"But," returned Walter, "if you are a priest, you are a sacrificing priest, for sacrificing is essential to priesthood; and if you are a sacrificing priest, you are a massing priest, for what other sacrifice have the priests of the new law, as distinct from mere laics, to offer to God, but that of the Eucharist, which we call the Mass? If, then, you are no massing priest, you are no sacrificing priest; if no sacrificing priest, no priest at all, and consequently no bishop.†"

The bishop moved uneasily in his seat during this address, which was delivered with a sudden burst of eloquence that enforced silence.

"What dost thou mean by this prisoner?" said the judge: "art thou a priest of Rome, and thus a traitor?"

"I am," said Walter, "a Catholic priest, ordained by authority from the Pope, who alone has power to send forth priests; but I am no traitor. And according to this law, you would condemn Christ Himself, seeing He also was a priest, according to the order of Melchisedec."

"This fine language and pleading will avail thee nothing; you will not acknowledge the supremacy of the queen?"

"Not so, my lord," answered Walter; "I acknowledge Elizabeth my queen in all temporal matters, God be my witness; I have ever prayed for her, and would serve her to the best of my poor powers. I have never incited any one to rebellion against her, but have ever taught and maintained our duty to her as our sovereign."

"But," said the judge, "thou wilt not confess her to be the supreme governess of the Church of England?"

"No," answered Walter, "for it is contrary to Scripture that any woman can be the head of the Church, seeing that Christ Himself gave that dignity to St. Peter and his successors for ever."

"Tush, tush!" answered the judge; "this is folly. Wilt thou take the oath of supremacy or not?"

"No, my lord."

"Then thou must die."

"My lord, I am ready," said the prisoner; "for it is better to die with a good conscience for the faith of Christ, than to live in this miserable world having denied Him."

"Neither canst thou deny," said the judge, "having heard confessions of both men and women, having offered the damnable idolatry of the Mass, having blessed beads, and carried about Agnus Dei and crucifixes. Witnesses are here ready to prove it."

"Nay, my lord," said Walter, "let not men perjure themselves for the sake of shedding my blood. Well do I know that the witnesses waiting here can prove nothing against me; but beforehand I am ready to plead guilty to all of this. But again I say, in the name of all truth and justice, what treason is there in exercising the functions of my ministry, seeing that Christ Himself gave power to His priests to forgive sins, as we read in the Holy Gospels, and also to offer up the Mass—the unbloody sacrifice of His body and blood? And for the rest"—

"Enough, enough," said the judge; "no more of this blasphemous folly. Good master jurors, ye have heard this man condemned out of his own mouth. Ye well know the pestilent rebellions that are fostered by these men, who have presumed, against her majesty's express command, to be made priests beyond seas, and to return hither to this country and celebrate Masses, which are strictly prohibited, hindering likewise the people from going to church, and beguiling them with Popish fables. And ye, my good masters, what need that I speak further? Ye know your duty, as loyal and loving subjects of Elizabeth our queen (whom God preserve), is to bring in the prisoner guilty of the charges laid against him."

There was a short silence and one of the two ladies in the gallery almost gasped for breath as she bent over into the court below. The suspense was not long; the juries of free England in the days of "good Queen Bess" were too well trained to hesitate.

"My lord, we find the prisoner guilty."

Constance's eager look was directed to the bar; a smile of celestial joy shone on the face of the prisoner, and though Constance could not, Arthur Leslie heard him murmur, "Lord, I thank Thee."

The Recorder of London bent forward and said—"Prisoner, thou art a young man; have mercy on thyself, go to church, and thou shalt be pardoned."*

Walter turned round towards the crowded court. "Good people, I pray you to hearken; if I will go to church I shall be free—how then can I die for treason? See ye well, I die for priesthood alone, and for doing that which our Lord Himself commanded, saying, 'Go, teach all nations.' I returned into this realm for no other purpose than to administer the Sacraments of Christ, and to reclaim to Him such of His sheep as, through ignorance or malice, had strayed from Him. And so it will continue; for this religion, being divine, can never fail, and if you condemn one and put another to death, others will be ready to preach to you the faith of Christ crucified."

"Silence the prisoner," said the judge in wrath. "Stand forth, Master de Lisle, for thou art an obstinate recusant, and listen to thy sentence."

Yes, listen to it, heir of the De Lises; freeborn Englishman, listen to it:—

"Thou art guilty of death for the sole crime of exercising thy priestly office in this free land under this most just and gracious queen." "In three days from this thou shalt be carried on a hurdle to Tyborne, there hanged, and thy body disembowelled and quartered; and may God have mercy on thy soul! Amen."

A shudder ran through the court. Many men, as well as women, were in tears.

"Courage, my friend," whispered the ambassadress, as she held the half-fainting Constance in her arms; "my husband will intercede for him; one so noble shall not die thus; he will be saved." Alone in all that multitude there was one unmoved.

"Like a dog as they die at Tyborne, mother," said the boy baron a few years back, leaning on his mother's breast, and she shuddered.

"Te Deum laudamus: te Dominum confitemur,"* said the hunted priest in joyous accents; and perchance one voice in the heavenly choirs, as they saw the things of earth pass before their gaze, echoed more exultingly—"Tu, devicto mortis aculeo, aperuisti credentibus regna celorum."†

CHAPTER XI.

"If the love of God is in your heart, you can easily understand that to suffer for God is an enjoyment to which all the pleasures of the world cannot even be compared. I assure you there are not in all Salamanca chains or irons enough to prevent me from wishing for more for the love of Him in whose honor I wear this which appears to you too heavy.—ST. IGNATIUS LOYOLA

CONDEMNED to death! Oh, word of exceeding dread—word that the sick heart of the criminal can hardly realize, even while he shudders with horror! Death, not to the life almost ebb'd out by sickness, but to those through whose veins the free blood courses, and who feel within them the vigor and energy of strength. In Walter's case, the strong constitution of the De Lises had triumphed over the sufferings of prison, and health was fast returning. His hands were the greatest sufferers; the right wrist was totally dislocated, and he could only with great difficulty use the left. On his return to prison from court, he was placed in a larger and more commodious cell, in which there were a bedstead, table, and chairs, and writing materials were furnished to him by the jailer. One mark of severity was still retained, by replacing the irons on his legs,—they could not attempt to put them on the arms already so tortured.

"Nay, nay, my Arthur," exclaimed Walter, as the former entered the cell with a face expressive of deep affliction, "not thus must thou enter the 'bridegroom's chamber.' Bring to me no sad looks, no sighs and tears. Is it not what I have desired—was it not humbly hoping for this end that, by thy good aid, I landed on the Essex coast?"

"But for so short a time," answered Arthur, "for so few months,—if thou hadst labored for years;—but to be cut off in thy youth, ere men know what is in thee!"

* We praise Thee, O God; we acknowledge Thee, O Lord.

† Thou, the sting of death being overcome, open to believers the kingdom of heaven.

"God's time is the best, my friend," said Walter; "and surely it was not long that my dear father in Christ, Edmund Campian, was permitted to labor, and yet who left behind so bright a witness! Dear friend and father," continued Walter, looking up, "shall I soon see thee again, and thy face, on which Heaven shed its light even on earth, radiant in the vision of Jesus? Ah, Arthur, would thou couldst have seen him!"

"Yes, he must have been wonderful, when even the queen's curiosity was raised to do so."

"Was it? I never heard that."

"Oh yes," said Arthur. "From the Tower, when almost rent asunder with the racking, he was taken before her; she wanted to see the man, she said, who, having made Europe ring with his name, could spurn every hope of life to die a felon's death; and she looked on him and saw one who trembled not at her frown, nor fawned for her smile. Verily it must have been a new sight for her highness."

"May his prayers win for her light and repentance," said Walter. "Now, my Arthur, I must trust to thee to let the faithful know I am about to die, and entreat their prayers for me in my last conflict; and, Arthur, dost thou think it is possible to find a priest who in charity could come to me, now Father Paterson is in Bridewell? I think there must be another in London, since my imprisonment hath been known."

"I will try," answered Arthur. "If one can be found, I will convoy him hither."

"How much have I to thank thee for, my true friend!" said Walter. "My poor prayers for you will be heard at last, and a reward shall fall on you for your generous devotion."

Arthur did not reply, but going towards the bed on which Walter was lying, he knelt down by the side and hid his face in his hands.

"Is it so in very truth?" said Walter, in a tone thrilling with joy. "Wilt thou, indeed, choose Christ and His Cross for thy portion?"

"Yes, father," he answered, with tears, "the 'almost' is gone. I cast in my lot with Christ for aye. Hear my confession, father, and give me to drink of the waters of eternal life."

Towards evening in the same day, Walter lay down to sleep. During the day the cell had been thronged with visitors. The French ambassador came to express his deep sorrow that his intercession for the life of Father de Lisle had proved unavailing, and that it was evident Walter was the object of bitter hatred to some one at court. Many other Catholics came to make their confessions to Walter, and receive his last counsel and blessing; and none ever forgot those words of sweetness and strength. It was remarked afterwards, that none of those who had seen Walter in his last hours ever fell away from the faith.

While Walter slept, another stranger entered the cell; he trod softly, and going up to the bed, bent over the sleeper, and as he gazed, the tears gathered in his eyes. "Is it possible?" he whispered to himself—"Is this the boy I saw last at the wrestling-match in the college grounds at Rheims, when every eye was on him because of his manly beauty, and the wonderful strength he displayed, and which had been concealed in his slight, lithe form?"

Walter's lips moved, and he spoke in his dream, "Not as I, but as Thou;" and in another moment he awoke, and looked up in his visitor's face. Then came a wondering look of half recognition.

"Is it you, Basil?"

"Yes," answered his friend; "it is Basil Tavers."

Walter was silent for a minute from deep emotion.

"I fell asleep, praying that if it were His will, a priest might be sent to me, and in answer you come. Verily, my cup runneth over with consolation."

On the morning of the following day, Walter was again alone, when the door opened, and the jailer ushered in two ladies closely veiled.

They came forward, and kneeling, entreated the priest's blessing.

"I can hardly raise my hand to give it to you, my daughters;"

he answered, smiling, "but I will essay my best: 'The God of all might strengthen you, and give you courage to serve Him unto the end.'"

One of the visitors now threw back her veil, and Walter recognized Rose Ford.

"Ah, my child, come to bid me farewell. Nay, weep not, there is no cause for sorrow; rather thank God for me. Is your companion also known to me?"

"She desires to remain disguised," replied Rose; "and I fath'r, come hither with a message from my mistress. She hath made great exertions to procure your pardon, but the difficulties have been many; at last, however, she has succeeded, and the queen pardons you."

A shade of deep disappointment passed over Walter's face, and he said in a low tone, as to himself, "I am not worthy; as Thou wiltest in all things,"

Then turning again to Rose, he said—

"Thank the duchess for me, Rose, for her charity. A pardon I did not expect nor desire. Nevertheless, a longer life will be an opportunity of serving God longer, and making myself more fit to see Him hereafter. Let her not deem me ungracious, Rose; but thou as a Catholic canst understand that to snatch water from the thirsty is less painful than to bid back to life's hard battle the soul that longed to be with God."

"But there are conditions to this pardon," said Rose.

"Ha! of what nature, I pray you?"

"You must give up exercising all priestly functions, and reside as a simple gentleman either here or abroad:—if here, concealing your faith as far as possible."

Walter's face was radiant again.

"Most happy conditions," he said, "since they permit me lawfully to refuse this pardon. And, my child, when you thank the duchess, as you must do for me, most gratefully, for her zeal in procuring that for me which I cannot accept, try and make her understand how low, how utterly worthless would be the life that is offered on such terms. Forswear my priesthood! forswear God's greatest, noblest, grandest gift to man! Does not the soldier die for his glory? Does not the king die for his crown? Does not even the merchant die for his gold? And why should we be backward, as soldiers of the Cross, the co-heirs of the kingdom, the stewards of the treasure house? Tell her, Rose, that the only wisdom is to love Christ, and the only folly to despise Him. Tell her that the longest life without a care, the fairest visions of youth perfectly fulfilled, is not to be compared for one moment to the joy of the prison and the rack, and the looking forward to Tyborne. I choose this last of my own free will, a thousand times; and she, when she comes to die, will feel, too, the truth of my words. Oh! that ere that day comes upon her, she may have learned to know the nothingness of earth, the greatness of eternity; and may have learned to dare all things to win Christ."

There was a short pause, and both his auditors were weeping.

"I have a favor to ask of the duchess, Rose; it is that she will do what she can to comfort and help, after my death, Lady Beauville. I hear her life has been spared, thanks to God; she is yet unconscious; but when she recovers she will need comfort. Ask your mistress to do what she can for her; and now I must bid you farewell, my children. Yet stay," and he took from his vest a small and well-worn rosary. "Carry this to the duchess as my last gift; it is the rosary of the Seven Dolours of Mary. It has its value, for it longed to my dear mother, who often bathed it in tears; it hath been a consolation likewise to me. It may seem a strange present to the noble and prosperous lady; nevertheless, when dolor comes on her, as it does one day to all the children of earth, the thought of what the heart of Mary, pierced with that sharp sword, endured, may comfort her. God bless you, my children, and fill you with His benedictions. I beseech your charitable prayers for me."

Rose dropped her veil, and drawing the arm of her companion within her own, they passed from the cell through the long passages into the free air. The lady clung to Rose's arm, and her frame trembled with convulsive sobs. When they reached home, C's stance (for it is easy to penetrate her disguise) went to her own room, and remained alone for many hours.

But Walter had yet one visitor to see: once again the door opened, and a woman entered; she was not veiled, but a large cloak and hood enveloped her tall, gaunt figure. Walter started as he beheld her; the face was so wan and haggard, and the large eyes glared wildly upon him. She stood still without speaking.

"What can I do for you, my daughter?" said the priest.

She came nearer. "I have come to see my victim, and to let you see your murderess."

Her eyes, fixed on Walter's face, beheld that not a muscle moved. He looked at her with the same compassionate glance.

"I am ignorant how thou hast wronged me; will you tell me, and are you a Catholic?"

"Once, once," she said, wildly. "Oh! talk not of that—of these days gone by, to the lost, the perishing!"

"Nay," said Walter, "tell me of them; it will ease thy aching heart, which is breaking 'neath the burden of memory."

"Thou didst dwell once secure in innocence and peace; then sin entered the paradise, and with it misery. See; have I not guessed rightly?"

She was crouching on the ground now, and weeping those agonizing tears which they only shed whose eyes have been dry for many years; and at last, in broken accents, the story came.

Young, lovely, but lowly born, Maud Felton had become one of the numerous victims of Lord Leicester's vice. Cast off for a newer toy, the favorite gave her over to the care of Eliot. She would have escaped from him, and soon ended her wretched existence, had not her child been born. Eliot, who desired to keep her as a slave, saw his advantage, used Leicester's name, and told her that in event of disobedience the child should be taken from her, and so she dragged on a life of misery. A ray of light had been shed on it by the visits and consolation of Rose Ford, who had accidentally found her out. We know the information that Eliot compelled her to procure from Rose; and the discovery of what she had done, and the falsity of Eliot's words, had driven her almost frantic.

All this was related to Walter, and she added, "You are already avenged, father. From the hour of your condemnation, my child sickened, and this morning she died."

"Then I shall see her ere you do," answered Walter, gently.

"Oh! my poor child, how is it that that deep mother's love of yours, which could not part with her on earth, can consent to part with her for aye?"

A groan of anguish burst from Maud.

"Why not turn now to God, and after leading a life of penance, rejoin your child in the light of God's kingdom? As for me, reproach not yourself so bitterly. You did not intend to work my death, and it was but a few days sooner. Eliot would speedily have tracked me; but if you think you have wronged me so much, grant me then a favor that shall cancel the debt."

"I will father," she said, looking up eagerly; "but what is it possible I can do?"

"Repent," said the priest, solemnly, "not with the wildness of despair, but with utter abasement of hope. Seek Rose Ford, tell her you have seen me; and I commend you to her care. She will hide you from Eliot, teach you the new path you are about to enter and bring you to a priest. Wilt promise me this my child?"

"Oh! call me not that, father," she said, shrinking back; "I—the outcast!"

"Nay," said Walter, "the Gospel tells us that 'when he was yet a great way off, his Father saw him, and had compassion on him.' Are we not the faint shadows only of His fatherly heart? Be of good cheer, my daughter, and give me thy promise;" and it was given, and Maud quit the cell.

LIRA CATHOLICA.

THE evening of the same day had come. Walter was lying down, and Arthur Leslie sat at the table engaged in writing letters from Walter's dictation. They were interrupted by the entrance of the jailer. "I bring thee bad news, Master de Lisle."

"Indeed!" answered Walter, with his usual smile; "let me hear thee, friend."

"Thou art to die to-morrow."

"Impossible!" cried Arthur, starting up; "the sentence said three days, and lo! to-morrow is the second."

"'Tis no fault of mine," returned the man; "but express orders have come that the execution take place to-morrow."

"'Tis well!" said Walter. "Arthur, hold thy peace for an instant. My friend," said he to the jailer, "thou hast brought me the joyfullest tidings that ever I heard! At what hour, I pray thee, must I be ready?"

"Thou art to leave this at eight o'clock; and for to-night, sir, whatever indulgence thou dost crave thou shalt have. Most prisoners like to feast the night before they are executed, and to take leave merrily of earth. Wouldst like a flask of wine for thy supper?"

"No, friend," said Walter; "I am going to my feasting, not to leave it."

"I trust me, good master," returned the jailer, "thou wilt not forget my poor services; I have been as lenient as mine office permits."

"Thou hast," said Walter; "be sure I will not forget thee, and, ere, I die, will give thee the best reward I can."

The jailer left the cell; and as he went along the passage he muttered to himself,— "They are a strange set. How he rejoices to die! Hark, how those wretches who are to die with him howl and rage! Alack, 'now from the saint I must go to the devils.'"*

"Dear Arthur," said Walter to his friend, "I desire to pass the night in prayer and vigil; wilt thou ask Father Travers to come to me, if possible, at sunrise to-morrow?"

"Yes, father," said Arthur; "but I know now why this new order hath come. The queen takes boat to-morrow from Westminster to Greenwich, and it is designed to draw off the people's attention from Tyborne. I will hasten, however, to let all I can know of the trick."

"Ah, Arthur," said Walter, laying his hand caressingly upon him, "didst thou but know the joy this news gives me, thou wouldst not be so angry with Walsingham."

But as the night passed on, the calm and happiness that surrounded Walter departed, and as great heaviness and agony overshadowed him: it was often thus with the martyrs, the more to liken them to their Lord. Into such an agony we cannot enter, or attempt to sound its mysterious depths. The early dawn brought with it a comforter, better than an Angel. Basil Travers said Mass in Walter's cell, and Arthur served; and thus Walter received his viaticum. From that moment peace returned, and, happy as he had always been until the night before, he seemed now filled with a celestial joy.

"Arthur," he said, "thou must be my groom to-day, and tire me bravely, seeing my poor hands cannot help themselves. Let me be well apparelled for my bridal day."

At length eight o'clock arrived, and the jailer came for Walter. The prisoner rose with alacrity, his irons were knocked off, and giving the jailer some gold pieces, he passed, accompanied by Basil and Arthur, into the outer court of the prison. The hurdle was ready, and a companion was waiting for Walter. He was one of a gang of notorious highwaymen, wild and ferocious-looking, with an aspect of sullen despair; it was with some difficulty he was bound down with ropes to the hurdle; and then came Walter's turn. He came forward, and making the holy sign, knelt for a moment in prayer, and then, without waiting to be forced, or even helped into it, he leapt into the straw, and "composed himself upon it as if he had been riding in triumph."* Many Catholics had gained admission to the prison, and were weeping bitterly. "Why weep ye for me," said Walter, "who am glad at heart of this hap y day?"

"Well," said one jailer to another, as the hurdle moved from the prison, "assuredly this man dies for a good cause!"

Walter was bound to the hurdle by cords passed over his legs only, on account of the already crippled condition of his hands. The prison-gates were opened, and the hurdle, closely guarded by pursuivants, made its way into the midst of a vast multitude. Walter raised himself, and blessing the people, exclaimed, "God save you all; God bless you, and make you all good Catholics!"†

The great multitude swayed to and fro, as the guards beat a passage with their staves, crying "Back, in the queen's name." As the procession went on, the crowd grew less dense than immediately outside the prison. The windows of the houses on each side were thrown open, and their inhabitants were standing there, some weeping, most gazing with wondering enriosity. At the open window of one large house were collected a remarkable group. The French ambassador was kneeling forward, near him knelt also his wife, and between her and Rose Ford knelt the duchess of Bertram, holding in her arms her youngest child, while her eldest was by her side.

No word passed between them and Walter. Reverently they all bowed their heads while the mangled hand of the martyr was raised in benediction.

The first feeling of the idle mob had been rather one of compassion for the victims; but as this wore off, the spirit of mischief came into play, and some amused themselves by throwing stones and mud at the hurdle. It roused Walter's companion, who had hitherto lain still, to utter a volley of fearful oaths and curses, and to attempt to defend himself. This, from having both hands and feet bound, was impossible, and his angry and unavailing withings diverted the mob so much, that they redoubled their annoyance. A shower of mud covered Walter and his companion, and one ruffian in the crowd, getting near the hurdle, spat into Walter's face, exclaiming, as he did it, "There's holy water for ye." The man by Walter's side was so excited by this, that, making a tremendous effort, he broke the cord that bound his arms, and turned towards Walter to wipe off the insult. Walter cast on him his glance of sweet serenity—

"Thank ye, my friend, for this kindly office; I need not fear more now."

"'Tis a shame to treat thee so," muttered the man; "thou hast done no crime, save refusing to chop and change thy religion at the queen's will. I like thy courage, for my part. Well, good father, it is soon over for both of us now, and then we go—thou to heaven, I to hell."

Walter, who had been looking earnestly at him said—

"What is thy name, friend?"

"Ralph Woodbine," answered the man roughly.

"Art thou a Catholic?"

"I have served no God save the devil all my life. My mother was a Catholic, and my father too, for that matter, in Queen Mary's time; but he changed when Queen Bess came to the crown, and my mother broke her heart and died, because he would bring me up in his fashion."

"And what did he teach thee?"

"Why, nothing. Marry, then, what had he to teach? The God he served was to keep his place as steward in the royal buttery, and get rich, and leave his riches to me; and he has lived to see me here;" and Ralph laughed hoarsely.

"Ralph," answered Walter, "we are going together to death, let us go together to heaven."

"Alas! good master, art thou distraught? Did I not tell thee I have served the devil well, and am to be hung for my crimes, as I deserve?"

"You have served Satan in life," said Walter, "and it suffices; serve him not in death. Thou hast not forgotten thy mother, and thy childhood, when thou knelt by her side, and heard the holy mass. She is dead long since, you say, and is with God; I too had a mother who died praying for me; perchance from that sky above us they, with God's chosen ones, are leaning to see us die! Oh, how mightily they pray for us!" and as he spoke he raised his eyes with a look of such rapt faith and devotion, that one might almost dream, like St. Stephen, he saw heaven open. "And another mother prays for you Ralph," he continued; "Sancta Maria Mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus, nunc et in hora mortis nostræ."

The words struck on Ralph's ear with a strange appealing sound. The tears were falling down his rough hard face. "Alas, father, I am too great a sinner; there is no repentance for me, a wretch, a villain! No, no; hell gapes for me! I saw it last night in my sleep, and for the first time in my life I knew what fear was; but there is no hope for me."

"Thou art not a greater sinner," the priest replied, "than he who hung on the cross by the side of JESUS, or she that washed His feet; thou canst recollect the time when, at thy mother's knees, thou heardest the tale of mercy! He has said, "If thy sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow." Ralph thou believest in God, in Christ the Saviour, and that in His Church He hath left pardon for sins?"

"I believe," sobbed Ralph; the hard heart was broken in the anguish of that hour, and on that rude death-bed the work of reconciliation went on. The mob pelt them still, and jeer them, as they pass. The hurdle shakes and jolts along the rough road, and up the long Holborn Hill, but they heed not the one, feel not the other—that sinner who sobs out his sins and his repentance; that priest who, for the last time on earth, absolves his Master's sheep. Soon, very soon, he must stand before that Master to render his account, and he is winning one more soul to lay before those feet.

And now they have reached the top of the hill, and the houses, which have been getting gradually few and straggling, have ceased altogether, and they have reached the Hospital of St. Giles in the Fields, and there, according to an old custom, a cup of wine or ale was offered to the prisoners, "their last refreshment in this life!"* Then, for the first time, did Walter betray some emotion. He gazed on the full cup of good red wine, and the tears came into his eyes, and he refused to drink. Ralph, parched with thirst, drank eagerly, and then urged Walter to do the same, but he would not, and Arthur Lisle knew that his thoughts were of the "gall and vinegar" of his Lord's last cup on earth. A crowd having collected at this place of stoppage, Walter began to speak to them. "Good people, ye know for what cause I am about to die;" but he was rudely checked by the guards, and the hurdle again put in motion.

There will not be any more houses till they reach the little village of Tyborne. It was a lovely day, one of those cloudless days in summer, when hardly a fleecy cloud can be seen in the clear intensely blue sky. The birds carolled gaily past, unmindful and unknowing of cruelty and wrong on earth, and in the fields the little flowers, England's own meadow flowers, rejoiced in their beauty, and sent up their worship to their Creator. And so the long procession reached Tyborne.

It was a sight, in very truth; the fields immediately surrounding the place of execution were filled with people; it was one dense mass of heads. Nearer the gallows and scaffold, which were on the edge of the road, were numerous coaches and horsemen. It was roughly computed, afterwards, that of these there were from six to seven hundred, and the crowd of people on foot about twenty thousand. However many people had gone to see the queen step into her royal barge, there were enough left to be a more numerous body of witnesses than Elizabeth would have desired. Among the horsemen, there was one mounted on a dark gray horse, who was determined in his efforts to place himself in good sight of the gallows, and by great perseverance, and many winning words, he succeeded in his purpose. Arthur Leslie, on foot, was close beside the scaffold, he had struggled through the crowd with the strength love ever gives to be near the loved and suffering. The tall gallows rose grim and dark before the spectator's eyes, but loving hands had endeavored to rob it of some of its horrors, for it was twined with wreaths of green and summer flowers, and the ground directly around was strewn with green leaves and sweet-smelling herbs. The affectionate hearts who had prepared these tokens were rewarded when they heard of the smile of pleasure which lit up the martyr's face as he perceived them. Close to the gallows stood the scaffold, raised some feet above the ground, and formed of rough planks. The hangman's two assistants were there, holding in their hands the cords for binding the victims, and the long knives for the inhuman butchery which was to ensue. The hangman himself was busy at the gallows. On one side of the scaffold was the sheriff of the county and some of his officers, together with three or four Protestant ministers, who had come thither with the hope of winning a recantation from Walter, or of preventing any dying words of his having weight with the people. The hurdle stopped; the prisoners were released and led to the scaffold. There was a great hum among the crowd when Walter made his appearance. Despite all he had gone through, there was a majesty and a patrician grace about his tall and noble figure, and though torture and suffering had done their work, there lingered much of that manly beauty which had gladdened his mother's eye long years before.

"Let the highwayman be put to death first," said the sheriff; "and perchance, sir, thou, by this grievous sight, may be led to crave the queen's grace even now."

"Farewell, then, my son," said Walter, turning to Ralph; and he would have embraced him had not the latter fallen at his feet, and kissed them with many tears.

And now Walter was compelled to witness the horrible spectacle of Ralph's death.

"Make him look at it all," whispered one of the ministers to the sheriff.

No need of such counsel. The priest knew his duty too well, and faltered not; he held up the crucifix before Ralph's eyes, and bade him call on his Lord for patience. The agony was fearful, and shrieks and cries burst from the dying sufferer. Walter prayed earnestly for Ralph and for himself: "Lord, give us grace to endure unto the end."

At length one frightful cry, and then it ended. Upon the poor, panting, bleeding corpse earth could do no more.

"Now, Master de Lisle," said the sheriff, "'tis thy turn; unless, indeed, thou wilt repent and go to church."

"Nay," said Walter, "better a thousand deaths than deny Christ. I desire of your favor but a short space to speak to the people."

"No, no," cried the ministers with one voice; "let him not pervert the people."

The sheriff was quite willing to forbid it; but the people were determined to hear the speech,—and the will of a great mob is generally omnipotent,—and so Walter stepped forward and began his address;—

"Good people and dear countrymen, harken unto me. My religion is the Roman Catholic; in it I now die, and so fixedly die, that if all the good things in this world were offered me to renounce it, all should not remove one hair's breadth from my Roman Catholic faith. A Roman Catholic I am; a Roman Catholic priest I am; a Roman Catholic priest of that religious order called the Society of JESUS I am; and I bless God who first called me, and I bless the hour in which I was first called to these functions. Many that are here present heard my trial, and can testify that nothing was laid to my charge but priesthood: if to be a Catholic priest is to be a traitor, then indeed I am one! this is the cause for which through the whole world, taught through all ages, from Christ's time, and will be taught for all ages to come. For this cause I most willingly sacrifice my life, and I look upon it as my greatest happiness that my most good God has chosen me (most unworthy) to this blessed lot, the lot of the saints; I have deserved a worse death: for though I have been a faithful and true subject to my queen, I have been a grievous sinner against God. Thieves and robbers that rob on highways would have served God in a greater perfection than I have done, had they received so many favors and graces from Him as I have. But as there was never sinner who truly repented and called to JESUS for mercy, to whom He did not show mercy, so I hope, by the merits of His passion, He will have mercy on me, who am heartily sorry that I ever offended Him. Whomsoever, present or absent, I have ever offended, I humbly desire them to forgive me; as for my enemies, I freely forgive them all, and singularly, and especially all who have thirsted after my blood. I wish their souls so well that, were it in my power, I would seat them seraphim in heaven. And I beg of the goodness of my God, with all the fervor I am able, and most humbly entreat Him that He would drive from you that are Protestants the darkness of error, and enlighten your minds with the rays of truth; and you who are Catholics I say, fear God, honor your queen, be firm in your faith; avoid mortal sin by frequenting the sacraments of Holy Church; patiently bear your afflictions and persecutions; forgive your enemies. Your sufferings are great; I say be firm in your faith to the end, yea, even to death; then shall you heap unto yourselves celestial treasures in the heavenly Jerusalem, where no robber robbeth, no moth eateth, and no rust consumeth. Bear me witness, all my hearers, that I profess all the articles of the Roman Catholic faith in that Church, one, holy, catholic, and apostolic; that Church which is to continue to the consummation of the world. Whatever that Church of God hath by revelation from Him, whatever that Church hath taught me and commanded me to believe, I believe it to an iota. And as to what is said of Catholics having dispensations for lying, perjury, killing kings, and other the most enormous crimes, I declare it a most wicked and malicious calumny cast upon us.*"

"Cease, cease, Master de Lisle," said the sheriff, "time presses, and it is enough; prepare to die."

Walter turned from the edge of the scaffold, and was about to pray. One of the ministers came forward—

"Good brother repent thee of thy errors, and let me pray with thee for mercy on thy misguided soul."

Walter looked at him, saying gently—

"My friend, you and I are not one in religion, wherefore I pray you content yourself. I bar none of prayer, only I desire them of the household of faith to pray with me, and in my agony to say one creed."†

"Then," replied the minister, rudely, "if thou prayest at all, pray in English, and not in an unknown tongue."

"I will pray," replied Walter, gently, "in a language I well understand."

"Misguided man," said another minister, "we bid thee pray as Christ taught."

An involuntary smile passed over Walter's face."

"What! do you think Christ taught in English?"

"Pray for the queen," said the sheriff, sternly.

"I have and do," said Walter.

"But do you pray for Elizabeth, the queen?" said the sheriff.

"Yea," answered Walter, "for Elizabeth, your queen and my queen. I now at this instant pray my Lord God to make her His servant in this life, and after this life co-heir with Jesus Christ."

And then there was silence, such a silence as there could be amidst an eager multitude; and the executioners adjusted the rope, and sharpened their knives; and Walter prayed with closed eyes, and hands crossed on his breast. He opened his eyes at length, and earnestly looked among the crowd, till they rested on the rider of the dark-gray horse; then he bowed his head down low, and at the same moment the rider raised his hand, and the last absolution fell on the soul of the martyr.

The hangman now came up, and, kneeling down, implored pardon for the deed he was about to end.

"Most willingly do I forgive thee," said Walter, giving him some pieces of gold he had brought with him for the purpose.

The man began to take off the upper garments of the priest; and while he did so, Walter cast one glance round on the world he was about to leave. On one hand stretched the large forest of St. John, which covered the country in the direction of Edgeware, and its tall trees waved proudly in the summer light. Towards Paddington the country was more bare, and like a little distant speck was that farmhouse where Walter said his last Mass.* On the other side, the smooth, green meadows sloped down towards the river, and far off were seen the oxen quietly grazing. Farther in the distance the silver Thames rippled in the sunlight, and the glorious Abbey of Westminster stood out clearly in its beauty. One glance around, and one other into the clear blue sky, and then the hangman came near to put the rope round the priest's neck; and Walter took hold of it and kissed it, and then put it on his shoulders, saying, "Behold the last stole of my priesthood." He closed his eyes, and clasping his hands, he said, "In manus tuas Domine commendo spiritum meum." The rope was drawn tight, and the plank on which he stood withdrawn from under his feet; but the very next instant the sheriff gave a sign, and though the people cried eagerly, "Hold, hold," the rope was cut, and Walter dropped on the scaffold, insensible, but not dead. Hastily they stripped him, and then began that scene of butchery which would have disgraced a heathen nation, and which we shrink from describing; nevertheless, as was beautifully said in speaking of the sufferings of martyrs in the olden times, "what they endured, we may bear to hear of." The design was to cut open the body till they found the heart. They literally began to cut him in pieces. Groans and sobs were heard on all sides, and many tears were shed, and some of the senseless rabble yelled and howled like brute beasts. The executioners growing timid, did their work badly, and cut and stabbed, scarce knowing what they were about. The first incision of the knives had woken Walter to full consciousness; the executioners flew upon him to bind him down. There was no need, he lay perfectly still; the sweat gathered in heavy drops upon his brow; and as the agony increased, from his mouth, eyes, and nose ran down blood and water; † but there was neither groan nor cry from those lips. They spoke, indeed, but it was one word only, "JESU, JESU, be to me a JESU!" The work was accomplished, and the quivering heart was torn from its place and held before the fast-glazing eyes, and then placed on a spear and shown to the howling multitude. "O JESU, JESU," said the martyr once again, "I come to Thee, O sweet JESU!" and with these words the spirit was set free.

Then the head of the martyr was struck from his body, and in doing so the clumsy hangman let his axe first fall on the arm, and severed from it the right hand; it rolled over the scaffold, and was instantly perceived by Arthur Leslie, who contrived to take it up and conceal it. ‡ But the body of Walter was not, as usual with others, quartered and placed on London Bridge—Lord Beauville had no wish to be thus reminded of his kinsman—and so the remains were hastily thrown into a cart, and interred within the precincts of Newgate, as they would have buried a dog, without chant or prayer. So they deemed; but perchance their ears were too dull to hear sweet alleluias, and their eyes too blind to see angelic forms lay him softly in his grave, and kiss those limbs twice consecrated, once with the unction of the priesthood, and again with the martyr's blood. He sleeps there, the last of his line—not as his fathers do, 'neath sculptured altar tombs, with their deeds inscribed in marble—it matters not; for them they sang the Mass and chanted the Requiem, and gave abundant alms that the soul might rest in peace. No need of these for him. The white robes gleam in heaven with radiant brightness, for another is among their throng, and the martyrs wave their palms triumphantly, for another mortal hand grasps his and is crowned with them.

Hush, ye mourners by the scaffold of Tyborne, weep not so bitterly; the blood is dripping truly, and the green earth of England sucks it in; but look up, ye that weep for your father, look up and listen, there is "a sound of harpers harping with their harps."

Note.—"He reconciled, in the very act, one of the malefactors that were executed with him."—Life of Father Heath, O. S. F.

"When they arrived at Tyborne, they found the gibbet beautifully adorned with garlands and wreaths of flowers, and the ground all covered with odoriferous herbs and greens."—Life of Thomas Maxwell, Priest.

The instances of the martyrs surviving and speaking, after the heart had been extracted, are numerous.

CHAPTER XIII.

"Then, with slow reverent step
And beating heart,
From out thy joyous days
Thou must depart.

"And, leaving all behind,
Come forth alone,
To join the chosen band
Around the throne "

ADELAIDE PROCTOR.

It was over, and the pent-up hearts of the mourners had leisure to pour forth their griefs; but their sorrow had a soothing character: the loss to them was bitter, but the gain to him how great! When they recalled to mind each step of his weary pilgrimage, and then considered the end was reached—the victory won—they could not but rejoice, and turned away from Tyborne resolved to suffer manfully and follow in the way he had gone. To Arthur Leslie fell the task of delivering the letters that Walter had written from prison; and most of them had, indeed been written by Arthur himself, at Walter's dictation, but the trembling signature of the tortured hand of the martyr was there to enhance their value in the eyes of the recipients. These letters were three in number: one to Father Mordaunt, another to Sir Robert, and the third to Blanche and Mary. The one addressed to Sir Robert Thoresby was as follows:

"MY DEAREST UNCLE:—

"After many conflicts, mixed with spiritual consolations and Christian comforts, it hath pleased God, of His infinite mercy, to call me out of this vale of misery. To Him, therefore, for all His benefits, at all times and for ever, be all praise and glory. The tender care you have had for me, I trust, in heaven shall be rewarded. I am advertised that I am to end the course of this life; God grant I may do it in imitation of the servants of God, and may say joyfully with St. Andrew, risi from the hurdle, Salve sancta crux. Innocency is my only comfort against a forged villainy which is fathered on my fellow priests and me. Well, when by the high Judge, God Himself, this false vizard of treason shall be removed from Catholic men's faces, then shall it appear who they be that carry a well-meaning, and who an evil, murdering mind; in the mean season, God forgive all injustice; and if it be His blessed will to convert our persecutors, that they may become professors of His truth. Prayers for my soul procure for me, my loving kinsman; and so having great need to prepare myself for God, never greater in mind, nor less troubled towards God, binding up all my iniquities in His precious wounds I bid you farewell; yea, and once again, the lovingest uncle that ever kinsman had in this world, farewell.

"God grant us both His grace and blessing to the end, that living in His fear, and dying in His favor, we may enjoy one the other forever. Your good Nephew,

“WALTER DE LISLE, Priest.”*

To Father Mordaunt he wrote :—

“MOST REVEREND AND MOST DEAR FATHER,—

“As in duty I am bound never to forget you, who have ever had so tender and fatherly care of me, so now, especially, I must in no ways omit to write to you, being the last time I must salute you; for, unworthy though I be, I am to end my days in the just quarrel of my Lord and Master, Christ JESU.

“Alas, Father! what other thing can I desire than to suffer with Christ, to be reproached with Christ; to be crucified with Christ, to die a thousand deaths that I may live for ever with Christ? for if it be the glory of a soldier to be made like his lord, God forbid I should glory in anything but the cross of my crucified Lord. My greatest desire is to suffer; and I would I had as many lives to offer as I have committed sins. Dear father, prepare yourself always to suffer, and animate your spiritual children. God give me strength and courage, and make me glorify his glorious name by my death. Let me, therefore, dear father, be made partaker of your good prayers; and say, I beseech you, and procure others to say, some masses for my sinful soul. Commend me to all our most dear fathers and brothers of the Society of Christ my JESUS, in whose prayers, labors, and sacrifices as I have a share, so have I a great confidence. I have comfort in Christ JESU and his Blessed Mother, my good Angel, and all the Blessed Saints; and I have much comfort in the valiant and triumphant martyrs that are gone before me, and I do trust much in their good prayers.

“Once again, adieu! I take my last leave of you, and commit you to Christ JESU.

“Your poor debtor and Son,

WALTER DE LISLE, Priest.”*

The last was addressed to Blanche and to Mary :—

“MOST DEAR AND LOVING CHILDREN IN OUR LORD,—

“Be of good courage; hereafter at the pleasure of God, we shall meet in heaven: do not then weep, do not lament, do not take heavily my honorable death. Know you not that we are born once to die, and that always in this life we may not live?—know you not how vain, how wicked, how inconstant, how miserable this life of ours is?—do you not consider my calling, my estate, my profession?—do not you remember that I am going to a place of all felicity and pleasure? Why, then, should you weep, or mourn, or cry out? But, perhaps you will say, ‘We weep not so much for your death as we do for that you are hanged, drawn and quartered.’ Dear children, it is the favorablest, honorablest and happiest death that ever could have chanced unto me. I die not for knavery, but for verity; I die not for treason, but for religion; I die not for any ill-demeanor or offence committed, but only for my faith, for my conscience, for my priesthood, for my blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ. We are not made to eat, drink, sleep, to go bravely, to feed daintily, to live in this wretched vale continually; but to serve God, to please God, to fear God, and to keep His commandments, which, when we cannot be suffered to do, then rather must we choose to lose our lives than to desire our lives. Be of good cheer, then, my most loving children, and cease from weeping; for would you not be glad to see me a bishop, a king, or an emperor? How glad, then, may you be to see me a martyr, a saint, a most glorious and bright star in heaven! My sins are great, I confess, but I flee to God’s mercy; my negligences are without number, I grant, but I appeal to my Redeemer’s clemency; I have no boldness but in His blood, His bitter passion is my only consolation. It is comfortable that the prophet has recorded that ‘He hath written us in His hands.’ Oh, that He would vouchsafe to write Hims in our hearts. All that dulls me has been delay of my death; it was not without cause that our Master said Himself, ‘Quod facis fac cito;’ for I had hoped ere this, casting off the bod of this death, to have kissed the precious glorified wounds of my sweet Saviour, sitting on the throne of His Father’s own glory. Commend me to all my spiritual children, wheresoever they are now sorrowing; remind them that the joy of this life is nothing, and the joy of the after-life is everlasting. It is said on Friday next I shall be possible; God grant me humility, that, following His footsteps, I may obtain the victory. God comfort you, my children; Jesus save your souls, and send you to His glory.

Farewell, farewell, ten thousand times!

Your loving father in the Lord,

WALTER DE LISLE, Priest.”*

There was indeed, a fourth letter, written altogether by Walter himself, at many intervals, and at the cost of much agony. No eye save his own saw its contents; he sealed it and addressed it to the Countess of Beauville. But Isabel was unable to read the letter of her dead brother. Her life had for weeks hung on a thread, but on the day of Walter’s condemnation the fever abated; then followed a fearful exhaustion, and at length, gradually, strength seemed to return. For weeks she had never spoken, save in ravings, and her state had alternated between delirium and stupor. Now Rachel, and Rose, and Constance, who watched by her, waited anxiously for the moment when strength should bring conscience, and consciousness memory, and the hideous past should gleam before her eyes. But Isabel woke again to life, but not to reason. When she spoke, it was to talk of the days of her childhood, and she became amused at each passing trifle, as an infant, the past was one great oblivion—the physician gave it as his opinion that reason would return, if ever, only shortly before her death, and that she would probably recover much of her strength, and might live for years. This latter point decided, Constance hesitated no longer to take a step which was truly a taking up of her cross and confessing Christ. In the chapel of the French embassy, with no witness save her loving Rose, Constance was received into the One Church. On her return home, she told her husband. For a long time simple and unfeigned astonishment so filled the duke’s mind that he could not entertain any other idea. That Constance, his young and lovely wife, surrounded by all that could make life pleasant, should deliberately throw away all for religion’s sake, was to him simply incomprehensible. If she had been brought up a Catholic and kept to her faith, though that for his part he could not understand, still it would be more reasonable; but to adopt it, save only when it was the sovereign’s creed, and so a way to advancement, was incredible. He tried all his arguments, and Constance answered them in the same strain as St. Philip Neri’s What then? and each answer puzzled the duke more and more; and at last, weeping like a child, he reminded his wife that he had no power to shield her from the queen’s sentence, whatever it might be. Constance knew it well, and she knew too, as every Englishwoman did, that her beauty, and fidelity to her husband, and her freedom from the least taint of scandal, were not likely to advantage her in Elizabeth’s eyes. The royal sentence on the duchess was banishment from her husband’s house, to retire on a small allowance (the amount of which Elizabeth herself would fix), and never on any account again to see her children. They should run no chance of being taught their mother’s religion, and the queen appointed the Lady Fortesene, an elderly kinswoman of the Bertram family, and a bigoted Protestant, to bring up the children. In three days Constance must part with them. Alas! how the hours fled, counted by the mother’s aching heart; how fondly she watched over them, and how she strove gently to prepare them for a separation from her.

“But if we go away, you will soon come, mother?” said Lady Mary; and Constance said, “she hoped so.”

Alas! what death-like hopes.

“I will teach thee one prayer, my little Mary,” said Constance, fondly, "which thou shalt say each night; and when Harry grows older, thou shalt teach him too, but not till he is old enough to know that it is a secret—mother's secret, which you must tell no one."

And Mary, with a look of great importance, promised; and she repeated after her mother the words of the "Hail Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee; blessed art thou among all women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, JESUS. Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners, now and at the hour of our death. Amen."

A shadow of awe gathered on her childish face. "I will never forget it, mother, and say it every night when I think of you, before I go to sleep."

The day of parting came at last, and Lady Fortescue, stern, cold, and harsh, arrived to receive the children; and when Constance, with bursting heart, would have given her some of the counsels respecting them, which a mother's heart alone can give, she was repulsed by—

"Pardon me, your Grace, the mother who can forsake her children, is one who can meet with no sympathy from me."

And Constance turned away to hold her children for the last time in her arms. Her little lovely Mary, just six years old, and her noble boy of three, with his large, starlike eyes, and his playful ways, and a wisdom beyond his years—they cling to her neck and cover her with kisses, and cry and sob with all their childish misery at parting; but she knows well this will pass, and they will be taught to forget and despise the mother who loves them so wildly. She knows it, and she bears it all, and her heart is rent and broken within her. It is her torture-chamber and her racking. And now the desolate future lay before Constance; and in the midst of her agony, as before in her joys, she was thoughtful for others. She saw that Rachel's strength was rapidly giving way from the great strain on body and mind, attendant on Isabel's long illness, and her present trying state; and Constance knew that Rachel's prayer was that she might live to see Isabel recover even an hour's consciousness, and be reconciled to her God. Constance thought also of Rose and her future; for Rose's parents were dead, and her brothers scattered.

The duchess proposed to her brother that he should commit to her the care of his afflicted wife, and that they should together seek a refuge in France or Belgium. They would there be free from molestation, and the entire change of air and scene might possibly tend to restore Isabel's mind. The earl gladly consented. His wish now was to obtain a divorce, and by a second marriage perpetuate his family, and in his burning indignation against his sister, he desired to persuade the Duke of Bertram to follow his example. But this the duke, sorely afflicted, refused to do. Nothing could, however, suit the earl's plans better than the exile of Constance and Isabel, and he facilitated their speedy departure. They left London in the direction of Apswell, but turning sharply away when within a few miles of that place, they travelled the same road which, eleven years before, Walter de Lisle had passed in his hasty flight. A small vessel was in waiting, and the party embarked. Isabel was laid on cushions on the deck, and she laughed with childish glee at the foaming waves and the ropes and sails, while Rachel sat beside her, with tears rolling down her face. The proud Isabel, with her haughty intellect and her indomitable will, and this was the end! Rose, too, sat still and wept, and by her side sat a tall thin woman, on whose pale cheeks there burned one spot of red, and whose sunken eyes were glassy and bright, and who looked on the receding shore with no glance of sorrow or regret. The tears, indeed, rolled down her cheeks, but they came from a sorrow within—it was easy to see they were the constant tears of a penitent. There were no tears on Constance's face. She stood gazing at the white cliffs of England, until they grew dim in the distance. From the land where her children dwelt she raised her eyes to the clear sky above, and as she thought of the Love to which even a mother's is as a vain shadow, her bruised heart was still.

CHAPTER XIV.

"Now the heavy day is done,
Home awaits thee, wearied one."

FELICIA HEMANS.

"I am footsore and very weary,
But I travel to meet a friend:
The way is long and dreary,
But I know that it soon must end.

"Like a dream, all my toil will vanish,
When I lay my head on his breast;
But the journey is very weary,
And he only can give me rest!"

ADELAIDE PROCTOR.

MANY years have passed away, and we may cast one glance round upon the different characters in whose joys and sorrows we have taken some interest, and linger for a moment longer upon spots which have been associated with these events.

To an old, quaint town in Belgium, we must bend our steps. Threading our way along the narrow streets where the houses almost meet overhead, we come at last to a curious pile of buildings—a long low house on each side, and an old Gothic church in the middle. It is the Convent and Hospital of the Dames of St. Augustine, who break their cloister only to attend upon the sick and dying. The church is open to all comers, so we will open the door and walk in. It is a beautiful church, and from the glare of the summer's day there is coolness and refreshment in the shade of those long aisles and shadowy roof, and the sunlight falls through the stained glass in gorgeous hues upon the stone floor. In the portion set apart for the religious several nuns are kneeling in prayer. They wear the habit and scapular of white serge, the leathern belt, and straight black veil, which mark the daughters of St. Austin.

In the outer part of the chapel there hangs upon the wall a large and celebrated painting; it is of the "Mater Dolorosa." Before the picture is kneeling a lady dressed in black, and those who are in the habit of frequenting the church bear witness how constantly through the day that same slight figure is seen kneeling there, and those eyes, which are so often swollen with weeping, gaze long and lovingly on the face of Her who cried, "Is there any sorrow like unto my sorrow?" And those who knew Constance said afterwards that she told them she could think only of one of those seven sorrows which grieved the heart of Mary, and it was the three days' loss, when His mother "sought Him sorrowing." But on this day, while Constance knelt absorbed in prayer, a side door opened, and a nun entered, and beneath the habit of the Religious might be recognized the sweet features of Rose Ford. She bent for a few moments in earnest prayer; then approaching Constance, beckoned her from the church. When they were outside, she said, "There is a change;" and without another word they hastened to a large room in the hospital, in which Isabel was lying. For ten years had she lingered in darkness of mind, and, until the last few weeks, in the same state in which she had left England. She had not even missed Rachel, who, a few months after their arrival, died, literally of exhaustion and sorrow, blessing God that He had brought her to die within the shadow of His house, and with the strength of His sacraments, and praying with her last breath for the child of her love and devotion.

Beside Rachel's grave there was another, unmarked, save by a little cross; and the good nuns of the convent often prayed beside it, and mingled tears with their prayers, for they said that though she who rested there had been unable to speak their language, they knew assuredly her fervent penance had won favor with God, and if they prayed for her according to her last earnest message to them, she would plead for them before God's face.

Shortly after Rachel's death, Rose entered the convent, and received the habit of the order, and in due time was professed. She was, however, constantly sent, as well as other of the Religious, to assist Constance in the care of Lady Beauville. But latterly Isabel's strength had suddenly given way, wit out any apparent cause, and the physician declared death was at hand, and, with an intensity of anxiety, the watchers waited for some sign of reason, and fervent were the prayers that went up that this boon might be granted.

On each side of the bed knelt a nun, and a physician was standing near, while in one corner knelt Father Louis, the almoner of the hospital. There was a change on the sufferer's face, and she turned restlessly from side to side. She fixed her eyes on Constance as she entered.

"Constance, is it you?"

Constance bent over her. "Dearest, I am here."

"I see all, I know all," she murmured. "Forgive me, ere I die."

And Father Louis came near, and she said—"Father, bless me, for I have sinned deeply. Is there hope for me, father?"

And Father Louis answered—"He that cometh unto Me, I will in no wise cast out."

And the watchers withdrew, and the room was closed to all save the priest and the dying penitent. And then they were recalled, and the last rites of the Church took place, and Isabel made her last Communion. After that she spoke but little, but those words were treasured up afterwards, for in them lay hid a depth of penitence, and of self-abasement, and of the childlike faith that clung to forgiveness in the Precious Blood.

She looked at Constance, and she blessed her for her long years of patient devotion. "Thou hast comforted me, my sister, and God will comfort thee in thy last hour." The night came; she fell into a gentle sleep, and awoke in her death-agony. It was not long, but sharp; but the prayers of Holy Church went up with might, and at last peace came.

"Mother!" she cried, looking upwards, "do I see you at last? Mother and Walter—how glorious!"

And Constance's eyes also looked upward, for she, too, almost fancied she saw angelic forms, and for a moment she murmured, "Lord take me home, also." But only for a moment, and then the humble, patient spirit turned again to her task on earth, to watch, to wait, to pray.

Within a year of their arrival in Belgium, Lord Beauville procured a divorce, and immediately afterwards married again. The next news that came to Constance was, that her darling boy, the little Marquis of Moreton, was dead. In the midst of his childish glee, while riding on a pony in the park of Bertram Castle, the pony stumbled, threw the child, his head struck against the root of a tree, and he was taken up dead. Poor Constance! when the first burst of the mother's agony was over, while she pictured to herself those golden curls lying stiff in the coldness of death, and those merry blue eyes closed forever, became comforted, and thanked God for thus taking one of her darlings safe in his innocence to the country where there are no more partings; but her anxiety for her remaining child grew keener, and increased when she received the news of her own divorce, which the duke, after the death of his heir was induced to seek, and afterwards that of his marriage to Mistress Elizabeth Fortescue, a woman of the same nature as her mother—stern, implacable, and bigoted. But there was no help on earth, and Constance prayed on. Years passed from the time of Isabel's death, and Constance spent her time between prayer and good deeds. From the feet of the Mother of Sorrows where she poured out her aching heart, she went to comfort the afflicted, to bind up the broken-hearted. All in sorrow, all in sickness, all in suffering, knew her well. "The pale English lady," was the title the Belgians gave her. She was kind to all; but when, as it sometimes happened, refugees from England came for shelter, her sympathy poured itself forth upon them with infinite tenderness. The sick valued the touch of her cool hand, and the sound of her soft voice. The sorrowful raised their heads as they looked at her, bearing her bitter trials so meekly; priests, who were venturing on the English mission, came to see her to beseech her prayers; for in their night, before God's throne, they had great faith. The Religious, also, of the convent, when in trouble or distress, were wont to ask their superioress's leave to beg the English lady to pray for them; but of all who loved her, and she loved, the dearest were the little children.

They flocked round her when she went forth; and she could enter into their gambols, and soothe their childish sorrows with a mother's care. She was not wont to say much, but her few words of counsel sank into their hearts, and checked many a hasty word or foolish action. In such deeds her calm life passed away; and gradually her step grew feebler, and a hollow cough shook her frame, and Sister Mary of the Cross (which was Rose Ford's name in religion) saw plainly that for her, too, rest was coming.

At last she could not go beyond the convent walls, and then she grew weaker still, and could no longer leave her chamber. It was a peaceful room that of Constance's; the windows looked into the convent garden, with its bright flowers and shady trees, and one transept of the church was in view; and Constance lay on her couch, and gazed on the fair things His hand had made, and thought of the time when she, too, had played among the flowers, blithe as the birds that flew past the window; and she remembered what she was, stricken and suffering, with death near, and she rejoiced.

It was on such a day that two persons might be seen passing through the streets, and inquiring anxiously for the Augustinian Convent. One was a tall and handsome Frenchman, and he bent with tender care over a young lady who clung to his arm, and whose fair complexion and sunny hair marked her at once as having English blood. They paused before the door of the convent, and the lady cast an eager glance on the gray walls.

"Does an English lady reside here?" said the gentleman to the portress.

The woman answered him by bursting into tears.

"Oh, is she dead?" cried the lady, in a tone of agony.

"No, no, Madame; but near to death. You had better see Mother Prioress."

They were shown into the parlor, and an aged nun, the Prioress of the convent, entered.

"You ask for the Duchess of Bertram," she said; "she is very ill; and few, indeed, are they whom we can allow to see her;" but she glanced at the lady: "You are English, and that has ever a claim upon her." And then the nun started. "Madame is a kinswoman of our dear and noble lady?"

"Reverend mother," said the lady, going forward, "I am her child."

Sister Mary of the Cross went gently into Constance's room; she sat, as we have said, gazing on the fair scene, and then on a crucifix she held in her hand. The nun knelt down by her side.

"Has she come, my sister?" said Constance, gently. "Yes, I know all; that Mother's Heart has heard my prayer, and I shall see my child ere I die."

And for the few last days of Constance's life, she was watched and tended by a daughter's love.

Mary Bertram's was a strange history; her childhood had been an unhappy one; her step-mother was stern and unloving, and treated the child with undue severity. It tended, however, to keep alive in her mind a tender remembrance of the mother's fondness she dimly remembered. She never forgot the prayer she had been taught, and she cherished an intense desire to know more of the religion for which her mother was banished. When she grew up, and made her appearance in the world, she was taken notice of by the French ambassadress, who remembered Constance, and who, from political reasons, was high in favor at court. By her Mary was instructed in the faith, and by her means a marriage was arranged with the Marquis de Coucy, who had been attached to the embassy, but who, on his marriage, would return to France. Mary was one to inspire ardent affection, and he was as eager to grant as she to ask that their first act should be to visit Belgium, and see the mother from whom she had been so long parted.

So thus it came to pass that Constance first saw her beloved child received into the Catholic Church, and left her the wife of a Catholic. All earthly sorrows and cares were over; and leaning on Mary's bosom and holding Rose's hand, she not long after passed to her home.

At the same hour, in a royal palace, there was another death scene, and the sufferer sat upon the ground in sullen despair, and "dared not" die in her bed.*

Long ere this Basil Travers and Arthur Leslie (who became a priest) had gained the martyr's crown, and in their turn, "gone to Tyborne."

And Thoresby Hall. We must not forget one look at that and its inhabitants, and what they have been doing these long fifteen years. Good Sir Robert sleeps with his father, and Sir Henry Thoresby rules the hall. Blanche, too, has long since gone to her reward; and Mary and Clinton reside at their manor of Northwolds, near Colchester. Sir Henry has married, and little merry voices wake the echoes in Northwolds and Thoresby Hall, and childish feet patter up and down the stairs, and childish minds wonder much why the large tapestry chamber at Thoresby is kept so sacred, and never used save by the priests.

Three hundred years are past and gone! The last of the Tudors and the last of the Stuarts alike crumble into dust. A new dynasty holds the sceptre of England, and a queen, with many womanly virtues, sits upon the throne. The rack and the torture-chamber are things of the past, and the savage laws of Elizabeth can be found only in some obsolete statute-book. Men walk abroad in safety, for England is free!

Still fondly do we linger over the places where our martyrs suffered and our confessors endured. Still stands Thoresby Hall; its walls are gray and the ivy clings lovingly to them. Though still the property, it is no longer the habitation of the noble line. The pressure of fines removed, they have grown wealthy, and a more stately house has arisen for their home, and their honored name is on the rolls of England's nobility. There has been no stain on the history of their house. No apostate has ever been reckoned among their ancestry; and in Thoresby Hall, though the daily sacrifice was oft suspended, and the faithful worshipped in fear, still, never through those long three hundred years has the sound of alien worship, of mutilated rites, or of false doctrine, been heard within its walls. The chapel now was the chapel then; small and not richly adorned, yet breathing the odor of a changeless faith, of an abiding presence. And the lime-trees send forth their sweet fragrance in the moonlight, while other lovers perchance plight their vows; and on the grassy slopes the sunlight shines. Go visit Thoresby Hall, as we erewhile did, on some summer day, when the scorching glare of the sun is almost blinding, and yet around Thoresby there breathes the air of coolness and repose. Go look at the "hiding-hole" where Walter de Lisle once lay and prayed. Look around the garden and mark the rose-trees bending to the earth with their luxuriant weight, and feel as we did, that over Thoresby Hall there breathes a "perpetual benediction."

And what of Tyborne? Three hundred years are past and gone, and the tall trees are cut down, and tall houses have risen in their stead. A wilderness of houses, and the once muddy, broken road is smoothly paved, and the green fields are laid out into Hyde Park; and the rush of gay carriages, and gayer ladies pass by, without a single thought, the place where many won the martyr's palm. How few know the spot where, close by the Marble Arch, there stands a little mile stone to tell where Tyborne stood. Its name now serves to mark a fashionable quarter of the town, and there are none who, like the Catholic Queen,* kneel at the spot and water it with their tears. It is hard, indeed to stand there, in the midst of bustling, rich, gay London, and recall the scenes such as we have dwelt upon in these pages; and yet Tyborne should not be forgotten; its witness pleaded to Heaven, and it pleads still more powerful than man's weapons, more availing than his strong words; for—

"God knows it is not force nor might,
Not brave nor warlike band,
Not shield and spear, not dint of sword,
That must convert the land;
It is the blood of martyrs shed,
It is that noble train
That fight with word and not with sword,
And Christ their captain."

The Blind Man of Argenteuil.

IN the immense library of a large and sombre hotel at Rouen, which was ornamented with portraits of magistrates in the scarlet robes, there was seated an aged man of venerable appearance, seemingly engaged, by the light of a lamp, in meditation and study. From the richness of his dress, it was apparent that he belonged to the first ranks in society; and, in fact, this old man was Laurent Bigot de Thibermesnil, first advocate in the parliament of Normandy, a man of great abilities and still greater virtues, one of those learned magistrates of the sixteenth century whose judicial acts shone with so great a splendor. His long and laborious day at the palace began at five o'clock in the morning. For many years he had performed his legal functions with high success, and had suggested to the parliament decrees destined afterwards to become laws in the province; and now the indefatigable old man gave himself up to another kind of employment, which seemed to him a relaxation; he was laying the foundation of a rich collection of books and manuscripts, which in after years became celebrated, and is even now spoken of in France, though its treasures have unhappily been dispersed.

Engaged at this moment in examining a very old manuscript which had been sent him by his friend Turnès, he was suddenly interrupted by the noisy exclamations of two young men, seated not far from him, who were reading Horace, and who cried out, enchanted with the verses of that great poet. These two youths were Emeric Bigot, his son, and Etienne Pasquier, the schoolfellow of Emeric. Pupils of Hotoman, Cujas, and Baldwin, the two friends had come to Rouen to pass the holidays together. Laurent Bigot wished to see the ode that thus electrified them. And soon the old man's enthusiasm equalled that of the young ones. And who would not have thrilled at the description of true merit thus portrayed by Horace— "Dwelling far from vulgar minds, intrigues, cabals, favors solicited, and degrading refusals; overturning all obstacles, rising above earthly trifles, shining with spotless glory, and conquering for immortality, etc." Laurent Bigot, continuing this beautiful ode, had just read those energetic lines where the poet paints the cripple seizing with a firm grasp the guilty man whom he had preserved, when suddenly a noise was heard at the foot of the gallery, and a magistrate was introduced. From his extreme pallor, agitated features, and humble attitude, one would have expected to see, not the lieutenant of criminals at Rouen, an upright and just judge, but one of those guilty men who every day trembled in his presence.

"I have failed," said he at length to Laurent Bigot, "I have failed, I confess it; but in mercy do not condemn me without a hearing." The lieutenant then commenced his recital, the king's advocate calmly listening, and the two young men also, with the curiosity natural to their age.

"A citizen of Lucca," said he, "named Zambelli, had es-established a house of business in England, where his affairs had greatly prospered. At the age of fifty he had made his fortune, and wished to return to his native country to finish the rest of his days near a much loved brother. He wrote, therefore, to his family, and the news overwhelmed them with joy. Soon a second letter, dated from Rouen, where he had been since his arrival from England, announced that he would be at home in the course of two months. It would take that time to terminate his business at Paris, and to make the journey. A home was prepared for him at Lucca, and every day he was expected; but two, four, six months passed by, Zambelli had not appeared, and what was strange, even no letter had been received from him. The uneasiness of his family was very great. Cornelio, his brother, went to Paris, where he made many inquiries, but without success. He visited all the houses with which Zambelli had hitherto transacted business. In these houses they had seen, or thought they had seen, Zambelli. An individual had come under this name, and collected money to a considerable amount; the merchants showed Zambelli's signature written at the back of the receipts. 'All these signatures are false,' cried Cornelio indignantly; 'describe the impostor to me, that I may seek him everywhere.' But they could not satisfy him on this point; no one could remember the man. Thus an audacious theft had been committed, and perhaps even a frightful crime. Cornelio, pursuing his researches, returned from Paris to Rouen. He inquired at all the hotels in that city. At the hotel La Crosse they had seen Zambelli; he had remained there some time; from thence he had gone to Paris, with a valet; this valet had not been remarked. A considerable time had passed since then, and how was it possible to recall the features of a servant amongst thousands of others who were constantly arriving with the gentlemen and merchants who frequented the hotel, which was one of the first in Rouen?

"It was then," continued the lieutenant, "that Cornelio came to complain to me. I agreed with him that a great crime must have been committed between Rouen and Paris; but how discover the guilty person? At last, in the midst of our numberless and vain researches, a sudden idea occurred to me, and I hastened to act upon it. Seven or eight months since, a jeweller named Martel, unknown at Rouen before that time, had opened a shop here. No one knew where this man came from; there was something strange, too, in his looks and general appearance. He was silent as to his former life; and those who had hazarded questions on the subject received evasive answers, made with ill-disguised embarrassment. Struck with the similarity of his business to that of Zambelli, and influenced by an involuntary presentiment, I sent some one, under pretence of making purchases, to enter into conversation with him, and casually mention the name of Zambelli. At this name he saw Martel turn pale, and look at him with an air of uneasiness. This fact confirmed my suspicions. I resolved then to proceed further, but here (I confess it) the excess of my zeal has misled me. By my order, a sergeant went to Martel's house, to obtain from him the sum of four thousand francs, which I pretended was owing to some one under a false name, and must be paid immediately. Martel, as soon as he saw the account, exclaimed it was false, and refused to pay it. Summoned by the sergeant to return with him to prison, Martel, acting on the first impulse, followed the sergeant with the security of a man certain that he owed nothing; but stopping all of a sudden, and evincing great anxiety, he said—

"I am quite easy as to this arrest; it is a forgery, and I can prove it; but is there nothing else besides? Have you heard anything?"

"The sergeant pretended astonishment; and on protesting that he did not know what he meant, Martel was reassured, and followed with a firm step to the jail, where he was locked up. An hour after he was brought to me.

"It is useless to dissemble," I said to him, in an imperative tone. 'Yes, the bill they showed you is false; but what you have still to fear concerns a more serious affair. A citizen of Lucca, named Zambelli, is dead, and it is you who have assassinated him. Do not seek to deny it; I have the proofs. But calm your terror. Zambelli was a stranger; no one here will avenge his death. By some sacrifice on your part we could hush up this sad affair. You must confess all that you know on the subject; your life is only spared on this condition.'

"Struck, fascinated as it were, by the assurance with which I spoke, smiling at the hope of escape, he cried out, 'I see in all this the hand of Providence. As there was no witness but myself, it could not otherwise have been known to you. I will confess all, then. My fortune is yours. How could I refuse it to him who gives me life?'

"His resolution was taken; he was going to relate all, when the apparition of the scribe, who, ordered by me, came to take his confession, seemed to awaken him from a dream; he had perceived the trap, and when I invited him to raise his hand and swear to tell me nought but the truth,—

"No! I have nothing to tell," cried he. 'I have nothing to tell. I am innocent!'

"All my efforts, all my entreaties to obtain another word being useless, I ordered him back to prison, still hoping he might change his mind. But what had I hoped for! To-day, instigated by those villains who always infest prisons, he protests against his incarceration, and accuses me and the sergeant who arrested him, of doing so on false pretences. This is my fault, then. You cannot doubt the purity of my motives. But what will the parliament say—those messengers so rigid towards inferior officers? Must it be that thirty years of service will all at once be forgotten, and my life the forfeit to an excess of zeal, which was for the good of the state? I have told you all. Tell me my fate."

"Reassure yourself," said Laurent Bigot; "and pardon me for not having abridged your anguish. The parliament knows all, and excuses you. To-day, even, the chambers are assembled at my request, to decide on this affair. I have spoken for you with all the warmth of a man who esteems and loves you; but your thirty years of service and integrity have pleased more eloquently than all I could say. The protest that Martel had lodged against you is suspended for three months; the case relative to the assassination of Zambelli is now committed to parliament. Martel will be transferred to the conciergerie. Everything tells me you have found the real culprit; but how are we to obtain the proofs? where is the body of the murdered man? That is what we must discover. In two days I shall leave here. I shall take the road from Rouen to Paris, and search from village to village for the traces of the crime. Let us hope that my researches will not be in vain. Knowing all, I ought certainly to have interrupted and consoled you; but I obeyed a feeling which you well understand, since you are a magistrate and father. Emeric, my son, and you, Etienne Pasquier, both one day destined to wear the gown; you, Emeric, to succeed me, perhaps; you, Pasquier, to shine in the parliament of Paris, or in some other sovereign court; learn that as it is not permitted for any one to do evil that good may come, a judge, above all, ought not to seek truth by means of falsehood. Such actions are unworthy of a magistrate; the most brilliant success would not excuse it. Justice and truth are sisters: a judge ought not to separate them. Let us wait for time, which unveils every mystery."

Three weeks afterwards there was a great commotion in the village of Argenteuil. The inhabitants had suspended their different occupations, quitted their dwellings, and assembled round the door of the Hotel De Heaume, and by their talking earnestly together, and questioning eagerly all those who came out of the hotel, it was evident something very unusual was going on within. In fact, in the large common hall, which was transformed for this day into a hall of audience, Laurent Bigot, assisted by the bailiff of Argenteuil, was engaged in interrogating a number of witnesses respecting an occurrence which had taken place there some time previously.

The worthy magistrate had caused searching inquiries to be made in almost every town and village between Rouen and Paris, with a view to discover the fate of Zambelli, but without success, when, at the last moment, just as he had begun to despair of success and was thinking of returning, a light suddenly flashed upon him. He was informed that some time before a corpse had been discovered in the vineyards near Argenteuil. Bigot hastened to view the body, which was already half devoured by wild beasts, and in the mutilated remains he easily recognized the tall figure of the unhappy Zambelli, from the description given by his brother Cornelio.

The bailiff began in a loud voice to state the facts relative to the discovery of the corpse, when suddenly a piercing cry interrupted him, and at the same time an old blind man, whom no one had before remarked, presented himself before the magistrate and his assistants. He seemed a prey to great agitation, and made a sign that he wished to say something. It was old Gervais, a beggar, born in the province, and beloved by everyone. When his wanderings brought him to Argenteuil, he was lodged in the hotel. He had just arrived, returning from a long tour, and had seated himself unperceived upon one of the stone benches placed round the large chimney. It was from thence issued that loud cry, when, listening to what the bailiff was reading, he heard him speak of a corpse discovered among the vines. But absent so long a time from Argenteuil, what could he know?

Laurent Bigot looked with a sort of respect at the fine noble figure of the old man.

"Unhappy being," said he "what can you have to tell us."

But, recovered from his first emotion of surprise, which he could not suppress, the blind man now seemed embarrassed and undecided.

"Oh! my lord, may I speak?" said he. "Is there no danger of my life?"

And he turned his white head on all sides, with an air of distrust and affright.

"Speak, speak without fear," said Bigot; "but once more, what can you know?"

The old man then related, that about eight or nine months since, going from Argenteuil on a journey, he was upon the high ground which surrounded the parish, when warned by the barking of his dog, he stopped and listened. A man's voice, but weak, plaintive, supplicating, was heard. "Monster!" it cried. "Thy master! thy benefactor! Merely! Must I die so far from my country, from my brother!"

Then he had heard a last cry, agonizing, heart-rending, like that of a mortal in the last extremity, and afterwards the heavy steps of a man who walked painfully under the weight of some great burden.

"Influenced," said Gervais, "by an involuntary movement, I advanced. 'Who have you there,' I cried—who weeps thus? 'It is nothing,' answered a trembling voice—'nothing; only a sick man I am carrying, and who has just fainted. Good man, go about your business.' And again I heard the voice speak low and menacing. 'Thank God that you are blind, or I should have done the same to you.' I understood then that a frightful crime had just been committed, and I cannot express to you what I felt. All contributed to alarm me; for, at that moment, a tremendous storm broke over our heads, the thunder shook the ground with its loud peals, and seemed to pursue the murderer. The world appeared coming to an end. Trembling and almost beside myself with terror, I continued my journey, swearing never to reveal what I had just heard; for the criminal might belong to this country, and the life of a poor blind old man like myself was at his mercy, if he wished to take it. But just now, when the bailiff spoke of a corpse found a short distance from the place where I heard the voice, I could not suppress a cry. I have now told you all, and I trust no harm will come to me on account of it."

During the recital of Gervais, Bigot appeared absorbed in a profound reverie, which lasted sometime after the blind man had ceased speaking. Then suddenly addressing Gervais, he said,

"Old man, I am going to ask you a question; reflect well before answering. This voice which you heard on the mountain, which answered and also menaced you, does your memory retain a distinct remembrance of it? Do you think you could recognize it again if you heard it?"

"Yes, my lord!" answered Gervais; "as I could recognize the voice of my mother, if she still lived, poor woman!"

"But," said Bigot, "have you ever thought of it? Some time has now elapsed since that day."

"It seems to me to be but so many hours!" answered Gervais; "for my fright was then so great, I think I am always hearing it, and the voice of distress also, and the thunder, which on that day pealed louder than usual."

And as Laurent Bigot was again about to express a doubt, the blind man, raising his hands towards the sky, which he could not see, said—

"God is good, and never abandons the blind. Since my sight is gone, my hearing is more acute. But if you disbelieve me, ask all the inhabitants of Argenteuil; they are here, or near the hotel. On fête days they often amuse themselves in trying to confuse me, by counterfeiting each other's voices, and asking 'Who has spoken?' They will tell you if I am ever deceived."

The people cried out that all the old man said was true; that when he was in Argenteuil this was one of their pastimes, and a merry game to the young in the parish. Some hours after Laurent Bigot left Argenteuil, and returned to Rouen, taking with him blind Gervais. In the village (lately so agitated) everything resumed its usual appearance. The inhabitants had returned to their dwellings, excepting those who stopped to chat with their neighbors on what they had seen and heard; and many conjectures were formed as to the result of this mysterious affair.

In the 16th century, most magnificent was the great hall of audience where the parliament of Normandy assembled; with its fine platform of black ebony, ornamented with fantastic carvings in every shape and form, shining with gold, azure, or vermilion; its flowered tapestries, its vast ceiling, its gilded ceilings, on which shone the royal arms of the kings and princes of France; the violet canopy which was used when the sovereign was present; and lastly, the large picture of Louis X.I., the father of his people, and his minister and adviser, the great Cardinal D'Amboise, who had bestowed upon the province a permanent exchequer. When on a great day of assembly one hundred and twenty magistrates were seated there to administer justice, in long scarlet robes, headed by presidents in ermine mantles, the multitude, awed and astonished at such magnificence and majesty, bent humbly before this imposing senate; and still more when, raising their eyes, they saw above the assembled magistrates a beautiful painted crucifix; with Moses the lawgiver, the four Evangelists, and our divine Saviour between His Blessed Mother and the Apostle. At this sight one could hardly restrain a movement of fear, for it recalled to the memory the beautiful verses of the Psalmist, where God is depicted in the midst of judges who deliberate—God, deciding and rendering justice with them.

It was in this august sanctuary, on the morning of Christmas-eve, that the members of the Grand Chambre and La Tournele were assembled. But this time they wore their black robes, and their pensive attitude showed they were about to transact an affair of rigorous justice. Great curiosity was displayed as to what would be the result of this secret conference. The assassination of the merchant of Lucca, the arrest of the supposed criminal, the discovery of the corpse of the victim, the unexpected testimony rendered at Argenteuil by a blind man, formed inexhaustible subjects of conjecture to the immense multitude who thronged the court and avenues of the palace; and each one affirmed the day was come which would give liberty to an innocent man, or send a monster to the scaffold.

After long debates in the parliament, it was decided to send for the blind man of Argenteuil. Gervais appeared before the assembled chambers. His deposition, simple and circumstantial, made a deep impression; but still doubts occupied the minds of all. Was it not strange to put the life of a man at the mercy of the fugitive reminiscence of a blind beggar?

who could do nothing else but hear? Was it possible this man's memory could retain what he had only once heard? It was then decided that it must be clearly proved; that he must be confronted successively with all the prisoners, Martel among the number, and if, after hearing them speak, the blind man, spontaneously, and without once hesitating, should recognize the voice which had so much struck him, this last sign, added to other circumstances, would no longer leave any uncertainty.

It was not without design that Christmas-eve had been chosen for this trial; one hitherto unheard of in the annals of judicature. To command the appearance of the prisoners on an ordinary day, would have awakened suspicions, and suggested means of evading the proof to be put to them. On Christmas-eve, however, there would have been great astonishment in the conciergerie, if the order had not arrived for a general meeting at the palace, the usual custom on the eve of great fêtes, when the members of the council examined the criminals; sometimes even these magistrates (on occasion and in reverence of the fête) gave liberty to those who were detained for slight offences. Above all, it was requisite to impress on the blind man, that Heaven had invested a sacred power in the decisions of the parliament. At its head was the president Feu, whose wisdom and gravity had caused him to be named Cato the Censor—

"Gervais," said he, in a solemn penetrating voice, "there above us, is the image of the Son of God, who was unjustly put to death by false witnesses. Swear by this crucifix—swear by God Himself, who is here present, and listens to us, that you will affirm nothing that you are not as sure of as your existence, or of the misfortune that deprived you of the light of the sun."

After this oath, which the old man took with a fervency that dispelled all doubts as to his sincerity, the proof began. Already eighteen prisoners had appeared and answered the questions put to them. The blind man listened, but made no movement; on their side, perceiving a person unknown to them, they remained quiet and indifferent. It was then that the nineteenth prisoner was introduced in his turn; but who shall picture his amazement at the sight of Gervais? Who shall describe the sudden alteration in his manner, his pale and contracted features, the perspiration that chilled his forehead, and his sudden prostration, which was so great, that it was necessary to support and lead him to a bench, where he could not even seat himself without the keeper's aid; and, overcome as he was, when he came a little to himself, one perceived in his involuntary gestures the remorse of a tortured soul, or, perhaps, the horrible regret of having committed an incomplete crime—of not having finished his work.

The presidents and judges awaited anxiously what was to follow; but at the first words Martel answered to the questions of the president, the blind man, who, since the commencement of this scene, which he was ignorant of, had remained immovable, suddenly roused himself and listened; he listened eagerly—listened again, then quickly recoiled, and making an eager gesture of horror and alarm, as if to repulse with his hands an object he knew was near, and of which he was afraid, sought to fly, crying out—

"It is he! Yes, it is the voice I heard at Argenteuil."

The jailor removed Martel, more dead than alive, the president ordering another prisoner to be brought forward, but at the same time making a sign that was understood by the jailor, and some minutes after it was Martel again that he brought, and who was a second time placed on the bench, and interrogated under a false name. New questions drew forth different answers; but shaking his head with an incredulous air, the blind man said—

"No; it is a feint. I recognize the voice that conversed with me on the heights of Argenteuil."

Six times all the prisoners from the Conciergerie were severally brought forward, each time under a new order; and even to some of the astonished prisoners were addressed questions which concerned the assassination of Zambelli; and warned by a sign from the president, they answered to the accusation of which they were ignorant. But the blind man did not hesitate for an instant; he always recognized the voice he had heard on the mountains of Argenteuil.

At length, then, the horrible mystery was cleared up. A superhuman voice seemed to fill the vast chamber of audience, and say to the blind man—"It is he! it is the assassin of Zambelli!" This thunder, loud and menacing, like that which sounded on the heights of Argenteuil on that day of crime, seemed to overwhelm the guilty man, who shuddering and convulsed, murmured a tardy confession, now useless for, to all the magistrates seated there in judgment, the effect of the proof had been such, that not a shadow of doubt remained in the mind of one of them.

A few minutes after, in a dark cell of the Conciergerie, was pronounced a terrible decree, whilst in the public square near at hand, dreadful preparations were being made; for, in those times, to the man found guilty of death there was no morrow—the sun rose no more for him.

Some hours had passed, and the streets around Saint-Michel, Saint-Sauveur, the old place, and the college of Saint-Georges, could scarcely contain the inhabitants of the town, who were returning from the Vieux-Marché, where they had been witnesses of a horrible spectacle; and these men, these women, pale, trembling, terrified, repeated to one another the solemn words they had just heard. That voice had sounded to them from the depths of grief; and feeble as it then was, nearly extinguished, yet what authority it had, what power in those last moments! Thundering, formidable, speaking like the voice of God to that immense multitude, who, coming to see, was now silent, listening eagerly, as if it had no other sense. And the voice had uttered words that would long be remembered; for what moralist, what philosopher will find more believers, or leave more lasting impressions than a condemned criminal confessing and detesting his crime to the world, which recoils from him, and to heaven, who punishes him; denouncing his cupidity and thirst for gold, which precipitated him into the abyss, declaring, as one who knows it, that however distant he may be from the place where his crime was committed, God will be there before him, will have waiting for him, to spy him out, an unsuspected witness that the rest of the world was ignorant of,—seeing all, forgetting nothing; first an inexorable denouncer, and then a terrible judge.

About fifty years after this event, Laurent Bigot being long dead, Emeric had succeeded him, and became president. His friend Etienne Pasquier was a noble and venerable old man of great learning, engaged in composing his curious "Recherches sur la France." Wishing to show, he said, that God sometimes permits crime to be proved, when man thinks discovery almost hopeless, he took care not to forget the almost miraculous fact he was witness to in his youth, and which we have given an account of, nearly word for word as we found it in his narrative,

The Black Seal.

"IS it true, then, mother, that when I shall be fifteen years old you will tell me something from the other side of the grave, as Monsieur le Curé says?"

"Yes, my child, if at fifteen years old Michel Lacroix has become a better boy, and more studious at school, he will be able to read fluently for himself the message which I have to communicate to him at that time, in accordance with a will."

"I begin to know all my letters already, when they are not too small."

"Already, eh! that's not much to boast of, I think, at your age; you ought to be ashamed of yourself."

"What would you have, mother? I have no wish to be a learned man, still less a half-learned one, who is, as Monsieur le Curé says, a pest to society. When you send me to school of a morning and I see the birds singing amongst the leaves, and the horses frisking in the meadows, I fancy I am going to prison. Why is it so, mother? Because my chest requires air—because my forehead requires the breeze which blows in autumn—the snow which falls in winter, and the sun which glows in summer. Away with study, and long live the liberty of the fields and of the sea! Now, mother, I must just tell you my way of thinking. I wish to be a sailor, as my father, my grandfather, and all my ancestors were."

"It is a noble profession for a Breton; but your father and your grandfather knew how to read, write and cipher."

"The famous Jean Bart knew at most how to sign his name."

"What one could excuse in the time of Jean Bart would be unpardonable nowadays."

"Very well, mother, say no more about it. I shall soon know how to read in an old book, as I already know how to do the parts of a vessel."

"Oh, as for that," said a stout man who hitherto had taken no part in the conversation, "as for that, I can vouch for my pupils being the first readers of a ship in the country, without flattering myself. Now, then, child, tell me what a garnet is?"

"The garnet is a rope which has a simple pulley tied fast to a great stay, and serves in loading a ship."

"Very well, child, what are bow lines?"

"Bow lines are long cords which are joined on to shorter ones called clews, which are tied to the corners of the soil."

"Very well. What is the use of bow lines?"

"The use of bow lines is to pull the bolt-ropes of the sail tight, so as to hold the wind better."

"Very well; explain to us the meaning of studding-sails."

"Studding-sails are small sails, which are put up when the wind is very light, to aid those of the vessel."

"What is a crosstaff?"

"It is a graduated instrument by which sailors can tell the height of the sun and the other stars in the horizon."

"Better and better, child; What does 'to drive with the tide' mean?"

"To lead a vessel against the wind in the current of a river."

"What is a cathead?"

"It is a great rope which runs through a pulley fixed to a large iron hook, the use of which is to handle the anchors."

"Bravo, child! you have answered like a real Tourville. What do you think of it, sister?"

"I say that merely reading a vessel is not sufficient nowadays for a man who wishes to push his way. I think that Michel ought to be ashamed to be the last in school."

"But to make up for that he is the first in all our holiday games; and amongst those of his age there is not one who knows better than he how to hoist a rope, to moor a cross vessel, and to fix the shrouds. Only yesterday he made big Simon take a bath gratis, who is a head taller and five years older than he is."

"Is it true, Michel?"

"It was quite necessary to defend the honor of the parish—the tower is the flag of the Breton peasant—woe to him that touches it."

"What did Simon do to you?"

"Nothing; just think what would have befallen him if he had!"

"Then, you little rogue, you were the aggressor?"

"I am not capable of it, mother. Judge for yourself. I was mending our nets when big Simon passed by, driving before him his grey ass—the old grey one you know. Where are you both going like that?" said I.

"To enroll Gris in your parish, so that there may be one the more, and to replace your master, who they say is very ill."

"Simon answered that, did he—the rude boy?"

"That is not all, mother, listen to the end."

"You must take care never to let Gris drink by moonlight," added Simon.

"Why?" said I, clenching my fists.

"Because," said Simon, "he would drink the moon, which would be very unfortunate for him."

"I did not understand him. Nevertheless, I was nearly bursting with rage. Simon continuing, related to me that one evening an ass was drinking by moonlight at the pool of our parish; a cloud eclipsing the moon, the darkness prevented some women who were washing some things at the pool from seeing. These women, said Simon, accused the ass of having drunk the moon, and, as the poor beast could not justify himself, they ripped him up in order to obtain possession of the moon, which accordingly soon re-appeared. Now, mother, what would you have done if such an insult had been paid you?"

"I should have contented myself with shrugging my shoulders."

"But I preferred rubbing those of Simon; but, as I rubbed them rather hard, it appears I flung him into the water to refresh himself."

"But you might have drowned him, child!"

"Oh, no fear of that, Simon swims like a mackerel!"

"Really, you never mean to be good!"

"Well, then, by our Lady of Anray you will see. From to-day, mother, I set foot in the path of reason, and, before six months' time, I shall know how to read, write, and cipher, as well as my father or mother."

"Then, nothing will prevent my giving you the message which you are to know when you are fifteen. May God and our Lady of Anray keep you in your good disposition!"

This singular dialogue took place between a woman already advanced in age, the daughter, wife, and mother of a generation of fishermen; an old sailor who was her brother, and a boy whose strong neck and round shoulders denoted unusual strength.

Madame Lacroix, who had been a widow for ten years, had lost her husband, who had been made prisoner on board a vessel of which he was commander, and sent to the desert island of Cabrera, where he died. Her husband's father and one of her uncles perished in the fatal battle of La Hogue.

The day on which the mysterious message was to be delivered to her boy was drawing near. On the eve of that day Michel Lacroix made his first communion; devoutly prepared for this great action in a Christian's life, he received this divine food with sentiments of fervent piety; the more so as his age allowed him to appreciate the importance of the grace which God gave him in communicating Himself substantially to his soul. Like Jean Bart, Michel Lacroix learned the duties of a Christian at an early age. At last the epoch so long desired had arrived; Michel had attained his fifteenth year; this day, which was to exercise such a great influence upon his life as a sailor, was the 24th of March. Having risen with the sun, Michel went at nine o'clock to his mother, who, clothed in mourning, gave him her hand, saying: "Michel, I have been waiting for you;" then after a moment's silence, which appeared a century to the young man, who was waiting impatiently, she added: "My child, I am pleased with you; you have been faithful to your engagement. I must fulfil the promise I made you." Then she went to an old walnut wood trunk, upon which an artist of the middle ages had sculptured the Massacre of the Innocents; she took out from it a little hard wooden chest, with gilt-headed nails round the edges, carefully locked. Madame Lacroix slowly opened it, and taking from it a letter, the square envelope of which bore a large seal of black wax—she gave it to her son, who read it with deep emotion. It was from his father.

Several times whilst reading this letter, dictated by heroic sentiments of Christian charity, Michel had been obliged to pause to wipe away his tears with the back of his hand. His mother also wept. After having pressed his father's signature to his lips, Michel said—"Willingly would I give the beard that I shall soon have, that the murderers of my father were within my grasp."

"Why, my son?"

"Because I should like to meet them one day at the end of my boarding-pike, and so the son would worthily avenge his father's death, I assure you."

"You have already forgotten," replied Madame Lacroix, "that your father's last words were those of pardoning and forgetting—"

"I will pardon also; but I could never forget, and memory would augment my strength and would make me combat with happiness my father's jailers of the island of Cabrera, though, when once they were down, I might give them my hand to raise them up."

"Well said, child!" said his uncle Jerome, who had assisted at the end of this scene. "You will do honor to your father's memory."

This occurred in 1817. Michel had just attained his fifteenth year; but one would have taken him for three years older, to judge by his robust health and formed character. He begged so much of his mother, that she at last consented that he should go to Brest, where he engaged himself on board a vessel of the navy. Later, when he had fulfilled the conditions enforced by law, he signed his engagement as a sailor.

At this time, a French army, commanded by the Duke d'Angoulême, crossed the Pyrenees, to reestablish a throne overturned by the revolution. For the first time Michel regretted that he was a sailor, because he was thus deprived of the pleasure of combating, as a soldier, a nation which had occasioned his father's premature death. The entrance of the French troops into Spain was a triumphant march, celebrated by the victories of St. Sebastian and of Trocadon. The revolution was subdued, and King Ferdinand regained the sceptre of which it had deprived him. Some thousands of prisoners were brought into France.

Among these was a Catalonian, whose body seemed to have been copied from that of Hercules; and who was still more remarkable for the instincts of an indomitable and savage nature, marked by an implacable hatred against the French. Matteo, confiding in his strength, and above all in the skill with which he dispatched, with scientific precision, all adversaries whom he could reach with the point of his sword or the end of his gun, had distinguished himself under Mina by acts of ferocity almost incredible. Chief of a band of guerrillas, he boasted of never having given quarter to any Frenchman whom he had surprised in an ambuscade. Thus, he soon became the terror of Toulon, occupying the leisure of his captivity by encounters generally fatal to the unfortunates whom he had drawn into a quarrel by unjust provocation.

One evening in a café, a young Parisian, named Perret, taking his place at the same table without asking his leave, was insulted, provoked, and at last killed before several witnesses. This young man had engaged himself on board a small vessel which was under repair in the Toulon docks, the same in which Michel had embarked, with whom he was thus on intimate terms. Michel vowed that he would punish the murderer of his comrade. An occasion was not long in offering itself. The next day Michel went early to the café, where Matteo went every evening, to lie in wait like a wild beast for its prey. A few minutes later Matteo entered, proud of yesterday's success, with a provoking assurance, his cap on one side, and his hand on his hip. Seated in a corner of the hall, at a table where there was only room for two people, Michel was reading attentively the newspaper of the day; Matteo sat down immediately at his side, and throwing down his red cap on the table under Michel's nose, he rolled a cigarette in his fingers, then lighted it, and blew an immense body of smoke right across his neighbor's face. Michel jumped from his seat, raised his hand, but at the moment when he was going to let it fall upon the face of the Spaniard, he calmed himself and on y said—"Sir, do not repeat that, for tobacco smoke does not at all agree with me when it is so near."

"Perhaps you would prefer that of powder," replied Matteo.

"Perhaps, as you say—every one to his taste."

"In that case it would be easy for me to satisfy yours."

"We shall see that; but I shall be occupied in reading this paper for a quarter of an hour, so leave me to finish it."

"Be good enough to excuse me, but I came here on purpose to read it, and, as I am in a hurry, you must give it up to me."

"Ah—You are in a hurry, sir! Very well; but, as I am not, I advise you to take a draught of patience instead of the coffee you ordered." Then, turning to the waiter, Michel said in a calm though emphatic voice—"Waiter! a cup of patience for monsieur, if you please; serve it hot and very sweet—monsieur wants sweetness!"

Matteo, who understood French as well as he spoke it, jumped in his turn from his seat, ready to throw himself upon Michel, who stopped him with a look, and these words—"Patience is the mother of safety."

The French sailor was drinking beer. The Spaniard, annoyed by Michel's coolness, took up passionately his red cap and placed it upon the sailor's jug, who burst out laughing, saying—"It appears, Signor Cavalier, that you take that jug for a Spaniard's head."

Matteo bit his lips, and remained silent at the keen reply. Silence reigned in the interior of the café; it was the silence of the calm which on the seashore precedes a storm. The brown face of the Spaniard had become quite purple with rage; passion was working in the swelling veins of his forehead. The forehead of the Frenchman was as calm as the heart of a Breton on the day of the feast of our Lady of Auray.

"This plate of red carrot here, annoys me," said Michel; "I pray you, sir, to put it off your head."

"I shall do nothing of the kind, for it is already too warm here."

"Nevertheless," said Michel, getting up and opening the stove door; "see, the fire is going out."

"Ah!—well, keep it in."

"What with?"

"Whatever you like."

"Thanks for your advice," then the sailor, approaching the table, took the cap from the jug, and kicked it into the stove.

"You are a dead man!" said Matteo.

"But not yet buried," replied Michel; "the gravedigger has not had time to dig my grave."

"I will place you in it myself!"

"When, if you please?"

"To-morrow!"

"At what time?"

"At daybreak!"

"At what place?"

"Behind the great cemetery wall."

"That is enough."

"Now finish your newspaper, the sooner the better, for in the interest of the future life I advise you to see a priest. Now, then, make haste. I allow you five minutes." Thus saying, he pulled out a large gold watch, which he placed before him on the table.

At the sight of that watch a cloud seemed to pass over Michel's face, which till then had remained unchanged, but now became quite pale. This watch bore on the case of it a figure of St. Michel bearing a cross as a lance.

"Where did you get that watch from?" cried Michel, in a hurried tone.

"What is that to you?"

"I wish to know, because I believe it to be a family watch; the watch of a gallant Frenchman who was basely assassinated by a Spaniard in the island of Cabrera, in 1810—it is my father's watch. But speak, sir." A complete change had come over Michel; with inflamed countenance and clenched fists, his upper lip curled with an expression indicating thirst of vengeance, his eyes bloodshot, his voice short and quivering, he repeated—"Where have you taken this watch from?"

"I have not taken it, sir. It came to me by descent at my father's death."

"What was your father's name?"

"The same as mine."

"What is your name?"

"That of a brave Spaniard, Huertas."

"Huertas," cried Michel, "is the name of an assassin. Your father treacherously assassinated mine. God is just, because to-day he sends the son of the murderer to the son of the victim."

The impression produced by this scene can easily be understood, but cannot be put into words. Accompanied by two witnesses chosen from amongst the inmates of the Café de Paris, the Frenchman and the Spaniard went to a deserted place situated at the extremity of the town. The stars of heaven, like funeral torches, lighted up the way that Matteo had gone the day before at the same hour, to add one name more to the bloody catalogue of his victims.

"What are your arms, sir?" inquired Matteo of Michel, when they had reached the place.

"I am your man, sir, with any weapon you please," replied Michel.

"Let us cast lots—that shall decide!"

"Throw up a piece of money in the air—heads for the sword, and tails for the pistol."

The money came to the sword. The attack, which was made on both sides with great vigor, was of short duration. The Spaniard was obliged to yield, and was soon disarmed; he had placed himself upon a damp spot of ground, and his foot had slipped in the very blood which he had himself shed the day before.

"Strike, then," said Matteo, "my life belongs to you."

"Do you take me for an assassin?" replied Michel, giving a generous hand to his adversary. He added—"I could kill you, but I will not; the last wishes of my dying father impose obedience, which is due to his memory. Listen, sir, to the last recommendation of Michel Lacroix, who died in 1810, in the island of Cabrera, under the stroke of a man who has now appeared before God's tribunal; listen, sir!" Then drawing from a pocket-book, which he always carried about him, a letter sealed with black-wax, he read with emotion the following lines by the light of two torches, which the seconds had procured to give light for the combat.

"One day no doubt you will have, as your ancestors have had, the honor of serving France either as a soldier upon land, or as a sailor in the vessels of the State. You will bravely do your duty I am sure; in an enemy wounded or conquered you will only see an unhappy or disabled brother. Far from putting him to death, give him generously your hand to raise him up. You must become a rampart to his body if attacked by your furious companions. Such is my will at the hour of my death: remember the will of a dying person is something sacred and holy."

"I remember," added Michel, after a moment's silence, which gave Matteo time for reflection: "I remember, and that is why at this critical moment I offer a friendly hand to the son of the murderer of my father. Brother, I forgive you."

Matteo threw himself into the arms of his generous victor.

The day after this nocturnal encounter, the conclusion of which produced a lively emotion in the city of Toulon, Michel Lacroix received a box containing the watch which was the sacred heirloom of his family.

About this time a great fire broke out in the Toulon arsenal, and occasioned great disaster. At one time the flames, increased by a north wind, threatened even to blow up the powder magazine. At this critical moment, a man, a sailor, distinguished himself above all others by his courage and self-devotion; it was Michel Lacroix. His noble conduct was deemed worthy of reward. The prefect of Toulon, having told him to come to his house, took him into his room and said to him, "Michel, you are a brave young fellow; the king, who knows how to reward every kind of service, will no doubt recompense you; I intend to ask him to give you the cross of the legion of honor; nevertheless, if there is any other favor you wish for, tell it to me; I will do all that depends upon me to obtain it for you."

Michel, who was as modest in success as he was brave in peril, replied—

"Monsieur, the prefect, you are very good in bestowing your praises upon one who, having done his duty like many others, is already quite enough rewarded by the testimony of his conscience; nevertheless, since you deign to grant me a favor, I accept your offer with gratitude."

"What do you wish?"

"Amongst the prisoners of war who are at Toulon there is a young Spaniard, who is on the point of losing his wife; he is in despair at not being able to be with her; as a husband and a father he is wounded in his tenderest affections. He would bless the hand which, setting him at liberty, should allow him to console the last hours of his beloved wife. It would be an act of holy generosity worthy of France. Permit me to hope for it of your benevolence. Instead of the cross of honor you proposed, I ask the liberation of Matteo Huertas."

"Brave and generous Michel!" replied the prefect, who knew all the circumstances of the combat we have narrated. "Noble boy, your father in heaven ought to be happy and proud of having such a son. Give me your hand that I may press it in mine!" And, going to his desk, he wrote a decree which allowed Matteo Huertas to return to Catalonia. A month later Michel received the cross of the legion of honor, the cross of the strong and brave.

Michel Lacroix retired when still young from the service of the navy, to assist his mother in her declining days. He has found happiness and peace in his marriage, and is the father of a numerous family, of which the eldest reads as well in big books as in the rigging of a vessel; and if the perfection of happiness were possible in this world, he certainly would have thought it was placed in his own house. His friends, who sometimes ask Breton hospitality of him, see suspended at the side of a black wooden crucifix a case with a gilt edge; in this case is a watch, with the figure of the patron Saint Michael upon it, and at its foot is a cross of honor, and a large black seal.

CHAPTER I.

LA PINEDE.

ON the coast of the Mediterranean, between Marseilles and Toulon, a small harbor lies snugly ensconced in the rocks and protected from the wind by a stony projection shaped like a pier. In stormy weather vessels sometimes seek the shelter of this little haven, but at other times the only boats in it are those belonging to the fishermen of the town. The name of this little port is La Ciotat. It had never been heard of until the Carlo Alberto in 1831 landed the Duchesse de Berri on that point of the French coast, and at the time when this story begins its existence was as little known in France as if the quaint little city had been situated in the neighborhood of Pernambuco or Batavia. In geographical dictionaries it was said to contain four thousand five hundred inhabitants, and the vintage of its hillocks was highly commended.

At the time we are speaking of, a carriage road from Marseilles to La Ciotat was in course of construction. In spite of great efforts, the work proceeded slowly. Great obstacles arose from the nature of the soil. Engineers and miners found it difficult to deal with the rocks and precipices in there way; but there was no lack of zeal in overcoming nature's resistance, for the new road was to open communications with Marseilles—and for the inhabitants of La Ciotat, Marseilles was a sort of Paris. As to the real Paris, they knew its name, they talked of it, but never dreamed of going there; nor is it quite certain that they all did know of the existence of Paris in 1835. This is no exaggeration, for at that time many a poor peasant used to take off his hat as he passed before a picture of Louis Philippe, and called him the good King Louis the Sixteenth. The storm which convulsed the world from 1789 to 1794, and the glory which dazzled it from 1800 to 1815, had passed unperceived over the heads of these good people.

Now all is changed. A dockyard for steamers has been established at La Ciotat. The benefits and the evils of civilization have reached that remote corner of the world. The traveler's eye reads its name as he passes by one of the stations of the railway, and catches a glimpse of the picturesque little town and its busy port full of shipping.

At about a league and a half from La Ciotat, at the foot of a hill covered with dwarf pines, ilexes, and holly, stands a rock where the goatherds of the neighborhood are wont to congregate, and which they call from its peculiar shape, "the Sugar-loaf." At the time in question, just opposite this rock two roads diverged in different directions. The new highroad leading to Marseilles made an angle and stretched its dusty length between the olive plains on each side of it, and the other road, or rather pathway, half choked up with furze and brambles and supported by dilapidated stonework, ascended the hill.

On a sunny morning in March a man was sitting on a stone ledge at the bottom of the Sugar-loaf rock. His dress and appearance were those of a thriving bourgeois—his figure short and stumpy, his complexion brown and ruddy. He looked between forty and fifty years of age. There was in his countenance a mixture—not an uncommon one in France—of good nature and shrewdness: shrewdness of a commonplace sort, with more sharpness in it than cleverness. There was a cunning look in the fat little gentleman's eyes; but his laugh was frank, which indicated that the cunning was assumed and the frankness natural. A man's character is more easily read in his manner of laughing than in any other way: what is false or affected in it is too apparent to deceive. The name of this personage was M. Toussaint Lescalle. He was a solicitor, one of the two royal notaries established at La Ciotat. At the moment when we find M. Lescalle seated at the foot of the Sugar-loaf hill, he seemed to be expecting somebody. Now and then, shading his eyes with his hand, he glanced at the new road, as it was then called. The white pebbles sparkled like diamonds, the ground glowed like burnished gold, the olive trees glittered like quicksilver; but it was not the peculiarities of the landscape which occupied M. Lescalle. He beguiled his impatience by reading over a letter which he drew out of a huge portfolio on his knees, and then by looking every two or three minutes at his watch with manifest signs of impatience.

At last he got up, seized his portfolio and a bundle of keys which had been lying in his hat, and began to ascend the path up the hill. As he was slowly advancing, the sound of a horse's trot reached his ears, which made him suddenly stop and turn round, and then he saw a man on horseback approaching at full speed, upon which he retraced his steps.

"Upon my word, M. le Baron, I had given you up," he exclaimed, as the gentleman came up to him.

"No wonder, my good friend," was the reply; "but if I am late I assure you I could not help it. I have been spending two days with the Marquis de Previs, and did not arrive at Marseilles till this morning."

"Will the Marquis lend a helping hand about the election?" the solicitor inquired.

"We had some conversation on the subject," the Baron said, in a way that showed he did not intend to disclose what had passed between him and the Marquis. M. Lescalle took the hint, and allowed the subject to drop.

Before the two men left the foot of the Sugar-loaf hill, the Baron dismounted and tied his horse to the trunk of an olive tree. Glancing at the stony and steep pathway, he said, "I am not going to run the risk of breaking my Silphide's legs up that horrid road."

The lawyer repressed a smile, for although the old mare might have once deserved that fanciful name, her actual aged condition and broken knees were not in keeping with it. There was a sort of resemblance between Silphide and her master. He too was old and thin and worn out; a small head, long limbs, and an aquiline nose, gave him a combined likeness to a race-horse and a greyhound. The Baron de Croixfonds had every right to this aristocratic appearance, for he was descended—so he always said, at least—from one of King Rene's brethren-in-arms during the wars between the houses of Anjou and Aragon. His wealth was supposed to be greatly inferior to the antiquity of his family, but he had an elder brother who was a peer of France and very rich. His expectations, in consequence, were more brilliant than his means.

As they slowly ascended the hill, M. Lescalle was the first to speak. Assuming a somewhat consequential manner, he said, "I am rather afraid, M. le Baron, that this excursion of yours will prove a fruitless one."

"Why so?" the Baron asked.

"I mean that you will not be able to carry out your plans."

"Have they changed their minds about selling La Pinede?"

"Oh, dear, no; but there is another purchaser in the field."

"A bona fide one?"

"Yes, a bona fide one."

* The following tale is an imitation, and partly a translation, of "Un Marquis en Province," by Madame Leonie Douet, who has most kindly sanctioned this adaptation of her work.

"How have you heard of it."

"Read this letter. It is from M. Berthet of Marseilles."

The Baron glanced at the contents of the letter, and asked, "Who is this Comte de Vedelles?"

"An ex-magistrate, I think. One of the old nobility of Lorraine."

"I wonder how high this new purchaser will bid."

"Considering the price at which we start the sale, there is ample scope for bidders," the solicitor observed, in a confidential tone

"We shall see," the Baron replied. "That low price may have tempted this Count. When he finds that a neighboring landowner is in the field, he will withdraw."

"And you will purchase?"

"Well, my son Cesaire's election must be secured, and to secure it we must possess La Pinede. I must do all I can;" and after a pause the Baron added, "and then my brother will help us."

"Oh, if the Vicomte de Croixfonds lends his assistance, there will be no difficulty."

"I am glad in any case to see this mysterious place," the Baron said, without taking notice of M. Lescalle's remark. "It is an old fancy of mine, which I have never been able to gratify. Ever since my return to Croixfonds, fifteen years ago, I have wished to go to La Pinede, but I never could get in. Have you always had possession of the keys?"

"I received the keys of the chateau sixteen years ago, when Count Honore went away after the death of his wife, and I have never been there myself since that time. He had given me exact orders on the subject, and I adhered to them."

"And has nobody been into the house—nobody at all—for sixteen years?"

"Count Honore, as long as he lived, spent a week there by himself every year."

"In what a wretched state it must be," the Baron said.

"I should think so indeed," M. Lescalle replied, and taking the largest of the keys which he carried in his hand, he thrust it into the rusty lock of an iron gate.

Above this gate was a medallion in the style of Louis the Fifteenth's time, on which the letters H. and P. formed a monogram, surmounted by a coronet. On each side of the gate a stone wall followed the undulations of the uneven ground and surrounded the whole summit of a tall hill, which seemed to rebel against this rigid belt by throwing out such an immense quantity of brambles and ivy that in several places breaches were opened in the wall. About sixty acres of barren, wild, uncultivated land, dotted about with clumps of firs—remnants of the old forest which had given its name to the place—were inclosed within its precincts, and in the centre of this property stood the house, respectfully called by every one in that neighborhood the Chateau de la Pinede.

Small as it was, something distinguished and old-fashioned in its appearance justified that appellation. It had been built in the reign of Louis the Thirteenth, partly of brick, partly of stone, and formed a perfect square; irregular rows of windows on every side, and a single door studded with projecting iron nails, gave it very much the look of a gigantic dice

Before the entrance-door was a broad paved terrace, bordered by a parapet, on which vases of blue china contained dried-up mould and sticks which had once been wreathed with green. Four acacias, planted at each corner of this terrace, had grown to a magnificent size. Their branches, freed from the trammels which used to compel them to form a sort of tent before the house, had taken all sorts of strange liberties. One of them had availed itself, in a free and easy manner, of the opening made by a broken pane of glass in one of the windows of the second story, and intruding into a bedroom, astonished every spring the spiders, its sole inhabitants, by a burst of green leaves, white blossoms, and delicious perfume. With the exception of this broken pane, everything in the little chateau was hermetically closed. Thick shutters protected the windows of the first story, and heavy iron bars those of the ground floor. If it had not been for that audacious branch of acacia and the grass growing amongst the stones of the pavement before the entrance-door, it might have been supposed that the inhabitants of La Pinede had only left it a few days ago.

The grounds evinced the contrary even more than the house. The dried-up soil, covered with branches and bindweed, presented the most desolate appearance. A fine avenue of olive trees, which led from the gate to the terrace, some few peach and almond trees and straggling vines, which made it their business to strangle the fruit trees in their entangled knots, alone testified that the place had been formerly cared for. The soil of Provence is unproductive when left to itself. To make it fertile, two things are required—labor and water. For sixteen years La Pinede had been left without the beneficial ministrations of spade or watering-pot.

The scene above described met the eyes of M. Lescalle and the Baron de Croixfonds when, after having with difficulty pushed open the iron gate, the hinges of which refused to do their part, they walked up the avenue, arrived in front of the Chateau de la Pinede, and by means of another of M. Lescalle's heavy bunch of keys, entered the house and found themselves in a large hall paved with marble, which emitted that peculiar odor of dust and decay which housekeepers call a close smell. M. Lescalle rushed into the adjoining saloon and threw open the windows. The gladsome morning sunshine flooded suddenly with light the long-closed room, and the two men looked at each other in silent astonishment. The principal pieces of furniture were grouped round the chimney, in which half-burnt logs of wood seemed to be waiting for the fire-tongs to rekindle them.

On one of those low couches which used to be called Causeuses, some tapestry work with a needle hanging to it, and an unfolded pocket handkerchief, were lying. A child's table standing near this sofa was covered with little white sheep wearing pink collars and fraternizing with lions, wolves, elephants, and stags, of proportionate size. Shepherdesses in blue gowns and hunters in red coats, resting at the bottom of a large box of playthings, seemed destined to join that happy family. The box was lying open on the couch by the side of the piece of work. It was impossible to mistake the mother's place and the child's place in that room. Her work and its play seemed only just interrupted. Where was the mother? Was she not about to come in? Where was the child? Would not the sound of its laughing voice soon ring joyfully on the stairs? No; all was silent as the grave.

The two men looked at each other with that sort of sadness which is sometimes felt at the sight of an empty nest. An old lawyer, and an old man of the world! There must have been a strange pathos in that room to have thus affected them.

On the corner of the chimney was lying a dried-up nosegay of violets, which the first touch would have destroyed, and an old newspaper. The Baron de Croixfonds took it up and read the date—March 7th, 1819.

"Yes; the eve of the anniversary of the poor Countess de la Pinede's death," the notary observed.

"Come, Lescalle, give me some account of it," the Baron said, resuming his usual manner. "You keep your reminiscences as closely under lock and key as the domain of La Pinede."

"I had made a promise on the subject," M. Lescalle answered; "but now unfortunately there is no reason why I should keep it."

"Well, then, let us break the seal at once," the Baron said. "I like family histories, and I suppose as there was so much secrecy observed in this case, that this one must have some peculiar interest." As he said this, the Baron stretched himself at full length on the sofa, took out his cigar-case, and assumed a listening attitude.

"If you expect some complicated or extraordinary history, your curiosity will be disappointed," M. Lescalle answered. "The state in which you find this place—and this room, in which everything tells its tale—reveals the simple fact that death snapped the thread of a young woman's existence, and doomed the life which was bound up in hers to a hopeless sorrow."

"I know the fact, but I want to hear details."

"You know, I suppose, that the La Pinede were one of the oldest families in this part of the country, and that they built this little chateau in the midst of this pine forest when Les Trois Tours, their former abode, had fallen into decay."

"Yes I have heard all that ancient history. But what was their position in more recent times?"

"They did not go often to Paris, or to Court, but were always very popular in their own neighborhood, so much so, that they remained here quite unmolested through the whole of the revolutionary period. The Court party, after the restoration, never forgave their not having emigrated."

The Baron, whose family had emigrated, looked displeased, and said "I do not care for political details, my dear Lescalle. Let me hear their domestic history."

Their private history, M. le Baron, was closely connected with what I have just told you as briefly as I could, for it accounts for the fact that Count Honore de la Pinede concentrated his existence in the narrow circle of his domestic affections and his secluded home. One so young, so wealthy, so handsome, and so clever, would certainly have played a part in the world, if his principles during the empire, and afterwards a sensitive pride resulting from the circumstances I have alluded to, had not kept him aloof from social and political life. He knew the Bourbons were not favorably inclined towards him, and though his sympathies were Royalist, he would not condescend to curry favor with them, so he lived entirely in the country, and cared for nothing but his wife and his home."

"Whom did he marry?"

"His cousin, Mdlle. de la Pinede. They had both lost their parents in early life, and had been brought up by an old childless uncle. From the time of their babyhood they had cared for each other, and cared for hardly any one else besides. It was one of those engrossing affections which seemed to supply to them both the place of all other ties. People used to say that these children realized the story of Paul and Virginia, only in their case it ended in a marriage. When Count Honore was twenty he married Mdlle. Louise, who was eighteen. They had one child, a girl, and for six years their happiness knew no bounds. La Pinede seemed an earthly paradise. But in one day in one moment, it came to an end. Madame de la Pinede died suddenly of disease of the heart. Beautiful, happy, smiling sitting by her husband, who perfectly adored her, and her little child playing at her feet, she expired!"

M. Lescalle paused a moment, and then pointing to the sofa, said: "I see it all before my eyes as I saw it then. Her lovely face, white as a sheet and sinking on her bosom, her hand on the head of her child; Count Honore on his knees, trying in vain to make her smell salts, and looking at her with eyes which seemed to grow wild with terror and despair."

"How did you happen to witness this scene?" the Baron asked.

"I arrived here at the very moment it took place, having called to talk over matters of business with the Count. As I opened the door of this room, I saw what I have been describing, and knew at once that there was no hope—that all was over. I dragged the poor man out of the room. He seemed to have lost his senses, and for several weeks his friends were afraid he would quite go out of his mind. They urged him to leave the place, and at last, for the sake of his child, he consented to go away. But before his departure he dismissed all his servants, even the gardener, and locked up the house and the gates of the park. Then he sent for me, gave the keys into my keeping, and exacted a solemn promise that I would never use them—never go myself, or let anybody else go to La Pinede. It was a morbid fancy of his that the place where his wife had been born, had lived, loved, and died, should remain as a solitary monument to her memory, the tomb of his past happiness, an emblem of utter desolation and perpetual mourning. I promised to attend to his directions. After shaking hands with me, he drove away with his child and her nurse. For the sake of Mdlle. Denise's education, the Count took up his abode in Paris. For the last fifteen years he has always spent one week in March at La Pinede. For eight days shut up in solitude, for even then he would not admit any one into the place, he wandered like a ghost about the house and grounds. People about here think he was out of his mind, and lament that this ancient family should have ended so sadly. The last time he came he looked deplorably ill, and spoke of his failing health. I tried to cheer him up, and advised him to try some waters. He smiled in a mournful manner, and said, 'My good friend, the wound has never healed. It is not waters that can cure a broken heart. Do not look at me so sadly. Fifteen years ago I was indeed to be pitied; but now God has been good to me, and my release is at hand. I am happier than I have been for a long time past. My sufferings will soon be over.'

"But, Mdlle. Denise," I said, 'you ought to wish to live for her sake.'

"Ah! my little girl!" he said, with some emotion. 'God will take care of Denise.'

"God, you see, was so much in his thoughts, M. le Baron, that I took it as a bad sign, and though I said all I could to make him more cheerful, I felt sure he would die soon, and so it turned out. Three months afterwards I received the news of his death, and then Mdlle. de la Pinede, by the advice of her guardian, M. Legrand, made up her mind to sell this place. He has never been to see it, this fine Paris gentleman, and he does not know that its value has considerably increased since the new road to Marseilles has been made. I painted in somewhat high colors the deplorable state into which Count Honore's morbid fancy has allowed the property to fall, and so we arrived at a valuation which has placed it within reach of your son's means."

"In case we have no serious competitors," the Baron replied; "but that M. de ——. How do you call him?"

"M. de Vedelles."

"Well, that M. de Vedelles, who falls upon us from the skies, is a great bore."

"I did my best. The sale has scarcely been advertised at all at Marseilles—only for the last eight days, so that there has been hardly time for any one to know of it—but this purchaser writes from Paris."

"And how on earth did he hear of it there?" the Baron exclaimed.

"Oh, in a very simple manner! Mdlle. de la Pinede has been educated at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, and the Countess de Vedelles visits the ladies there, and made acquaintance with the heiress, and they have laid their heads together on the subject. It was impossible to foresee this."

"It is the devil to pay!" the Baron cried. "If they bid more than two hundred thousand francs, we shall have to give it up. Even with my brother's assistance, and by getting into debt, we cannot go beyond that price."

"It is a great pity," the solicitor said.

There was rather a long pause, and then in a hesitating manner he added, "There might perhaps be a way in which the matter could be arranged."

"What way?"

"Under certain circumstances it would be in my power to place fifty thousand francs at M. Cesaire's disposal."

"Could you really, Lescalle?" the Baron anxiously inquired.

"But then you see, M. le Baron," the solicitor replied, speaking slowly and laying an emphasis on the words, "you see that sum constitutes a considerable portion of my daughter's fortune, and Rose is growing up."

"Oh! it is your daughter's fortune you are speaking of. Then in that case——" The Baron did not finish his sentence; but there was a look in his face which meant, "We need not say anything more about it."

"Can you reckon on your electors?" M. Lescalle asked.

"Yes, I think so. I have no anxiety on that point."

"If we come to an agreement, I might secure you a certain number of votes."

"Oh! pray do so. We cannot afford to neglect any chance."

"It would be rather a serious thing for me, however," the lawyer answered "You see I cannot throw over the party which supports Richer de Montlouis, unless I had a good reason for it."

"Always on Mdlle. Rose's account?" the Baron asked, in a slightly satirical tone.

"Yes, M. le Baron, I am quite above board with you. I do not mind showing you the cards Artemon Richer—"

"De Montlouis," the Baron sneeringly added.

"Artemon Richer seems inclined to pay his addresses to Rose, and upon my word, he is so good a match that I am not inclined to put a spoke in the wheel by quarreling with his family and opposing the election of his uncle."

"You don't mean to say that you would give your daughter to that heavy dolt of a man, who is always lounging in the Estaminets?"

"Not if I could find a better match for her," the solicitor answered. "but——"

The Baron snatched up his hat, and walked out of the house into the avenue. He was determined not to look as if he understood. M. Lescalle dropped the subject, and the two gentlemen walked about the place calculating the worth of each acre of land, and exulting over the neglect in which everything was left, which certainly did seem likely to disgust any one who should visit it before purchasing.

When this sort of approximate valuation was concluded, they went back to the place where Sulphide was leisurely grazing at the foot of the Sugar-loaf hill. The Baron mounted his steed and turned its head towards Croixfonds. The solicitor walked by his side for a few minutes, talking over some of the details connected with La Pinede, and then somewhat abruptly said "I am very much afraid that M. Cesaire will not be elected."

Without giving the Baron time to answer, he bowed and left him and as he hastened home with the tear of Madame Lescalle before his eyes, who could not bear to be kept waiting for breakfast, the little man murmured between his teeth "That old aristocrat. I hope he understands that I can spoil his game."

M. de Croixfonds meanwhile was making the following mental ejaculations: "The presumption of these low born people is becoming quite intolerable. To think of this vulgar attorney's venturing to offer me his daughter for my son. And now I suppose he will turn against us! But somehow or other Cesaire must be elected." His pride and his ambition pulling in different directions, the descendant of King Rene's friend went home in a very bad humor.

Three weeks afterwards the Comte de Vedelles became the owner of La Pinede. A bid of twenty thousand francs beyond the sum the Baron could produce settled the matter. When M. de Croixfonds was informed of this result he felt almost sorry that he had so decidedly snubbed M. Lescalle's proposal for unless his son could purchase a property in that part of the country, he would not be eligible; and as M. Lescalle took care to point out, this was not an easy thing in an old-fashioned locality where estates did not often change hands, the Baron knew perfectly well that this was the case, to remind him of it was like handling a smarting wound. It was with difficulty that he concealed his vexation.

CHAPTER II.

THE FAMILY OF DE VEDELLES.

THE Comte de Vedelles and his family arrived at La Pinede at the end of April, just at that moment so delightful in Provence, when the full burst of a southern spring adorns the whole landscape with a profusion of flowers. The blossoms of the peach and almond trees clothe the country in pink and white. The yellow stock, the purple iris, the blue salvia, the red valerian, and the wild vine cover every hill with a rich mantle of gorgeous colors, fringe every wall with bright tufts of waving beauty, and embalm the air with an indescribable perfume. The days were mild and lovely but the evenings sometimes very cold—thanks to the mistral, that terrible bane of the Provençal climate.

One night that this rough enemy was blowing with virulence and had prevented the usual stroll after dinner three of the new inhabitants of La Pinede were sitting round the chimney, where some pine-logs and burning cones were diffusing their fragrant perfume and not unwelcome heat. These three persons were the Count and Countess de Vedelles and their eldest son, Jacques de Vedelles. The Count was reading in a huge arm chair the Countess working at a piece of tapestry Jacques, half sitting, half lying on a couch near his mother, poked the fire and watched the sparks as they flew up the chimney with an absent expression of countenance which betokened either an idle or a dreamy state of mind which is by no means the same thing.

For some time no one spoke. The great hall clock ticked, the logs crackled, the wind made strange noises amongst the pine trees.

At last Madame de Vedelles dropped a ball of worsted, and as her son stooped to pick it up she whispered to him. "Is George still out of doors?"

"I suppose so," Jacques answered in the same low voice. Madame de Vedelles sighed and another long silence ensued.

Though she had not meant her question to be heard, it had apparently caught her husband's ear for he rang the bell, and soon the wrinkled face and grey head of old Vincent appeared at the door.

"Is M. George at home?" the Count asked, without raising his eyes from his book.

"M. George is finishing his supper in the little dining room. He has made a very good meal of it," the old man added in a significant manner and almost before he had finished his sentence, George de Vedelles came into the room.

Though he was twenty his figure was so slight and his appearance so youthful that he did not look more than seventeen or eighteen years of age. The perfect symmetry of his features and the whiteness of his face gave it the appearance of a marble bust. It was only in his eyes that there was any animation. They were dark, sparkling, and yet soft their dreamy absent expression added to the peculiarity of this young man's countenance.

George's dress, unlike that of the rest of the family, betokened neglect. He had on that evening a shooting jacket and trousers much the worse for wear heavy leathern gaiters and thick clumsy shoes. Had it not been for the fineness of his linen and his white and well-shaped hands, he might have been taken for a young gamekeeper.

After he had made a bow to his father and kissed his mother's hand he sat down on the couch near his brother. As he did so and turned towards him a bright smile lighted up his face, but only for a minute.

"What have you been doing, George?" the Count asked. "Why did you not come home in time for dinner?"

"I have been out shooting all day," was the answer; "and it was later than I thought when I came back."

"We may conclude, then, that you have brought home plenty of game."

"The season is very bad, and game, I fancy, scarce in this neighborhood."

"Then why are you always going out shooting? What an absurd fancy it is to be walking about all day with a gun on your shoulder without object or result." George made no answer, and played with the ears of a fine spaniel which had followed him into the room. M. de Vedelles went on "It was just the same at Valsec, where there was plenty of game of every sort. You do not choose to exert yourself even as to idle sports. You never make an effort even for the sake of amusement. You will always remain a listless unsociable obstinate dreamer."

"But my excursions amuse me," George replied, "even though I do not shoot much, and I think they are good for my health."

"Health, always health!" the Count exclaimed, "that is the excuse for everything. I am getting tired of it."

"But, my dear, if these long walks strengthen him," Madame de Vedelles said.

"He seems strong enough now," the Count rejoined. "It would be well to think of the improvement of his mind. Come, George," he added in a kinder manner "can't you resume a little your course of studies? Jacques would direct and help you."

"Pray do not talk of that, my dear father. I cannot work my head. I tried to look into the books Jacques lent me, but I could make nothing of them."

"Don't you understand what you read?" Madame de Vedelles asked.

"Sometimes I do, and sometimes I don't, mother. But I hate study; it tries my head."

"Astronomy is, perhaps, your favorite pursuit," M. de Vedelles sneeringly remarked. "I saw you yesterday walking up and down the avenue, with your nose in the air, star-gazing, I presume."

"Oh, yes; I like to look at the sky; it is so beautiful."

"Then I hope your memory is returning. Do you find that you recollect the names of the constellations? If I remember right, you had at college the first prize for cosmography."

"Oh! that was before my illness, father, and I have forgotten the names they gave to my dear, beautiful stars. Now I can only look at them and feel glad that God made them."

M. de Vedelles looked disappointed and sighed. His wife, who wished to interrupt the conversation, turned to her eldest son and said, "Dear Jacques, will you read us something aloud?"

"Yes, mother. What shall I read? I have got here Valentine, a novel of George Sand's, and Sous les Tilleuls, by Alphonse Karr"

"Novels," Madame de Vedelles said. "What sort of novels are they?"

"An amusing sort, I suppose," Jacques answered, "for they are very popular, and people do not generally care for tiresome books."

"But are they good books to read?" Madame de Vedelles again inquired.

"You need not take the trouble to ask, her husband said, "the names of the authors are enough."

"I know nothing about them."

"Well, I will tell you what they are," the old Count rejoined.

"They are writers who seek for subjects of interest amidst the foulest scenes of human depravity and exhibit the worst passions of human nature under the fairest and most deceitful garb. M. Karr and Madame Sand hold a high rank in this intellectual orgy, which would end by utterly dishonoring literature in France, if, like all other orgies, it was not doomed to be short-lived and to die of its own excesses."

"You are very severe, father, on these poor authors," Jacques said. "If they had appeared before you when you sat on the bench, they would have found no mercy at your hands."

"I should have made short work with them," the old Count answered, and then turning to his wife he said, "I suppose you do not wish Jacques to read to us such books as those, my dear?"

"No, indeed," she replied. "Can you suggest anything we should like to hear?"

"Why not one of the chef-d'œuvres of our old literature?" the Count said, taking up from the table a volume of Voltaire's tragedies.

Be it remarked that the old man, who had so justly and vehemently denounced the immoral writers of his day, shared that unaccountable partiality for the wickedest, the meanest, and the most unpatriotic Frenchman of the last century, which lingers still in the minds of so many of his compatriots, even in those who, to a certain degree, have struggled out of the mists of cynical unbelief with which he has poisoned the souls of successive generations. M. de Vedelles was of the number of those who had imbibed from the teaching of the eighteenth century a practical scepticism, if the two words can be united, which, though not obtrusively put forward, nevertheless influenced his thoughts and actions in various respects. He was a Royalist, a Conservative, and the husband of a pious woman. For all these reasons he always spoke of religion with respect, and he abhorred modern infidelity and lawlessness. But his secret sympathy with Voltaire and his school sometimes pierced through his political and domestic code of religious propriety, and Jacques de Vedelles, in spite of his mother's efforts, had derived from his father opinions which he more boldly announced and acted upon more consistently when not under the paternal roof.

Though a general admiration for Voltaire was among the half involuntary influences which the Count had exercised over the mind of his son, the proposal to read aloud Merope did not particularly charm him. He made, however, no difficulty on the subject, and drawing a chair close to the table where his mother was working, he began to read that somewhat dull but fine tragedy.

Jacques was gifted with a melodious voice and a great talent for reading. His father listened to him with delight, and his mother as if she was hearing the most exquisite music. George, before the end of the first act, was fast asleep. The Count de Vedelles kept glancing at the couch in a contemptuous manner. At ten o'clock every one rose and went to bed. Passing before his slumbering son, M. de Vedelles said to his wife, "And you try to make me believe he has a taste for poetry?"

"The poor child is tired," she said; "look how pale he is."

"Oh, I know that you can always find excuses for him; but really he cannot go on leading this kind of life. Only see in what a way he is dressed: those dirty shoes and worn-out clothes make him look like a poacher just escaped from the hands of the gendarmes!"

"I will speak to him about it to-morrow," Madame de Vedelles gently said.

During this conversation Jacques had roused his brother, and was whispering to him something he did not seem to understand.

On the first floor of the chateau there was a square ante-room, with four doors opening into different apartments. After the Count and Countess had gone into their rooms, Jacques stopped his brother, who was going up the staircase to the next story, and said:

"You really must attend, George, to our father's wishes. He gets quite angry with you. You ought to have more sense."

"What sense?" George asked, having heard only the last word of his brother's sentence.

"The sense to behave like other people."

"I do not see what harm I do to anybody."

"That is not the question. It is your duty to obey your parents; and your way of going on, though it may not do them harm, displeases your father. Do try George, to acquire the habits of a gentleman. You are now twenty, and after all you are the Baron de Vedelles."

"I do not care whether I am or not," George answered. "Come Jacques, please do not preach to me. You used not to do so, but now everybody tries his hand at it; even old Vincent, whilst I was at supper, kept grumbling away about something or other I don't know what, for I was not listening. Really, people might leave me alone."

"Poor fellow!" Jacques said to himself; "it is impossible to make an impression upon him. We must be indulgent to his infirmities."

And there the conversation ended. The brothers shook hands; Jacques went into his handsome, well-furnished bedroom on the first floor, and George to a sort of large lumber-room upstairs, which he had made choice of as his sleeping chamber, after obtaining leave from his mother to arrange it as he pleased.

One of his fancies had been to divide and subdivide this room by means of curtains hanging on rods, made with the pieces of tapestry which used to cover the walls of the rooms below before the house had been refurnished and silk substituted in their place. These ancient hangings represented a variety of Scriptural, historical, mythological, hunting, and pastoral scenes. Though faded and worn out, they were still very handsome even when seen by daylight; and in the evening, in the faint vacillating light afforded by a single candle, they seemed to assume all sorts of strange, fantastic shapes—white plumes nodded on the helmets of the knights; horses advanced against a wild boar standing at bay, surrounded by a pack of hounds; Abraham's sword seemed to descend towards the form of his son bound to the altar of sacrifice; knights, hunters, and patriarchs looked as if they were carrying on mysterious interviews; and a crowd of Scriptural and legendary personages rose from the canvas like figures in a dream.

George evidently took pleasure in living amongst these shadowy apparitions, for he often went up to his room before bed time, and his mother had sometimes found him in a fit of abstraction, silently gazing on the face of Rebecca at the well, or the holy Queen Bertha.

There was nothing in that room which deserved to be called furniture, except a bed, a dressing table, and a few chairs. In one corner stood an old lacquered harpsichord, which had once made the happiness of some ancestress of the Pinedes, but had been consigned to oblivion for many a long year. George had ruthlessly torn out of it the remaining strings and turned the case into a receptacle for shells, and pebbles, and dried flowers. Planks, supported by tressels, and covered with shreds of tapestry, did duty for a table, on which heaps of books were lying in hopeless confusion. Old Vincent had vainly asked leave to sort and arrange them. It was just over this disorderly library that the branch of acacia from the terrace extended its green foliage and white flowers. George would not allow it to be cut off or meddled with. He said it was the nicest piece of furniture in his room. An old easel, a fiddle, and two or three boxes containing unfinished sketches, and all sorts of odds and ends, completed the singular medley of things which filled this strange bed-chamber.

About an hour after he had gone to his room, but not to bed, and when the lights in the chateau were all put out, George de Vedelles softly opened his door and went down stairs. He stood an instant on the landing-place of the first floor, and listened to ascertain that no one was stirring. All was quiet, and he went on, first to feel for his shooting jacket, which he had left on the couch of the dining-room, and having found it, crossed the vestibule and let himself out by the front door, which he carefully locked. Once in the avenue he ran on towards the gate, opened it in the same noiseless manner, and then dashed down a little path which led through the olive woods to the sea.

CHAPTER III.

VISITORS.

On the following day the weather was beautiful. A mild shower in the night had softened the air, the short-lived violence of the mistral had not too roughly shaken the clouds of snowy blossoms, and the sun was forcing open the orange buds. Bursting on every side they filled the air with perfume. Everywhere the gardeners hastened to disengage the trees from the straw clothing which protects them during the cold weather. Spring had gained the victory, and was triumphing over winter.

The Count's family were sitting at breakfast. As a rule silence prevailed during that meal. He read the Paris newspapers; George, who was sitting opposite the window, ate heartily and stared at the flower-beds; Madame de Vedelles now and then said a few words to Jacques, who was sitting near her, and consulted him about points relating to the furnishing of La Pinede. A difference of opinion arose on the subject of the relative merits of dimity and chintz. Jacques advised chintz for the chair covers in the drawing-room. Madame de Vedelles, faithful to the traditions of the Restoration, inclined to dimity.

The Count was appealed to and also voted for dimity: the Countess thus remaining mistress of the field, told Jacques, to comfort him, that she meant to put chintz in his room.

"Oh, it is not worth while to do that, dear mother," he answered.

"What! sit on Utrecht velvet all the summer, Jacques," she answered, "and in Provence too? I cannot think of such a thing!"

"That is not what I meant," he replied; "but as I shall not be here more than a few days, it really would be useless to go to that expense."

Madame de Vedelles' countenance fell. "I did not know you were going away," she said.

"Has not my father told you?"

"No."

"I meant to speak to you about it this very day, my dear," the Count said, looking up from this newspaper. "Jacques is anxious to go back to Paris, and I think he is quite right. He is losing time here, and time is precious."

"I suppose he is bored here," Madame de Vedelles said, scarcely able to suppress her tears.

"Oh, you must not say that, dear little mother," Jacques exclaimed, as he affectionately kissed her hand.

"And if he was bored here," the Count rejoined, "if this sort of idle life in the country did not suit him, I should not blame him in the least. It is a proper sort of life for an old man of my age who wants rest and solitude. But at Jacques' age a man must think of the future, and devote himself to his profession. Jacques has abilities which will secure success in any line he follows. He has studied for the bar. He has a decided talent for speaking, but it is not by walking about a park that he will acquire reputation, or by living at home that he will prepare for himself future electors."

"But my dear, the election which they are so excited about here, takes place in two months!"

"I am not talking of municipal elections. I mean the approaching general elections, where I hope to see Jacques cut a considerable figure. But for that end it is necessary to take measure beforehand, and to acquire a well-known name; that once secured, all the rest will easily follow."

"Do you really think so," Madame de Vedelles exclaimed, quite electrified at the prospect. "George! only think if your brother was to be, one day a deputy! Would not that be a great honor?"

"A great honor indeed, mother," George replied helping himself meanwhile to some more chicken.

"Are you appealing to George on the subject?" the Count bitterly asked. "Do you suppose he has any ambition for his brother? Would he had a spark of it for himself!"

George took no notice of his father's sneering remark, and breakfast ended in silence.

As Madame de Vedelles rose from table, she looked out of the window and saw three persons walking up the avenue. "Here is company" she said. "Jacques can you make out who they are? I do not feel as if I had ever seen these people before."

Jacques looked and answered: "It is M. Toussaint Lescale, mother, with his wife and daughter."

"Yes, it must be Lescale," the Count said. "I sent for him about some business matters but I wonder why he brings his family here. Does he suppose that we are to be on a footing of intimacy with them?"

As soon as his mother uttered the word company, George had disappeared. In the meantime the visitors had been shown into the vestibule. Madame de Vedelles came there and civilly greeted them. The notary said that his wife had hastened to pay her respects to Madame la Comtesse, and had not been able to resist the wish to present her daughter to her.

Though Madame de Vedelles was not a little bored with this visit, she answered in a gracious manner, and when the Count went into his study with M. Lescalle, she led the two ladies into the garden.

Madame Lescalle, like many of the inhabitants of provincial towns, was a person who took immense pains to disfigure, by affectation, excellent natural qualities. Born at La Ciotat, she had left it only twice in her life, both times to spend a week at Lyons with an aunt of hers. These northern journeys, as she used to call them, gave her an assumed right to lay down the law on points of fashion and taste. She was in the habit of pronouncing in the most positive manner that some particular stuff was out of fashion, that such a style of dress was antiquated, that such and such a color was in bad taste. No one ever ventured to differ from her. Privileges founded on assumption are singularly solid, and Madame Lescalles had long been the uncontested oracle of all the fine ladies of La Ciotat. Her decisions were undisputed, even by the wife of the mayor, the first dignitary of the town, and were listened to with deference in the house of the Richers de Montlouis, the wealthiest family in the neighborhood.

Firmly seated on her little throne, which had never been threatened with a rival, the notary's wife had felt a little anxious at the apparition on the scene of a Parisian lady of high birth and large fortune. She apprehended danger from that quarter, and like a skilful general, determined to go and judge with her own eyes of the extent of the peril. In case it proved imminent, she was not a woman likely to succumb without a struggle. Heroic measures were already floating in her mind. "If it is necessary," she thought, "I shall get my gowns from Paris."

When, after these desperate resolutions, she found herself in presence of a thin, pale, gentle, sickly-looking woman in a lilac silk dress and a plain white lace cap on her head, Madame Lescalle felt reassured, and still more by the fact that two or three silvery grey hairs were to be seen in the smooth black bands which lined the Countess' white forehead. It was evident that Madame de Vedelles did not care how she dressed, and would never be a leader of fashion at La Ciotat.

In the meantime the good lady, who had no idea what was passing in the mind of the notary's wife, was wondering at the peculiarities of her dress and manner. In spite of a stumpy figure and a too great embonpoint, Madame Lescalle had been and was still considered pretty. Her complexion was blooming, her features regular, her countenance good humored, and if she had been dressed with a little of that taste she was always talking about, she would have been a pleasing looking person, but by dint of absurd pretensions she often made herself ridiculous.

A great desire to dazzle the eyes of the inhabitants of La Pinede had led to an unfortunate display of magnificence in her dress on that particular day. She wore a bright green Chaly gown, the pattern of which represented branches of coral, immense sleeves inwardly sustained by internal circles of whalebone, which gave them no chance of collapsing. An imitation Cashmere shawl, a pink bonnet surmounted by a bunch of flowers which would have filled a jardiniere, completed this astonishing toilette.

From the first moment they met, these two ladies felt how little there was or ever could be in common between them, even with regard to that ordinary sort of intimacy which presupposes a certain degree of similarity in habits and tone of mind. They did not feel the least at their ease with each other during that first interview, and had it not been for Madame Lescalle's inveterate custom of asking as many questions as possible, conversation would have languished. But uncertain as she was of another opportunity of seeing the Countess, and anxious to collect from her an ample harvest of details about Paris, she made the best of her time.

Innumerable were her questions concerning dress, of course, and then theatres, parties, balls, and even the dishes then in fashion, for Madame Lescalle, with all her finery, was also a good housekeeper.

Poor Madame de Vedelles was very much behindhand in all these respects. Her delicate health and pious habits of life had always kept her out of the way of worldly pleasures, and she was obliged to acknowledge her ignorance on several of those subjects in a way that perfectly astounded Madame Lescalle.

One strange question she addressed to Madame de Vedelles. "Does it not surprise you very much, madame," she said, "to see the sun here?"

"Why should it surprise me?" was the answer.

"I have been told that there is never any sunshine in Paris. It must be very dull."

Madame de Vedelles could not help smiling, and found it no easy matter to alter Madame Lescalle's impressions on that point. In order to interrupt the unceasing course of her visitor's questions, she turned to Rose Lescalle, who had remained till then in the background. Her dress was a great contrast to her mother's toilette. It so happened that she had returned only a few days before from the Convent of the Dames Bernardines at Marseilles, and was still wearing the school uniform. She felt a little ashamed of her plain blue frock, her white scarf, and her straw hat lined with black velvet. But in spite of her bashfulness and somewhat awkward appearance, Rose Lescalle was really very pretty. She was then just seventeen. Except a rather plump and rounded figure, there was no likeness in her to her mother. She was fair, a very unusual thing in Provence and a profusion of soft, smooth, golden hair surrounded her cheeks and encircled her head in two magnificent plaits. Her eyes were of so dark a blue that they looked black by candle light; their expression was sweet and shy, and at the same time open and confiding. The extreme delicacy of her features and her very small nose gave rather a childish look to her face. She looked like a beautiful little girl of two or three years old dressed as a grown-up person and seen through a magnifying glass. As to her complexion it was simply dazzling. For once the name of Rose had turned out appropriate.

Jacques was at once struck with astonishment at the mother's dress, and with admiration at the daughter's beauty. He tried to converse with the pretty Provençale, but could not obtain anything more than a yes or a no in answer to his questions. His mother was a little more successful.

"Do you like the country, mademoiselle?"

"I don't know, madame. I have never lived in the country."

"Then I suppose you like a town life better?"

"I have not tried yet living in a town, so I cannot tell if I shall like it."

Jacques laughed and said, "But you must have lived somewhere, mademoiselle, either in a town or in the country?"

"No, sir!" Rose answered. "I have spent six years in a convent; and if you had been at school there, you would know that it is not like being either in the country or in a town."

"You are quite right, mademoiselle. I understand now what you mean. A convent is not like any other place. You see people in the parlor, but it is not like meeting them in a salon. You have a garden to walk in, and trees to look at, but it is not like real country."

In the course of their walk round the grounds, the ladies, escorted by Jacques, passed by the threshing floor. There they found George kneeling against a low wall, his chin resting on his hands and his whole attention engaged in watching something on the ground.

"What are you doing there, my dear boy?" Madame de Vedelles asked.

George stood up, bowed to Madame Lescalle, and looked rather foolish.

"What were you so intent upon?" his mother inquired.

"Perhaps monsieur was watching those two beetles fighting in the grass," Madame Lescalle said, meaning it as a joke.

"Yes," George answered; "I have been looking at them for the last half-hour. They are wonderful creatures. Do you see that one with the blue scales, mother? It is such a beauty."

"My son George is a great child, I think," Madame de Vedelles said, smiling rather sadly and kissing her son's forehead.

"Come along with us," Jacques said, drawing his brother's arm in his. George made no resistance, and Rose seemed more at her ease than when walking alone with Jacques behind the two mothers. She even ventured to remark upon the beauty of the flowers, and Jacques tried to keep up the conversation.

"I suppose, mademoiselle," he said, "that La Pinede is one of the prettiest places in this neighborhood?"

She shook her head and answered: "La Tour and Fond Saint are also very nice country houses. The views are not so fine, but then the gardens are much more neatly kept. You do not see in them those straggling vines which hang on all the trees here."

"You do not like them?"

"They destroy the trees, and prevent them from bearing fruit. And only look how those caper-bushes are springing up in every direction. My father says nothing injures a place so much when once they take possession of the soil there is no getting rid of them."

"And why should they be got rid of?" George asked; "the lilac flowers of the caper-bush are lovely, with their long pistils which look like plumes."

"Yes, they are very pretty, but still you ought to have them pulled up."

"Why?"

"Because you could plant that hill-side with lucerne. It would grow as you have water here, and be a profitable crop. Lucerne sells very well in this country where there is so little hay."

"O worthy daughter of the house of Lescalle," Jacques mentally exclaimed.

"M. le Comte means, I suppose, to cultivate all this land?"

"I hope not, indeed," George hastily rejoined; "they can make a kitchen garden somewhere out of sight."

Rose opened her large blue eyes very wide, and said, "Would you really not wish to improve this property?"

George made no answer, and Jacques laughingly said that he meant to plant a great many rose-bushes about the place, and then Mdlle. Lescalle, when she came to La Pinede, would find herself surrounded by her namesakes.

This rather stupid compliment did not seem to displease the young lady, who blushed and smiled, and in so doing showed a row of the whitest little teeth.

Before the visitors left, the whole party sat down for a moment on the terrace. Madame Lescalle caught sight of the acacia branch which had pushed its way into George's bedroom. "Dear, me," she exclaimed, "did they really make over the house to you in this dreadful state? That horrid tree has quite spoilt the window. I could send you a carpenter this very evening, Madame la Comtesse, to saw off that abominable branch and mend the casement."

"Do not take that trouble, madame," Jacques said. "It is into my brother's room that the branch trespasses, and George will not hear of cutting it down."

"Oh, what an extraordinary idea!"

"It is a fancy of his."

"But the effect is so bad. It spoils the symmetry of this side of the house, and it just happens that it is the only side of La Pinede which is at all symmetrical. What a pity it is that the windows are so badly placed—otherwise it would be a handsome house. In those old times they had no idea how to build."

At that moment M. Lescalle's reappearance put an end to the discussion, and soon afterwards the visitors departed.

As they walked down the avenue, the notary and his family met a carriage, the dusty appearance of which betokened that it came from a distance. Madame Lescalle's eager curiosity could only discern that it contained an elderly gentleman and a lady with a black veil on. "Who are those people?" she inquired of her husband. "They are not any of the neighbors."

"I don't know them by sight," M. Lescalle said, after glancing at the vehicle which passed them rapidly. It stopped at the door of the chateau just as the notary and his family were going out of the gate of the park.

Vincent came forward, and the old gentleman said, "Will you tell Madame la Comtesse de Vedelles that Mdlle. Denise de la Pinede and her guardian have called to see her."

CHAPTER IV.

MORE VISITORS.

Mdlle. DENISE DE LA PINEDE was still in deep mourning for her father. Her plain black traveling-dress, made like a riding-habit, became her tall thin figure. Round her neck she wore a simple white muslin collar, and on her head a large black felt hat like those worn by the peasant women in Provence. Her regular features, large dark eyes, delicately white complexion, and the masses of black hair on each side of her face, were in keeping with the simplicity of her dress and the mild, serious expression of her countenance. She looked the high-born lady that she was.

M. Legrand, her guardian, was a singularly commonplace individual. The most remarkable thing about him were his gold spectacles and an imperturbable self-complacent manner.

Whilst they waited for Madame de Vedelles, he seated himself in an arm-chair and read the newspaper. Denise stood in the middle of the room and looked about her. After the lapse of sixteen years, she was gazing again on that once familiar scene! on that room where she used to play about near her mother's couch, at the arm-chair her father used to sit in when he came home from shooting. Nothing was changed in that drawing-room. Each piece of furniture was in its old place. The bull clock was ticking with the sound she so well remembered. Flowers filled the old vases in the corners of the room. All looked the same; but sixteen years had elapsed. Both her father and her mother were dead—La Pinede sold. Here she was as a visitor in the house where she had been born and had begun what seemed such a bright existence!

It was a strange feeling, a wonderful change! She looked at everything with that sad, curious attention with which the eye rests on once familiar scenes, and as the past rose before her with overpowering intensity, the orphan girl felt more deeply than she had ever done before the yearning pain of bereavement, the utter loneliness of her position. Her heart swelled with this consciousness, and silent tears coursed down her pale, beautiful face. She did not perceive that there was some one looking at her. George de Vedelles had been standing for some minutes at the door, entranced, absorbed in a state of intense wondering admiration.

The Comte and Comtesse's entrance interrupted George's ecstasy, Denise's contemplation, and M. Legrand's perusal of the Journal des Debats.

Mdlle. de la Pinede made a strong effort over herself, wiped her eyes, and hastening towards Madame de Vedelles, said to her in a low, tremulous voice, "I am sure, dear Madame de Vedelles, that you understand the feelings of a poor girl who, after so many years, sees again the home of her childhood, and that with your usual kindness you sympathize with her."

The Countess took the hands of her young friend in hers and pressed them affectionately. After a few words of sympathy and interest had been uttered and answered, Mdlle. de la Pinede explained that the Comte de Vedelles having written to her guardian to ask for the list of the family pictures and the things that had belonged to the late Madame de la Pinede, and not been included in the sale of the house as it stood—by the express desire of Count Hopore, who had foreseen the possibility of his daughter's selling the place—she had thought it better to come herself from Toulon, where she was spending some weeks with an aunt of hers, in order to point out herself what these exceptions were, and to arrange the matter with her kind friends.

Denise had such a pleasant voice, and such a charming way of speaking, everything she said was so courteous and so well expressed, that even the old Count, who would naturally have been disputatious and inclined to stand on his rights, fell completely under the charm, and hastened to say that Mdlle. Pinede had but to go through the rooms and point out whatever she wished to be sent to her, and her directions would be immediately complied with.

It was settled that the visitors should first take some refreshment, and then the business was to be proceeded with. In the meantime the following conversation was carried on.

"Shall you come to Paris next winter?" Denise asked the Countess.

"Oh, no; we have entirely given up Paris."

"On account of the climate?"

"Yes; I cannot spend the winter there."

"We sold Valsec only because my wife's health required a southern climate," the Count said.

"And do you mean always to live in the country? Will you not find it rather dull?"

"Oh, no; we have made up our minds to retire from the world. At your age you cannot understand such a resolution. You would think it very tiresome always to remain here."

Denise smiled and said, "I do not think it would quite suit me."

"How do you like Toulon?"

"I shall not be sorry to go back to Paris."

"Ah, I thought so," the Count said. "I know what Toulon is like, and the sort of society there: sailors and old dowagers, amusing enough to look at, but desperately dull to talk to. I suppose you do not mean, mademoiselle, to vegetate long in that dull seaport?"

"I am going to remain there some time longer."

"And what can induce you to inhabit such a tiresome place?"

"My aunt is very kind, and wishes me to stay with her as long as possible."

"Mdlle. de la Pinede invents all sorts of strange amusements for herself," M. Legrand said. "You would never guess how she wiles away the time in that horrid seaport town."

George, who had been leaning on the back of his mother's chair without joining in the conversation, but with his eyes and ears intently engaged on every word that was uttered, ventured to say in a low voice, "How, I wonder!"

M. Legrand laughed. "I shall get into a scrape, I suppose, if I speak of l'œuvre des petits matelots."

Denise turned to the Countess with a smile, and said, "It is only to you, dear madame, that I will let M. Legrand mention my hobbies. We had many common interests in Paris. You know that you were the first person who took me to one of the meetings of the Sainte Famille."

"Oh, that is another of Mdlle. Denise's enterprises at Toulon. She leads the ladies of the town a weary life with her Parisian activity. Our Provençales are rather inclined to the dolce far niente of their Italian neighbors."

"Then they would suit you, George," the Count said to his son, whose pale cheeks suddenly reddened at being thus addressed in the presence of Mdlle. de la Pinede, whose dark, speaking eyes turned upon him with an inquiring expression.

"I shall tell you one advantage you may derive from your residence in the south, my dear," the Countess said to her young friend. "The climate will still further improve your very beautiful voice. Your talent can hardly admit of improvement. Have you been singing much lately?"

"Has not she got up a choir in the Church of St. Ildegonde," M. Legrand exclaimed, "which is the admiration of the whole town? It has become the fashion to go to Vespers since Mdlle. Denise has begun to play the organ and to lead the choir."

"How odious it is," Denise exclaimed, "to think of fashion having anything to do with the worship of God!"

"Better that it should be the fashion to go to church than to stay away, my dear," Madame de Vedelles said.

"Ah," Denise rejoined, "I suppose you think like the English poet who said that there are some 'who come to scoff and who remain to pray.'"

George's eyes seemed to grow more eloquent every moment as he listened to this conversation, and it was like awaking from a pleasant dream to be asked by his father to go to his study and fetch from it some papers relating to the personal property and the recent purchases connected with the chateau and the estate, which he wished to examine with M. Legrand.

He at once left the room; but on his way upstairs entirely forgot what he had been sent to do, passed absently before the door of the study, went into his own room, walked up and down for a few minutes, and then leaning against the window, fell into a fit of deep musing.

Meanwhile Jacques, who had been out, came in a short time afterwards, and M. de Vedelles presented him to the young heiress with a feeling of conscious pride. The way in which he spoke of Jacques as "my son," made her ask, "Is the young man who was here a moment ago also your son?"

"Yes; my youngest son," the Count answered, "an overgrown school-boy, without any manners or conversation. He is so shy that I was afraid of introducing him to you. By-the-by," he added, turning to Jacques, "do go and see what he is about. I sent him half an hour ago to my study for some papers. I dare say he is quite puzzled to find them. He has no head for anything."

"He is not in the study," Jacques answered; "I saw him, as I came in, at the window of his room, staring, as usual, at the view. I called to him, but he did not answer, and disappeared."

"Go and tell him," the Countess said in a whisper, "to be sure to be in time for dinner. Mdlle. de la Pinede and her guardian will stay and dine with us."

Jacques went to give his brother this message, and then came back and tried to make himself agreeable to his mother's young guest. He evidently was as much struck with her as George. Nothing could be more opposite in looks, in character, and in but his admiration was evinced in quite a different manner. Manner than M. de Vedelles' sons. Jacques was eight years older than George, and most people would have said much the handsomest of the two.

The de Vedelles were originally of Norman extraction, and he had all the distinctive characteristics of his father's family. Strong, tall, fair-haired, with a fine complexion and white teeth, he presented a perfect type of the manly beauty of the race to which he belonged, whereas George resembled his mother, who was a creole of the isle of Cuba.

Jacques knew perfectly well how to set himself off to the best advantage, both as to dress and as to manner. He had talents and cleverness, and made the most of them. A general favorite wherever he went, his confidence in his powers of pleasing was very great, but not offensively displayed. With considerable quickness he discerned that the light and chaffing tone which was habitual to him when conversing with young ladies would not suit Mdlle. de la Pinede, and without conscious hypocrisy or affectation, he talked of things he thought likely to interest her, and gave it to be understood that he might be induced even to take—some day—a practical interest in many subjects he had hitherto little studied.

George scarcely opened his lips before or after dinner. He had made, under old Vincent's superintendance, a rather unsuccessful attempt at dressing for the occasion: submitted to have his hair brushed in a fashionable manner, and put on a white waistcoat and a coat and trousers which showed him to have grown considerably since those garments had been made. His attire was not in keeping with his style or looks, and his excessive shyness made him awkward and almost ridiculous, so that Denise easily accepted the disparaging description his father had given of him, and concluded that his mind was as deficient as his manners were strange.

Still she seemed interested about him, and as she talked with his brother, often turned towards him, and tried to make him join in the conversation. But whenever she addressed a question to the poor youth, he looked so distressed that at last she thought it kinder not to speak to him.

When the meal was over, and coffee had been served on the terrace, M. de Vedelles and M. Legrand retired to discuss matters of business, and Madame de Vedelles and Mdlle. de la Pinede, by the Count's desire, went over the house for the purpose of marking out the pictures and the articles of furniture which the latter was entitled to claim.

The Countess was not clever or observant, but full of sweetness and kindness. Her gentle sympathy softened what she felt must be a painful task to the orphan girl, who went through it in a calm, deliberate manner, as a matter of duty, but, except when she came upon pictures of her parents or her mother's own work-box, showed little care or emotion. She consulted a list in her hand, drawn up by her father, and verified its accuracy.

When they returned to the drawing-room, she took Madame de Vedelles' hand in hers, and said:

"My dear Countess, I am going to make rather a strange request. You have always been so kind to me, coming to see me at the Sacre Cœur, and to-day you have been so full of tenderness and sympathy that I feel I may look upon you as a friend. Might I ask you to leave all these things with you? I don't want to take them away; I should like them to be here—to remain here."

"We will keep them as long as you like for you, dear Denise. I dare say it will be more convenient for you not to remove them till you have a house of your own."

"That is not what I mean. I should always like to think of them as being here. I have some of my dear father's feeling about this place. In my heart and thoughts it will be always sacred to the memory of my parents. What they looked upon, what they touched, what they used, had better be here than elsewhere."

The young girl hid her face in her hands, and gave way to a burst of tears. Madame de Vedelles gently stroked her hand, and for a few minutes did not speak. Many rapid thoughts passed through her mind.

"Why did she sell the place as she cares for it so much? Does she now regret that she did so? What a strange idea to want to leave all those souvenirs here! Dear me! I wonder! Such things have, they say, happened as—. Jacques is so handsome, so pleasing. Has it occurred to her as a possibility? What a perfect thing it would be for both of them! She is going to stay some time at Toulon. How glad I should be."

"Forgive me for being so foolish," Denise said. "I do not often shed tears, and now it is all over."

She raised her head, and there was a sweet and beautiful smile on her face—so full of peace and serenity, that Madame de Vedelles felt surprised at the sudden change.

"Will you do what I asked you?" Denise said.

"I must speak to my husband first; but I think I can answer for him that he will agree to keep these things as long as ever you wish them to stay here, and to send them to you whenever you claim them."

"I shall never claim them," Denise said in a tone of such decision that Madame de Vedelles could only say:

"At any rate, they will always be at your disposal. By the way, there is a box I must also show you."

"George," she said, for at that moment she saw her youngest son on the terrace, sitting on the parapet with his dog, and watching his mother and Denise as they sat in the drawing-room. "George, go up to the lumber-room, and bring here a box on which you will see written, 'Mlle. de la Pinede's toys.'"

George disappeared, and brought back that very box which had for so many years stood on the coach near which Madame de Vedelles and Denise were sitting. He laid it on the table, removed the lid, and took out of it the little sheep with their pink collars, the wooden animals, the hunters and shepherdesses, and spread them before Denise, who took them in her hand, one by one, sighed, then smiled, and said:

"Yes; how well I remember them. They were the delight of my childhood. I often asked my poor father for them. It was those little sheep I was so fond of. He used to buy me all the most wonderful toys that could be found in Paris; but I never had any just like these." After looking at them a little while she said, "I suppose there are some poor little children in the neighborhood whom you could make happy, dear Countess, by giving them my dear old toys?"

"May I have them?" George eagerly said.

Denise laughed, but Madame de Vedelles looked vexed.

ends, you will give to people the idea that you are a grown-up baby."

"I don't care what people think," George said. "Mademoiselle, may I have these things?"

Denise laughed, and said, "Yes, if you can reconcile it to your conscience to deprive the poor children of that boxful of happiness."

"I will go to Toulon, and buy a cartload of toys for all the little beggars round La Pinede, and then, I suppose, I may keep this boxful of happiness?"

Those last words were said with a sort of emotion that did not escape Denise's notice.

"What a strange youth that is," she thought.

Jacques reappeared just then, and, till the visitors departed, devoted himself to Mdlle. de la Pinede, and flattered himself, when she drove off, that she had found him very agreeable. He asked leave to call on her aunt when—as was often the case—he was at Toulon. She answered civilly, and took an affectionate leave of the Countess.

Madame de Vedelles told her husband of Denise's strange wish to leave all her souvenirs and family pictures at La Pinede, and confided to him the idea that had passed through her mind.

"Well, my dear wife," the Count answered, "bring that about if you can. Nothing would help on better Jacques' election or his prospects in life than to marry this beautiful heiress; so I give you full leave to promote this most desirable result. But believe my experience. Hurry it on slowly. Girls with beauty and fortune require to be carefully dealt with, and he must make his way with her himself before we sound M. Legrand on the subject. I suspect the young lady is like you, my dear wife, devout and clerical; Jacques—bad fellow that he is, and more or less Voltairian—"

"Do not say that, my dear husband. It makes me so miserable."

"If you succeed in marrying him to Mdlle. de la Pinede, she will convert him. I never saw a woman who gave me, at first sight, so much the idea of strength of character. Depend upon it, she will influence all those she has to do with."

"Thank God for that. It will always be in a right direction," and the poor mother began to pray that night for the success of the scheme she had so fondly devised.

Before retiring to her room, she had ascertained from Jacques that he thought Mdlle. de la Pinede wonderfully handsome, and refrained, with difficulty, from hinting at her hopes. Before wishing him good night, she said:

"I was so grieved at dear George's asking Denise to give him her old playthings. It made me feel quite uncomfortable. I am glad his father was not in the room."

CHAPTER V.

MISE MEDE.

LEAVING for awhile the de Vedelles occupied each with his or her own private cogitations relative to the visit of the beautiful Denise, we shall follow M. Lescalle and his wife and daughter to a country house called "Les Capucins," which belonged to an aunt of his, with whom they were going to spend the rest of the day.

This aunt was a maiden lady, who had been given the rather affected name of Mesdelices, but in the familiar Provençal patois, was called by everybody Mise, that is Madame Mede.

Mdlle. Lescalle's youth had witnessed the stormy scenes of the first revolution. When, under the empire, order was re-established, and property resumed its rights, she found herself in possession of a valuable little estate, and, though somewhat advanced in age, received many a proposal of marriage. The old Baron de Croixfonds compromised his ancestral dignity so far as to solicit the hand of Mise Medé, but his and every other offer to know that at her age it was only her fortune that attracted suitors, and independently of other reasons this would have been enough to determine her to remain single.

Young Lescalle, her nephew, was, at that time, in Paris, studying for the bar. He had often recourse to Aunt Mede's purse when his extravagant love of amusement and expense involved him in pecuniary difficulties. After a few years' residence in Paris, young Lescalle found himself provided, indeed, with diplomas, but with no means of existence but his own talents which he was intelligent enough not to rate very highly.

Such being the case he gladly accepted his aunt's offer to purchase for him an attorney's office in his native town. From that moment Toussaint Lescalle entirely changed his habits of life: he married, and became steady and hard-working—the dissipated students of the Ecole de Droit was transformed into a respectable man of business, and was very severe upon those who ventured to live as he had done in past days. It was rather amusing to hear him find fault with Mise Mede for her charitable indulgence towards people who fell into distress through their own extravagance.

In 1819, the birth of Rose gave Middle Lescalle a feeling of intense happiness. When she looked at the helpless little creature just come into the world, all the tenderness and depth of feeling in her nature was called forth; all that sort of motherly affection which is dormant in many a woman's heart and is ready to spend itself in its rich abundance on some object near and dear to it, which Providence, sometimes late in life, places in its way.

Holding the baby in her arms, she hastened to her nephew's room, and said: "Toussaint, if you feel any gratitude at all for the affection I have always shown you, do grant me what I am going to ask."

"What is it, dear old aunt? There is nothing I would not do for you."

"Let me bring up your little girl."

"What! would you really wish that, aunty?"

"Yes; I want to take her and her nurse to The Capucins. You and your wife could come and see her as often as you liked. Do let me have her, my dear nephew; I have set my heart upon it."

"This is a very sudden thought, Aunt Mede: you never said anything about it before. How came you to think of it now?"

"When I saw her, and kissed her, I understood for the first time the deep love one can have for a little child. It was quite a new emotion; and then the thought came into my mind that you would let me take charge of her."

M. Lescalle rapidly resolved in his mind the merits of this proposal, and then said, "Well, for my part Aunt Mede, I see no objection to what you wish. The child will be better off with you than with any one else, that I am sure of. If you can settle it with my wife, you can rely on my consent."

Madame Lescalle did not long resist the earnest entreaties of her husband's aunt, and Mise Mede carried off the baby in triumph to her country house.

From that moment her life, which had been so long a solitary one, underwent a great change. She loved little Rose with an intense affection, which filled her heart with overflowing delight. She was her joy, her thought, her care of every instant; and that large rambling house, which had been before so silent and so still, was soon enlivened by the sound of childish laughter and the pattering of infant feet.

Mise Mede's country house had formerly been the ancient and famous Convent of the Capuchins of La Ciotat. It was built on a slanting part of a beach, beneath which the waves of the Mediterranean were continually breaking against a belt of small rocks, just rising above the surface of the water. The situation was beautiful, and the terrace and the garden looked on a magnificent view of the coast on both sides, and on an unlimited expanse of deep blue sea.

This spot had been well chosen for a convent. We never feel so strongly God's greatness and our own littleness as when we gaze on the boundless sky and the fathomless ocean.

It was in this delightful spot, in the midst of the loveliest works of nature, and under the loving and fostering care of her great aunt, that Rose spent the time of her childhood. In her eleventh year, M. Lescalle decided that she was to go to school.

Mise Mede wept in silence for some days, but did not try to persuade her nephew to alter his intention. In her deep humility, she thought herself unequal to the task of educating Rose, and though she would never have volunteered to part with her, when her parents spoke of it, she submitted to it with silent anguish.

M. Lescalle made a mistake in proposing, and Mise Mede in acquiescing in this measure. If he had possessed a wiser judgment and a warmer heart, if she had not been deceived by her saintly ignorance of her own merits, they would not have thought it an advantage for Rose. The society of one so holy and so sensible as her old aunt, the knowledge derived from her experience in life—a life which, like so many of those which began during the terrible period of the first French revolution had gained from an early acquaintance with suffering and persecution a peculiar strength and generosity—would have been a far higher and better training for a young girl than that of a boarding-school in a country town under the care of good and pious women, not highly educated themselves and obliged by the exigencies of parents of the middling class to attend to their pupils acquiring showy accomplishments, and a smattering of learning in preference to useful practical information.

The school where Rose spent six years was immeasurably better for her than her father's and mother's society and the influence of Madame Lescalle's worldly example and gossiping acquaintances but it was as decidedly inferior to what she would have gained in daily intercourse with her Aunt Mede, as were the straight alleys and high walls of the convent play-ground to the glorious expanse and lovely views of the old Capucin monastery.

But it was not to be expected that M. Lescalle would understand this and so his daughter had to learn the elements of various sciences in dull abridgments, and to tire her little fingers by running endless scales on the yellow keys of a consumptive piano forte.

When she came home Rose Lescalle had made a good first communion, and since that time had kept up habits of piety which in her father's house would certainly not have been the case. But it may be doubted whether she knew as much of solid virtue and real religion as when she had left The Capucins, or was prepared to encounter the dangers of the world she was entering upon, as if during those years when the mind receives its strongest impress, she had been under the wing of Mise Mede. The society of her school-fellows had not tended to elevate her tone of mind, or improve her character.

The calm, good sense of the old lady made her perceive it at once but she also saw that Rose was an innocent and loving child, and that no real harm was done. The good nuns, in spite of the unfavorable effects of association with girls some of whom had been brought up in irreligious homes, had preserved her faith and maintained her in the practice of her duties. Middle Lescalle felt, on the whole, satisfied and hopeful that she might now resume all her influence over the child of her heart.

As to Rose's parents, they were enchanted with her accomplishments. She could play a long sonata of Hertz without making a single mistake, and brought home gigantic heads of Niobe and Romulus, drawn in red chalk. She could speak a little English, not quite with what Madame de Staël calls the "pure insular accent," but, at any rate, what sounded like English in her father's ears, who had once been in London for two days.

It can easily be supposed that in her solitary life the least circumstance connected with Rose assumed a high importance in Mise Mede's eyes. So she made her nephew promise that he at any rate would call on his way back from La Pinede. She wanted to know how Rose had got through this sort of first introduction into society. Contrary to her usual habits, she felt restless all the morning, and ten times in the course of an hour looked out of the window. At last, she could not remain indoors any longer and seated herself on a stone bench in the garden.

from whence she could see the road. There she sat knitting, with a sort of feverish activity, a thick stocking for her charity bag.

Mise Mede was then about seventy years of age. She was tall, thin and as straight as an arrow; her face rather long, her nose aquiline, her lips compressed, in consequence of the loss of her front teeth. Her features indicated a great strength of will, and would have been, perhaps, a little stern, if it had not been for the sweet expression of her large, grey, and still very beautiful eyes.

Her dress was half like that of a nun, half like that of a peasant. It consisted of a gown made of a thick, dark stuff; a round white plaited cap, and a stiffly-starched handkerchief standing out in projecting folds over her bosom.

When Madame Lescalle's wonderful bonnet appeared in the road, the old lady rose and went to meet her relatives.

"Well, Virginie," she said, "are you pleased with your visit?"

Madame Lescalle shrugged her shoulders and answered, "Madame de Vedelles was civil enough; but she is not particularly agreeable. I think she is as stiff as a poker—that woman."

"And the Count?"

"Upon my word, I hardly saw him. He just bowed to us and that was all."

"My dear," M. Toussaint put in "the Count had to speak to me on business."

"Oh, of course; but he might have said a few words to us."

"He sent his son to make acquaintance with you."

"Oh, yes! and a charming young man he is; so handsome and tall, and conversable too, quite different from his parents."

"He is the eldest son, the only one they call—— What do they call him?" M. Lescalle asked.

"M. Jacques," Rose said.

"Ah! you remember his name, mademoiselle," Madame Lescalle laughingly remarked, and then added in a low voice to Aunt Mede, "He looked a great deal at Rose, and he said something complimentary about her complexion."

"She is not an ugly little thing," the aunt rejoined, kissing one of Rose's blooming cheeks.

"But what is far better than compliments, Aunt Mede," M. Toussaint said, "is the certainty of being employed in the entire management of the Count's affairs. He is tired of business, and means in future to leave everything to me. This will necessitate my being a great deal at La Pinede. I am going to breakfast there to-morrow. We have to talk about the lease of a farm."

"How angry the Arnoux will be," Madame Lescalle exclaimed.

"Oh! but you must not say anything about it, Virginie."

"Why not?"

"It is better M. Arnoux should suppose I go there as a friend. It will have a better effect."

"My poor dear Toussaint," Aunt Mede exclaimed, "what a foolish sort of vanity that is!"

"My dear aunt, people value us according to the value we set on ourselves. I learnt that in Paris. For one person who looks into things, five hundred take them on trust, and believe you are what you give yourself out to be."

"I do not like that principle," Aunt Mede said. "I know of a better one, I think."

"What is it, Aunt Mede?"

"It is better to be, than to seem, worthy of esteem."

"Oh! that is a fine sentence for a copy-book, Mise Mede; but those high flights do not answer in real life. Come now, you must admit that if they think me in the town on intimate terms at the chateau, it will give me a sort of prestige. If I am simply considered as the factotum of the old Count, it will not do me half so much good. Trust to me, my dear aunt. I know how to steer my little bark. It has made good way already. I am considered an influential person at the elections, and people make up to me in consequence—the Richers on the one hand, old Croixfonds on the other. I am not quite sure that the de Vedelles have not some notions of that sort too. I am rather inclined to think so; but the future will show. Now, let us go to dinner, and converse whilst we eat."

They all went into the house, and then on the terrace, where dinner was served amidst the orange trees, at the place where the view was most beautiful and extensive. To the right rose the crested walls and picturesque gateways of La Ciotat, surmounted by the roofs of the houses. Further on a high rock, called the Eagle's Beak, stood out in bold relief against the deep blue sky. To the left a beautiful range of hills enfolded the bay in which lies the port of Toulon on the foreground, exactly opposite, was the picturesque little islet called l'Île Verte, and the sea glittering like burnished gold in the broad sunshine.

It was just at the same hour that George de Vedelles was standing at his window, absently gazing on the magnificent landscape.

"Does not the sea look beautiful from my terrace, Rosette?" Aunt Mede said to her niece. "We have taken away all the palisades which used to surround it, little one, to prevent your falling over the edge and nothing now impedes the view."

"Oh, Aunt Mede, it is indeed very beautiful," the young girl said, and then for a moment remained in silent admiration. "I never saw so bright a sunshine as that at St. Benoit, the walls were so high." And then the conversation turned again on the inhabitants of the chateau.

In the midst of Madame Lescalle's rather prosy descriptions, Mise Mede said, "But you only speak of one young man. I thought the Countess had two sons?"

"Yes, Aunt Mede," Rose answered, "there is another, the youngest son, a pale, slight, strange looking youth."

"No one pays any attention to him," Madame Lescalle rejoined. "He is a funny sort of creature—half-witted, I think. Between ourselves, people say he is a fada,* and I dare say they are right."

"Who says so?" M. Lescalle asked.

"Oh, I don't know—everybody. Gantier, the farmer at La Pinede, who sometimes works in the garden, and Marion the milk-woman."

"What do they know about it?"

"Marion says that as she was walking in the night to Beausset with her son, they saw a ghost, as they thought, walking by the seaside. They were dreadfully afraid at first, but as they came nearer, who should it have been but that young de Vedelles. She said something to him, but he did not answer, and walked away in another direction. She said he looked as pale as a ghost, and stared at them ever so strangely."

"How can you listen to such foolish gossiping stories, Virginie?" the notary said.

"Oh, I suppose you think, then, that there is nothing strange in a man's mooning about the beach at three o'clock in the morning, when he ought to have been in bed."

"I dare say it was some piece of nonsense. Perhaps he meant to frighten the women going to market."

"Very likely indeed; but unless a man is a fada, he does not play such tricks when he is no longer a school-boy."

"Perhaps if this poor young man is in the state you suppose," Aunt Mede said, "he may be restless and nervous. Fudas have often delicate nerves, and are bad sleepers. Did the Countess say anything about her son's health?"

"No; but I think she seemed a little ashamed of him. She looked quite distressed when he left Rose and me so suddenly."

"And the Count?"

"He did not mention him at all," M. Lescalle answered. "I do not think he likes him."

"Poor youth!" Mise Mede said; "who would care for him if his mother died?"

"Do not distress yourself about that, my dear aunt," M. Lescalle answered. "His father is very rich, and it will not be difficult to find him a wife. When a man can give his son fifteen thousand francs a year, there is no difficulty in getting some one to look after him."

"Oh, father," Rose exclaimed, "who would marry a fada?"

"I am quite of Rose's opinion," Mise Mede said.

"Oh, I don't know," M. Lescalle rejoined. "I dare say this * Fada, in the dialect of the south of France, does not mean exactly an idiot, but a grown-up person who remains in mind and habits a child.

young gentleman would make a very good husband. A wife would do what she liked with him, and have her own way about everything."

"But, papa, this M. George is not like a child who would do all he was told. He has all sorts of strange fancies and odd obstinacies. He does not want his father to cultivate his land, because he likes the flowers of the caper-bushes. He will not let them cut down a branch that runs into his window, and he lives in a sort of lumber-room, where he keeps all sorts of strange, useless things. And he does not dress like other people, he looks so untidy, not at all like the son of a count."

"What Rose says is perfectly true," Madame Lescalle rejoined; "and moreover, he does not seem to understand when people speak to him."

"All this may be as you say, my dear," her husband observed; "but I maintain that it will be easy to find somebody who would be glad enough to marry this youth. It is pleasant to have a rich husband, and to be called La Baronne de Vedelles."

"How can you talk in that way, Toussaint?" Madame Lescalle exclaimed. "What, marry a fada! It is dreadful to think of. It gives me quite a horror. I had rather beg my bread than have such an idiot for my husband."

"Well, well, Madame Lescalle, do not fly into a passion. Nobody wants you to marry him."

The conversation then turned on some other subject, and after dinner M<sup>se</sup> Mede's relatives took leave of her. They were all more or less thoughtful on their way back to town. M. Lescalle was turning over in his mind how he could make the most of his position at La Pinède. His wife was occupied with the idea of sending to Paris for a new gown. Rose involuntarily dwelt on the recollection of Jacques' pleasant, animated countenance, and mused on the flattering words he had said to her. She compared him in her mind with Artemon Richer de Montlouis, the lion of La Ciotat, and came to the conclusion that the son of the Comte de Vedelles was much better looking and more agreeable than the said Artemon; but then with a sigh she thought, "He is going back to Paris."

CHAPTER VI.

AN ACCIDENT.

SOME days after the first visit which M<sup>lle</sup>. de la Pinède had paid to the de Vedelles, the Countess drove to Toulon to return the compliment, and to make acquaintance with Denise's aunt, a good-natured, commonplace, elderly lady, who was very fond of her niece, of her pet dogs, and her little comforts. Denise was out, and so Madame de Vedelles had an opportunity of spending an hour with Madame de Brissac, and availed herself of it by trying to find out whether there was any marriage in question for the young lady, and what were the ideas of her aunt and her guardian on the subject. If she did not succeed in obtaining any positive information about it, at any rate she satisfied herself that at present there existed no definite obstacle to the scheme which she had formed in her own mind.

Madame de Brissac said that her niece was to spend the following winter at her guardian's house in Paris, and would go out in the world, as she had done before her father's death, under the chaperonage of Madame Legrand, who had daughters of her own, and intimate connections in the Faubourg St. Germain. She had married a wealthy banker, but belonged herself to an old Legitimist family.

"She will not long remain unmarried," Madame de Vedelles ventured to say. "With her beauty, her birth, and her fortune, M<sup>lle</sup>. de la Pinède's hand will be eagerly sought for."

"Ah, even now," Madame de Brissac said, "M. Legrand often receives proposals for her from various quarters. But after her father's death, Denise declared that for one year, at least, she wished nothing to be said to her on the subject, and neither

M. Legrand nor myself can get her to speak of her own intentions, or express an opinion as to the eligibility of any parti offered to her acceptance."

"Perhaps she is a little romantic, and means to make a marriage d'inclination," Madame de Vedelles said, "and has not yet seen the person who may please her fancy."

"It may be so. She is very reserved about everything, is Denise. She made, I believe, a promise to her father on his death-bed not to make any decision for a certain time, and meanwhile I really think she is more occupied about her little sailor boys than her suitors."

Then the conversation changed, and soon afterwards M<sup>lle</sup>. de la Pinède came into the room. Madame de Vedelles and she had many things to talk about. Denise was much interested to hear of that lady's plans of opening a school in the village of Troistour, which was at a distance of about two miles from the chateau, and also of obtaining a second priest, who would assist the very old cure of that parish, and say mass every day in the small chapel in the grounds of La Pinède, which, like everything else in the place, had been shut up and left in utter neglect.

Denise had all the savoir faire and energy in practical matters which Madame de Vedelles was totally deficient in. Her co-operation in these plans was therefore singularly useful. She promised to see the vicar-general of the diocese, to write to the superior of an order which sends out religious school-mistresses, one by one, into remote and poor localities, and finally to go again herself to La Pinède to report progress and confer with the Countess, as soon as the answers reached her.

"You know there is nothing, my dear, like talking over these things together," the Countess artfully observed. "More business is done in a quarter of an hour's conversation than by twenty letters."

They were still eagerly discussing these projects when Jacques de Vedelles called for his mother, with whom he had driven into Toulon. He was presented to Madame de Brissac, and quite won that lady's heart. The advice he gave her about the proper diet for her dogs was proffered in that good humored, playful manner which had a great charm for persons of all sorts and all ages.

Charlot himself looked up into his handsome face as if he appreciated the interest evinced in his health, and Denise, seeing him so amiable and good-natured, ventured to ask him if he could recommend anything for the cure of a sick poodle she had undertaken that morning to prescribe for.

"Is he a pet of yours, mademoiselle? Could I see him?" Jacques eagerly inquired.

"He is the friend and companion," she answered, "of a poor blind man who sits on the quay, a few doors from the corner of this street, and who is in despair at his illness. I would have taken him to a veterinary surgeon, but his master could not bear to be without him even for a short time; so I promised to get some one to look at the old dog, and see what could be done for him."

"If my mother can wait a few moments I will go at once, and give master and dog the benefit of my advice. I consider myself clever at doctoring animals. At Valsec I had quite a reputation amongst our farm laborers. They said M. Jacques had a gift for curing beasts. Have you not heard them say so, mother?"

"I know that has been one of your pretensions, dear Jacques, and I will wait with pleasure whilst you do M<sup>lle</sup>. de la Pinède's commission."

Jacques was absent about twenty minutes. When he came back he related with a great deal of fun and animation the result of his exertions. How the case had seemed to him beyond his own powers; how he had ascertained the direction of the dog-doctor, dragged him out of his den, and brought him in presence of the dejected poodle. How the very voice of the canine Æsculapius had raised the spirits of the patient and made him wag his tail. How he had prescribed for him a certain powder mixed with his food, and a more generous diet. And that not being quite aware, in spite of his knowledge on the subject, what constituted generous diet for a dog, Jacques had given a piece of twenty francs to his master, and requested him to provide it.

"I assure you mademoiselle, that I left the whole party in a happy frame of mind, your Belisarius declaring that when Mdlle. Denise took anything in hand it always succeeded, and that the dog-leech was a very clever fellow, and your humble servant worthy of entering into partnership with him. Moreover, that Toupet would certainly get well, seeing he would have the bone of a good outlet to gnaw this evening. Between ourselves, my bettel is that Toupet was dying of inanition, and that when you walk that way to-morrow, mademoiselle, you will find your protege perfectly restored to health."

"How very good of you M. de Vedelles, to have taken all this trouble. You must be experienced in the art of doing kindnesses, or you would not be such a proficient in it."

"Is it an art mademoiselle?"

"If not an art, a talent," Denise replied. "There are generally three or four ways of doing a kind action, and very different degrees of happiness produced according to the one we adopt."

"I had never thought of that," Madame de Vedelles said. "I never see but one way of doing things, and it is, I dare say, not the best."

"On the contrary, dear madame," Denise exclaimed. "You have a natural spirit of kindness which guides you better, I am sure, than any amount of thinking would do."

"You are right, my dear; I never think to any good purpose."

"You are mistaken there, my dear little mother," Jacques affectionately said. "You are not conscious of it, but your mind is always occupied with plans for making others happy."

He would have thought so still more if he could have read her thoughts at that moment, for as she looked at her handsome son and at the beautiful Denise talking together of the blind man and his dog, and saw his look of admiration and her apparent pleasure in listening to his playful, amusing nonsense, visions were passing before her, all tending to his happiness in this world and in the next.

Providence favored her maternal wishes, or, at least, seemed to favor them, in an unexpected manner; and being the most unselfish of human beings, she rejoiced at an event which had this result, though it involved suffering to herself.

As Jacques and she were returning that day to La Pinede, a horse harnessed to a light cart, which its master had left standing at the door of a public-house, took fright at something, ran away and dashing against their caleche, overturned it. Jacques escaped unhurt, and so did the driver, but Madame de Vedelles' collar bone was broken and her arm fractured.

It would be difficult to describe the consternation her husband and her sons evinced in different ways, and according to their different characters; but as intense as possible in each case.

The Countess de Vedelles was one of those persons who, without cleverness or much capacity of any sort, and apparently singularly helpless and inefficient, by dint of tenderness, gentleness, and unselfishness, had become essential to her family. As is so often the case, though always delicate in health, she never hardly had been seriously ill, and when it crossed their minds that there was reason for alarm, it struck them for the first time that life without her would be a dreary sort of thing, and that they could not bear to look such a misfortune in the face.

The old Count seemed simply bewildered, and walked twenty times over from her room, where she had been carried, to the drawing-room, unable to realize that she was not going to spend the evening opposite to him, as she had done for the last twenty-eight years. George seated himself in a corner of his mother's bed-chamber, and remained there with his eyes fixed upon her till, her moans becoming more frequent, he could stand it no longer, and snatching up his hat, rushed out of the house, threw himself down, with his face on the grass, and remained in that posture till the surgeon, whom Jacques, the only active member of the family, had instantly sent for, arrived from Clotat, and set the injured limbs. He said the fractures were serious, but still he hoped all would be right. However, the next day, a great deal of fever came on, and Jacques proposed to his father to send for the best doctor at Toulon. For that purpose, he wrote to Mdlle. de la Pinede, to tell her of the accident, and to beg her to despatch, as soon as possible, whomever she considered to be the ablest medical man in that town.

M. Dubois arrived as soon as could be expected, said the state of the Countess gave cause for anxiety, but that with care and skilful nursing she would recover. He recommended that they should at once procure an experienced nurse, and offered to remain himself at the chateau till she arrived.

Jacques again sent a messenger to Madame de Brissac's house with a letter, in which he implored Denise to secure, as quickly as possible, a skilful, devoted sick nurse, repeating what M. Dubois had said—that his mother's life would most likely depend on the care with which she was watched for the next few days and nights, and the quiet and presence of mind of those about her.

In a very short time, the answer to his letter was brought back. It was as follows: "M. le Comte—I know of no one in this town whom I could fully recommend to wait on your dear mother at this critical moment. We have not any Sœurs du bon Secours here—none but paid nurses, in whom I have little confidence. It seems presumptuous to offer myself, but M. Dubois will tell you that I am not an unskilful nurse; and I may venture to say that what care and attention can do, will not be wanting on my part. I shall start in an hour, and if my earnest prayers are heard, God will bless my efforts to be of use to one for whom I feel so much esteem and affection."

"God bless her," Jacques ejaculated; but turning to the doctor, who was in the room, he said in an anxious manner, "Mademoiselle de la Pinede—it is so kind of her—offers to come and nurse my poor mother. I do not doubt her good will, but she can have no experience."

"Has not she experience?" M. Dubois rejoined. "I am heartily glad of what you tell me. It is the very thing I could have wished. I have seen that young lady at work: a clearer head, a lighter hand, a more noiseless tread in a sick room, a more cheerful disposition I have not met with in the whole course of my practice. I can tell you that you are lucky to have found such a nurse for Madame le Comtesse, and I shall go away easier about my patient now that Mademoiselle Denise will be here."

Little had the old Count and his sons thought to have seen Mdlle. de la Pinede so soon again at the chateau, and it was strange to witness the effect her presence produced, when, scarcely an hour after her letter had reached Jacques, she arrived.

It seemed as if a mountain's weight had been lifted off the hearts of all in that house, as if they breathed more freely, and instinctively derived hope from the presence of that gentle, strong, bright-looking creature, who really seemed, so George said to himself, to be an angel sent to their assistance.

When Jacques announced to his suffering mother the arrival of Denise, and her object in coming to La Pinede, a faint color rose in her cheeks, and she said, "Thank God," with an energy which almost surprised her son. "The sight of her face did me good at once," she told the Count the next time he came into her room, after Mdlle. de la Pinede had been with her. "I had been—I am ashamed to say—fretting because my illness would prevent those two from meeting, and now it has come about that it has actually brought her under our roof. Oh, something must come of it, I am sure."

Something was hereafter to come of it, but not just what poor Madame de Vedelles expected.

"Mind," she said to her husband before he left her that afternoon, "mind that you insist upon it that she should have all her meals with you and our sons. She must not shut herself up in my sick room, and she should take a walk every day."

It was a peculiar life that began that day for the inhabitants of La Pinede, a life that was to last about three weeks, and then be as if it had never been, except as to the traces it left in the hearts and secret thoughts of each of the de Vedelles.

Denise coming amongst them was a little like the effect produced in the drawing-room of that house when M. Lescalle had thrown open its windows, and let in air and sunshine.

The old Count had always wished for a daughter. He was— to use a French word—very impressionable, and though reserved and stern himself, gaiety had an irresistible charm for him. His wife had been the comfort of his life. She had taken away, as far as in her lay, every stone out of his path, smoothed his mental pillow from morning to night, studied every turn of his countenance, and reflected, in a softened and gentle form, the shades which had saddened his existence. As to his sons—of Jacques he was both proud and fond, but there had never been any intimacy between them, and he had become so early a complete man of the world, and took—even at nineteen or twenty—such a matter-of-fact view of men and things, that, in spite of his handsome face and lively manners, there was nothing really young about him, and by the time he was twenty-eight, his father often felt himself, in some respects, the more youthful of the two. He looked up to Jacques for advice in worldly matters, and leaned upon him in all that had to do with the practical side of life.

George, as we have already said, was several years younger than his brother. The Count and his wife had always longed to have a second child, and though they would have liked better to have had a girl, his birth gave them great delight. As a little child, he had been delicate in health, and his mother, in consequence, had spoiled him, which made his father send him to school very early. He got on there extremely well, and made great progress in his studies. When he was about twelve years old, Madame de Vedelles' father died in the island of Cuba, and it became necessary for her and her husband to go and look after the property which she inherited. They were to have been absent for fifteen months, but a law-suit with the Spanish government detained them there five years. During all that time, the letters they received from France spoke of George's success at his college examinations, and the prizes he won on every occasion.

His masters always spoke of his excellent abilities and wonderful facility in learning. His parents were joyfully anticipating that at the time of their return, after those long five years of absence, he would be preparing for his examination at the polytechnic school, and that they would arrive in time to enjoy the brilliant success with which he was sure to pass it. But just as they landed at Brest, in all the happy confidence that such would be the case, they found a letter, which informed them that George, exhausted by mental anxiety, superadded to the strain of the last few months' intense study, had been seized with a brain fever, and was lying between life and death, the delicate organization he had inherited from his mother had given way under this fierce pressure.

The unhappy parents rushed into a post-chaise, and in forty hours were sitting by the bedside of their dying and unconscious son. For many days the case seemed utterly hopeless, and the eminent physicians who attended him said his recovery would be little short of a miracle. However unexpectedly, he did recover; but remained in a state of prostration, both of body and mind, so weak, that for months he could hardly stand or walk a step, and sunk into such apathy that nothing could rouse or interest him. The doctors predicted that his convalescence would be slow, but that all would be right in time; what he required, they said, was absolute rest and country air.

M. de Vedelles settled at his own place, Valsee, in Lorraine, and with aching hearts the afflicted parents brought home the pale, languid, listless youth, for whom they had anticipated such a brilliant career. By very slow degrees, the bracing air, sitting out in the garden, and then riding, improved George's health, and his physical strength gradually returned; but the moral apathy remained the same. He was either incapable of the slightest mental exertion or unwilling to make it, and it became very difficult to say whether the condition of his brain really precluded work of any kind or whether a morbid discouragement had taken possession of him. He complained of frequent headache, was sensitively susceptible of the changes in the weather, irritably impatient of noise, wayward in temper, and inert in mood.

He had been spoilt as a child, and spoilt at school, by the perfect facility with which he had carried everything before him, and mastered, without effort, what to others were difficulties. His mother watched him with anxious affection, but she had no discernment of character, and never saw what was not obvious. His father at first kept observing every turn of his countenance, listened to each word he uttered, and devoted himself to him with a restless solicitude. But when nearly three years had elapsed and no change took place, he could hardly restrain the irritability and annoyance he felt at George's prolonged apathy and entire idleness, especially when his bodily health returned and he was able to ride for hours, and take long walks all over the country with or without a gun on his shoulder.

There was no doubt that George was by nature indolent, absent, and careless about many things. These defects had of course increased to an extraordinary degree since his illness. What had been looked upon as mere originality in the bright and clever boy of twelve, became intolerable in his father's eyes in the lazy, incapable, and in moments of bitterness the Count internally added, the half-witted youth, whom he was ashamed of, and whose actual condition so painfully contrasted with the bright promise of his childhood.

The more irritable his father became, the more plainly he showed a sort of aversion to him, the more George's silence, reserve, and apparent indifference to everything increased. Nothing provoked the Count so much as to see him sitting for hours gazing on the sea, or at the clouds, or in the evening at the stars, or if there was a fire in the room at the blazing faggots and the sparks they emitted.

He had a habit of scribbling on fragments of paper, and then tearing them up and throwing them away, which provoked M. de Vedelles, but he seldom took the trouble of writing a letter. "It made his head ache," he said. Had his father been more kind, or his mother been cleverer, or had his brother in the least understood his character, this state of things could not have existed: but as it was, there seemed little hope of a change.

The domestic life of the family had thus settled into a groove which was fatal to the happiness of its members. Jacques' principal wish, in spite of his real affection for his mother, was to get away; for the others the future seemed sad enough.

It was therefore singularly refreshing to all when a new element was introduced into that home circle by Madlle. de la Pinede's presence. The Count was charmed with his young guest. How could it have been otherwise? He saw her skilful care, her watchful nursing, her sweet serenity, working a rapid improvement in his wife. She was soon pronounced out of danger; and, as far as her health was concerned, quickly became convalescent. Her only anxiety seemed lest she should get well too soon.

It was touching to see the little artifices she had recourse to in order to keep up the idea that her life depended on Denise's care. How they all leant upon this young girl, and what a strange influence she soon possessed over that father and those two sons, so different from one another, yet each of them feeling that there was something in her nobler, purer, and higher than they had ever before known! And with all that superiority of character and mind, she was so simple, so innocently gay, so femininely attractive.

The Count had never met with a woman at all like Denise de la Pinede. He had known bad and good women, charming and disagreeable women, clever women and silly women, free-thinking women and pious women; but never one who united so much enthusiasm with so much practical good sense, one so bold and fearless in defence of all she believed and honored and loved, so uncompromising and yet so fair-minded, so just, so tolerant of difference of opinion in others, whilst so firm in her own convictions. He found pleasure in drawing her out. He provoked argument for the sake of hearing her speak in that peculiarly musical voice which was one of her attractions, and watching the eloquent expression of her dark eyes. And then her mirth, so like the ripple of a stream, or a child's laugh, was wonderfully refreshing to the old man, who had lived so long alone with his gentle but saddened wife, whose gaiety he had crushed long ago and then unconsciously missed it, and his two sons, who for different reasons were not happy in their home. He was the most openly devoted of the three to Mdlle. de la Pinede. He walked with her up and down the terrace during the short moments she could be induced to leave the Countess' sick-room and after dinner detained her a little while in the drawing room and made her sing to him Le fu de la Vierge.

Jacques rapidly fell in love with Denise, and at the end of a week made up his mind to propose to her as soon as her stay at La Pinede came to an end. He did not much doubt that she would accept him nor did it cross his mind that the dissimilarity of their ideas and feelings would prove an obstacle. He was under the impression which at that time was prevalent in France that religion though superfluous for a man, was a sort of necessity for a woman of the better sort—for the sort of woman he should like to marry—he did not at all object to a pious wife. It did not occur to him that she would object to an unbelieving husband. He thought of her as the future young Comtesse de Vedelles, who would make a great sensation in Paris and do the honors of a salon where statesmen would congregate and men of letters flock. She had read a great deal, she was eloquent, she had wealthy relatives and distinguished connections. She could not imagine a more perfectly suitable parti for one who, like himself, had the desire and the ability to play a part in political and social life.

Denise was very amiable in her manner to him. She was naturally kind to every being that approached her—there was not a dog or a cat about the place to whom she did not say a good word as she passed by the kennel or the sunny wall on which puss was often seated. As to the children of the gardener and the shepherd, they watched for hours together in hopes that the beautiful lady who was staying at the chateau might stop before their parents' cottages, pat them on the cheek, and give them bon-bons, that necessity of life to French children.

One very bold urchin made his way one day to the terrace, and was looking up in hopes of seeing the bestower of pralines and sucres de pomme appear at a window. But instead of the face which he expected to see, a very pale and, it seemed to the child, very stern one looked down upon him, on which he began to cry and ran away. At the bottom of the stairs leading down from the terrace, he suddenly came face to face with Mdlle. de la Pinede, who sat down on the steps and took him on her knees to comfort him.

"What are you afraid of, little one?" she said, stroking his black hair with her soft white hand.

"I am afraid of the fada," he answered, hiding his face in her breast.

Denise was not acquainted with this Provençal word, and supposed it to mean a hobgoblin but anxious to stop the child's crying, which she was afraid Madame de Vedelles might overhear from her room, tried to lead him away. At that moment George appeared carrying in his hand the box of toys which had remained in his room since the day of Denise's first visit.

"Oh, this is very opportune," she exclaimed, and seizing on a hunter in a red coat and a sheep with a pink collar, she displayed them to the astonished eyes of little Pierre, who now looked at George with awe, but less terror than before. He evidently thought him still a very strange being, but not as evil-minded as he had supposed.

"Will you take him home, M. George," Denise said, "and let him carry away those treasures with him. But tell his parents to try and prevent his coming up to the terrace. Your father would have been very angry if he had heard him crying under the windows. I must go now to your mother."

George took the child's hand, and they walked towards the shepherd's hut. Pierre looking up at him now and then, half afraid and half confiding. When they reached the cottage, George told Madame Lubin what Denise had said and went away. She proceeded to scold Pierre for his audacity, and the better to secure his keeping away from the awful precincts, told him that if he ever trespassed again in the neighborhood of the chateau, that gentleman who had brought him back, and who was a fada, would wring his neck just as she was at that moment going to do to the superannuated hen she held in her hand doomed to the pot au feu. After that day, Pierre's little companions, when they saw George walking on the road or on the seashore, always ran away in a fright, screaming out, "The fada, the fada!"

We have said and shown that Denise was kind to every one, and to Jacques as to everybody else. And then she spoke to him sometimes in a very earnest manner. During the hours when she had sat by Madame de Vedelles' bedside, the poor mother had spoken to her of her sorrow, that this eldest, bright, hopeful son of hers had lost the faith of his childhood, and ceased to practice his religion.

At that time in France this was, however, so commonly the case with the young men of his age, that it appeared even to a pious mother no strange thing. She had lived for thirty years with a husband indifferent to religion, and surrounded by persons holding infidel opinions. This had blunted the edge of her grief with regard to her son, though it did not efface it; but Denise whose character was stronger, whose zeal was more ardent, whose love of God was a deep, engrossing, supreme affection, could not look unmoved on what she felt to be such a great calamity, could not converse without emotion on subjects which related to the existence or the absence in a soul of that faith which was the mainspring of her whole being. So when she talked to Jacques of anything relating to it, when she watched the effect of her earnest words upon him, and like all earnest words they sometimes did affect him, there was an expression in her countenance and a thrill in her voice which—poor vain man—he ascribed to a personal feeling of interest in him, Jacques de Vedelles, not to the intense solicitude which one who has at heart the glory of God and the salvation of souls feels in every creature who is severed from the source of life and light, and the ardent desire to bring it back to a sense of its high destiny. He could not have conceived that the look of joy which beamed in her speaking eyes one day when he had uttered words which implied that he meant to think and act differently with regard to religion than he had hitherto done, could proceed from a disinterested anxiety for his salvation.

He would have believed it, perhaps, if he had ever followed Denise in the hospitals or in the homes of the poor. He would then have seen her beautiful face lighted up with the same exulting gratitude when some poor wretch, who had been cursing and blaspheming, perhaps, during the long course of a sinful and miserable life, with softened heart and tearful eyes, for the first time prayed or kissed the crucifix she held to his lips, or when a poor girl on the brink of sin and shame, saved by her tender energy, turned from the tempter and followed her to a place of safety.

It was natural he should cherish hopes founded on a mistake and indulge in anticipations which reconciled him to her departure, for he felt that it was not during her stay at La Pinede that he could propose to Denise; and that being the case, he almost longed for the day when she would return to Toulon, and he would feel at liberty to offer her his hand, which, to say the truth, he did not much doubt she would accept.

Madame de Vedelles had unconsciously contrived to excite in Denise a strong interest in both her sons: in Jacques by speaking of him, by dwelling on his good qualities, and his talents, which had already begun to display themselves at the bar, and then of that absence of faith and that sceptical spirit which enlisted against religion and the Church capabilities which, rightly directed, might have made him, the poor mother fondly thought, a Montalembert, an Ozanam, or a Berryer.

As to George, she had been profoundly silent; but what with her compassionate tone when she spoke to him, his father's ill-disguised contempt, a few words which had been dropped by a servant, and also his absence, his oddities, and the wild, anxious expression of his eyes at times, Denise had easily come to the conclusion that the name of fadu, which she had heard applied to him, meant idiot, and that the poor young man was really half-witted. Still she had her doubts; these doubts led her to seek for opportunities of conversing with him, and gradually her opinion on this point was shaken, and her curiosity strongly stimulated. Now and then George said things which astonished her by their originality and depth of thought, but he never kept up a conversation. He generally sat in a corner of the room where he could watch her unobserved, but hardly answered her questions or seemed to attend to what she said, unless they happened for a moment to be alone together, and then he was so agitated that he sometimes said incoherent things.

She felt very sorry for him and had suspicion that his relatives were altogether mistaken about this young man; but she did not venture with any of them to approach the subject. There seemed a sort of tacit agreement that in her presence George was not to be taken notice of and they never mentioned him any more than if he had not existed. He did not seem conscious of this sort of moral ostracism, and went on reading much the same life as usual, sitting sometimes by his mother's couch, gentle, silent, and abstracted, only he remained more at home, and was often on the terrace whence he could see into the drawing-room where Denise spent part of the mornings busy with Church work. She had undertaken to make the altar linen for the little chapel which was to be used for mass as soon as the arrangements with the bishop were concluded. When she read aloud, as she often did, to Madame de Vedelles, he stood hid behind the open window, listening.

Meanwhile the Countess recovered rapidly, and Denise, in spite of her entreaties that she would prolong her stay, fixed the day for her departure.

"But you will return to the opening of the chapel?"

"Perhaps, dear friend," Denise answered; "but I can make no promise."

As she looked up from her work, she saw George's eyes fixed upon her with an expression which startled her. It was one of entreaty, of deep sadness, of pathetic meaning.

"Do tell my mother that you will come back," he said in a low voice. "I have made a vow to our lady of La Garde to do for you whatever you ask me if you will promise to come back for the opening of our chapel."

"What a rash vow!" Denise said, with a smile.

"Very rash, he said; "for I should keep it, whatever it was."

Denise thought a moment, and revolved in her mind the hold which that singular promise might some day give her over that singular youth, whom she could not help feeling a deep interest in, and then she said gaily: "Well, if I can, I will."

"I will means nothing," Madame de Vedelles said, laughing, "with the proviso of if I can."

"Would you have me promise to do something impossible?"

"Yes," George eagerly said. "I want you to do something impossible." He finished the sentence only in thought, and mentally added, "And that would be to care for me."

Denise was going away. She had been singing to the Count, for the last time, his favorite song Al pie d'un Salice. And then, the carriage being announced, she kissed the Countess, and was escorted to the door by M. de Vedelles and Jacques. George was nowhere to be seen.

"How like him," the Count exclaimed, "not to be here to take leave of Mlle. de la Pinede." Then he thanked Denise for all she had done for his wife, and handed her into the carriage with a strong hope in his mind that she would be one day his daughter-in-law.

The caleche drove away. Where the while was George? Climbing up the Sugarloaf hill, whence he could see for miles, amidst clouds of dust, that vehicle rolling along the road to Toulon.

The Count glanced at his eldest son, and saw that he looked troubled and excited, and thought it time to break silence on the subject which he felt sure was in both their minds.

He put his hand on Jacques' shoulder, and said, "What are you thinking of, Jacques?"

"What am I thinking of? Nothing that I know of, father."

"But I do know, and I can tell you."

"What do you mean?"

"You are thinking of that charming girl who has just driven away."

"Well, I do not deny it."

"You admire her, you are in love with her?"

"I am not prepared to say no to that either."

"And what do you mean to do?"

"Well if you have no objection, I mean to propose to her."

"She would be a very suitable match for you, and she is certainly a very attractive person."

"Who are you speaking of?" asked the Countess, who had just been wheeled upon the terrace in her garden-chair.

When her attendant had withdrawn, her husband said, "Denise de la Pinede."

"And what were you saying about her?"

"Jacques wants to propose to her."

"Oh, I am so glad. And you, of course, approve of it?"

"I cannot see any objection to such a marriage: her family is just as good as ours, and she has a fortune of five hundred thousand francs."

"She is so very handsome," Madame de la Vedelles added, in her somewhat dejected tone of voice.

"Not too handsome, is she, mother?" Jacques said with a smile. "If you had said too religious, I might, perhaps, have been inclined to agree with you. But, no; I should not like her to be in any way different from what she is. I believe I should not have lost my heart half so quickly to her if she had not been bent on converting me."

"Oh, Jacques, you will, indeed, be a happy man if you marry Denise!"

Jacques hugged his mother, as he used to do when he was eight years old, and then his old father. Rushing into the house, he shouted, "Vincent, order my horse immediately."

"Where are you going?" asked the Count.

"To Toulon."

"Not to-day?"

"Yes, to-day. I shall sleep at the Grand Cerf, and call at Madame de Brissac's to-morrow morning. The first year of Denise's mourning for her father ends to-morrow. She will see that, out of respect for her feelings, I waited till that day to propose to her."

"Well, be off my dear boy, and God speed you on your errand," his father said, and his mother added, "God bless you, my dear son."

At about two o'clock the next day Jacques rode up the avenue, his horse in a sweat, and his clothes white with dust. He looked pale and jaded.

"What has happened?" his mother anxiously asked, as he came into the drawing-room, where she and her husband were sitting.

"Something we did not foresee, mother."

"What?"

"She has refused me."

"Refused you?" Madame de Vedelles exclaimed.

"Yes, without hesitation and without agitation. I spoke of hope, and she said there was no hope. She was as calm, as kind, as decided as when the other evening she refused to sing Gastibelza, the song I had bought at Marseilles."

"This is a sad disappointment," Madame de Vedelles sighed, with tears in her eyes.

The Count cleared his throat, and took up the newspaper, but laying it down again, looked at his son, and in a husky voice said, "You will not break your heart about her, Jacques?"

"Oh, dear, no; I shall not die of it, nor even make a vow never to marry. I did not expect to have ever been so sentiment-tal; but nothing cures one so quickly of that infirmity as the cold shower-bath of such an absolute and civilly gracious refusal. I shall go to Paris in a few days."

CHAPTER VII.

COMPLICATIONS.

SEVERAL days elapsed, and no one at the chateau made any allusion to Denise. Jacques found it hard work to get over his disappointment and longed for the moment of departure. George, to whom not a word had been said of what had been going on, was, as usual, silent. The old Count, almost as vexed as his son at the result of the journey to Toulon, took refuge in politics, and held long conversations with Jacques about his prospects at the approaching elections.

A request had been made to him to stand for the department, M. Cesaire de Croixfonds, who was to have done so, having apparently been unable to buy a property which would have made him eligible. This incident happened luckily at the very moment when the thoughts of father and son were particularly prepared to indulge in ambitious projects, and day after day they had gone through calculations in the morning, and in the afternoon paid visits in the neighborhood, in order to feel their ground and sound the dispositions of the electors.

The result of their investigations showed that parties were very evenly balanced, and, as the Baron de Croixfonds had also discovered, that M. Lescalle's influence, and the votes he could command, would probably turn the scale on way or the other.

"Would he be well disposed towards us?" Jacques asked his father.

"I really cannot tell. He had given the Baron de Croixfonds great hopes that he would support his son in case of his standing, but somebody said the other day that he threw him over, and is hand and glove now with the Richers de Montlouis. M. Jules Richer is the ultra Liberal candidate, you know."

"I had better call on Madame Lescalle, and try to obtain her good graces."

"I suspect that she has not much influence with her lord and master, that is to say, she rules the menage, but when it comes to business or politics, he is absolute."

"How can we get round him?"

"We can ask him to dinner before you go, and judge of his dispositions."

"In the meantime I shall leave my card at the Maison Lescalle. Such little attentions are never wholly unacceptable."

On the afternoon of the same day, as he was returning from La Ciotat, Jacques met his brother, and was struck with his paleness and look of more than ordinary dejection.

"Are you ill, George?" he said, in a kind manner.

"What makes you think so?"

"You don't look at all well."

"Oh, I am quite well. There is nothing the matter with me."

"I am not at all convinced of that. I have observed that for some days you have looked anything but well. You must take care of yourself, George."

"Oh! I shall take a long walk to-morrow; that does me more good than anything when——"

"When you feel ill. What is the matter with you?"

George hesitated and seemed about to answer, but he stopped, turned away, and, as if speaking to himself, said, "Oh, these last twelve days!"

Those words struck Jacques. It was just twelve days since his own unsuccessful journey to Toulon. As his brother walked away, he looked at him in a thoughtful and anxious manner, then went out himself, and for nearly an hour paced slowly up and down the avenue. At last he stopped, and, as if he was making up his mind to an effort, came back to the house and walked straight into his father's study.

The Count de Vedelles was writing, and said, without looking up, "What do you want, Jacques?"

"I want to speak to you about something which is, I think, of consequence."

"About your election?"

"No; it is about George."

"Oh, George again!" the old man said, with a look of weariness. "Well, what is it?"

"He is not well, and if we do not take care, he will get worse, both in body and mind. I suspect he spends his nights wandering about the grounds. I found out accidentally that he had not gone to bed at all the night before last."

M. de Vedelles made a gesture which meant, "Why was I not told of this before?"

"I did not speak about it, because I knew how much it must vex you, and then, as I could not imagine any reason, or think of any remedy for this increasing depression, I thought it better not to thwart his fancies. But I am getting anxious about him. He is looking very ill, he has lost his appetite, he is more silent and abstracted than ever, and sometimes his absence is so great that I can hardly rouse him from it."

"My dear Jacques, all this is not new to me. Your mother has noticed it as well as yourself, and it makes her very unhappy. But what can we do? We have tried everything we could think of to rouse him out of this apathy. I afraid there is nothing to be done. Speaking to him about his health only serves to irritate him."

"But I think I have found out the cause of this increased dejection."

"Have you? What is it?"

"He is in love."

"In love! George! Oh, then that would explain those long walks and wanderings about the country! And you have found out the secret, and know who it is he has taken a fancy to. A peasant girl, I suppose—one of the farmer's daughters?"

"No; not at all a peasant girl!"

"Some one at La Ciotat, then? That would be better. If she is a respectable girl and tolerably well connected, why really it would be no bad thing to get him married. I have often thought that as there is no hope of his entering into any profession, this would be the best thing that could happen."

"But unfortunately it is Mdlle. de la Pinede he has fallen in love with."

"Denise! Nonsense! I don't believe a word of it!"

"But I am quite certain it is so. I suspected it, and just now something he said, half unconsciously, proved I am right."

"Then I don't see what is to be done. She would certainly not marry him."

"No, indeed," Jacques said, glancing at his own handsome face in the glass. "A girl who has refused me, would not, I suppose, think of marrying George. But what can we do about this poor dear boy?"

"You think much too seriously, I am sure, of this fancy of his. Well, suppose he imagines himself in love with Mdlle. Denise, it is only because she is the first pretty girl he has met and talked to. We could easily, if he has taken a sentimental turn, lead his affections in some other more possible direction. The fact is, he is bored to death. Without occupation of any sort, without interest in anything, his life here is of course dreadfully dull. He will never be able to take care of himself, and a good, sensible wife, pretty enough to please his fancy, would be the making of your brother. Do you know that this idea is quite a relief to me? Can you think of any one that would do for him? We must not be too particular. People in our own rank of life would object to marry their daughters to such a poor creature as George, considering he is no great parti, and will never get on in life. But what I can settle upon him, and the title of Baronne, would throw dust into the eyes of many an honest roturier."

Jacques reflected a moment, and then a smile hovered on his lips. "O father, what a capital stroke of policy for both your sons I have thought of."

"What are you thinking of?"

"Suppose that with one stone you could kill two 'birds.'"

"What two birds? Speak out."

"Well, you know that M. Lescalle holds the fate of the next election completely in his hands. This is the case, beyond a doubt. He has been, up to this time, playing off the Croixfonds and the Richers against one another. Now it appears that Cesaire de Croixfonds is out of the field, and the choice lies between M. Richer and me. Would not the excellent Toussaint like his pretty daughter to be madame la Baronne de Vedelles? and you would really have a very nice little daughter-in-law."

"I wonder if he would agree," the Count said, greatly excited. "Of course it would secure your election at once. The joke in the neighborhood has been that the representation of this department is a part of Mdlle. Rose's marriage portion, and we could go much farther and fare worse. The parents would be a great nuisance, but the girl is nice enough."

"She is a charming little thing. Let us lose no time about it. That gigantic swell, M. Artemon Richer de Montlouis, is said to be very much fascinated by the notary's daughter, and they may engage themselves beyond recovery if speedy measures to cut him out are not taken."

"I shall write at once to Lescalle and ask him to come here to-morrow. He wants the East Farm for a client of his, and I shall put our friend in a good humor by telling him that I have made up my mind, for his sake, to let Jean Benard have it."

"Bravo! I already see myself M. le Depute des Bouches du Rhone, and my pretty sister-in-law installed at the chateau. We shall then see, I suppose, the acacia branch cut at last. Poor, dear George! It is really a capital plan, if only he falls into it."

"Of course he will," the Count answered. "We shall have to tell him that Mdlle. Denise is as much out of his reach as the moon, and once convinced of that, he will be enchanted to fall back on the fair Rose we shall have provided for him. You had better not say anything of all this to your mother at present; she is overanxious about things."

To the disappointment of the Count and his eldest son, an answer was sent to say that M. Lescalle was absent, and not expected home for some days. Jacques put off again his departure for Paris, wishing to keep up his father to the plan they had formed, and to see the affair fairly started. In the meantime he was assiduous in his attentions to those he looked upon as his future constituents, and made himself very popular in the neighborhood.

George looked every day more sad and dejected. There had been no communication between Madame de Vedelles and Mdlle. de la Pinede since she had refused Jacques; but four or five days after the one when he had spoken to his father of George's state of mind, the Countess received a letter from Denise, inclosing one from the vicar-general, announcing that a second priest had been appointed at Les Trois Tours, and would begin saying mass every day at the chapel in the grounds of La Pinede, as soon as he received notice of M. and Madame de Vedelles' wishes on the subject. Denise had informed the vicar-general that the Countess would answer his letter herself. She added kind and affectionate expressions as to the health of Madame de Vedelles, but said nothing as to their meeting again.

The last day of the month of May was fixed upon for the opening of the chapel. It was to be a very simple function. There had been plans for the formation of a choir under Denise's direction, and the music for the occasion had been chosen during her stay at La Pinede. But all this having fallen to the ground since her departure and the unfortunate result of Jacques' visit on the following day, there was now to be only a low mass at eight o'clock in the morning. A box containing all the things she had worked for the altar, and another with all those she had ordered, at Madame de Vedelles' request, from a shop at Marseilles, arrived the day before that of the opening.

George seemed excited at the sight of these cases, and when his mother went to the chapel to see them unpacked and arranged, and to meet the young priest from Les Trois Tours, he followed her there, and exerted himself more than he had done about anything since his illness, in helping to ornament the altar.

On the following morning Madame de Vedelles, in her Bath chair, and her husband and her eldest son on foot crossed the garden and entered the chapel. The Count went because it would not have looked well in the eyes of his servants and tenants if he had not done so; Jacques, because he did not like to vex his mother by staying away. George had preceded the rest of the family, and when they arrived was sitting on one of the benches with his head leaning on his hands. When mass began he knelt, but otherwise remained in the same position. Once, just after the elevation, he raised his head, and then, in a little tribune on one side of the chapel, which was reached by a side entrance, he caught sight of a face which at that moment, and to his excited imagination, seemed a heavenly vision. The expression of devotion in that upturned countenance was more holy, more beautiful than anything he had ever seen or dreamed of.

It was the face indeed which, from the first moment he had beheld it, he had thought the most perfect ideal of pure, high, and lofty womanly beauty. But never had it seemed to him, during those many hours he had watched it, not even when it bent in gentle sweetness over his mother's sick couch, half so beautiful or so angel-like as now, in the attitude of ardent prayer and adoring love. So holy was its look that it impressed him with a feeling of awe. He dared not continue to gaze upon it in that Sacred Presence he had always believed in, but which that expression of fervent adoration seemed to impress upon him more vividly than ever. He again covered his face with his hands, a mute, silent, instinctive prayer rose from his heart, which softened the dull, aching pain so long felt and never spoken of.

When mass was nearly over he glanced again at the tribune, but it was empty, and he asked himself if he had imagined or seen a vision, whether Denise had really been in that spot a moment ago, or if it had been a mere illusion.

He walked home like a person in a dream, and never uttered a single word during breakfast-time, and when his father and his brother had left the room, sat opposite to his mother, still plunged in a deep fit of musing.

"George," she gently said. "I have a message to give you."

"A message?" he said. "I cannot think who can have any message to send to me."

"I have just been given a letter from Mdlle. de la Pinede."

A hectic red spot rose on George's pale cheeks.

"She was in the chapel this morning. She says that she had promised us to be present at the first mass that should be said there, and that, though at present, it is better for all parties that she should not come here, and of course it is, she felt that she must keep her word, and that with all her heart she united her prayers with ours; and then she adds, 'Will you tell M. George that I kept my promise, and that I may some day claim the fulfilment of his.'"

"Mother, what does it all mean?" George exclaimed, starting to his feet. "What has happened? What is changed? Why does she stay away?"

Madame de Vedelles hesitated a moment, and then thought it better to let him know the truth.

"My dear boy, if you had not been so absent, so unobservant, you would have guessed what has taken place. Your brother fell in love with Mdlle. de la Pinede, and the day after she left us went to Toulon and proposed to her. I am sorry to say that she refused him. It was a great disappointment to him and to us."

"Jacques? She refused him? Thank God!" he added in so low a voice that his mother did not hear those last words. "And she has sent me that message. She remembers my vow."

He darted out of the room, and rushed through the olive woods to the sea-shore. His head was aching with excitement, and during the rest of the day he could only sit with his forehead resting on his hands, or walk up and down the bench repeating to himself; "She has refused Jacques. She has sent me that message."

It was a day or two after the opening of the chapel that M. Lescalle came back to La Ciotat, and he lost no time in obeying the Count's summons which he found on his arrival. But between that arrival and his visit to the chateau, short as the interval had been, something had happened which made him look singularly radiant. Pleasant thoughts were evidently in his mind, and he kept rubbing his fat hands together every five minutes, as if to relieve the overflowing exuberance of his spirits.

The fact was, that an hour after his return he had received a visit from M. Richer de Montlouis, the father of M. Artemon, and that after a few preliminary remarks that gentleman had said to him—

"M. Lescalle, my object in calling upon you is an important one. I come to ask your daughter's hand in marriage for my son Artemon."

The notary rather expected this proposal, but he thought it right to appear surprised.

"How comes it," he said, "that such an honor is done to us by the first family in the town?"

For the best reason possible in such a case, M. Lescalle, Artemon could not meet your lovely daughter and remain indifferent to her great attractions. She has made the deepest impression on my son's heart, and you will make him the happiest of men if you accept him as a son-in-law."

"Rose is very young, M. de Montlouis."

"That is a defect which will always go on diminishing," the banker said, with a broad smile.

"I am afraid the fortune I can give her will seem to you very small."

"You give her——"

"Forty thousand francs."

"I have been told sixty thousand francs."

"No. M. de Montlouis, forty thousand; and I assure you that even that is almost beyond my means."

"Well, you will perhaps reconsider the matter before we finally fix the sum, my dear M. Lescalle. I do not want you to give me a positive answer at once, not to-day I mean. You must wish, of course, to consult Madame Lescalle, only I flatter myself that if you are friendly to us there will be no difficulties in the way."

"You have no doubt, I hope, of my friendly feelings?"

"Well, well, my dear M. Lescalle, you have not always been our friend."

"What do you mean, my dear sir?"

"Come, let us speak openly. We are on the eve of an election. My brother is going to stand, and you know that you promised to support M. Cesaire de Croixfonds."

"Ah! I thought as much," inwardly ejaculated the notary. "The election is at the bottom of the marriage, to a great degree, at any rate."

"What I promised," he answered, "was to help M. de Croixfonds to qualify himself by the purchase of an estate in this part of the country."

"Yes, exactly so, to set up another candidate. Thanks to your good offices, he was very near purchasing La Pinede for a song."

"I acted as his lawyer and a friend of his family. I have no wish to injure your brother's position."

"But if we come to an agreement regarding this proposal I have just made to you, I suppose that in the event of any one else standing we can reckon on your support?"

"I am not pledged to any one else."

"Then I can solicit your votes for my son's uncle. On another occasion you will give them of your own accord to your son-in-law."

"What does your son intend?"

"Artemon has no settled plans of the kind; but seeing that for the last ten years he has set his face against marriage, and now his career. I am sure that as a married man he will be a model of steadiness."

"It is never too late to mend, certainly; but I suppose there is room for improvement," M. Lescalle said.

"Oh, of course, he has been a little wild, like all young men. There is no harm in that. He has sown his wild oats. You were just as unsteady once, and only think what an excellent husband you have made."

M. Lescalle did not much like this allusion to his past life; but as it was a home thrust that could not well be parried, he thought it best to drop the subject, and the two gentlemen parted on the most cordial terms.

As soon as M. de Montlouis was gone, M. Lescalle rushed to his wife's room.

"Virginie," he said, "we are going to marry Rose."

"To Artemon Richer?"

"Then it is no surprise to you?"

"I saw his father going into your office, and I immediately guessed what he was come about. I knew it would end in that way."

"I suspect that their anxiety about the election and securing my votes hurried on the proposal. I shall not think of giving them more than forty thousand francs with Rose; it is quite enough, considering that it will be my doing if M. Jules Richer is elected."

"Oh, certainly, it is quite enough, and Rose such a pretty girl, too, in the bargain."

"Very pretty, no doubt; but I can tell you, Madame Lescalle, that her blue eyes would not have made up for the loss of twenty thousand francs, if it had not been for the votes I can command."

"Artemon is very much in love with her."

"So much the better. And Rose—has she seen him?"

"I don't know; I have looked after her very closely. M. Artemon is apt to flirt with young ladies, and I was determined that nothing of the sort should go on till he had proposed."

"You were quite right, but now you can speak to Rose. Do you think she will be pleased?"

"I should fancy so, indeed—such a tall, handsome fellow, and so admired by everybody. There she is, Toussaint, just come back from Les Capucins. She has spent the morning with Aunt Mede. Leave us together. I shall speak to her at once. It would be too formal if you were in the room."

"Very well," M. Lescalle answered, and away he went to his office.

A moment afterwards Rose came into her mother's room. She looked like one of Greuze's pictures in her large straw hat, ornamented with a wreath of wild flowers; her pretty soft hands and arms holding up the skirt of her pink gingham frock, which enabled her to carry an immense bunch of flowers gathered in Mise Mede's garden. With her fair hair hanging about her face, the color in her cheeks deeper still than usual after her walk, and that harvest of roses, no painter could have sketched a more perfect image of spring. Breathless and smiling, she ran up to her mother and kissed her.

"See, mamma, what lovely flowers! I have ransacked Mise Mede's parterre."

"They are beautiful," Madame Lescalle answered, glancing at the roses; "but I am not thinking of nosegays now. Can you guess what I have heard?"

"No; what is it, mamma?"

"Some one has proposed for you, my dear."

"For me—really? Who, mamma?"

"Can you guess?"

"No, mamma," Rose answered, opening very wide her large blue, innocent-looking eyes.

"Well, Artemon Richer de Montlouis wishes to marry you."

Rose's countenance changed, her hands loosened their hold of her gown, and all her flowers fell at her feet.

"You said the other day, mamma, that I was too young to be married."

"Are you speaking quite in earnest about it, mamma?"

"Oh, yes, my dear, as earnestly as possible."

"But, mamma, you did say, the day before yesterday, that I was a great deal too young to be married."

"Oh, that is what one always says when there is nothing actually in question about a girl's marriage, and no one has yet proposed for her; but people do not throw away the chance of a good match on the score of a person's youth. You are very difficult to please if you are not delighted with this proposal. Artemon Richer is the best parti and the handsomest man in this place."

Rose said nothing. She knew her mother's partiality for the handsome Artemon, and felt that nothing she could say would be understood. She sat silently listening to Madame Lescalle's comments on her extraordinary good luck till some visitors were announced; then hastily rising, she threw hat, covered with flowers, into a corner, and went straight to her father's study. She found him seated at his bureau, with his head on his hand. He was calculating all the advantages he expected to derive from a connection with the Richers de Montlouis.

Rose tried to steady her voice, and said, "Dear papa, mamma has just told me——"

"Oh, indeed! So you have heard, little girl, of the conquest you have made. Well, it is of some use to be pretty."

"And so M. Artemon——"

"Will be your husband, little lady, in three weeks."

"Not so soon as that, papa, I hope. I don't know him at all."

"Well, I know him, my dear, and that is quite enough. You and he will have plenty of time to get acquainted when you are married. But you have seen him; you know what a good-looking fellow he is. That will do for the present, and I suppose he admires my little Rose as he has proposed for her."

"Perhaps it is his father who wants him to marry me."

"Oh, dear, no. Rosette; a man of thirty is not like a girl of seventeen."

Rose sighed deeply, and her father went on saying: "I would not on any account have forced upon my daughter a disagreeable husband; and if Artemon had not been good-looking and young, rich and well-connected, if he had not been just the sort of man a girl would like to marry, I should not have accepted him for my little Rose; but this match is everything I could desire. What! are you not delighted, my love? Why don't you thank your papa and kiss him, instead of standing there looking as doleful as if you were not the luckiest of girls?"

"I am so surprised, papa, and I really hardly know if I am awake or dreaming. The idea of my being married seems so strange—and so soon, too! I had never thought about it at all."

"It is much better to be taken by surprise, I can tell you, than to be ten years looking out for a husband, as the Demoiselles Arnoux have done, and end by not finding one and being an old maid. I can understand your surprise, Rosette; but after Artemon's first visit you will be enchanted."

"Oh no, papa, I am sure I shall not like him;" and in saying this Rose, who had been struggling for some time with her tears, hid her face in her hands, and began to sob.

"What is all this nonsense?" M. Lescalle sternly said. "Are we going to play the fool and turn our back on the best match in the neighborhood? Oh, I see how it is. We dreamed at school of some fine fairy prince, and we mean to wait for him."

This sort of banter Rose could not stand. All she had meant to say went out of her head. She felt herself helpless against what she felt would be her father's invincible will, and her courage gave way. She rushed out of the study and locked herself up in her room, without listening to her father's consoling assurance that she was to leave it to him, and that he knew much better than herself what would be for her happiness.

As might well have been expected, Rose's tears did not in the least affect his plans. He did not make her girlish objections even a subject of thought; and as he went the next day to La Pinede, Toussaint Lescalle felt in a most agreeable frame of mind.

Any one who had seen him walking slowly, with his hands behind his back, enjoying the pleasant breeze from the sea and the perfume of the wild thyme, and had observed the affable way in which he nodded to the persons he met, smiled on the children, and called the dogs by familiar names, would have said, "There goes a happy individual." And what was giving such joy to that man, that it seemed to ooze out of every pore of his comfortable plump body, and to glitter in his little sharp eyes?

Well, he had an only child—a lovely, innocent girl, full of the gaiety which is so attractive at that age. He had her in his home, under his roof, near him from morning to night, like a bird in spirits, like a flower in beauty and sweetness; and what made him so very happy was that he was going to get rid of her.

Was he on that account a hard-hearted man or a bad father? By no means. He was like an innumerable number of fathers. In many families a daughter is considered as an inconvenience. If she marries at eighteen it is a good thing: if at sixteen or seventeen, still better. To see her unhappy in her husband's house is much less of an annoyance than to have her happy at home unmarried.

SECOND THOUGHTS.

M. DE VEDELLES was immediately struck with his visitor's beaming expression of countenance, and something in it which seemed to provoke an interrogatory remark.

After requesting him to be seated, the Count said, "You seem in excellent spirits this morning, M. Lescalle?"

"Ah, well! I am not at all apt to be melancholy, M. le Comte, and I have indeed no reason to complain. Things are not going badly with me, as times go."

"Your business is increasing very much, I hear."

"It increases every day, and I have clients in every corner of the department."

"Yes; your acquaintance must be very extensive. I suppose you know most of the families in this neighborhood?"

"A great many of them—not to say all."

"You saw by my letter, that I will agree to let the East Farm, at his own terms, to your protege, Jean Benard."

"Indeed I did, M. le Comte, and I am delighted to find that you have arrived at this decision. I have known Benard for twenty years, and I can assure you that he is a good sort of a man, and a good farmer too. He will do justice to your land."

"I am always inclined to take your advice on such matters, because you have so much knowledge of business, and are especially conversant with questions of land in this locality, of which I am myself quite ignorant."

"Without boasting, I may say, M. le Comte, that few men have applied themselves with as much attention as I have done to all the details regarding the management of property in this part of the country."

"But I suspect, M. Lescalle, that you are not only experienced in matters of this description, but that you have a pretty quick eye as to all sorts of affairs, and that you could give me judicious advice on a very delicate matter."

"Well, M. le Comte, I will not deny that I am often consulted by my neighbors on subjects which require considerable tact and discretion."

"That is just what I meant. You are a person to whom one can speak quite confidentially."

"I always go on the principle that a notary is a sort of lay confessor."

"I felt sure that was the case, and I am going to speak to you with entire confidence. You know that I have two sons?"

"Yes; though I only know M. Jacques—a very charming young man in every respect."

"He is also remarkably clever, and has already distinguished himself at the bar. They are trying at Marseilles to persuade him to give up Paris and remain in Provence. He is thinking of engaging in political life, and I have no fears as to his not making his way in the world; but it is not the same case with his brother."

"You are alluding to M. George?"

"Yes."

"He is still very young?"

"Not so young as he looks. He will be twenty-one in a few days. He was, till the age of seventeen, one of the most promising boys imaginable—full of intelligence, and even, apparently, very talented."

"Oh, indeed! then he has not always been——"

"Deficient in mind, you were going to say. On the contrary, it is only since a brain fever, followed by a typhoid fever, which seized him during his preparation for his examination at the polytechnic school, that he has fallen into a state of mind which it is difficult to define. As far as health goes he is well and strong enough now. George is by no means an idiot. He has as much sense as many a one who gets on creditably in a quiet and obscure position. If he had not once given promise of superior intellect, his present deficiencies would not strike us so much. He has lost the power, and even the desire, of exertion; and I see no prospect of his being able to follow any profession, or of his doing anything for himself. I feel obliged—and his brother quite agrees with me—to think of his future existence, and to form some plan with regard to it."

"And what are your ideas on the subject, M. le Comte?"

"Well, really, the only thing I can think of, is to find him a wife, and to let him live quietly in the country—either with us, or in a little home of his own in this neighborhood. He is passionately fond of the country and the seaside—that is really the only taste he seems to have. My wife's health is in a precarious state. I am getting old myself, and I feel that it would be a great relief and comfort to us if our son was married to an amiable and well-principled girl, who would supply to him our place, and who could make herself happy in a quiet existence, and with a man who would, I am sure, make her a very kind and affectionate husband."

M. Lescalle was listening intently to the Count's words, and busy thoughts were crossing his mind. "What has he in his thoughts?" he said to himself, and then aloud—

"I should think there would be no difficulty in finding a young lady such as you describe, M. le Comte."

"Well! could you suggest any one?"

"I ought to know, first, what would be your stipulation with regard to this daughter-in-law."

"I should not be very exacting."

"Must she be of noble birth?"

"I do not hold to it. A man gives his own name to his wife."

"And the title of Baronne?" M. Lescalle observed.

"Of course. It is quite a different case with daughters."

"And as to fortune?"

"As to fortune, I should settle on George and his wife twenty-five thousand francs a year, and if the girl had thirty thousand or forty thousand francs of her own, which could be hardly reckoned a dowry——"

"I beg your pardon, M. le Comte. In our part of the country, such a sum is reckoned a very good marriage portion. But as to the position of her family?"

"All I should care about would be its respectability—not trades-people, however."

"And the age of the young lady?"

"Oh, anywhere between sixteen and twenty-five. She ought to be good-looking—pretty, if possible, in order that George might take a fancy to her."

"Let me think," M. Lescalle said, musing as if he was turning over in his mind all the young ladies in the neighborhood. "There is Mdlle. Veslaint, but she is sickly."

"Oh, that would never do."

"Mdlle. Laurice is pretty enough, but as she has a hundred thousand francs, I scarcely think——"

"That she would accept George."

"Mdlle. du Lac is young and well born, but then——"

"What then?"

"She is humpbacked."

"He would demur at that."

"What would you say to the postmaster's daughter?"

"That would be too great a mesalliance."

"M. le Cure has a handsomish niece, but she is forty at the least."

"Almost double his age! Is there nobody else?"

"Well, M. le Comte, I really cannot think of any one else."

"Oh, I am sure you will, if you try. If I could meet with something really suitable, I should not mind adding to what I settle on George and his wife, ten thousand francs for the corbeille."

The notary reflected for a few instants, and then said, slapping his forehead, "A thought just occurs to me——"

"What?" the Count anxiously asked.

"There is my own daughter."

"Mdlle. Rose?"

"Yes."

"I thought she was engaged to a young man of La Ciotat."

"Artemon Richer, you mean? There has been some question of it, but I must say I should prefer the connection with your family. There would be, however, a difficulty, even if you thought my daughter a desirable match for your son."

"I certainly should think so. There would be no obstacle on our side."

"But then, you see, M. le Comte," and M. Lescalle hesitated, like a man who has something awkward to bring out. "The fact is, that Rose has not got any fortune at all."

"But you could, if you wished it, do something for us that would quite make up for her want of fortune."

"How so, M. le Comte?"

"By supporting, and consequently securing, the election of my son Jacques."

"I thought as much," M. Lescalle inwardly ejaculated. "They are all possessed with the same devil."

The Count went on. "There are two candidates, I know—that is, if M. Cesaire de Croixfonds is still in the field. We were told he had retired, but——"

"He now hopes to purchase l'Estraine, which would make him eligible."

"Would not a third candidate, well supported by influential parties, and with a decided talent for speaking, carry the election?"

"It is not unlikely. But I hardly know how I could support M. Jacques, seeing the encouragement I have given——"

"Oh, you cannot have any scruples on the subject. If we arrange the marriage, Jacques' success will become, in your case, a family concern."

"Well, there is truth in what you say, M. le Comte, and I am quite ready to further his interests. How old is M. Jacques?"

"He will soon be thirty; and to get him into the Chamber this year will be an immense advantage. It is worth two years to him."

"I quite see that, and you can rely upon me. I shall be happy to use my influence in his favor; and as to my daughter, I assure you that I am highly flattered at your wish to have her for a daughter-in-law."

The two fathers shook hands, and then M. Lescalle said, "Your young man is not ill-tempered, I hope?"

"Oh, dear, no. He has never in his life said an unkind word to any one. It is possible that his wife may not find him a very amusing companion, but he is sure to behave well to her."

"Ah, well, then it is all right. I would not on any account give my daughter to a man who would make her unhappy."

The Count and the notary walked out of the house, and down the stairs of the terrace, arm in arm, like old friends, to the great surprise of Vincent, who was not used to see his master on such intimate terms with persons of inferior rank.

M. de Vedelles accompanied M. Lescalle to the gate of the chateau. The last words that passed between them before they separated, were these—"He has never opposed my will." The Count was speaking of George.

"She would never dream of disobeying me," the notary said, alluding to Rose.

CHAPTER IX.

A TRIFLING OBSTACLE.

THE day on which this important conversation had taken place was a Sunday. At eleven the notary had set out for La Pinede, and at the same time his wife and daughter had gone to church. It was one of the finest days of a beautiful spring. The abundant and unusual quantity of rain which had fallen in the early part of the year, had made Provence as green as Normandy and as fragrant as Spain. La Ciotat had never been in such beauty before. The altar of the Blessed Virgin in the parish church was so surrounded by a mass of lilacs and orange blossoms, that the perfume of the flowers exceeded that of the incense.

After mass all the population flocked to the Tasse, a charming promenade on a terrace near the sea. A number of pretty girls in short petticoats, and youths with red fisherman's caps on their heads, were strolling up and down in parties of seven or eight, shaking hands and laughing as they stopped to speak to their friends.

Some of the consequential families of the town were walking more sedately in the midst of that animated, picturesque, and noisy crowd. Amongst the rest M. le Baron de Croixfonds and his family, M. Arnoux and his two daughters in very stiff muslin gowns, M. Richer de Montlouis arm-in-arm with his wife, and Madame Lescalle and Rose, escorted by M. Artemon Richer.

At La Ciotat, as in all small towns, the least little events assume a great magnitude. Everything is made the subject of comments and conjectures. Acts which in Paris no one would take the least notice of, are immediately remarked, and give rise to all kinds of suppositions. It was accordingly a matter of great astonishment to the big-wigs of La Ciotat when Madame and Mademoiselle Lescalle were seen walking with M. Artemon Richer.

We must describe Artemon. He was a tall fellow, almost six feet high, broad in proportion, with a brown and florid complexion and dark hair. His features were symmetrical and heavy, his countenance impudent, vulgar, and good humored. He was always laughing and showing a row of fine white teeth. His dress was in the worst possible taste. He wore diamond studs in his shirt, had large, red ungloved hands, and was the very type of a Provençal swell—to use a slang word—an overbearing, noisy, cynical, insolent, dashing fellow, who carried all before him in the little town of La Ciotat. Rich, handsome, and connected as he was with some of the best families in the neighborhood, nobody ventured to discountenance him. Laughing at everybody and everything, with no deference for any one, smoking in the presence of the finest ladies of his acquaintance, coarse in conversation, and familiar in his way of talking to women and girls, he was, in spite of all this, or perhaps in consequence of it, rather a favorite in the society he frequented, and supposed to have broken the heart of more than one young lady who had fondly and vainly hoped to become Madame Artemon Richer.

After spending some years in Paris on the very specious pretext of studying for the bar, he had returned to La Ciotat, leaving behind him debts to the amount of thirty thousand francs, which his father had paid, stipulating, however, that there was to be an end to his residence in Paris, so he was obliged to find amusement in a small country town and its vicinity. For some time Father Richer laughed at the quarrels, the scrapes, the flirtations, and the follies of his incorrigible son, but at last he became anxious to get him married. Several attempts of the kind had utterly failed. However, from the first day he had seen Rose Lescalle, Artemon had taken a great fancy to her, and her coldness and reserve only made him the more obstinately bent on marrying the notary's pretty daughter.

Father Richer, as we have seen, hastened to take advantage of this position of things, and what was going on that Sunday on the promenade seemed a public manifestation of the intentions of both families. All the town was watching the parties, and Madame Lescalle's attitude amounted to a first publication of bans. There was a sort of official dignity in her way of receiving the indirect congratulations of her friends, and an ironical condescension in her manner of bowing to the ladies whose daughters Artemon had rejected.

Rose, who was that day an object of envy to all the young girls—Rose, the destined bride of one who had been sought after by the most fashionable of the town beauties—Rose, the heroine of the day, did not seem to share Madame Lescalle's triumphant self-complacency. She walked up and down by her mother's side in a listless manner, without answering a word to the high-flown compliment which Artemon Richer was showering upon her.

All at once Madame Lescalle was interrupted in the middle of a sentence. She felt her arm laid hold of, and turning round saw above her daughter's shoulder her husband's red and irate face.

"Good gracious! M. Lescalle," she exclaimed, "what is the matter? You tumble upon us like a waterspout."

"Madame, you ought to have been at home long ago," the notary answered, in a gruff voice very unusual to him. "Take my arm, if you please, and let us be off."

As Madame Lescalle, quite bewildered, was staring at him without moving, he rather rudely separated her from Artemon, took his daughter's arm under his own, and was going away, when the young man, recovering from his first surprise, said to him in a half jesting, half sneering tone—

"Upon my word, M. Lescalle, you seem to have lost your eyesight at La Pinede! Did not you see that these ladies were walking with me?"

"I saw it very well, M. Artemon."

"Then why are you carrying them off in this sudden manner? You may esteem yourself fortunate that I have reasons which make me unwilling to quarrel with you."

"Oh, pray do not have any scruples on the subject," M. Lescalle rejoined. "I should like to know what right you have to object to my taking my wife and my daughter home, if I do not approve of their walking here?"

Artemon bit his lips as if to restrain a torrent of angry retort which his rising anger was about to give vent to. He said tolerably calmly: "Your conduct, sir, is quite inexplicable."

M. Richer de Montlouis came up at that moment, and exclaimed; "Is this the way you take, sir, of breaking off the negotiation you so readily entered into?"

"You may think what you please about it, sir," M. Lescalle answered, and then making a low bow to M. Richer, he hurried away his wife and daughter.

Madame Lescalle was astounded. During eighteen years of married life she had never seen her husband behave in such a strange and unwarrantable manner. She foresaw a quarrel with the Richer family rendered inevitable, and all her hopes destroyed by this unaccountable burst of temper. M. Lescalle's conduct struck her as so extraordinary that she felt almost afraid he had gone out of his mind. The more she thought of it, the more her surprise and annoyance increased.

As the notary and his companions walked from the Tasse to the Rue Droite, where they lived, not a word was said. When they arrived at their house, M. Lescalle, red, breathless, and agitated, stood opposite the couch on which his wife and Rose had seated themselves. The mother and daughter were awaiting his first words with equal, though a different kind of, anxiety. But he remained silent for a few instants, as if hardly knowing how to preface what he had to say.

Her husband's evident embarrassment inspired Madame Lescalle with courage, and in her most acrimonious voice she began the attack.

"Sir, are you going at last to explain the reason of your extraordinary behavior? Will you, if you please, tell us why you have insulted the only family in this place which offered a suitable marriage for Rose?"

"Rose will have a husband," M. Lescalle replied, in a dignified manner, "worth all the Richers in the world. M. le Comte de Vedelles has just asked her in marriage for his son."

"For M. Jacques?" the young girl exclaimed, blushing crimson.

"No; for M. George—which is just as good. He is quite as rich as his brother. His father settles upon him twenty-five thousand francs a year."

A dead silence ensued. Then Madame Lescalle, divided between the prospect of so magnificent a connection and a feeling of maternal anxiety, said:

"What? the youngest brother—the fada?"

"Fada yourself!" exclaimed the exasperated notary. "How can you talk such ridiculous nonsense, Virginie? George de Vedelles is a very pleasing young man. Rose will be very happy with him."

When Rose had heard the name of George, she had turned as white as her cambric collar, and leant back, unable to utter a word.

The idea of an objection to this marriage had not entered into M. Lescalle's mind. To do him justice, he had always considered the reports as to George de Vedelles' incapacity of mind as greatly exaggerated. He believed him to be a young man of no abilities, and somewhat below par in intellect, but by no means half-witted. In spite of all his worldliness, he would not have married his daughter to an idiot. He was not aware of the degree to which the reports of his mental deficiency had been spread in the neighborhood, and how deeply they had prejudiced Rose against George de Vedelles. Seeing his daughter so deeply affected, he went up to her, and patting her cheek, said:

"Well, after all you were quite right, Rosette, to turn up your nose at M. Richer's son. I hope you are satisfied now. Who would ever have expected my little girl to be Madame le Baronne?"

Rose sat cold and motionless as a statue. She felt as if a terrible nightmare was oppressing her. At last, bursting into tears, she threw herself into her father's arms, sobbing violently and in broken accents said:

"O my dear father, you cannot mean that you have really accepted this horrid proposal. I am sure you cannot want me to marry that half-witted youth. What a dreadful thing it would be to be the wife of such a man. You would not make me miserable! You did not know that I should hate the thought of it. Oh, I am sure that it cannot be, that nothing is settled about it. You will change your mind, and tell them so, for you are a dear, good father, and you love your little Rose. O dear, dear papa, for God's sake speak, and tell me that you will withdraw your promise, if you have made one. You won't speak. Oh! I am quite broken hearted—quite miserable!"

M. Lescalle, very much distressed by his daughter's tears and vehemence, held her in his arms, and instead of speaking, kissed her hair and tried to soothe her by his caresses, as if she had been a baby.

"Come, come, my child," he said at last, "don't cry now; be a sensible girl. Yes, I love my little Rosy, and I want her to be happy. Now, please don't cry so, my darling. You are quite mistaken about M. George. He is not at all the sort of person you think."

Madame Lescalle, affected at the sight of her daughter's grief, pulled her husband by the arm and said, "Would it not be better, Toussaint, to let her marry Artemon Richer, and be happy?"

"Oh, but mamma," cried Rose, lifting up her face, streaming with tears. "I should not be happy with M. Artemon. I don't want to be married at all. I would rather live always at home with papa and you."

These words gave an immediate advantage to M. Lescalle, who said, "Nonsense, nonsense; that is what romantic girls always say when their parents want them to make a sensible marriage. You see, Virginie, we must insist upon being obeyed. She does not want to marry either of these suitors. Yesterday she came crying to my room, and wanted me to refuse Artemon."

"If I am absolutely obliged to marry one or the other of those gentlemen, I had rather of the two be M. Artemon's wife than marry M. de Vedelles."

"It is too late for that, my dear. If you had not shown so great a dislike to M. Richer, I should have hesitated at the Comte de Vedelles' proposal. I would have sacrificed great advantages sooner than thwart your inclinations. But as you have no preference for any one, it is my duty to choose for you a husband. Artemon was a good match, and you would not have him. What I have now arranged for you is still more desirable, and I cannot listen to any more nonsense on the subject."

"But why is it so necessary I should be married?" Rose objected.

"For the matter of that, my dear," Madame Lescalle said, "if you did not marry M. de Vedelles, nobody would ever propose to you again after what took place on the promenade."

"I should not care."

"Oh, that is all very well; but some years hence you would not be of the same mind."

"Having publicly broken off, as we have done, the affair with the Richers, it is absolutely necessary that you should make a brilliant marriage," M. Lescalle said.

"You really behaved very ill to that poor Artemon," Madame Lescalle observed.

"What else could I do? I was seeking some cause to break off with the Richers, and had been turning over in my mind fifty different plans on my way back from the chateau, and when I arrived and saw you walking in that public manner with Artemon, which almost amounted to an announcement of the marriage, I was so taken by surprise, and so dreadfully annoyed, that I lost my head. But I am not, on the whole, sorry for it. After such a scene as that, the Richers cannot expect me to support them at the next election."

"What, are you going to fail them about that also? What has made you take such a dislike to them?"

"How stupid you are. Don't you understand why I cannot support them now?"

"No; I don't."

"Why, Jacques de Vedelles is going to stand. I must, of course, favor the interests of Rose's brother-in-law."

Rose was hiding her face against one of the cushions of the sofa, and weeping bitterly.

M. Lescalle loved his daughter, but yet the sight of her grief did not affect him the least. It was not a thing that could enter into his head that a woman was to be pitied who married in a way which secured to her a good fortune and a higher position than she could have had a right to expect. He had always seen how happy young girls looked when they were engaged to rich husbands, and so he made up his mind to let the storm of Rose's tears blow over, as he would have done a shower of rain.

As he left the drawing-room, he whispered to his wife, "She would have cried just as much if we had married her to Artemon. Soothe her, and reason with her—I leave that to you."

The mother and daughter, left alone together, remained silent for some time, Rose engrossed by her sorrow, and Madame Lescalle considering what line she could take. Her maternal and womanly feelings made her understand better than her husband Rose's grief. But there was one idea which towered above all other considerations—now that Rose could no longer marry Artemon, if she refused George de Vedelles, there was danger of her not marrying at all. This result, a most galling one to her pride, was not at all improbable. Some girls of good family, and pretty too, had remained old maids at La Ciotat because no eligible matches could be found for them, and she would have accepted anything rather than such a destiny for Rose. And then M. Lescalle was bent upon this marriage, and his wife was rather afraid of entering upon a course of positive resistance to his will. Like many women of the middling class, Madame Lescale was in some respects a tyrant, and in others a slave. She governed despotically her household, and did not endure the slightest interference with her authority in domestic affairs; but in important questions, business matters, as M. Lescale called them, she was very submissive to her husband. She, who would have fought him to the death rather than change, at his bidding, her laundry arrangements, and resisted openly any attempt on his part to interfere with the dismissal or the engagement of a kitchen-maid, trembled at the idea of opposing him with regard to her daughter's marriage. Such being the case, the more she reflected, the more incumbent she felt it to submit.

Rose, who could not divine what was passing in her mother's mind, threw her arms round her neck, and implored her to prevent this new marriage. She spoke with that vehement emotion which a first grief produces in a young heart. Timid as she was, and unaccustomed to express her feelings, the poor child used strong and eloquent words. She described the irretrievable misery of her future life, the hopeless sadness of her young years. Throwing herself on her mother's breast, she said:

"O mamma, mamma! do take care. Is it not a sin to marry a person for whom one feels a deep aversion? It is so dreadful to think that one will never love one's husband. How can I ever care for this M. George? If I remain unmarried, at any rate I can look forward without dread and sorrow to the future!"

Madame Lescale felt moved by these words. For a moment the idea crossed her mind that it was wrong to doom her child to a fate she so much dreaded. She thought also of the possible dangers and temptations which might be the result of forcing her into this marriage, and for an instant her heart sank within her. But this was only a transient feeling. The habitual submission of the wife triumphed over the mother's anxiety, and her own worldly nature soon resumed the upper hand.

She kissed her daughter, and, with those fond and caressing endearments with which people are apt to soothe a grief they cannot allay, she tried to comfort her in her own way, and to set before her what she considered herself the great advantages of the dreaded marriage.

"Come now, my darling child, you must not make the worst of it. This marriage, which you dislike so much, has, after all, some very good sides. The de Vedelles are a noble and highly respectable family. The Countess is very good and kind, and my little girl will enjoy many advantages which are not to be despised, I can tell you. With twenty-five thousand francs a year, you will be able to have four servants at least, and to keep your own carriage. You will be really one of the first ladies in this neighborhood. Dear me! I should not wonder if you gave a dinner some day to M. le Prefet when he makes his annual visit to La Ciotat. And when you go to Toulon and Marseilles you are sure to be invited to the Prefecture balls. And as to your dresses, why you will be able to get them from Paris. M. George will leave you, I am sure, the management of everything. He is very good and gentle, your father says, and will not thwart or bother you about your expenses. You will be mistress in your own house, and I can assure you, Rosy, that this in itself is worth thinking of. You have no idea what we women have often to go through with a husband."

Madame Lescale went on in this strain, dwelling at length on that last consideration, which had a somewhat practical reference to her own experience.

All her descriptions of dress, of parties, and of the luxuries of life fell flatly on her daughter's ears. She made no answer, for she felt at that moment that there was nothing in common between her mother's ideas and her own.

Rose was not romantic or sentimental, but she had, like other girls, cherished the hope of a happy marriage, and of being loved by a husband whom she could love in return, and it was with bitter regret that she saw herself doomed to give it up. Artemon Richer's familiar and vulgar manners were disagreeable to her, but not near so much as the prospect of marrying that strange, uncouth being, George de Vedelles. It never crossed her mind, however, that she could refuse to obey her parents. She had been brought up in the idea that daughters are bound to submit implicitly to paternal authority in that, as in all other respects.

In some of the old-fashioned provinces of France, this is still the common belief. Is this a good or a bad principle? There is much to be said, perhaps, on both sides of the question. Even the strongest advocates of parental authority will admit that there are cases which warrant a departure from the general rule of duty. It is, again, a question whether parental authority may be justifiably exercised, in any degree, on this subject. Different nations, different families, different individuals, will pronounce on this point opposite opinions. We shall not attempt to discuss the matter; but in France, forty years ago, and especially in the provinces, there could scarcely have been found an instance of dissent from the axiom, that a well-principled girl was bound to accept the husband chosen by her parents. This Rose had never doubted; and after this short struggle against her fate, she resigned herself to what she felt to be inevitable.

CHAPTER X.

ANOTHER TRIFLING OBSTACLE.

WHILST the scenes described in the last chapter were taking place at the Maison Lescale, something not very dissimilar was going on in the salon of the Chateau de la Pinede. After his interview with the notary, M. de Vedelles said to his wife: "Well, my dear Claire, you will be glad to hear that Jacques will, in all probability, be a deputy in the next Chamber."

"No, really—for this department?"

"Yes."

"What miracle has brought this about?"

"A very simple miracle; I will explain it in a moment. But will it not be delightful to see Jacques at last launched in public life, and taking part in the affairs of his country? What an effect he will make at the Tribune, with his gift of speaking and his good looks! People may say what they like, but a handsome face and figure are no small advantages for an orator."

"You think only of Jacques, and we really ought to take into consideration George's future. It is a strange life he leads here. Your plan of leaving him to himself, the little notice you ever take of him now, will, I am sure, have bad results."

"You do not, I suppose, wish me to make him a Deputy," the Count answered in a dry, sarcastic tone.

"No, of course, I do not mean that; but he is getting worse again, I am afraid, in health, and I do not know what to do, for it annoys him if I say anything about it."

"Leave him alone, my dear; I have a plan which I will tell you later. It is time now to go to dinner."

They went into the dining-room, where their two sons were waiting for them; the Countess whispered to her husband: "How dreadfully pale George looks."

"Oh, it is nothing to signify; the boy only wants cheering up."

Madame de Vedelles looked surprised, but said nothing more.

They all sat down to dinner, and the Count seemed in better spirits than he had been for a long time. "What has become of the charming Denise?" he said. "It is a long time since we have seen her."

"Three weeks," Jacques said. George reddened to the roots of his hair, and his father glanced at Jacques as much as to say, "I see you are right in your suspicions;" and then he said, "It was very pleasant having her here. I was glad to see, George, that you are not quite as unsociable as might be supposed. You seemed to enjoy Mdlle. Denise's society. Well, it is very natural; young people like to meet young people. But I wonder why you run away when visitors call. Each time that Madame Lescale and her daughter have been here, off you go like a shot. I wonder at it, for Mdlle. Rose is a remarkably pretty girl."

"Yes, I never saw such a lovely complexion," Jacques added. "She is quite a picture of youth, with her fair hair and charming little figure, her soft large blue eyes, her small hands and feet. Amongst all those dark, sallow Provençales, Mdlle. Lescaulle really looks like a fresh, blooming rose."

"Well done, Jacques," the Count said, laughing. "You have drawn a very pretty and exact picture of the young lady. And you, George, what do you think of Mdlle. Rose?"

George seemed surprised at being asked his opinion, and answered: "I don't know, I have never looked at her."

"Well, the next time she comes, look at her."

George seemed quite astonished. "Yes," the Count added, "I should like to know your opinion of her."

"I have no opinion about girls of that age," George replied in an ungracious manner. "I don't care to make acquaintance with them—they don't care to talk to me, and what does it signify to me whether Rose Lescaulle is pretty or not?"

The Count and Jacques again glanced at each other. The Countess was puzzled and did not understand what they were at. She was singularly matter of fact and had very little penetration. She did not perceive George's emotion, and only saw that there was something going on which she could not make out, and determined after dinner to ask her husband what it all meant. In the course of the evening, when they were alone, he gave her ample explanations, and informed her of his plans for both their sons.

"Jacques a deputy," he said, "and George married, will be a happy solution of the anxieties we have felt about both our children. One of our sons will plunge into the active and brilliant life that suits his talents, and the other will find a happy destiny in an obscure domestic existence, in which his want of capacity will pass unobserved."

Madame de Vedelles listened with deep attention to her husband, and seemed struck by his sagacity and the wisdom of his plans. "I entirely approve of your intentions, my dear husband," she said, "only I hope if poor George objected to what you wisely think would be for his happiness, that you will not make use of your authority to constrain his will."

"I have neither the intention nor the power of obliging him to follow my wishes, my dear Claire. My authority can only consist in the sort of influence a parent has a right to exercise, and that influence I must use. George cannot judge for himself as to what is best for his happiness. He requires to be directed, and it would be no kindness to leave him to his own foolish devices."

The Countess admitted that this was true, and on the following day George was summoned to his father's study. The Count fixed his clear sharp eyes upon him, and in an impressive manner said:

"My dear son, your mother and I have come to an important decision, and though I cannot doubt that you will be ready to accede to anything which we thought would be for your happiness, I wish to explain to you the reasons which have led us to this determination."

"What determination, father?" the young man asked in a gentle and indifferent manner.

"We are convinced that it is desirable for you to marry."

"Indeed! and who do you want me to marry?" George asked in a voice trembling with anxiety.

"Sit down there and listen to me; you will answer me afterwards."

George bowed in assent, and leaning against the corner of the bureau where his father was sitting, rested his head on his hand and remained motionless. The Count then began to relate the reasons which had made him form the plan he had in view: his conviction that a quiet and retired life of domestic happiness would suit George far better than any other; the excellent character he had heard of the young girl whom he wished him to marry, and her many attractions, the probability that whereas girls of a rank equal to his own might object to bury themselves in the country, which was evidently what his own inclinations pointed to, Rose Lescaulle would be so gratified at an alliance far beyond what she could have hoped for as to rank and fortune, that she would fall in readily with all his wishes. And then he touched on the subject of Jacques' election. A vague, half unconscious smile hovered on the lips of his son as he did so, and then the Count added—

"These family considerations would not, of course, have influenced me if this project had not helped at once to promote your brother's important interests and to secure your happiness."

"Father, my happiness—" George began in an eager tone. M. de Vedelles stopped him.

"You had promised not to interrupt me; I have not finished what I had to say to you. I knew what is in your mind, my dear boy; your mother, your brother, and myself have all guessed what are your feelings."

"Do you mean—" George said and hesitated.

"Yes, I know that you are cherishing a foolish dream, a senseless hope which can never be realized. Mdlle. de la Pinede has refused an offer of marriage from your brother, whose position in the world and whose abilities are well known. That you are much too young for her is in itself an obstacle, and even if you ceased to be so hopelessly indolent and gave up your strange ways of going on, there would not be the least chance of her accepting you. Jacques' fortune and position did not satisfy Mdlle. Denise's ambition, so you can imagine how utterly impossible it is that she should think of you. It would be an absurd folly to persist in such an illusion. You will find in Rose Lescaulle a good wife and charming companion, and once married, or even engaged to her, you will see how that other fancy will vanish like a dream."

There was no danger now of George's interrupting his father. Since the Count had mentioned Denise, his agitation had become so great that he seemed unable to utter a word. He grew pale and red, and then pale again, and when his father left off speaking walked silently towards the door.

"Well, George?" M. de Vedelles said in his sharp, decisive manner. "Now let me have your answer."

George stopped, seemed to collect his thoughts, and then murmured something his father could not catch.

"What is it you are saying?" he asked in an impatient tone, "Can't you speak?"

George turned back, and laying a cold and heavy hand on his father's arm, said, "To-morrow, father, I will speak to you."

"And why not at once, my boy?"

"No, to-morrow," George replied again, and left the room.

"Poor fellow," thought the Count, "he actually requires a whole day to find something to say on the subject. Well, I must let him have his way."

No one at the chateau knew how George spent that day. In the evening, as he had not appeared at dinner, old Vincent, uneasy at his absence, went and knocked at his door, but without result. No answer came, and after two or three renewed attempts, he came down, looking very dejected.

"M. George," he said, "is shut up in his room, and I cannot get him to unlock the door."

"Never mind, Vincent," the Count said, "M. George wishes I know, to spend the day alone; you had better not disturb him."

On the following morning very early some little shepherd boys who were carrying cheeses to Beausset, suddenly met George near Cereste, at about two leagues from La Pinede. He was coming back by the cross-road which led to Toulon. He looked pale and harassed, and was walking fast, but like a person dreaming and half unconscious. The children felt as frightened as if they had seen a ghost. In the patois of the country they whispered a few words to each other.

"I say, Jean Baptiste, did you see that man?" the youngest asked.

"He is not a man," the other gravely answered.

"I thought it was the young gentleman at La Pinede."

"Yes; but he is a Juda, and those sort of people are bewitched. On Saturday nights they hold their meetings on the hills, or sometimes on the sea-shore. Folks like that, look you, seem very quiet, and keep out of the way of everybody to hide their wickedness, which is dreadful."

"Are you sure of it?" the little one said, glancing back in affright; "and is the young gentleman really one of them?"

"Thereson has told me so, and she must know, for she says she has very often met him."

"I dare say she is right, for where could he be coming from just now, and he walked as fast as if the devil was after him?"

"Oh, he must have been at the Gorges d'Olliouilles, up there in the caverns where the witches dance at night."

"Don't let us go that way, Jean Baptiste; it is not quite light yet."

"What a goose you are! Of course we are not going that way, it would be out of our road," the other answered in a consequential tone.

George had passed the two children without noticing them. It was about six in the morning when he came home. Everybody was asleep, and he went into his room without any one seeing him. He did not appear at breakfast, and his father, anxious not to hurry him, took no notice of his absence. In the meantime he, his wife, and his eldest son discussed the subject on which their minds were running. Jacques had set his heart upon the scheme. His vanity had been wounded by Denise's refusal, and he was longing to be a Deputy, and to exhibit his talents as an orator, to rise in public life, and give the young lady reason to regret that she had declined his offer. Dazzled by this prospect, and biased by his wishes, he persuaded himself that George's marriage with the notary's daughter was really the best thing that could happen to his brother.

As to Madame de Vedelles, she felt some scruples at the idea of her husband exerting his paternal authority to force this marriage on George, whether he felt inclined to it or not, and the more so that she fancied him too timid and too helpless to fight his own battles. It seemed to her that this would be an abuse of parental power which her conscience could not sanction. The more she thought of it the more nervously anxious she became. Her mother's heart protested against the sort of moral coercion which she foresaw would be used to overcome any attempt at resistance on George's part.

The Count himself was not without some uneasiness. In spite of his strong will, and his conviction that he would be right in insisting on his son's complying with his wishes, he knew that there was a point beyond which he could not go. It was not in his power to oblige him to obey, and George's silence and seclusion made him rather afraid that he was preparing a decided resistance to the proposed marriage.

At one o'clock the door opened, and George came in. His parents and his brother all felt at that moment a secret agitation. Jacques looked anxious, M. de Vedelles troubled, and Madame de Vedelles could hardly restrain her tears.

They had on their side age, authority, conscious superiority of mind and experience; and yet, perhaps, because of a slight misgiving that they were not acting in quite a straightforward and disinterested manner, they seemed embarrassed in the presence of one whom they all deemed inferior to themselves in every respect.

George went up to M. de Vedelles, and said, "My dear father, I am quite ready to marry the person you wish me to marry."

After he had uttered those few words, it seemed as if he had exhausted his power of self-command, and sitting down on the couch near his mother, he hid his face in his hands.

M. de Vedelles breathed freely. To him the relief was great. Without a struggle, without any exercise of authority, or even persuasion his object was secured.

"That is right, my dear George," he said. "I felt convinced that you would be guided by our wishes."

Jacques was delighted, and going up to his brother warmly shook his hand. Madame de Vedelles felt a weight on her heart heavier even than if her son had made some objections, or expressed reluctance to the marriage arranged for him. She made a sign to her husband to leave her alone with George, and he and Jacques went into the next room. Then trying to take one of her son's hands in hers, she said:

"Do you really mean what you say, my dear boy? You have no dislike to the idea of marrying Mdlle. Lescalle?"

George did not answer.

"Because," his mother added with a trembling voice—for her fear of her husband's displeasure made her very nervous, though it did not prevent her from doing her duty—"if you hate the thought of this marriage, you must say so, dear child. We cannot wish to forward your brother's interests at the expense of your happiness. Come, tell me the truth, my dear George. Is it fear of your father that makes you agree to marry this young girl?"

"No, mother, it is not fear that influences me. Under other circumstances I should have refused my consent to this arrangement."

"Oh, I am glad to hear that, my dear boy. Then you have not any dislike to Rose Lescalle? You do not know her much, but I am sure you must think her pleasing—don't you?"

"I have never thought whether she is pleasing or not; I marry her because you are all bent upon it. I may as well do that as anything else. You wish me to marry, and I don't care whom I marry."

"Well, I could not have imagined that you could be as indifferent as that, George, on such a subject. Have you ever thought about it? I do not mean to say that in order to be happy together people need to be what is called in love with each other; but marriage is a very serious thing, and we ought not to feel a distaste for the person who is to be our companion for life. I want you to consider the question well, and not to act in this important matter with your usual thoughtlessness. Try to attend to what I say. You look unhappy. Do tell me the truth, George."

"All I can tell you, mother, is, that I have no dislike to that young girl. You have all agreed that I had better marry, so that if I refused to comply with my father's wishes in this case, he would soon be proposing somebody else to me. It is better to agree at once to what he wishes, and not vex him and my brother about it. Oh, my head aches dreadfully, and I cannot go on arguing on this subject. I have never gone against my father's will, much as I have often displeased and irritated him. He is determined I shall marry, and as he has chosen a wife for me, so let it be; only, please do not let us talk any more about it."

Madame de Vedelles felt sad and anxious, but said nothing more, and George felt her.

She then went into the garden, where her husband and Jacques were strolling. The latter came to meet his mother, and kissing her, said:

"Well, dear mother, how smoothly it is all going on—how obedient the dear fellow is. I suspect that at the bottom of his heart he is very much pleased."

"No, Jacques, I don't think so. He is very unhappy, and, I am afraid, very ill. I cannot get him to speak sensibly on the subject. He says he has no objection to this marriage, and yet he seems wretchedly out of spirits. But I don't think you guessed right about Denise. He never mentioned her name, did not even allude to her. His apathy is just what it has been all along, only he is much more depressed that he used to be."

"You will conjure up fears and miseries," the Count exclaimed. "The companionship of a charming young wife, and the new interests of a home of his own, will rouse him out of this morbid state of mind."

"I have never seen him look so miserable as he does to-day."

"My dear mother," Jacques said, "you will not see things as they are. He has, I have no doubt, some trouble to give up his dream of the last two months, and instead of worshipping the dark goddess at Toulon, to do homage to the fair beauty of La Ciotat. But depend upon it, the struggle will be short. Little Rose is charming, and I bet you anything that in a short time he will be enchanted with his destiny."

"God grant that you may be a true prophet," Madame de Vedelles said with a sigh.

CHAPTER XI.

DENISE'S LETTER.

Two days after the eventful decision which had given so much satisfaction to M. de Vedelles, and so much anxiety to his wife, the latter received a letter dated from the hospital at Marseilles. Seeing where it came from, she concluded it was a petition, and left it amongst others to be read and answered later in the day. It was not till some hours afterwards that she opened this letter. As soon as she had begun reading it, she glanced at the signature on the other side of the page, saw the name "Denise de la Pinede," then turning back to the first page, read as follows:

HOSPITAL CIVIL, MARSEILLES, JUNE 2.

My Dear Friend—I feel it a duty to tell you what I would certainly have mentioned to you some time ago—during some of those hours I spent first by your bedside and afterwards by your garden-chair, sharing the anxiety and then the joy of your family, and feeling for a while as if I belonged to you all, if it had not been that I was bound by a solemn promise, made to my dear father on his death-bed, not to give any one an idea of what he knew was my intention until I had attained the age of twenty-one. He was well aware that from the time I was twelve, and made my first communion, I have never had but one thought and one hope with regard to my future life, that of becoming a servant of God and the poor, a Sister of Charity of St. Vincent of Paul.

My dearest father, without absolutely objecting to my following my vocation, had misgivings and anxieties on the subject. I could not obtain his consent to my leaving him. When he felt himself dying, he spoke some beautiful and touching words of assent to God's will in that respect, though it destroyed his favorite dream that I was to marry and live at La Pinede, the ancestral home of his family. But he exacted from me a promise, as I have already said, that I should not commit myself to the life I had chosen before a year after his death, and until that time keep my resolution a profound secret.

I have told you all this, my dearest friend, to explain a silence which you might otherwise think had been injudicious and unfair. You, with whom I had so often spoken of that love which is above all loves, and in which every earthly love is absorbed and transformed, will not wonder that having heard the voice of my Lord calling me to it from the first dawn of my spiritual life, I should have never hesitated to follow that blessed summons. I often thought that you had guessed my secret. Had I not been under that impression, I should not have stayed as long as I did at La Pinede. My constant prayer will be, in my present dear home—the home of the poor and the suffering—that the days I remained under your roof may not have been spent there entirely in vain, that if unconsciously I have caused pain to one you love that it may not have been a bitter or a cruel pain, and that blessings, both earthly and heavenly, may soon heal and dissipate it.

I am only a postulant in this house, but my real postulancy began years ago in the Chapel of the Sacred Heart. Even as a child I used to promise our Lord to belong to Him, and to Him alone, and He took me at my word.

I feel bound to pray for both your sons. The honor M. Jacques has done me, and which he will now forgive me, if he has not yet done so, for refusing, binds me to remember him gratefully before God, and to ask unceasingly for him the priceless gift of faith. As to M. George, his rash vow gives me a sense of duty towards him. Sœur Denise will one day claim something good and great from him in return for her appearance in the little chapel of La Pinede.

You now understand, dearest friend, my strange request that you will keep all the relics of my dear parents in the home of my childhood. I shall never look upon them again; my home will henceforward be a hospital, or a house of charity, in France, or in China, in Turkey, or in America. Oh, the strange, the intense joy of such a farewell to all but Christ and his poor! Forgive if I cannot restrain thus my cry of gratitude. I am not selfish, dear friend. I carry you and yours in my heart, a weak and a worthless heart, but so full of ardent desire for the salvation of souls, that perhaps God will let it influence with that holy passion those it cherishes and prays for.

With respectful and kind regards to M. le Comte de Vedelles, I remain, dear Countess, your affectionate

DENISE DE LA PINEDE.

Strange as it may seem, it had never occurred to Madame de Vedelles to suspect what after all, was natural enough in one so religious and devoted as Mdlle. de la Pinede. Her vocation took her entirely by surprise; but the surprise was by no means a disagreeable one. A feeling of resentment, which her better feelings had vainly striven entirely to subdue, had been working in her heart at Denise's flat refusal of Jacques' proposal. Since, indeed, she had been led to believe that George had also fallen in love with her, she had rejoiced that the pain and embarrassment which might have ensued from such a complication had been avoided, but still she could not get over the fact that her handsome, clever, and agreeable son had met with a rebuff.

It was therefore with grateful, soothed feelings that she rejoiced over the vocation of her young friend, and the thought that the beautiful and gifted girl, who had made so deep an impression on both her sons, would be acting, as it were, the part of a guardian angel, invisibly watching over lives which, in different ways, were full of subjects of anxiety, was dear to that poor mother's heart. She took Denise's letter into the drawing-room, where her sons had been obliged to attend at the morning to the Count and M. Lescalle's discussions as to the marriage settlements; that is to say, Jacques had listened, and now and then made a suggestion or a remark. As to George, he did not appear more interested in the matter than if there had been question of the letting of a farm, or a sale of timber. At last the notary had gathered up his papers, taken up his portfolio, and departed, well satisfied with the result of his morning's work; M. de Vedelles and Jacques were talking of the election, and George lying half asleep on the couch.

The Countess came in, and sitting down at the table, said in a low voice to her husband: "Read this letter."

M. de Vedelles took it, and as he mastered the contents, his brows were raised in astonishment, and a doubtful smile hovered on his lips. But when he had finished it, he said, "Well, I respect her for it. She is acting up to her convictions. She is a brave and noble soul. I wish——"

He was beginning a sentence which he did not finish, for his eyes met those of his youngest son, fixed upon him with a strange and deep expression.

"You must read this, Jacques," he said, banding the letter to the eldest brother.

Jacques had almost got over his attachment, if it could be so called, to Mdlle. de la Pinede, but his vanity had been cruelly hurt. When it was made clear to him that she had rejected him for no other reason than the strange and, to him, the incomprehensible one that she liked better to be a Sister of Charity than the Countess de la Pinede and his wife, he felt considerably mollified and relieved. The untranslatable French ejaculation, a la bonne heure, escaped his lips, and then he added: "Oh, well, if it is le bon Dieu who is preferred to one, it may be a matter of regret, but one cannot be affronted. Don't you think so, George?"

He handed the letter carelessly to his brother, who took it in an absent and apparently listless manner, and slowly getting up from the couch, walked out of the room and across the garden, straight to the chapel. There he knelt down, and spread Denise's letter before him.

Its contents were no news to him. On that evening when he had disappeared from the family circle, and was supposed to have shut himself up in his room, he had walked all the way to Toulon. Scarcely knowing what he was going to do, he felt he must see Denise, must speak to her. If she gave him the slightest hope—no, not even hope, but if she did not laugh at his love; if she did not scout and scorn him; if she would suffer him to love her in silence, to worship her in secret; if she would take him in hand and raise him by the might of her strong faith and her ardent devotion to those higher regions of the soul to which he had felt his spirit led during her stay at La Pinede; if she would be really to him a visible guardian angel, he would resist every attempt to chain his life to that of another woman, and brave an angry father, whose will he had never resisted.

His excitement had increased with every step of that toilsome journey and, by the time he had reached the outskirts of Toulon, the transition from light to darkness, so sudden in those regions, was just taking place. He was making his way to Madame de Brissac's house with a wild, impetuous determination that he would see Denise, that he would pour forth at her feet the passionate emotions of his heart, and hear from her the words which would give him courage to face his own family, and assert his own independence. As he hurried along the street, some one tapped him on the shoulder. He turned around, and saw that it was Dr. Dubois.

"You here, M. George?" the physician said. "How are you all at La Pinede? I hope Madame la Comtesse is well, and feels no pain in her arm now. By the way, I suppose she was satisfied with the garde malade I recommended. She is a capital hand at nursing, that fair lady, and will make an excellent Sister of Charity. Not but that I think it rather a pity that such a beautiful face should be hid under a cornette, much as I love and revere that strange head-dress."

"What do you mean, Dr. Dubois?" George stammered in a nervous manner. "Does Mdlle. de la Pinede intend—"

"Intend, my good sir! she went yesterday to the hospital at Marseilles, and is at this moment, I have no doubt, already at work under the Sisters. I saw her just before her departure. No bride ever looked brighter and happier. Women are wonderful when they get what they call a vocation, and take to be saints. There is a bit of the soldier, too, in these Sisters of Charity. I like them for that. They are afraid of nothing. Good night, M. George. Give my kind respects to M. le Comte and Madame la Comtesse."

Gene!—gone for ever! Severed from him, not by a grate, or by convent walls, but by a life as hopelessly separated from his own as if an abyss had opened between them. George felt stunned, and mechanically walked on to the ramparts till he came to a bench; and there he sat looking at the sea and the starry sky with a sort of hopeless, dull dejection. None knew what had been the sufferings of his soul during the last three years.

He had led a very strange, a very lonely life, with no inward light as to his own state of mind, puzzled about himself as much as others were about him. From the moment he had seen Denise, the apathy which had so long oppressed him disappeared. His admiration—his love at first sight for her—seemed to awaken his dormant faculties. Her faith and her enthusiasm rekindled smouldering sparks which had languished in his soul. George had never lost his belief in religion, or entirely omitted its most essential duties; but since his illness he had not thought much about it. His piety, if he had any, was of the vaguest description—a sort of almost pantheistic worship of the beauties of nature—a poetical and dreamy religious feeling, such as inspired Victor Hugo in his earlier days, and Lamartine when he wrote his meditations, and had not yet indulged in wild sophistry and heretical aberrations.

But Denise's faith had struck him as something at once divine and real. During the three weeks she had spent at La Pinede the life of his soul had revived but it was only a reflected light as yet. During her absence he had suffered deeply. Her presence had been the delight, and at the same time the strength, as it were, of his existence. It was as if a blind person had for a while, in some strange manner, seen and gazed on a world new to him, and then that the light had gone out and left him in his previous darkness. But still he had lived on the memory of those days. He had looked to their renewal; he had seen bright visions, and dreamed hopeless dreams, till that moment when, sitting in the deepening shades of night, he felt the old, hard, dull feeling in his heart returning, only with a more aching oppression than before.

At last he rose, and with feverish speed retraced his steps. It was then that the little shepherds thought they saw a ghost pass them on the road: it was then that he silently slipped into his room; then that he took out of their box the toys of little Denise de la Pinede, and wept over them as a child; then that he felt careless of his own destiny, indifferent to his own life—anything then he could endure except a struggle, except another allusion to his vain love for that angel who had disappeared for ever from his sight; then that he had yielded that calm, supine consent to a marriage which could not make him more miserable than he was, and at any rate would content others.

When Denise's letter was given to him, he carried it, as we have said, into the chapel where he had last seen her. He read it on his knees, and it soothed his anguish. The idea that in prayer, at least, she would sometimes think of him, relieved the sharp pain at his heart. He rejoiced at the vow he had made. It seemed to keep up a sort of link between them. He did not pray, unless there was tacit prayer in the tears he shed in our Lord's presence, and his silent gaze at the tabernacle, which he had seen her gazing at with such ineffable love; but there came to him during those hours thoughts which made him say to his mother, when he gave her back Denise's letter, "She has chosen the better part."

CHAPTER XII.

A MISCONCEPTION.

IN the midst of the sort of moral tempest in which Rose Lescale found herself submerged, she turned towards what seemed to her a beacons light in a dark sea—the wise and tender love of her old Aunt Mede.

In the evening of the day when the scene we have described had taken place in the notary's house, she went out by a back door, walked down an alley which led to the old ramparts of La Ciotat, and then, hiding her face with her veil, and walking as fast as if she was making her escape, took the road to the Capucins.

When she arrived under the dark projection which formed a sort of porch to the old convent, she raised with a trembling hand the heavy iron latch, and, crossing a dark passage, rushed into the hall, where Mise Mede's old servant was spinning.

"Jesus, Mary! how you frightened me, mademoiselle!" Marion exclaimed, quite startled at the young lady's sudden appearance.

"Marion, where is my aunt?" Rose asked.

"Where she is now, that is difficult to say; but if Blanquette has made good use of her legs (Blanquette was the mare that dragged Mise Mede's tilted cart), she must be a good way off by this time."

"What! is my aunt gone out?"

"Gone out? she is gone away!"

"Good heavens! Gone away! Why? When?" Rose exclaimed in despair at this news.

"What happened was this, mademoiselle. Mise Mede received this morning a letter from her old cousin M. Vincent Lescale, Cure of St. Blaise. The poor dear man said he was very ill, and wanted to see her before he died. Mise said, 'I must be off,' and no sooner said than done. She stuffed six chemises and two or three jackets into a bag, ordered Blanquette to be harnessed, and off she went full trot to Marseilles on her way to St. Blaise."

"Without letting us know," Rose sighed.

"Oh, but indeed she did write a note to M. Lescale—here it is in my pocket. She told me to take it, but I thought there was no hurry. I meant to give it to Casimir the carrier, but as you are here, mademoiselle, perhaps you will take charge of it."

Rose took the letter, and in an absent manner twisted it in her fingers.

"Don't you bother yourself about that letter, mademoiselle; there is nothing in it but what I told you."

"Oh, dear me!" Rose exclaimed, "what a terrible thing this is!"

"The illness of the good Cure? But you see he is past eighty, the poor, dear old man. It is a good old age, and we can't live for ever."

"No, thank God!" Rose could not help ejaculating.

Astonished at this strange exclamation, Marion looked at her mistress' niece, and was struck at seeing her countenance so agitated. Twenty questions were rising to her lips, but unfortunately for her eager and indeed anxious curiosity, the noise of Casimir's conveyance and his own entrance into the room interrupted the conversation. Rose asked if his carriage was empty, and hearing that it was, asked him to set her down at the corner of the Rue Droite for she felt afraid of walking home alone along the beach.

"Not at your own door, Mise Rose?" Casimir asked. "I don't mind going out of my way to oblige any of Mise Mede's relations."

"No," Rose quickly replied; "put me down where I told you."

Even the carrier could not help seeing that the young lady looked unhappy, and spoke in a sharp, nervous voice. He remembered what was already the talk of the town, namely, that the notary had publicly broken off his daughter's marriage with the handsome Artemon Richer, and that Mise Rose had been crying her eyes out in consequence; and as the honest fellow handed her out of his cabriolet, and watched her until she disappeared round the corner near her father's house, he gave way to sundry inward expressions of disapprobation of the tyranny of parents and pity for Mise Mede's niece. Everything that belonged to the old lady was sacred in his eyes, and the poor carrier knew that Mise Rose was the very apple of her eye.

In the course of that evening Madame Lescalle had made one more effort in behalf of her daughter, whose grief sat heavily on her heart. The Baron de Croixfonds had left his card for M. Lescalle, and she jumped at the idea that since the Comte de Vedelles had not disdained to connect himself with them, it was not at all improbable that M. Cesaire might, after all, propose for Rose.

"He is good looking—young Croixfonds," she said; "Rose would like him much better. I am sure, than that stupid George de Vedelles"—she did not venture to say fada. "You have been too much in a hurry about this marriage, Toussaint."

"Nonsense, Virginie! You are so foolish about this sort of thing. Don't you see that we should have been obliged to give fifty thousand francs with Rose if she had married the Baron's son, whereas the de Vedelles make settlements and do not care about her fortune. It is a wonderful piece of luck, I can tell you, and your daughter will think so too when she gets over all these school-girl fancies and becomes a sensible woman."

Rose was indeed so much under the influence of what her father called her school-girl fancies that she still cherished a lingering hope that her marriage would not take place. Mise Mede was the only person capable of influencing M. Lescalle's actions, and she clung to the thought that by writing to her and letting her know what was going on she might yet escape her dreaded fate. Accordingly she sent a letter to her aunt, in which she implored her to come back as soon as possible and help her out of this hateful predicament. When this had been accomplished she felt quieter, and offered no active opposition to her father's projects.

As to M. Lescalle, he hastened affairs as much as possible, and contrived so effectually to expedite them that a week after the conditions as to settlements had been agreed upon by the two fathers, M. le Cure of La Ciotat published, on Sunday after the Pronc, the banns of marriage between M. le Baron George de Vedelles and Mademoiselle Lescalle.

The congregation was taken by surprise, and extreme was the excitement produced by this announcement. The sudden rupture with the Richers and the news of this most unexpected marriage became, of course, a general and incessant subject of conversation in the town and in the neighborhood. A party was immediately formed on the side of the Richers, which loudly attacked M. Lescalle, who was accused of sacrificing his daughter to his ambition and vanity. It was said that Rose was in love with Artemon Richer, but that her parents compelled her to marry that little idiotic Baron de Vedelles. This gave rise to all sorts of exaggerated reports and inventions, which Rose's pale and dejected countenance seemed to confirm. M. Artemon, though inwardly conscious that at any rate the first part of the story had no foundation, found it too soothing to his vanity not to encourage a belief in it. This generally accepted version of the state of the case enabled him to bear his disappointment with equanimity; and the idea that he might maintain friendly relations with Madame George de Vedelles after her marriage with a man she was sure to hate and despise kept him from openly resenting the way in which her father had behaved to him.

As to the Richer family, who were restrained by no such considerations, they were loud and bitter in their abuse of the notary.

The Croixfonds, who had also been thrown over by M. Lescalle, vented their resentment by taking part with the Richers. It was curious to see how on this occasion the representatives in La Ciotat of a penurious aristocracy and of a wealthy democracy were for the time being united by sense of common wrong. This momentary fusion of the two camps produced a somewhat formidable amount of hostility. M. Lescalle saw this very plainly, and did not like it at all. He hated a struggle. His character was peaceable as well as ambitious, and what he wanted was to carry his point without an open breach with anybody. The sensation produced by this marriage began to disquiet him, and he was particularly afraid of these drawing-room agitations reaching the ears and exciting the feelings of his electoral clients.

He knew very well that the lower classes in town and country do not easily interest themselves in discussions of this sort, but that they are capable of being roused to it if they become loud and prolonged. The circumstances were imperative; there seemed but one thing to do, and that was to hurry on the immediate conclusion of the marriage. That once accomplished, discussions would be useless, and the subject soon dropped.

With this view, he expedited all the preliminaries and preparations, alleging as his reason an argument most powerful in the eyes of the Comte de Vedelles and his eldest son, viz., the necessity of his going, without loss of time, on a round of visits to the voters in order to secure their support for Jacques de Vedelles.

When everything was ready, and then only, he wrote to Aunt Mise Mede to urge her to come back. He had taken care in his letter not to inform her fully of the state of the case. When he announced to her Rose's marriage, he spoke of his future son-in-law as the son of the Comte de Vedelles, and poor Mise Mede never had any doubt but that it was Jacques who was going to marry her darling.

The notary's position had become desperate from the moment he had burnt his ships with regard to any ordinary alliance than that with the Vedelles, and he felt it impossible to stop at half measures, so he intercepted Rose's appealing letter to her aunt, and reasoned himself into the belief that he was acting in the best way for his daughter's happiness and peace of mind. That the marriage must take place was a matter of course, and much the best thing that could happen to her. Therefore it would clearly be wrong not to prevent by every means in his power the bad effects which Aunt Mise Mede's unreasoning tenderness and her exaggerated scruples, founded on idle, groundless reports, might produce in the girl's mind.

Not hearing from Rose herself, Mise Mede said to herself; "The dear child is too full of her happiness, and too busy, I suppose, about her trousseau to write to her old aunt. Never mind, the sight of her sweet, bright face when we meet will tell me more than any letters can do."

It seemed as if fortuitous circumstances conspired to favor M. Lescalle's schemes. One morning the Mayor of La Ciotat walked into his office.

"My dear Lescalle," he said, "was it not on Thursday next that we were going to marry your daughter?"

"Yes, my dear sir; at ten o'clock on Thursday morning."

"Oh, I thought so; but I have come to ask if you would mind delaying it a little. The Prefect has written and invited me to stay with him for two days. He wants to speak to me on some important business, but I shall be home again on Saturday evening."

"Then that would put off the marriage to the following Monday?"

"Yes."

This did not at all suit M. Lescalle's views. To wait till Monday was to leave Mise Mede, who was to arrive on Wednesday night, the eve of the day fixed for the civil marriage, for four days longer to cry with and over Rose, and perhaps stir her up to resistance That would never do.

Suddenly a bright thought struck the notary's mind.

"When do you go?" he asked the Mayor.

"Wednesday evening."

"Then, how would it be if instead of postponing the marriage, we were to fix on Wednesday, instead of Thursday morning for the ceremony at the Mairie? Would that be inconvenient to you?"

"Not in the least."

"You can arrange for Wednesday?"

"Perfectly."

"Well, then, I think we shall settle upon that. I shall go at once and arrange it with M. de Vedelles."

"How will it be about Mdlle. Mede's arrival? Can you get her here in time?"

"Oh, I dare say she will be here before Wednesday: we can write to her, you know; but if by any chance she did not come in time for your part of the business. M. le Maire, she would be present at the religious function, which will take place on Thursday That, you know, is the chief thing in my Aunt Mede's eyes."

This change of days ensured the desired object. Aunt Mede would not arrive before Rose's fate was fixed, and this was a great relief to M. Lescalle.

Mise Mede had been rather surprised that such short notice had been given her of the day of the marriage. She had only been left just time to arrive in time. Her old relative had been getting better for the last fortnight. She took an affectionate leave of him, and then, with a heart as light as a young girl's, she began her homeward journey, full of joy at the idea of Rose's happiness. As she traveled from Manosque to Marseilles, and then to La Ciotat, the most delightful illusions occupied her mind.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CIVIL MARRIAGE.

"Few are the words which, once read over, totally change our existence and fix our fate in life for ever."*

This was written by an English authoress fifty years ago, when the Anglican service was the only valid form of marriage for all persons in this country, whatever might be their own religion. But simpler and yet more dry is the purely civil ceremony which in France seals, in the eye of the law, the contract linking together for ever two human destinies. It seems so easy to write one's name at the bottom of the page of a register, and to give a monosyllabic answer to the question put to one by a gentleman in black, after reading aloud a string of official sentences.

The only valid part of the great act called marriage which the law takes cognizance of, is now nothing more than a simple formality. Oh, if young people thought more of what they were doing, if they considered the irrevocable nature of those easily uttered words, of that signature so lightly given, would they not oftener hesitate in following the impulses of their own impetuous self-will, or yielding too easily to the persuasions of others? Would they not be more afraid of rushing, without prayer, without reason, without guidance, into an indissoluble union, the holiest of earthly vocations when sanctified by religion, the dreariest of bondages when unblest by human love and unsustained by the grace of the sacrament?

But youth is thoughtless; it attaches little importance to its own acts; it is prone to hope blindly, and hope makes it careless. The only undying recollections connected with the marriage ceremony, our French authoress says, are those of the religious service which consecrates it. 'Who' she asks 'remembers the Mairie where they signed their names? Who ever forgets the altar where they receive the blessing of the priest?'

Whatever may have been the inward struggles or secret despondency of George de Vedelles and Rose Lescalle they made no remark and offered no opposition when their respective parents informed them of the day fixed upon for their marriage.

As to Rose she had been hourly expecting to hear from her Aunt Mede whose continued and unaccountable silence was a perfect mystery to her. On the eve of the day fixed upon for the marriage, M. Lescalle called his daughter into his study. "Here is a letter for you, Rosette," he said, "a letter from your Aunt Mede." Rose made a joyful exclamation, eagerly took the letter, and carried it to her room, opened it with a beating heart, and read as follows:

MANOSQUE, Sunday.

My Beloved Rosette—I am delighted to hear of your marriage with M. de Vedelles. His mother is so good that I am sure her son must be good too, and if he is not yet everything we could wish in one respect, I feel sure that time and your influence will work a great change in him.

I shall arrive at La Ciotat early on Thursday morning. You can reckon upon me, my darling. Your old aunt will be near you at that happy and important moment, dear Rosette, and join her earnest prayers for your happiness to the blessing of the Church. A revoir soon, my dear child.

I remain your affectionate aunt,

MEDE LESCALLE.

This, then, was the final blow to Rose's hopes! This the answer to her impassioned pleadings. Aunt Mede actually rejoiced at her marriage, and satisfied herself with hopes of a change in the one respect in which it did not seem to her completely satisfactory. "Time and my influence!" Rose ejaculated with bitterness. "Will they change a fool into a sensible man?"

But this last disappointment, if severe, entirely deprived her of all energy. She saw no option but to submit with a dull, sad resignation.

On Wednesday morning the Comte de Vedelles' carriage, driven by a coachman in full livery, passed through the streets of La Ciotat, and attracted to their doors all the inhabitants of the little town. It stopped before the door of the Mairie, and all the family got out, Jacques first, in his best looks, smiling and gracious, and then George, pale and pensive, but without any of that feverish agitation he had shown during the previous week. Whether from indifference, or from self-command, nothing could be more simple and dignified than his manner. Every one was surprised. Those who did not know him had expected to see quite a different sort of person, and even his relatives were astonished at his composure.

The Lescalle family arrived shortly afterwards. Madame Lescalle did not attempt to conceal her self-complacent feelings. Her eyes glanced with a triumphant expression round the room. The notary tried to assume a commanding appearance. Rose, though her eyes were red, behaved very well. Her mother had told her of the report in the town, that she was breaking her heart for Artemon Richer, and this had put her on her mettle. She was resolved that nothing in her looks or manner should countenance this supposition.

Then M. le Maire came in, and stood behind the long table, covered with green cloth, which, with some wooden benches and two wicker arm-chairs, furnished the room. Wearing his red official scarf round his thin figure, and with the bust of King Louis Philippe, in white plaster, forming a background to his mild and intelligent countenance, he proceeded to perform the ceremony.

All those concerned in it felt at that moment a sort of uneasiness, and a rather troublesome sense of having taken upon themselves a serious responsibility. George and Rose, though the saddest of the party, were probably more peaceful at heart than their relatives. They were acting under obedience, and their consciences did not reproach them.

Madame de Vedelles was pale and nervous; it so happened that a minor cause of anxiety, but one which involved considerable embarrassment, was preoccupying her mind, and—such is human nature—somewhat taking off her thoughts from the solemn considerations of the moment.

It had been arranged that the Lescalle family should spend the rest of the day at La Pinede, and that on the morrow, after the religious ceremony, M. and Madame de Vedelles and Jacques, who had business to do in Paris which had been delayed on account of the wedding, would take this opportunity of going there, and leave the chateau to the young couple for their honeymoon, returning in time for the business of the election.

But that very morning the doctor, who had been sent for to see a housemaid who had been ailing for some days, had declared that she had the scarlet fever, and gave the startling intelligence that the gardener's children were all laid up with it. This had occurred just as the Count and Countess were dressing and the carriage was at the door. George had had the scarlet fever, so on his account there was no great fear, though even in that case it would scarcely have been prudent to remain in the house; but for Rose to go there was clearly impossible.

To put off the marriage at the last moment was, under the circumstances, equally out of the question, and where to send the young people the next day sadly puzzled Madame de Vedelles. She drew Madame Lescalle aside as soon as the ceremony was over, and looked so miserable that had it been before instead of after the irrevocable act had been performed, that lady would have been greatly alarmed. When the state of the case was made known to her, she of course declared that Rose, not having had the scarlet fever, could not go near La Pinede, and for a moment she paused and reflected, and looked as distressed as the Countess. But suddenly, to the inexpressible relief of both, she exclaimed—

"We have a little parillon a few miles off in the mountains, called Belbousquet, rather a pretty sort of a villa. Why should not the young couple take up their abode there?"

"By all means, Madame de Vedelles replied, brightening up. And after some conversation with the Count and M. Lescalle, and for form's sake, with George and Rose, the matter was so arranged

The sick housemaid had been secluded from the rest of the household, and no danger was feared for the de Vedelles in returning, for one night, to the chateau. But as Rose was not to go there, it was decided that the afternoon should be spent at the Capucins instead, and provisions for a cold dinner were hastily sent there. This was a very trying arrangement to Rose. The sight of the home of her happy childhood, the rooms and the gardens where she had played as a little girl at her old Aunt Mede's feet, seemed to revive all the sharpness of her sorrow, and she had the greatest possible trouble not to break down.

The hours spent there would have been more tedious but for Jacques' unceasing lively talk. It was a relief to every one to smile at his playful sallies. His vanity, which had suffered from Denise's refusal, was soothed, his prospects for the election as good as sure; Madame Lescalle not so bad after all, though she was very vulgar, and Rose, as sister-in-law, not to be at all ashamed of. So he was really in very high spirits, and showed off to great advantage.

The de Vedelles were in admiration of Mise Mede's house, of her picturesque garden, of the lovely view

"How I wish my sister had been here," M. Lescalle said, "to do, herself, the honors of her dear Capucins."

This wish was too much for Rose to hear unmoved. She rushed out of the drawing-room upon the terrace, and burst into tears.

"Why don't you go and talk to your wife a little, M. le Baron," Madame Lescalle said to George, who was turning over Mise Mede's books. "You ought to make yourself agreeable to her, and pay her a few compliments. Young ladies like that sort of thing, you know."

George took no notice of the suggestion, but when Madame Lescalle was called away by her husband to discuss some question relative to the amount of furniture at Belbousquet, he rose, went out on the terrace, and slowly walked to the place where Rose was sitting. She did not notice his approach till he was close to her. When she looked up and saw him her countenance changed; she started back with an expression of intense fear and aversion. He saw it, fixed his eyes on her for a moment, and then turned away in silence. Shortly afterwards the party broke up.

As they were standing at the door Madame Lescalle called her daughter "Madame la Baronne," and made some allusion to her having soon a carriage of her own. George heard her, and again he smiled in the same faint and unconscious manner as he had done when his father had explained the connection between his brother's election and his own marriage. Rose, who had not heard what her mother had said, noticed that strange, and to her, unmeaning smile; and her heart sank within her. As the carriage drove off she murmured to herself, "Married! and to whom?"

CHAPTER XIV.

MISE MEDE'S RETURN.

ON the following day, at about eight o'clock in the morning, Mise Mede's little conveyance, drawn by the tired Blanquette, stopped at the door of the Capucins. The good old lady deposited at home her small amount of luggage, and then with a brisk step, wonderful in a person of seventy years of age, walked to La Ciotat.

As she crossed the Place de l'Eglise, Mise Mede saw two boys carrying green branches into the church through the back door, and others spreading fine sand on the steps of the front entrance.

"It is for the marriage of Mise Rose, my children, that you are doing that?" she said.

"Yes, Mise Mede."

"This is a happy day for me, my dears. Say a prayer for my darling niece, that she may be always good and happy."

"Do, not be afraid, Mise, we won't forget to pray at mass for Mise Rose. She is such a good lady, almost as good as you, Mise."

Aunt Mede smiled kindly on the boys, and walked fast down the Rue Droite, and in two minutes more reached her nephew's house.

Madame Lescalle's maids were busily engaged in getting the rooms ready for the important occasion. All the doors and windows were open, the covers of the old-fashioned chairs and sofas were taken off for the first time for several years, and exhibited in the rays of the morning sun their faded colors and worn-out magnificence.

"Is my niece upstairs?" Mise Mede asked of the oldest of the servants, who was directing the proceedings of her subordinates.

"Oh, dear no Mise; Madame went this morning at break of day to Belbousquet where Mise Rose is going to stay with her husband. Last night Madame sent some furniture, and now she has gone off there with linen and a lot of things."

"Then the young people are not going to La Pinede?"

"They were going there, but as ill-luck would have it, Babette, the under-housemaid at the chateau, is ill of something catching, and everything is in confusion."

"Where is Rose?"

"She has not left her room yet, the poor dear child; I suppose she is still asleep."

"I shall go and see," Mise Mede said, and scrambling over a pile of cushions and a barricade of footstools, the dear old lady rushed up the stairs, delighted at the idea that she would find Rose asleep, and when her darling opened her eyes she would see her loving aunt watching the moment of her waking, and ready to give her a first kiss.

Rose's room was between her mother's bedroom and a large one in which M. Lescalle kept his papers and Madame Lescalle her pears, her quinces, and her winter grapes. This receptacle of documents and provisions Mise Mede passed through, and opened the door of Rose's room. Struck with painful surprise, she stood on the threshold, dismayed and astonished at the sight which met her eyes, such a different one to what she had expected.

Rose's room, which was wont to be always tidy and nicely arranged, was all in disorder. Portions of a magnificent trousseau covered the chairs and part of the floor, lace and ribbons and embroidered dresses were lying about in a strange state of confusion.

A large open drawer, where Rose kept her clothes carefully folded up, contained all the modest little wardrobe of her school-days. By the side of the coarse linen and plain frocks and collars of this scanty trousseau, were lying books with worn-out covers, and soiled pieces of music, also some of those small things which have no value except as souvenirs—a little faded velvet pocket-book made by a favorite companion, the blue ribbons attached to the wreath won at the last distribution of prizes a little image of the Blessed Virgin inclosed in an ivory case. Two cashmere shawls and several pieces of silk for gowns covered the bed in the corner of the room. But it was evident that it had not been slept in.

Rose was indeed asleep when Mise Mede opened the door but not in her bed. She was half kneeling and half sitting on the step of a wooden prie-dieu still holding in her hand her little rosary. Her other arm was resting on a chair covered with lace and embroidered pocket-handkerchiefs. Sleep had surprised her in this attitude, her head was lying on her arm and her black and beautiful hair covering a part of her face and of her white dressing gown. She was dozing in that uncomfortable position, like a child fallen asleep in the midst of its tears: sobs now and again heaved her breast. She looked such a picture of oveliness and grief that even a stranger would have been touched at the sight of that fair young creature, in the height of her beauty and her youth, thus weighed down by grief. What must that sight have been to Aunt Mede!

She went up to the young girl and tried gently to raise her up and lay her on her bed. Rose awoke, opened her large blue eyes swelled with crying, and when she saw her aunt, started up and threw herself into her arms with a sort of half-loving, half-despairing embrace.

"What is the matter, my Rosette?" the good old lady said. "What makes you weep so my child?"

"Oh, Aunt Mede, Aunt Mede!" Rose exclaimed, struggling with her sobs.

But what has happened, my darling? Is your marriage broken off?"

"Oh, no, no; would to God it was! It took place yesterday."

"Yesterday?"

"Yes, yesterday—oh, it is dreadful!"

"But I don't understand what you mean, my darling. I passed before the church just now and saw the preparations going on."

"Oh, yes, at the church—but I was married yesterday at the Mairie. Oh, my dear dear aunt, why did you not come back sooner? I had begged you so hard in my letter to come back."

"In your letter? I never had a letter from you, my child. What did you say in it?"

"I said all I could, Aunt Mede. I implored you to come and help me—to save me—now it is too late. Oh, dear, oh, dear, I am so wretched!" and Rose wept as if her heart would break.

Mise Mede felt more and more perplexed.

"Did you cry like this yesterday, my darling?"

"No, yesterday pride gave me a sort of courage. I would not let people see how unhappy I was. Mamma had told me that they would say I cared for M. Artemon, and I could not bear that any one should think so, for I did not at all wish to marry him. So I made a great effort, and did not show what I felt. It was when I came back here last night that all my grief returned. I spent a part of the night in arranging my things. It seemed like saying good-bye to my life as a girl. This brought to my mind my happy school-days, and all the plans and hopes I had about the future."

"And why does the future appear so sad to you, dear child?"

"Oh, my dear aunt, now you know my fate is fixed, I can never look to being happy any more. This made me cry so much that I thought my eyes would be blinded by so many tears. How odd it is, dear aunt, that one is able to shed so many tears!"

"Poor child!" Mise Mede said. "At your age tears flow easily and plentifully, the font is not dried up. Later in life we suffer more, but we do not weep so much."

"Then at last I had a good thought—I tried to pray. I prayed very earnestly, and I think God heard me and had pity upon me, for He made me fall asleep. Just now when I awoke and saw you, I thought for an instant that my marriage was only a bad dream. But now it all comes back upon me, and I know it is irrevocable. I can never, never be happy again."

Mise Mede had not interrupted Rose, in hopes that she would say something that would account for her sorrow and despair. But when her niece left off speaking, she was as puzzled as ever as to the cause of all this misery, and said with a sigh—

"Dear me, my child, what a disappointment this is. I thought you liked M. de Vedettes?"

"Oh, Aunt Mede, I hate him!"

"But what has he done, my child, to make you hate him?"

"I feel an aversion to him, and a sort of fear."

"How very strange! You praised him so much that first day when you had seen him at La Pinède."

"I praise him: No, on the contrary. Whenever I have seen him I was struck with his gloomy, unpleasant countenance."

Indeed your mother said M. Jacques was so pleasing."

Good heavens! Rose exclaimed; "whom are you talking of, Aunt Mede? Don't you know it is M. George I have married—the other one—the judu?"

Mise Mede was thunderstruck. M. Lescalles ingenious contrivances had completely succeeded. The idea that Rose was to be married to George de Vedettes, to that strange, helpless, stupid young man whom she had never heard mentioned but with a smile of pity had never even entered her head. After the first moment of painful astonishment, this sudden information produced in Mlle. Lescalle a transport of impetuous indignation and anger. She rose without uttering a word, and walked towards the door. The impulse of her heart was to go and upbraid her nephew with the full force of her indignant and outraged feelings, for the unjustifiable manner in which he had acted towards his daughter.

But long habits of self-control, the constant sense of God's presence which had become the habit of her soul, the daily practice of submitting her every thought, word, and act to that Divine will which was the rule of her life, enabled her even amidst the tumultuous impulses of affection, grief, and indignation which like surging waves rose in her heart, to pause and ask herself what, in that terrible moment, was her duty to God and to her wronged and beloved child.

Her sound practical sense, sustained by her religious principles enabled her to see at once that, as what had been done was irrevocable—though it might relieve her bursting heart to charge Rose's parents for what she felt to be a sin, though they did not see it in that light—that it would neither improve the position nor assuage the sorrow of her injured niece. The impulse was conquered. The anger, which like a lightning flash had convulsed her frame and blanched her cheek, was subdued under the eye of Him whom in that hour she ardently invoked, and then she set herself to the task which she knew He assigned to her—the attempt to soothe, to strengthen, and to elevate that despairing young heart, so rudely dealt with by those who yet loved their child in their own way.

She came back to her niece, took her on her knees as she used to do when she was a little child, and kissing that sweet, pale, and tearful face, she said in the tenderest and most earnest manner—

"My own Rose, I am grieved to the heart now that I know the reason of your sorrow. I suffer with you, my darling, and I lament what has been done."

"Oh, I knew you would, dear, good aunt that you are. You, at least, love me."

"Try not to blame your parents, my child; they fancied they were acting rightly and for your advantage, only they do not understand what you and I mean by happiness. The whole misfortune comes from that. Now the thing is done, and I want you, my darling, to listen to what my earnest affection for my dear child wishes to make her feel.

"You must not give way, my own Rose, to this sort of despair. You must accept your fate with courageous resignation, and see if it is not possible to look on the future in a better light. You have now ceased to be a child. Yesterday's ceremony made you a woman, and you must try to be a good and sensible one. Instead of looking back with regret and despondency, fix your eyes dispassionately on the future. Depen upon it, Rose, on one who has duties to perform, and a loving heart, need be really unhappy. I know that at your age it is difficult to be satisfied with but a tolerable sort of existence. You had fancied that you were to be, one day, intensely happy. You think that this can never now be the case, and your fate seems to you a very hard and extraordinary one. My dear child, the happiness you had pictured to yourself is of very rare occurrence. Those who have a strong power of loving do not often meet with a return, and it is perhaps still more terrible to lose a blessing once possessed than never to have had it.

"Many and many women have seen their hopes and their joys vanish before they had scarcely been realized. They have had to say to themselves, 'It is for ever at an end, that romantic bliss I thought I had secured.' They have felt as if it would be impossible to live without it, but they have done without it, and found in life a fair share of happiness. There are in your destiny some compensations."

"You are not going, Aunt Mede, to speak to me—like mamma—of my carriage and my gowns," Rose bitterly exclaimed, spurning with her little foot the lace trimmings of her wedding dress.

"No, my child; what I allude to are higher and better consolations than those. I want you to think of the duties which the sacrament of marriage imposes upon Catholic Christians, and the blessings attached to it. I wish you to reflect upon the particular duties you are called upon to perform. From this day forward an important task is assigned to you, young as you are, and a great responsibility. The ordinary course of things is somewhat reversed in your case. Instead of becoming the wife of a man who could guide and direct you, it is your lot to be married to one whom you will have to watch over, to lead, to take care of. My child, there is something sacred in such a mission. It is a holy duty assigned to a woman to be a kind of guardian angel to one weaker, in every respect, than herself. Yesterday you were a child—a thoughtless girl. To-day you will begin to be your husband's protector, his counselor, and his friend. You will be to him what his mother has been. You will teach him how sweet it is to be cared for, and to care for others. And who knows, his heart and his mind may expand in the genial atmosphere of domestic happiness, and you may be rewarded by witnessing a great change in his moral and mental state. Love—the love which springs from the highest of principles and the most sacred of duties, is a great worker of miracles; but in any case there is not a higher, or a sweeter mission, than to bind the wounds of the heart. Infinite graces, heavenly blessings without number, descend upon those who devote themselves to this task. Believe me, dearest Rose, those who make sacrifices to duty, who accept the chalice which the will of their Father in heaven holds to their lips, and carry their cross with courage after their suffering Lord, know deeper and truer joys than those of selfish or worldly souls, who think of nothing but their own enjoyments."

Seeing that Rose was listening to her attentively, Mise Mede's hopes increased of finding in her niece capabilities for the sort of heroic virtue which alone can stimulate the soul to look upon life and its trials in a supernatural point of view, and lift it up high enough to accept, almost with joy, an exceptional destiny. Encouraged by this hope, she became eloquent, as people always are when intimately persuaded of a truth themselves, and ardently desirous to impart to others a holy enthusiasm in the right direction.

She did not even allude to the sorry advantages of fortune and rank, but continued to touch the chord which had found an echo in the heart of the young bride.

It is wonderful how some natures find relief in the midst of very severe trials by a view placed before them of their own position in a light which had never struck them, and which responds to their intuitive and undeveloped aspirations.

After two hours' conversation with her Aunt, Rose was no longer like the same person, and when Madame Lescaille arrived, and came into her room to superintend her daughter's toilette, she was immediately surprised at the change in her countenance. She looked serene and calm, and there were no tears in her eyes.

"Dear me, Rosette," she said, quite pleased, "how much more cheerful you look. Oh, I have always said that M. le Maire has a gift for changing the mood of romantic young ladies."

"No, dear mamma. It is not M. le Maire who has this gift, but my Aunt Mede possesses it. She has said to me things this morning, which have strengthened and encouraged me."

"Oh, true. There you are, Aunt Mede, just arrived in time. I did not see you at first. You must excuse me. I am so flurried. You see I had to go to Belbousquet early this morning. Everything was to be ready by this afternoon, you know. Oh, dear, and now that I think of it, I forgot the crockery. There is not half enough at the pavilion. What can be done? How will the poor children manage?"

"I can send some," Mise Mede answered, "and everything else that may be wanted."

"That is indeed kind of you, Aunt Mede. I dare say I have forgotten a great many things. On such a day as this one is apt to lose one's head."

"I am afraid, my dear Virginie, that you and your husband have strangely lost your heads since I went away," Mise Mede said in a grave and sorrowful manner; and taking advantage of Rose having been taken possession of by Thereson and seated before the glass in another part of the room, she added, "My advice has not been asked, nor my wishes consulted. What is done is of course irrevocable, and therefore reproaches would be superfluous. But," she continued, with two tears rolling slowly down her wrinkled cheeks, "it will be no easy task, I can tell you, to reconcile this dear child to her lot. You have very hastily disposed of the destiny of such a charming girl. Rose is affectionate and not vain. It would have been far better to have given her to a low-born, but honest and loving husband, than to your melancholy and morose Baron."

Madame Lescaille listened in silence to Aunt Mede's observations, and not feeling able to reply to them, she thought the best thing to do was to break off the conversation. Glancing at the clock, she exclaimed with affected surprise—

"Good heavens! how late it is. We have very little time left. Ought you not to go home and dress, Aunt Mede?"

"My toilette will not take much time. You need not be anxious about it, my niece. At what hour do we go to church?"

"At eleven."

"I shall be in time," and then Mise Mede kissed Rose, and with a look which conveyed all the love and all the encouragement which a look can convey, she departed.

With heavy and lingering steps she walked along the road she had so briskly and rapidly trod that very morning. The weight of her age seemed doubled by a load of grief which put to the severest test her strength of soul and Christian resignation.

At eleven the relatives and friends of the family assembled in the notary's drawing-room, and then proceeded to the church. Everything went off very well. Those who had flocked there in hopes of witnessing something out of the common way, were disappointed. George looked, as usual, very pale, but was perfectly calm. Rose was quite composed, and did not at all look like a girl married against her will.

The Richer family, who had gone to the church, rather expecting a scene, even perhaps that the bride would faint, could not report any particular appearance of emotion to Artemon. He was rather affronted that what he called "the execution" had passed of so quietly.

"After all," he said, "the girl is only a pretty doll, at this moment under the delightful influence of cashmeres and trinkets. We shall see how long this resignation will last." And then he walked off to the Estaminet de la Marine, and played a pool at billiards.

Three persons had been praying very hard during the ceremony: M<sup>lle</sup> Mede, who continued to command her feelings till it was over, but who afterwards nearly fainted away in the sacristy; Madame de Vedelles, who, in spite of the smoothness with which everything had gone on, felt anxious misgivings as to the future, and poor old Vincent, who had never been able to make up his mind to wish his young master joy of his marriage, partly because he had been looking as sad, if not sadder, than usual since it had been announced, and partly because he disapproved of what he considered a mesalliance, and thought it a great shame to have married the Baron George to the daughter of a notary, in a wretched little provincial town.

He had declared that his old legs would not carry him to the church that morning, and declined the offer of a seat in M. de Vedelles' second carriage. But still, after all, Vincent was there, his grey head bowed down in prayer during the service, and when the young people drove away after the marriage breakfast, his eyes followed the cateche as it went down the Rue Droite. With a thoughtful expression, and with his hands behind his back, he walked back to La Pinede, whence the Count, the Countess, and Jacques departed that evening for Paris.

CHAPTER XV.

BELBOUSQUET.

BELBOUSQUET would have been the beau-ideal of a place for a happy honeymoon. The little villa was situated amidst the hills, in a most beautiful position. In M. Lescalle's bachelor days it had been—during the holidays—a resort for himself and his friends. Many a jovial and rather a riotous party had made it a scene of festivity. But when he married, the shooting lodge was turned into a country house, and he had intended to spend there part of the summers, but Madame Lescalle would not hear of it. She declared that nothing would induce her to inhabit such a desert, and seclude herself from the social resources of La Ciotat. Every year she came there for one week, in order to superintend the vintage and the gathering in of the olives, and thought those days the most tedious of the whole year.

Like many women accustomed to the narrow atmosphere of a small provincial town, Madame Lescalle hated the country. Nature had no charms whatever for her. At La Ciotat, her house had a rather large garden, but she never set her foot in it. Two dozen hens, old Thereson's special favorites, took possession of it, and the maids, on washing days, used it as a drying yard.

Madame Lescalle piqued herself on being an excellent house-keeper, and had no idea of losing her time in taking walks. It was quite exercise enough for her to worry her servants, and ascend and descend thirty times a day the stairs which led from her drawing-room to her kitchen. On Sunday she almost always walked for half an hour on the Tasse, not indeed to enjoy the magnificent view of the sea, but to meet people, which meant from twenty to thirty persons, whose faces, and generally speaking, their gowns, were familiar to her. These acquaintances met, bowed, or conversed on the event of the week, whatever it happened to be.

As to the young people who were now going to stay at Belbousquet, neither of them had objected to the proposed arrangement. In George's state of mind, he would have acquiesced in anything which saved him the trouble of a discussion, and Rose rather preferred to be out of the way of her mother's gossiping friends.

Belbousquet owed its name to a grove of ilexes, planes, and beam trees, kept constantly green and cool by a pretty stream of very clear water, which flowed from a rock at the top of the hill. All sorts of gay plants and flowering shrubs lined its banks instead of the dusty hollies and stunted pines which generally grow on the hills of Provence. The house was small, flat-roofed, and covered with red rounded tiles. The shutterless windows were protected from the sun by white linen awnings. Those of the ground floor opened on a veranda, around the pillars of which a magnificent vine entwined its boughs and rich foliage. That red roof, those white awnings, and that festooning vine gave to this little abode the appearance of a tiny Italian villa.

For many years its only inhabitant had been an old and very intelligent gardener, who had at last arrived at thinking himself sole master of the place. This feeling led him to take more pains in improving the garden than if he had been under the impression that he was working for other people. Thanks to the brook, he had succeeded in surrounding the grounds with those shady covered green walks which are called charmilles in France, taises in Provence, pleached bowers in Shakespeare's plays—charming retreats which attract imprudent birds, and leave them at the mercy of Provencal shooters. But the winged denizens of the taises of Belbousquet had nothing to fear, and in the spring their concerts were so sweet and loud that it was quite a pity that they should have been so long wasted on the desert air, or the equally insensible ears of old Simon.

One day Madame Lescalle took it into her head that the grass on the hill of Belbousquet could very well feed half a dozen goats, and that their milk and cheese would be profitable to her menage. So she bought the six goats, sent them to her country house, and desired Simon to look after the said animals, and make the most of them. This did not at all suit the old man. He uttered such loud and incessant complaints that he bored his mistress into allowing him four francs a month to pay a girl to attend to them. Even this was not easily managed, for the wages seemed scanty enough even at La Ciotat. For some weeks Master Simon was obliged to take care of the goats himself, and he so earnestly set about it by kicking and ill-using them, that the poor beasts would soon have given him no further trouble if a woman from Cereste had not brought one day to Belbousquet a candidate for the situation. This individual was a little girl between eleven and twelve, called Benoitte, who had never done anything in her life but look after goats. Old Simon engaged her at once.

Little Benoitte was as wild, as simple, and lively as her own goats. From the age of three or four she had lived in solitude in the mountains, and cared only for the sky, for the clouds, for the brook, and the wild flowers. She loved the birds that she had taught to feed out of her hand, and the insects that buzzed over the wild thyme, and the squirrels that jumped from one branch to another; but as to people, she knew as little of them as possible, and was the most untaught, strangest, and yet cleverest little creature imaginable. As shy as a fawn, afraid of nothing in the mountains, she did not mind sleeping on beds of leaves, and spending the night sometimes in caves on the hill side quite alone, but not for the world would she have ventured on the high road or into La Ciotat.

The old gardener and the little savage got on well together, but scarcely exchanged ten words in the course of a week. He used to get up at break of day, but even before he appeared in the garden Benoitte and her goats were off to the mountains. And at night both were so tired that they hastened to retire, he to his little room, hung round with garlands of onions, and she to her bed of dry leaves in the garret.

To supply for the deficiencies of this very primitive household, the active Thereson had volunteered to accompany the newly-married pair, and bury herself in that solitude. Having been in the house before Rose's birth, she felt herself called upon, she said, to give her this proof of attachment.

Very few words had been spoken by George and Rose as they drove from La Ciotat to Belbousquet. He had asked one or two questions as to the environs of the villa, and remarked on the beauty of the country. She had spoken of the fineness of the day, and mentioned the names of some of the villages they passed through.

When they arrived at Belbousquet, she went into the little drawing-room, and he followed her. She seated herself at the window, and looked at the flower-beds. He stood for a moment before the chimney fitted with evergreens, and then going up to Rose, gave her a letter, addressed to Madame la Baronne George de Vedelles, and then went out of the house, and walked up the little path skirting the brook.

Rose felt strangely surprised at his writing her letter. What could be its contents, its purport? She looked at the handwriting. It was firm and distinct: nothing childish or uncertain about it. She was almost afraid of opening it, though she longed to do so. Perhaps it was a bit of nonsense, a hoax, or perhaps it was not from him. His mother had, may be, written to her some advice or some kind words, and intrusted him with the letter. At last she unsealed the envelope, and read as follows:

We have been united by the will of our parents. It is not our business to question the wisdom of their acts. I fancy that on both sides the object in view has been attained: my brother will be a deputy, and you are Madame la Baronne de Vedelles, with all the advantages, whatever they may be, that this title secures.

Two days ago I expected that our lives would be spent much in the same way that many other people spend theirs whose destiny has not been left to their own choice. I was prepared to find in you all the good and amiable qualities which you are said to possess, and which I am convinced you do possess, and I fully intend to try to make you as happy as under the circumstances it was possible for you to be. My own faults and deficiencies, which I am but too conscious of, I hoped to make up for by kindness and constant attention to your wishes. These were my thoughts and ideas when I left the Mairie, where we had been irrevocably united in the eyes of the law, and such they remained until a moment which you must remember, one which decided our whole future. You had left the drawing-room at Les Capucins in tears, and I saw you sitting alone on the terrace in an attitude of great despondency. After some hesitation I followed you. Your preoccupation was so great that you did not notice my approach till I came near you. You turned round, and then in your young face I perceived such unmistakable tokens of fear, aversion, and of contempt, that I saw at once that you loathed the very sight of me. I can never forget that look. From that moment my mind was irrevocably made up. As irrevocable as our apparent union, is my determination never to oblige you—nay, never to suffer you to consider me as your husband, save in exterior appearance, and that only for a short time. I own that it was almost a relief to me when your mother more than hinted, at a subsequent period of the day, that my title and my father's liberality compensated for my own demerits. I felt that I could leave you for ever to enjoy those advantages, unbarthered with the presence and the society of one whom you hate and despise.

I suppose you will agree with me that in order to spare the feelings of our respective families and save them annoyance, which I think we should both wish to do, however mistaken has been their line of conduct in our regard, it will be desirable for both of us to inhabit this house for a short time, but I solemnly promise that I shall inflict as little of my society as possible on you, and that very soon I shall take my departure for ever. The blame of the separation will rest with me. Once effected, I shall communicate my decision to my father, and make arrangements to settle on you two-thirds of my income whilst I live; your jointure is secured by our marriage settlement.

Should you wish me to go away at once I am ready to do so. You have only to write to me a note to that effect. If you do not write I shall conclude that you assent to my remaining here a short time—on as distant a footing as the most perfect stranger. I earnestly wish I could restore to you your liberty, but as that is not in my power, I earnestly hope that you may find happiness in the society of your family and friends and the innocent pleasures of the world, which your position will enable you to enjoy.

GEORGE DE VEDELLES.

Astonished almost to bewilderment, Rose held this letter in her hand, trying to understand her own feelings, and to define them.

Could the person who had written it be the weak-headed young man whom people had described as deficient in ordinary capacity, and unable to take care of himself? What was she to think of his determination? Was it a right or a wrong one? Ought she to feel glad or sorry? Was it a great relief or not? Was it true that she had shown him the aversion she felt for him? She questioned her conscience and her memory, and both reminded her of the inward feeling which had, it seemed, manifested itself so visibly and so offensively, and, as he said, decided the whole of their future existence.

Had this announcement been made to her the day before, she would have felt indeed startled at the idea of all that was involved in it, but relief would have been her chief sensation. But since her conversation that morning with Aunt Mede, a change had come over her spirit. She had enthusiastically accepted the idea of sacrifice and self-devotion presented to her. She had dwelt on the thought of being a guardian angel, and it was a somewhat abrupt transition to be discarded as a worldly creature, who had married for the sake of position and fortune, to be abandoned by the person to whom she had meant to devote herself. The situation was altogether changed; Aunt Mede's advice and exhortations no longer applied, and Rose sat with her head leaning on her hand, feeling as if she was in a dream, and longing to be awakened.

"Of course," she thought, "I cannot write and tell him to go away at once, and have Thereson sending for papa and mamma and throwing every one into an agitation. I never can ask him to change his mind as to this resolution, he speaks so determinately, and after all it is not my fault, and in some ways I shall be much happier if he does go away and leave me, strange, extraordinary being that he is. I suppose I did look at him in a way that must have made a man very angry; somehow I never thought he would perceive or feel it. And then mamma talking in that way to him! One thing I know, I will not have any of his money, and I wish I could give up being called Madame la Baronne. Perhaps I shall write to-morrow to Aunt Mede, and ask her to advise me, or perhaps I shall put it off for two or three days and see what happens."

Nothing happened, George went out with his gun early in the morning, and followed by his dog Wasp, wandered about the hills and woods as he used to do at La Pinède. Rose sat in the drawing-room with some work in her hands, or strolled in the garden gathering flowers which she afterwards threw away. They met for meals, and then said a few words to each other in a cold and constrained manner, and Rose wondered how long this sort of life was to last, and whether he would go away without giving her any further notice of his departure. Every morning she took up her pen to write to Aunt Mede, but a strange nervousness made her put it off from day to day.

One evening she met George coming into the hall with his game-bag in his hand, which seemed quite full.

"You have been successful to-day," she said, glancing at his bag.

"No," he answered, "I have not killed anything to-day," and then went up the stairs.

"Not killed anything," she thought to herself; "and what then, I wonder, does he carry in that bag," and glancing around her to see that she was alone, she peeped into it, and to her surprise saw that, instead of birds and rabbits, it contained books. Hearing footsteps in the passage, she hastily went into the drawing-room, but not before she had ascertained that one of those books was a volume of Shakespeare's plays, and another the life of St. Dominic, by Lacordaire.

"What did it mean?" she asked herself; "does he read during those long hours he spends in the woods? Shall I ask him if he is fond of books? He never seems inclined to talk to me of anything interesting. I feel so like a fool when we are sitting opposite to each other at dinner. If it was only out of curiosity I should like very much to converse a little with him; but I am so afraid of seeming to wish to detain him here after that strange letter and his irrevocable resolution, that I am the first to leave the room when our meals are ended."

Sunday came, and Rose wondered what George intended to do about going to church. "She said to him the evening before:

"Mass is at nine o'clock at the parish church."

"Yes," he answered; "but I mean to hear mass at Cereste at six o'clock in the morning, and to walk afterwards across the hills to St. Laurent. If you will excuse me, I shall not come home for dinner; Benoit's mother will give me something to eat."

Rose felt sad, and as she walked to the village church, about half a mile from Belbousquet, a strange sort of depression came over her, very different from all she had suffered before.

She was not satisfied with herself, and yet she hardly knew that she had cause for self-reproach. The future seemed so indefinite. It almost appeared as if she ought to be glad of the change in her destiny. Had she not told her parents, and believed it, that her wish was to remain unmarried and live with them; and would not Aunt Mede be glad to get back her child? But the more she put into shape the prospect before her, the more her despondency increased. Prayer did not comfort her, for she did not know what to pray for. She had no wishes, and she did not know how she ought to act. Still she felt an insuperable dislike to the idea of speaking of George's letter, even to Aunt Mede. As to her parents, she never could tell them of it. If the separation took place, they would hear of it from others, not from her.

She heard mass, and listened to the cure's prone, with a dull, heavy weight on her heart. When she returned to the silent house where she was spending so many hours alone, she caught herself throughout the day looking somewhat anxiously down the avenue to watch for George's return—and when she heard his step in the hall, was angry with herself for being pleased he was come back.

He was very tired with his long excursion, said his head ached, ate little at supper, and soon afterwards went to his room. She longed to ask him if she could get him anything for his headache, a cup of strong coffee, or what in Provence they called an infusion of tea; but her shyness with him had become so great that she could not bring herself to say even the commonest things in an ordinary manner, and she lost the opportunity of showing him this trifling attention. She did indeed desire Thereson to go and ask him if he wished for anything. The commission was executed, but in a very ungracious manner. Thereson not unnaturally had taken a great dislike to George. She considered him still in her own mind as a fada, and moreover, a very cross and disagreeable one, and when she looked at Miss Rose's sad, pensive countenance, the diminution of her bloom, and the black hue under her eyes, she often felt a strong rising desire to do some bodily harm to M. le Baron, which word she always pronounced with intense contempt, or at any rate to give him a peace of her mind.

Two or three days later, Rose was sitting at the window of her bed-room, which looked on the road, wondering whether any one would come to see her that day. She expected her mother's visit on the following Thursday, that had been agreed upon when she left home, but Aunt Mede or her father might be coming. She dreaded the thought of it, but still longed for something to break the sort of spell that seemed to hang over her.

These musings were interrupted by the loud barking of George's dog. She raised her head, which had been resting on both her hands, and looked eagerly at the road. Perhaps some one was arriving. Not but there was Benoit standing near the gate with a great load of grass on her herd. She was vainly trying to collect together her scattered goats, frightened by Wasp's barking—they were rushing about in every direction. The child laid down her burthen, and running after the terrified animals chased them one after another and drove them into the stable. She then tried to replace the heap of grass on her head, but exhausted and breathless with the efforts she had made to re-assemble her flock, twice she failed in her attempt to raise it, and down fell the grass at her feet.

George arrived at that moment, and seeing the little girl's dis-

ress, he helped her to lift up the load and to balance it on her head, and walking slowly by her side he said a few words to her. Benoit answered and they continued to converse. Rose could not hear what they said, but she watched their countenances and was surprised to see that when they came into the garden, they still went on talking.

The child stood leaning against a maple tree, and George, leaning on his gun, stood listening to her chattering with evident interest and pleasure. Once or twice he smiled kindly as he spoke to the child, and that smile on his pale, melancholy face was like a ray of sunshine on a sad landscape. Rose was struck with the expression which that smile gave to his countenance. She had, strange to say, never looked attentively at George till then. Before their wedding-day, aversion, and, since she received his letter, an unconquerable shyness, had prevented her from fixing her eyes upon him. For the first time she was looking at him without fear of being seen, and as he stood there talking with Benoit, she watched him with intense attention.

It struck her that his features were regular and refined, his hands white and well-shaped, and his figure graceful.

"If he was more like other people," she thought, "he would be very handsome." At that moment Thereson came into the room, and observing that her young mistress was noticing the conversation going on in the garden, she said—

"Ah! there is M. le Baron talking again to Benoit."

"Oh, he takes notice of her, does he?" Rose said, trying to look indifferent.

"Oh, dear, yes! M. le Baron, who has not a word to throw to a dog in this house, often favors Benoit with his society."

"I wonder what she can be telling him that seems to interest him so much?"

"Oh, for that matter, I suppose like takes to like. She is a queer wild imp whom nobody would care to talk to but a . . . I mean a sort of gentleman like M. le Baron. She is half crazy, is Benoit. You never knew such a head as that child has got. Always full of ideas without head or tail, which she strings together and makes songs of, and then she speaks of flowers as if they were people and of birds as if they were Christians; and she is as obstinate and as perverse as a wild cat. And there was M. le Baron yesterday telling her a tale about fairies, and showing her some shells. I don't know where he got them from. I declare it can only be the likes of such a little savage as that who could tame her."

Thereson, working herself up to a state of indignation, was on the point of giving vent to all the anger with which she was bursting against George de Vedelles, but Rose cut her short, and said in a dry manner—

"That will do. It is not your business to criticise what M. de Vedelles does."

"Oh, if madame is satisfied with the life that she leads here, I have nothing to say against it," and Thereson folded her hands in an attitude of resignation.

Rose, to change the subject, asked: "What is that case I saw Simon and the wagoner carrying up stairs yesterday?"

"Does not madame know? It comes from Paris and was sent to La Pinede. M. Vincent sent it on here. M. le Baron had it opened early this morning, and spent some time taking out the books that were in it. The floor of his room is covered with them. Such a mess as it is in! All the straw and brown paper and string thrown about. Did not madame hear the noise he made stamping up and down whilst he unpacked them?"

"No, I slept very late; I had a bad night, and felt tired."

"I am sure I don't wonder at that, or at your looking ill, Miss Rose."

"I am not ill; the air of this place is very healthy."

"The air indeed, oh, I dare say; I am not talking of the air."

"I think you had better go and look after the dinner now. M. de Vedelles is coming in."

CHAPTER XVI.

A CRISIS.

ZON understood that this was a hint to hold her tongue and leave the room. She went down to the kitchen, and, once there in her own domain allowed herself the relief of speaking out her mind to old Simon. She had already told him a great many things during the hour he sat every evening cooking his onion soup and frying the eggs for his supper at the corner of the stove.

The aged gardener proved a very safe confidant. He was as deaf as a post, but knew how to make up for the answers—not generally to the purpose—which he made to the communications addressed to him, by a play of countenance expressing alternately assent and surprise, in a way which generally satisfied his loquacious companion. So she abused George to her heart's content, declared that she was not going to allow Mise Rose to be snubbed by a good-for-nothing, ill brought-up fada of a Baron, who preferred the society of a half-witted creature like Benoit to that of his own wife, the most charming girl in the whole country. This should not go on. She would tell her parents how ill he behaved to her, and, shaking violently her saucepan, in which she was making a favorite dish of the country, called a bouille-abaisse, she, for the first time in her life, spoilt it. This did not improve her temper, and, whilst waiting at dinner, she darted angry glances at the unconscious and silent George.

That day, as she sat opposite to him at the little table where they had their meals, Rose could not help now and then raising her eyes to his face and contrasting its sad and indifferent expression with the animation and the smiles she had noticed when he was talking to Benoit.

After dinner, the post, which only reached Belbousquet three times a week, brought some letters and newspapers to George, and a note from Madame Lescalle to her daughter, in which she said that M. Lescalle had taken the horse and chaise for a two or three days' excursion to see some of his clients and canvass them in favor of Jacques de Vedelles, and she should therefore delay a little her visit. Rose had written two days before to her mother a letter, in which, without saying anything untrue, she had managed to make it appear that she was well and happy. She had dwelt on the charms of the villa, and described how much M. de Vedelles admired the country. What long walks they took. She did not say that each went out alone. And then she praised Thereson and said how comfortable she made them.

Madame Lescalle, finding all was going on so smoothly, thought it better to leave them, for the present, to themselves. Mise Mede, to whom she showed the letter, was of the same opinion, and so, to Thereson's great disappointment, no visitors appeared.

Ever since Rose had seen George talking to Benoit she had watched for an opportunity of getting acquainted with the child, and finding out from her what were the things she spoke of to M. le Baron. This was no easy matter: the girl was indeed, as Thereson had said, a wild little creature, very difficult to accost, or to detain. After many vain attempts, she happened, one morning that George was gone in another direction, to find Benoit sitting on the edge of a well, surrounded by her goats, which had been drinking, and were now lying at her feet. She started up when she saw Mise approaching her, and prepared to run up the steep path that led to the mountains. But when Rose called out to her in the Provençal dialect, and said: "I have got something for you, Benoit, something which will make you see wonderful things—things you have never yet seen—on the wings of the beetles and in the hearts of the flowers," she stopped and looked at her young mistress with a half-doubtful, half-eager expression.

Rose having heard of the child's passion for insects and flowers, had provided herself with a magnifying glass, the present her work-bag. She gathered a foxglove and looked attentively through the glass at the inside of the flower, and really astonished at the beauty of what she saw there, exclaimed, "Oh, how lovely!" upon which the little girl slowly approached, like a bird who longs to pick up the crumb you throw to it, but suspicious of your intentions, hardly ventures to come near enough. However, when Rose sat down on the edge of the well, and filled her lap with thyme, heath, and harebells, and then peeped into their secret folds, Benoit could no longer resist. When the glass was applied to her eye, and she saw the wonders it revealed, a cry of delight broke from her. Catching a lady-bird, she inspected it in the same way, and her delight was unbounded.

"Monsieur would like to see with that glass eye," she said. "Will you let him?"

The child's question pained Rose.

"Monsieur often talks to you, I think. Is it always about the flowers and the insects?"

"Oh, about many others things too."

"What sort of things? Birds and shells, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes, the shells! I hear the noise of the sea when I hold them to my ear. Have you ever heard it?"

"No."

"Monsieur does though, and he can tell what the wind sings in the branches of the pine trees, and what the swallows say to each other when they meet in the grove before they fly away. But I have told him things he does not know. That is why he likes to talk to me. 'Benoit,' he says, 'why is that cloud sailing so fast across the sky?' and then I answer that it is carrying a message from the islands out in the sea up to the tops of the mountains where the snow always lies; and then he asks me what the sunflowers are thinking of when they turn round to look at the sun as he sinks behind the hill, and I then answer that they are calling out to him, 'Come back again to-morrow before the Angelus rings.' When I sing my songs to myself, mother and old Simon and that cross Thereson call me a fool, but Monsieur pats me on the head and says I am something else, a word I don't know."

"What does it sound like?" Rose asked.

"Little poet," the child replied.

"And what has Monsieur taught you that you did not know before?"

"Oh, so many things about the good God and the angels."

"But I suppose you had heard of the good God, Benoit, and you knew that there are angels?"

"Yes, Mise, but not that it is the voice of the good God which speaks when it thunders, and that the winds do His bidding. Monsieur says that the mountains, and the sea, and the sun, and the flowers sing together a hymn in His praise, and that I must do the same as I go about in the woods and fields; and then he tells me that when he goes away I must talk to my guardian angel, my own angel, who is always with me though I do not see him, and that as he sees the face of our good God, he will teach me to love and praise my Father in heaven. The one I had on earth went away before I was born, and I am glad that the good God is my Father, and the Blessed Virgin is my Mother, and the angels my friends. I think Monsieur is himself one of the angels of the good God. When he speaks a song, for he does not sing his songs, he speaks them to me, I find it more beautiful music than the organ in the church."

Rose had listened to the child with a strange emotion; a vague idea was beginning to dawn on her mind that George was not only not a fool—this his letter, that letter which she was always reading over, had at once showed her—but that he had thoughts and feelings which no one knew of, and which he probably considered her incapable of appreciating or understanding. One thing Benoit had said struck her as if it had stabbed her to the heart—"when he goes away." When, and how soon, would that be? The words in his letter, which spoke of his irrevocable determination to part with her for ever, were remembered with a pang she could hardly account for. Could a week spent in the with cold, distant civility, and not even attempted to become acquainted with her, have wrought such a change in her feelings that she was actually dreading his departure, not merely from a sense that there was something wrong about it, though she could not clearly see who was in fault, but that she had begun to look eagerly for the brief moments, when a few words were exchanged between them, as the interesting periods of the day, and that if she caught sight of his face at times when he was not aware of it, her eyes could not detach themselves from it. She had sunk into a deep reverie, from which she was aroused by Benoitte saying:

"Now, I must take the goats to feed on the moor behind those trees to the left. We always go there at this hour, and Monsieur generally comes home that way with Wasp, who has now made friends with my goats. He is going to tell me the story of a peasant girl, who was a little shepherdess like me, and a great saint. Did you know, Mise, that little girls who take care of sheep and goats could be saints? Will you come and hear the story Monsieur is going to tell me?"

"No, I must hasten home, Benoitte; but to-morrow morning where will you be with the goats? I will come to you and you will tell me that story."

"Down by the side of the brook where it runs close to the wood, Mise. Good night," and Benoitte walked away, followed by her goats.

Rose went home. "I can never forget that look." Those words in George's letter seemed to haunt her. Had that look that instant indeed decided their fate, as he had said, beyond change and recall? She had been wrong, she knew it, to show feelings she now regretted had existed, and which had disappeared and given way, if not to opposite, at least to different impressions. It had been indeed an almost involuntary fault as far as that instant was concerned, yet she could not but remember that she had nurtured and encouraged in herself contempt and aversion towards the person she knew she must marry, which had prevented her from even trying to see in him anything better than what her dislike and ready belief of what others had said about him, pictured to her.

Again and again she asked herself what could she do now that the tables seemed turned. George really seemed to have conceived an aversion for her. The feeble efforts she made to converse with him on any but the most trivial subjects were met with a polite indifference, and an utter absence of interest. Then Rose felt her temper rising, and she showed a sort of irritation which she could not conquer at the moment, and which yet, she was conscious, might confirm him in the belief that it was his presence which caused it.

It was not strange that a young and timid girl in so difficult a position did not know how to act. It may indeed seem extraordinary that she did not hasten to her Aunt Mise, or write to her for advice; but a vague fear of bringing matters to a crisis, by herself taking any step, or acquainting even Mdlle. Lescalle of the determination George had formed, kept her silent. Mise Mede might think it right to speak to his parents and hers of the intended separation, and she abhorred the idea of their interference, either to make that separation a formal one, or to compel him to alter his intention.

This feeling was so strong that it enabled her to receive her mother on the day after her first interview with Benoitte with a smiling countenance, and to speak in a way which satisfied Madame Lescalle that although, according to certain hints which Thereson had given her during a brief conversation in the kitchen, M. le Baron was a very dull and silent companion, and that Mise Rose would soon be ill if she continued to lead such a stupid life, her daughter was well satisfied with her lot.

"But, Mignonne," she said, when Rose expressed her wish to remain on at Belbousquet, "we could very well lodge you in town till La Pinede is purified; and, between you and me, I believe that stupid maid had nothing after all but a common rash. You can stay with us until the Comte and Comtesse return. You must be longing to wear some of your new gowns. I have had them hung up in my large wardrobe. There is nothing so bad for dresses as to remain folded up in cases."

"I am sure that George likes better to be here than to go to town, mamma. This place suits him so well. He takes long walks into the mountains. He is gone to-day to the rocks of Entreat. I am sorry he will miss you."

"And does he, then, leave you in this way alone?"

"Oh, he heard you were coming, mamma, and——" Rose stopped, and then added, feeling that this sounded rude, "And I suppose he may have thought that we should like to be alone together. George is very shy, you know."

"Well, well, I suppose he will get used to me in time, and the best way will be to bring him to us at once. What day shall it be? Next Saturday? And then, on Sunday, after church, we can take a walk on the Tasse; and you can put on your blue and white moire gown, and your black lace bonnet with the white rose."

"I will speak to him about it, dear mamma, and write you a note."

"Oh, for that matter, my love, I hope you are not going to place yourself on the footing of asking your husband what he likes to do. At any rate, during the honeymoon it is a matter of course that you do as you like, and with such a young, inexperienced man—I mean, the sort of man he is—if you manage well you will always have the upper hand. I am sure this is what the de Vedelles wished. And if you find any difficulty about it, I can make him quickly feel that when we agreed to the marriage that was quite understood."

Rose winced at this speech, and felt how dreadful it would be to have her mother interfering in her concerns. So she only answered that as they had hitherto not disagreed about anything, there was no occasion for any assertion of her right to have her own way. She again expressed her wish to remain in the country, and Madame Lescalle reluctantly waived the point.

A day or two afterwards, as Rose was standing by a window in a back passage which looked on the garden, she saw George sitting on a bench with a bit of paper and a pencil in his hand. His face, as he looked up, was full of expression, his eyes flashing and his lips moving. He was writing; now and then he paused, looked up, and then wrote again. After a while he put the pencil into his pocket, tore the paper, threw the bits on the grass behind the bench, and walked out of the garden.

Rose had been two successive mornings to the spot where, at noon, the little shepherdess rested in the shade with her flock, and, seated by her side on the grass, had made Benoitte repeat the stories which George had told her the evening before. First about the holy shepherdess, Germaine Cousin, and then about the dear Saint and sweet Queen, St. Elizabeth of Hungary. The little girl repeated in a touching manner some of the incidents of these wonderful lives. She told how Germaine planted her staff on the hill-side when she went to mass, and left her sheep under the care of her guardian angel. Never, Benoitte said, did they stray from the spot, and then, in her picturesque phrasology and with expressive gestures, she described the miracle of the leaves changed into roses, which has been so often painted and carved and sung in verse, in honor of the dear St. Elizabeth.

"Monsieur has made me a song about that," she added, as she finished her recital. "He made it yesterday, and I have been singing it ever since. Shall I sing it to you, Mise?"

Rose nodded assent, and then Benoitte's childish voice warbled in the Provençal dialect—the melodious language of the old troubadours—rhymes of which the following verses are a feeble translation:

By all the humble grace that marked
Thy footsteps from thy birth,
By all the miracles that graced
Thy brief career on earth,

By all the sufferers, young and old,
That to thy threshold came,
By all the lepers foul and sad
That blest thy gentle name,

By each fair rose that bloomed within
The vest where love had sought
With curious eye to scan the dole
To famished beggars brought,

By all the poet's dreams that still
Are blended with thy fame,
By all the legends, strangely sweet,
Which consecrate thy name,

By the fair bird whose dulcet notes
Rang in thy dying ear,
And by the hymns which angels sang
Exulting round thy bier,

O loved, O sweet Elizabeth,
Bless all who swell thy train,
And let thy spirit, dearest Saint,
Ever with us remain.

Whilst the little girl sang, Rose sat with her face covered with her hands, tears trickling down her cheeks. She made Benoit repeat what she called St. Elizabeth's song till she had committed it herself to memory, and envied the child for whom it had been composed.

When, some hours afterwards, she saw George writing in the garden, his face lighted up with an expression she had never observed in it before, she guessed what he was doing, and a passionate desire seized her to collect the little bits of paper he had thrown aside, and to decipher what was written on them. She watched him out of the grounds, and then furtively made her way behind the bench, and, on her knees, carefully collected every fragment of the torn-up sheet of paper, and carried them up to her room; then, locking her door, she patiently and carefully reassembled and adjusted the bits of writing, and with flushed cheeks and beating heart made out some lines which had a strange effect upon her. They seemed to her very beautiful poetry, and deficient as she was in literary knowledge, her instinct did not mislead Rose.

The lines were full of melody—of the music of poetry—and they expressed forcibly strong and vehement feelings. They seemed addressed to some one revered, worshipped, and for ever lost, but not dead, for they called upon this being, as far removed from him who addressed her as if death had separated them, still to be the guiding light of his sad existence. He adjured that absent one not to forget, in her hours of worship before the silent altar, to send her angel with a message of strength and peace to him, who, after years of dull apathy, had been awakened to feel, to think, and after a brief gleam of illusive hope, to suffer, with an intensity which had roused latent powers, once possessed, long lost, and now regained. "In the homes of the poor," these lines went on to say, "pray for the soul thou hast taught to love the poor; by the bed-side of the dying, pray for him who often longs to lay down the burthen of life and rest in a quiet grave. God speaks to thee in silence of His sacramental presence; He speaks to thee through the eyes and through the lips which follow and bless thee in the sick ward or the house of poverty, and He will permit thy words to win for me strength to bear my fate, courage to go through life unloved and uncared for; they will reach my soul in hours of solitude, spent in converse with nature and with that God who, when He sent thee to my help, saved me from despair. Faith had waned, hope had died, love vanished from my soul; even though stamped with acute anguish, I welcome them again."

A strange number of confused, agitating, startling thoughts rushed on poor little Rose's mind as she made out these lines, and pondered over them. Their meaning could not be mistaken. He had cared for some one else—he had loved some one else. He still worshipped in some strange manner that one—whomver she was—whom he looked upon as a saint or an angel. "Then what business had he to marry poor little me?" she exclaimed to herself, with a sudden feeling of indignation, and perhaps of jealousy; but conscience—and Rose's conscience was one of those clear and upright guides which did not lend itself to self-deceit—answered, "The same business you had to marry him when you felt you hated him." "But a man should have more courage than a woman," the inward voice pleaded with some truth. But conscience again replied, "He meant to try and make you happy; his letter said so. And then you spurned him. You showed him you loathed his very sight. Oh, my God! my God! what a mistake I made. Are we both to pass through life, as he says, unloved and uncared for—bearing the same name but strangers to each other, strangers as we now are, and soon to part for ever? But who is this woman who he thinks has been a blessing to him, and yet made him suffer so terribly? Who can she be? Will they meet again? By what the verses say, she must be very good, a great deal at church, and taking care of poor people. I wonder where she lives? I suppose I shall never know. I was thinking yesterday of trying to show him that I do not dislike him, that I could like him very much; but now that I find he cares about somebody else, perhaps that would only make him hate me."

For two long hours Rose mused in this way, and was only disturbed from these absorbing thoughts by Thereson's knock at the door, and somewhat impatient announcement that dinner was on the table and M. le Baron in the dining room. She hastily came down stairs, and was so preoccupied, that if George had paid the least attention to her looks, he must have been struck with it; but he was, if possible, more silent and abstracted than ever. Rose, remembering the expression of his face whilst he had been writing the verses which had thrown her into so great an agitation, could hardly believe he was the same person now sitting opposite to her, and only uttering, at long intervals, some commonplace observation.

She became painfully nervous, answered in an impatient manner, and spoke crossly to Zon because, in clearing away the things, she had knocked two glasses against each other. He seemed surprised.

At last, when the servant had left the room, she got up suddenly, and said, "I must ask you to excuse me. I have a bad headache, and must go and rest."

"Are you ill, Rose?" George said, more graciously than usual.

"Oh, no; it is nothing. I feel only a little stupid—a little dull. I think I shall go and see my Aunt Mede to-morrow."

"By all means. I think it will do you a great deal of good. Perhaps you do not take enough exercise."

Rose stood with the handle of the door in her hand. She tried to steady her voice. She wanted to say some insignificant thing about sending for the carpenter's donkey to take her to town, but the effort to control her emotion failed, and she burst into tears. He started, up, and losing all self-command, she exclaimed, "I can no longer endure this—my life is unbearable."

He seemed pained, and said in a grave and earnest manner "I can indeed well understand it. I feel it has lasted too long. I have been considering that it is high time that you should be left to enjoy the society of those you love, and be delivered from my presence. You will do me the justice to say that I have fulfilled my pledge and kept my word. I need not repeat the assurances I have already given you. May God help us both to endure the trials of life. Our paths lie in different directions. May yours be as happy and as peaceful as is possible under the circumstances. Perhaps you will remain a few days at Les Capucins? or else bring back your aunt with you here. To-morrow I shall go to Marseilles."

Rose made no reply. She could not think of anything she could, or would, say, and hurried up to her room, where she remained for some hours, absorbed in painful reflections, made up of bitter regrets and self-reproach. It was late in the night before she fell asleep, and when she awoke in the morning it was past nine o'clock. She dressed hastily, and went down stairs. Breakfast was laid only for one on the dining-room table. Thereson's voice was audible in the kitchen, disputing with old Simon. Rose called her, and asked, "Where is M. de Vedelles?"

"Simon says that M. le Baron went to Marseilles by the first diligence, at five o'clock this morning. He carried his portmanteau for him to the highroad. So that was why I took away the second cup and late. Monsieur said that Madame was going to-day to the Capucins. Will Madame want Casimir's donkey, and am I to go with her?"

"No; I have changed my mind. I shall stay here, at any rate to-day," Rose said, and after swallowing with some effort a few mouthfuls of food she put on her hat and went to try and find Benoite. She was ashamed at feeling as wretched as she did. She could not bear to remain alone, nor to go to La Ciotat. She wanted to speak of George, and yet the only human being to whom, at that moment, she felt that she could do so, was the little wild girl of the woods—the child he had been kind to.

CHAPTER XVII.

A DISCOVERY.

ROSE walked with a rapid step to the well, where she expected to find Benoite, and sure enough she was there as usual, but instead of waiting to be accosted and spoken to, as soon as the child saw her young mistress she sprung up and ran to meet her.

"Oh, Mise," she exclaimed, "is Monsieur gone away?"

"He went to Marseilles this morning. Did he tell you yesterday that he meant to do so?"

"Yes, in the evening, when I was taking the goats to the stable, he came to wish me good-bye. He had not said anything about going away when I had met him in the afternoon. Oh, Mise, I am so sorry he is gone!" and Benoite began to cry.

Rose sat down by the child and held her hand in hers. The little girl looked up into her face and said—

"Will he come back again soon? I asked him, but he would not tell me. He only patted me on the shoulder, and said we should meet again some day. Are you, too, going away, Mise Rose? I do not love you as much as I love Monsieur, but I am beginning to like you, and if you will tell Thereson not to call me an idiot, I shall soon love you."

"Oh, she must not do that," Rose said, her cheek flushing. "People don't know the harm they do when they dare to say such things. I don't wonder, Benoite, that you should like Monsieur better than me. I cannot tell you nice stories, or make songs for you as he did."

"But can't you find stories in a book, Mise?"

"Do you mean if I can read them?"

"Well, I suppose so. What I know is, that Monsieur, when he began telling me about the dear St. Elizabeth, was carrying a book under his arm, and in the beginning of it was a picture of her with her lap full of roses, and a gentleman with a face something like Monsieur's peeping at them. Once he said he was going to tell me another story, about a sick man she put in a bed, and then when people came to look at him, there was Jesus, on his cross, lying in it instead. He found that in the book. Perhaps if you had it, you could find some stories in it."

The child's suggestion was not lost on Rose. She made up her mind to venture into the room where George's books were lying about, and to try and discover this one. Whilst she was thinking of this, Benoite was looking at her wistfully. At last she said—

"Mise, could you take care of the goats for an hour or two?"

"Perhaps I could. But why should I?"

"Because then I could do Monsieur's commission this morning instead of late this evening, and not have to keep Toinette waiting so long for her money."

"Who is Toinette?"

"She is a very old paralyzed woman, who lives in a hut half way between this place and Cereste, at the rocks of Etretat. Monsieur found her out one day by chance—the first day he was here, I think—and she was very ill, and afraid she was going to die. Monsieur walked to Cereste and told M. le Cure how bad she was, and M. le Cure came, and he got a woman to take care of her. After that Monsieur went himself every day to see her, and yesterday, 'Benoite,' he said, 'I went to send some money to poor old Toinette, as now I shall not be here to take food to her. I don't know who to send with it; Thereson and Simon would not care to walk so far.' 'Send your guardian angel,' I said. He laughed, and answered that I was for once to be his guardian angel, and when I have taken the goats home I must carry to her this fine gold thing. It is the finest thing you ever saw, Mise." And Benoite produced a twenty-franc piece in gold, which she held up before Rose's eyes with exulting admiration.

"Now I shall be tired to-night, and if you would mind the goats, Mise, I could go now to Toinette. She will be so sorry at the usual time when Monsieur took her some dinner and no Monsieur and no dinner comes. If she has this to look at, maybe it will comfort her, though she can't eat it. But Monsieur says it will turn into a bagful of pennies when she likes, and then she can buy bread."

Rose was hesitating as to what she would answer, and Benoite went on: "You see, Mise, I thought of putting my staff here, just as Germaine Cousin did and leaving it to take care of the goats; but I am afraid they would not mind it."

"No because you are not a saint, little Benoite. Thereson says you are very naughty sometimes, and will not do as you are told."

"Then I'll be a saint to spite her," Benoite exclaimed, shaking her fist and stamping in a very unsanctified manner. "I'll be a saint, and then the birds and the beasts will do what I tell them as the wolf did when St. Francis bade him keep the peace with the people of Gubbio. That was another of Monsieur's tales. But I shall not tell the wolves to keep the peace with Thereson. I will order that great eagle that flew across the sky and perched on the high rock above Etretat last night, to pick out her eyes."

"Oh, Benoite, you would not, if you could, do such a dreadful thing! You would be like a devil, not a saint."

"Well, if not her eyes, her cap. I would bid him carry her cap off her head, away to his nest. I should like to hear her scream after it. But what shall I do about Toinette?"

"Tell me where she lives, and I will go to her myself."

"Well, Mise, you must follow that path that leads through the wood, and then enter the olive groves and go up the hill. You will pass by a little shrine where there is a Madonna, and then turn to the left. In a little while you will come to some lemon and orange trees, and there under the rocks is Toinette's hut."

Rose went back to the house to fill a basket, and then, laden with provisions, and intrusted with the gold piece which Benoite gave into her hands with rather a wistful look of regret, she started on her errand.

It was one of the most beautiful of the long days of June. The air was balmy, and though the heat was great, it was not oppressive. There was shade almost everywhere on her road. Rose thought how strangely different things had turned out from what she had expected. She could form no idea as to her future, and felt as if in a dream. It was a relief to walk, to have something to do, and the fact that she was executing the commission George had intrusted to the little peasant, gave her a sort of satisfaction.

The hut Benoite had described was in a lonely situation at the foot of some rocks; the nearest place to it was Cereste. She easily found it, and explained to the paralytic and solitary old woman that M. de Vedelles was absent, that he sent her twenty francs to provide for her immediate necessities, and that she had herself brought her some dinner.

"And who are you, kind Mise?" the old creature asked, looking with admiration at Rose's lovely face.

"I am the wife of the gentleman who has visited you lately," she answered, and for the first time she said that word wife with a sort of emphasis that seemed like laying claim to a name she would not have willingly given up.

"Then the good God has rewarded him for all his charity by giving him an angel for a wife." Toinette rejoined, clasping her thin hands together, and speaking in that poetical manner which in Provence, as in Ireland, is so often met with amongst the poor and the ignorant.

Rose sat down by the bedside, and said, "He has, then, been very kind to you?"

"Good as the good God, Mise. He has saved my life—but done yet more for my soul. Oh, if you knew the peace and the consolation he has given to this poor heart of mine!"

"How so?" said Rose earnestly, drinking in each of the sick woman's words who told her sad and simple story with the impassioned feeling and natural eloquence of a southern nature. It was an often-told tale, that of a mother whose only son had gone on wildly from his boyish days, and had at last been led into crime, more from weakness—so she thought—than from perversity. Bad associates had got hold of him. Two years ago he had been concerned in the robbery of a diligence, tried, and condemned for five years to the galleys.

From the day the dreadful news had reached her, the convict's mother had not heard one word from or about her son. Her soul as she expressed it had thirsted for news of him but none ever came, and hope had died away in her heart till the day that George de Vedelles, in his wanderings in the hills, had accidentally entered her hut. To him she told her grief and, as she saw pity in his face, she poured forth the long pent-up anguish of her soul, and described the rebellious anger she felt against God and man. He had soothed and consoled her.

"Oh, Mise," she exclaimed, "he told me he knew what it is to suffer; that young as he was he had borne a heavy cross, and that he would try to lighten mine."

"Did he tell you what has been his cross?" Rose asked, with her face turned away dreading to hear the answer.

"Not exactly, Mise. He told me he had been ill, and lost for years the strength to work, or even to think. He said this when I complained that in the long sleepless nights in winter, when I lie here alone, I almost go out of my mind. He smiled kindly, and then just said those few words, and he promised to get me news of my son."

"Did he succeed?"

"Oh, yes; thanks be to the good God, who hears our prayers. Ah, that reminds me of what he told me when I was crying so bitterly, something a great saint had said about sons being saved by their mother's tears. Yes, Mise, he wrote to a friend of his at Toulon, some one as good as himself, and he brought me, three days ago, this letter. When he had read it to me he laid it on the bed, and forgot to take it away with him. And oh, I think this was a mercy of the good God, for I have found in it the words about my Antoine. It lies on my heart all the day, and at night under my pillow, such as it is. You may see it if you like, my beautiful Mise. Oh, you are happy to have M. George for your husband. I am so glad God has given him a wife as good as himself. I shall always pray for you both."

"Yes, pray for us both," Rose repeated softly, and two large tears rolled down her cheeks. The letter which Toinette put into her hands was as follows:

My Dear Friend—As soon as I got your orders, off I went to M. l'Aumonier du Bagne, and made inquiries with regard to the convict in whom you take an interest.

It is very like you, George, during the first days of your honeymoon, for I duly received the lettre de faire part, announcing your marriage with Mlle. Rose Lescalle, and saw in the papers that it had taken place. I must say I think you ought to have written to me yourself on such an occasion; but to return to the point, I say it was like you to ferret out in the mountains, to which you have apparently retired, a sick old woman to visit and a work of charity to be done.

When we were at college, and you were carrying off all the prizes, what made me love you, old fellow, was not that you were clever and bright and at the head of our class, but that if there was a kind thing to be done you were always the one to do it, and you seem not to have lost that good habit.

Well, I have good news to give of your young man, wherewith to cheer his mother's heart. He is alive—M. Antoine Lemaire—he is well, and what is better still, he has behaved so irreproachably since he has been at the Bagne, that a few weeks ago he was made one of the infirmarians of the convict hospital, and is becoming quite a favorite with the physicians. He goes to his duties, and M. l'Aumonier has promised me that the next time he sees him he will tell him that his mother sends him her blessing, and advise him to write to her if he knows how, which seems doubtful. Should he be able to do so, I will inclose to you the letter—as the good old lady's hut which you describe is not, I should imagine, familiar to the postman.

If you can tear yourself away from Belbousquet—what a charming name, and how well-suited the place must be for a honeymoon!—perhaps you could pay me a visit next week. I should like to show you the man-of-war which my uncle commands, and which is shortly to carry me off, in company with that uncle, to the shores of the New World. I have heard from the Paris publisher. His reader is delighted with your poems. I could not help laughing, the other day, when Cesaire de Croix-fonds spoke of you, and asked me if it was true that, since the illness you nearly died of, you had lost all that intelligence you were so noted for at college. I suspect, old fellow, that in that utter inability to occupy yourself with anything but poetry, there has been a tiny bit of mauvaise volonté. Am I unjust, M. George? Perhaps so, for a clever physician assured me, the other day, that after such a shock as your brain experienced in that fever, it was sometimes years before a person recovered the power of application, even though the mind was not affected. But God has given you genius, and you will take the world by surprise, especially the little world of your own family, who have, none of them, I fancy, the remotest idea of what lies under that silent, absent, languid, provoking manner of yours.

Write and tell me if you can come here next week, and believe me your affectionate and devoted friend,

ALOYS DE BELMONT,
Naval Lieutenant.

May I venture to beg you to present my respects to Madame George de Vedelles?

Light had been gradually dawning on Rose's mind, and this letter, so singularly thrown in her way, revealed to her the truth which she was beginning to realize. George de Vedelles was a totally different being from the one the reports of others and her own imagination had drawn. He had been misunderstood and underrated by his relatives, despised by his father, compassionated by his mother, held cheap by his brother, and hated by herself. No wonder he had told the poor paralytic woman before her that heavy had been the cross he had to bear. No wonder that when he had seen her on the day she had been made his wife look at him with contempt and aversion—she, the ignorant, foolish little girl, who had not thought it worth her while to judge for herself of the man to whom she had been married—that he turned from her with disgust, and left her to her fate. And he had known and cared for one who must have been so different from herself, his very ideal of a perfect woman, whereas she must be, in his eyes, one of those creatures who think trinkets and smart dresses and a carriage and servants the only elements of happiness. She kept the letter from George's friend a long time in her hand, and almost learnt by heart its contents. When at last she laid it down, and Toinette said, "Is it not a beautiful letter?" Rose started, and then answered—

"Indeed I am very glad you showed it to me. I shall come and see you again in a day or two."

"With M. George?" Toinette asked.

"Yes, if he is returned," poor Rose replied, with a pang, for she felt how unlikely it was that he would come back, though if he did, she thought things would be different than they had been; and perhaps—who knows?—they might be walking through those groves and across those hills one day together, on just such a lovely evening as this one, and visions of domestic happiness, that seemed to have vanished for ever, would rise again before the wedded girl who had, as she mournfully said to herself, turned her back on her own happiness.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE CLUE LAID HOLD OF.

Rose came home, and after eating her solitary meal she thought of Benoit's suggestion about the large book where Monsieur found the stories about St. Elizabeth of Hungary, and after some hesitation ventured into the room, which was called M. Lescalle's study, and which George had used as a sitting-room.

Next to seeing persons the thought of whom occupies us, the most interesting thing we can do is to examine a room which they have inhabited. There are so many small but significant traces of their presence. The prominent feature in this one was the books—some of them lying on the floor open and on their faces, others still in the case; some on the table, some on the chimney. A great many sheets of paper, scribbled upon, were thrust into a waste-paper basket. The disorder in which everything was left gave Rose some satisfaction. If George had really gone away for good, would not he have packed up his books? but perhaps he had given directions to that effect. She had not the courage to ask Simon or Thereson if he had done so.

Besides the books, there were some materials for drawing and painting in the open case, and in the corner an unframed picture loosely wrapped up in brown paper. She took it up and found it was a landscape representing the Chateau de Valsec, the hereditary manor of the de Vedelles which the Count had sold in order to purchase La Pinede. She took the painting to the window, and looked with interest at the view of a place where George had spent his childhood. It was a venerable pile of building—very imposing in its old-fashioned style, and surrounded by tall stately larches which added to its rather gloomy and aristocratic grandeur. In the corner of this painting, Jacques de Vedelles' name was written. He had told her, the first day she had seen him, that he painted landscape, but had never succeeded in drawing figures.

As she was carrying back to the case the view of Valsec, she happened to turn it round, and found that on the other side of the canvas there was the portrait of a woman, a most beautiful face, with a fine, dignified and sweet expression, which it was impossible not to be struck with.

"Oh, what a lovely countenance!" Rose inwardly exclaimed; and then she saw, at the corner of this painting, not Jacques' name, but the letters, G. de V., and the date, April 7th, 1835.

That was the day she had been at La Pinede for the first time. Suddenly it flashed upon her that as she was going away and the carriage in which she was with her parents was driving through the avenue gate, she had caught sight of a caloche going up to the chateau, in which a beautiful young person was sitting by the side of an old man. She must be the person he had painted on the back of his brother's picture of Valsec; she must be the person he had cared for and regretted so intensely. Who was she? Then the idea of Mdlle. de la Pinede suddenly struck her; she had heard of her beauty, and what the ladies of La Ciotat called, her exaltation.

On the day that she was walking listlessly by her mother's side on the Tasse, whilst Artemon Richer was paying her compliments, she had heard some one telling her mother that the beautiful heiress at Toulon, Mdlle. de la Pinede, was going to be a Sister of Charity.

How often it happens in life that we hear at one time things said with an utter indifference, which perhaps at some other period would have stirred the depths of our hearts with indescribable emotions. She guessed now, she felt certain, that it was Mdlle. de la Pinede George had so profoundly admired, so passionately loved.

It must be so. She held, for a long time, the portrait in her hand, and gazed at it with deep emotion. She thought that the heavenly expression of that beautiful face told the story of the high vocation of the unearthly love which God had given to this favored child of His Heart. She felt no jealousy, scarcely regret, that George should have known, and loved, and been influenced, by one whom he must now look upon as a superior being, a sort of angel or saint. She compared the lines he had written, and which she had preserved, with the picture before her eyes, and not a doubt could exist in her mind that the object of his love and his reverence was Denise de la Pinede.

So engrossed was she with this discovery, and the contemplation of the face he had painted with rare talent and exact fidelity, that it was long before she remembered the purpose with which she had entered that room. Rousing herself, at last, from this absorbing preoccupation, she began to search for the volume Benoit had described, and soon found it. That volume was the life of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, by the Comte de Montalembert.

Are there not many who at some turning-point of their existence have met with a book which has been to them like a revelation, and from the reading of which they can date an initiation into the secrets of a higher life, which, when it seemed hard to discern light in the future of their own destiny, opened before them aims and hopes and possibilities never yet dreamed of, heights they had never even in thought approached?

This was the effect produced on Rose by that beautiful history of the most lovable of saints, written with all the magic charm of brilliant genius united with ardent faith. It was not so much the magnificent language, the matchless eloquence of the great champion of the Church in France, which riveted and entranced her, as hour after hour she sat reading this new-found treasure, as the emotions, the ideas as to this world and the next, which it awoke in her mind. For the first time she conceived what a glorious and blessed thing life can be, even in the midst of the deepest sorrows, when once the relations of the soul with its Creator and its Redeemer have become practical and absorbing. For the first time she understood to what a degree human love can be purified and exalted in two souls united together in the same supreme love. Never has the imagination of man portrayed a more touching ideal of Christian marriage than the quaint old biographers of the dear St. Elizabeth—as she was always called in the land of her birth—have drawn of her union with that model of Christian princes, the good Duke Louis of Thuringia. The minute details of their domestic life and of the tender attachment and sweet piety of these wedded saints, pre-luding, as it did, his early death in the Crusades, and the deep sanctity of her widowhood, the poetical and familiar traits of the mutual affection of the young betrothed couple, the touching fidelity of his love for her, and her tender and grateful devotion to him, selected and traced, as they are, by a master's hand, formed a picture which laid hold, as it were, of Rose's heart, and seemed to call forth all its latent powers of thought and feeling. Seeds sown in her soul during the early years she had spent under her Aunt Mede's roof had been lying dormant, ready to expand under the ripening effects of suffering, and now they were about to bear fruit.

As Rose perused those eloquent pages she traced the impression they had made on another mind; pencil marks, and a few words here and there, revealed to her what had been George's thoughts as he read them. This agreement, this sympathy between them, struck her with a mournful sense of what might once have been, and now might never be. When he had felt the full force of some passage descriptive of Christian wedded love, or of exalted virtue, she had, no doubt, risen before his mind as the childish, frivolous school-girl she must have seemed to him, and the image of Denise de la Pinede passed before his eyes as the living type of womanly perfection. "Yes," she mentally exclaimed, "I can feel for him, I can pity him now, I can understand what his aversion must be to the worldly, selfish girl he thinks he has married. What a strange fate ours has been! But there must be a meaning in it; God never does anything or permits anything without a purpose; I have often heard Aunt Mede say so. She would have gone out of her mind, she said, during the Reign of Terror, but for that thought. I will go to her, or rather, I will write and ask her to come to me. I cannot leave this place; George might come back any day. Oh, that would be too good to be true. If I saw him coming in at that gate, what should I do? Perhaps be again afraid of showing him that I love him. And is it possible? Do I really love him, now that he hates me?"

As she was asking herself this question, Zon knocked at the door, and on being told to come in, the aged handmaid appeared, and giving a contemptuous look at the books scattered on the floor, exclaimed, "Good gracious, Miss Rose, what are you doing here, sitting in the middle of all these dusty books, and reading by candlelight, too! I declare it is enough to put your eyes out. Dear me! Have you not learnt enough during the eight years you spent at school, that you must be poring over books now that you are grown up?"

"It is to amuse myself that I read, Zon."

"Ah, well, I should think you did want amusement; but you might find something better to do than that."

"What would you have me do?"

"Why, go to town, of course, and pay visits. You have never put on one of your best gowns."

"I cannot go and visit about during my husband's absence."

"Ah, indeed; well, if I was Madame——"

Zon did not venture to express her thoughts in words, but an expressive shrug of her shoulders was significant enough of the very low estimation in which she held her young mistress' husband.

"Well," she said, "if Madame won't go into town, why does not she invite her friends here?"

"I do not want to see anybody for some days."

"People must please themselves, I suppose," Zon rejoined in a tone of resignation; "but if you lead this sort of life much longer, I expect that you will go into a decline. I don't know but that it would be my duty to tell Madame Lescalle what I think of it, but if I go to town, who would cook Madame's dinner?"

"I forbid you, Zon, to say anything about me to my mother. In a few days I shall go and see her myself. In the meantime, dear old Zon, do not meddle with what concerns no one but myself."

Rose went into her bedroom, taking with her the book which had made so deep an impression on her mind, and one or two more in which she had seen pencil marks and annotations in George's hand, and others on the blank leaves of which were written some unfinished poems, which she read with a beating heart, for they let her into the secrets of his soul. They contained allusions which marked them as his own, and now that she knew, by Aloys de Belmont's letter, that he was a poet, she valued every word, every line, which gave her an insight into his character—a glimpse of his mind.

That day and that night worked a great change in Rose. Feelings of strong religious fervor had been awakened in her, and at the same time a pure though earthly affection was dawning in her heart. She had discovered in the life of St. Elizabeth of Hungary that these two feelings are not incompatible. A strange new happiness seemed filling her soul during the hours of that sleepless night, which the foresight of suffering did not interfere with. Hers might be a sad fate in the eyes of the world.

It might be God's will that the cloud which hung over her future life was never to be dissipated, that he whom she now felt she could have dearly loved, might never care for her, never return to her; but she now discerned something higher and greater than earthly love, than earthly happiness. That light which sometimes breaks slowly on the mind after long years, sometimes after a life-time of conflict and trial, illuminates others at once, in the morning of their days, not always permanently or consistently, but it shines on the mountain-tops, even whilst the upward path is encompassed by dark shades. Such was the case in this instance. The clue had been laid hold of, and clutched by that young hand which erewhile was helplessly stretched out in the midst of unfathomable gloom. The hour when we can look forward to a life of suffering, of solitude, or of sacrifice, with a thrill of supernatural joy, is often the turning-point in our lives.

When three days afterwards Rose ran out to meet her Aunt Mede, whom she had urgently invited to come and see her, the penetrating eyes of the old lady perceived that a change had come over her darling niece. The soft, smiling, childish face was paler than she had ever seen it, the dark blue eyes had an earnest look such as she had never observed in them before. Even in the sound of her voice there was something different from its usual tone.

At first they spoke of indifferent things, as people do who are longing and yet afraid to begin an important conversation, and then Rose took her aunt upstairs to the room next to her own, which she had prepared for her, and made her sit down in an arm-chair near the open window, and as she used to do in her childhood, placed herself on a stool at her feet, her sweet face looking up into that kind aged face which looked down upon her so calmly and so wistfully. Mise Mede longed to ask,

"Are you happy, my darling?" but she did not feel confidence enough that the question could be answered affirmatively, to do so.

"I suppose your husband is taking one of those long walks," she said, "which you wrote to me he liked so much. Will he come home for dinner? I want to make real acquaintance with my nephew."

Two large tears rolled down Rose's cheeks, and a sudden flush gave them a deep color. "Aunt Mede, I have so much to tell you, so much to ask you. My mind is full of new thoughts, and such strange, different feelings, I hardly know how to begin telling you what has happened——"

"It happened, my child? What can have happened to you?"

"George has left me."

"Left you? Good heavens, Rose, what do you mean? When? How?"

"Four days ago."

"And where has he gone?"

"To Marseilles."

"With whom?"

"I am not quite sure; but I think he is staying with a friend of his—a M. de Belmont."

"My dear child, you should not have suffered him to leave you," Mise Mede said, with a look of uneasiness. "Who knows if he is capable of taking care of himself?"

"Aunt Mede," Rose exclaimed, "you, and all of us, and his own family, have made a great mistake about George—an extraordinary mistake—which I have found out too late. Oh yes too late!"

And bursting into tears, Rose hid her face on her aunt's knees.

"Speak, my child, you frighten me. Is he quite out of his mind?"

"Oh, no, Aunt Mede, he is not a bit out of his mind. He is full of goodness and cleverness. He is one whom a woman could most dearly love and admire. And if on the day we were married I had not shown that I hated and despised him—it was before you came back and talked to me, Aunt Mede—I might have been the happiest of wives; but now it is all over with that kind of happiness."

She paused, but seeing her old aunt's intense anxiety, she went on—

"As soon as we arrived here he gave me this letter."

She placed it in Mademoiselle Lescalle's hands, and when she had read it, said—

"He has acted up to what he wrote. For form's sake he remained here till last Monday, but we hardly spoke to one another, and then I think it was because he saw me looking so unhappy, and thought I could not bear the sight of him, that he went away, and I shall never see him again."

"That does not follow," Aunt Mede said, and seemed for a few moments buried in thought. "But what besides this letter—which is indeed a proof that he is far from being the sort of person we supposed—has made you think him clever, as you say you did not speak together hardly at all?"

Then Rose, in an artless and touching manner, told Mise Mede of George's conversations with Benoit, related to her by the little shepherdess; of the verses she had seen him write, and those she had found in his books; of the portrait he had painted of Mlle. de la Pinede, and his romantic devotion to her. And then, word for word, she repeated what Toinette had told her of his visits and their conversations, and last—not least—of M. de Belmont's letter, which had thrown light on the strange and fatal mistake of those who had mistaken the languor of an overwrought brain, and the fanciful peculiarities of a poetic nature, for proofs of mental deficiency and disordered understanding.

"I see it all," Mlle. Lescalle slowly ejaculated. "It may all come right, Rosy; but oh, my darling, if you knew how my old heart aches at the thought of what you have had to suffer, and may still suffer, my own poor darling child!" Then Mise Mede's self-command gave way, and tears coursed down her wrinkled cheeks. Rose took her hands in hers, and, looking at her earnestly, said—

"Aunt Mede, don't cry. You will not grieve when I have told you all I feel and think. When we both thought, on my wedding-day, that I was bound for life to a fada, though we tried to make the best of it, that was a sorrow which had something of shame in it; and then, though I wished to be good, I had no idea, I did not understand, what you must know so well, Aunt Mede—that there is a way of being good, which is not the common way, and that in it suffering and joy can be strangely blended—"

Rose stopped, overcome by her feelings, and looked up at the sky with an expression in her face which revealed to Aunt Mede the work of Divine grace which had taken place in that young soul. She slowly took up the words Rose had uttered, and said—

"So strangely blended, my child, that a heart broken with the deepest human sorrow may still know a happiness which is indeed a foretaste of heaven. But tell me how you have learnt this blessed secret? By what means have you discovered it?"

"Toinette's words, and what she said of all George had done for her, first gave me an idea that one might be very unhappy oneself and yet find happiness in loving God and doing good to others. But what explained it to me was this book."

She had brought with her St. Elizabeth's life, and laid it on the knees of her aunt, whose eyes glistened when she saw it.

"Ah! my child; you understood as you read these pages—they are very familiar to me, Rosy—for the first time you understood what it is to be a saint?" Rose nodded assent. "And then came the thought that to aim at sanctity, and by dint of sufferings and sacrifices to climb the steep ascent which leads to it, might be a greater, deeper joy than any this world can give." Rose again bowed her head and remained a moment silent. Then she said—

"Aunt Mede, if you knew to what a degree I feel this! I see two paths before me. I have no clear idea which God means me to follow. I leave that to Him;" and again Rose looked upward, and joined together her hands, which rested on Aunt Mede's knees. "What I mean is, that I see two kinds of life which He may intend for me."

"Tell me what you are thinking of, my child."

"Well, Aunt Mede, it is possible, is it not that George may return, and that he may some day find out that he can love me, as I have found out that I can love him, and then that we might be happy together, and love God and serve Him together, like the good Duke Louis and the dear St. Elizabeth? But if he does not come back, and if he never cares for me at all, then my life would be like hers after her husband's death. I would live with you, dearest Aunt Mede, or here perhaps, if my parents would let me remain here amidst these beautiful mountains, and the poor people scattered about this place, nursing the sick, teaching the children, and praying in the village churches. I did not know till quite lately, till these few last days, what prayer meant. I used to say my prayers, and I knew our Lord was in the tabernacle on the altar, but not as I now know and feel it. Oh, what a wonderful change comes over one when this is once realized! Which of these two kinds of lives would be best, do you think, Aunt Mede?"

"In themselves, my child, and for those bound by no duty and no indissoluble tie, a life devoted to God and to the poor is, without doubt, the most easy and straight road to heaven. If yours is to prove an exceptional fate, if though married you are irretrievably separated from him whose name you bear, then you may believe that what God will have permitted is intended to be the means of raising you to a more than ordinary perfection. But remember, my child, that yours is not a case in which you can be allowed to choose between these two kinds of lives. There is no choice for you in the matter."

"Perhaps not, Aunt Mede; still it might depend a little on what I felt and did."

"What you must feel and what you must do, Rose, is not optional. The vow you pronounced at the altar, the union which received the blessing of the Church, is not canceled by what has since occurred. You have a responsibility with regard to the soul of your husband, from which nothing can relieve you. You must not acquiesce in his forsaking you, even in order to lead a life of what seems to you higher perfection. The most perfect life for Christians is that in which God has placed them, and your duty is clear and evident."

"Is it? I have felt, on the contrary, so perplexed how to act."

"How to act may be a question, but the intention of your acts should not be doubtful. You must leave nothing undone to undeceive your husband as to your feelings towards him. You must let him know that you can, that you do, love him—"

"Let a man who hates me know that I care for him; and that, after he has made it plain that he despises me?"

"Is it the Rose who has been opening her heart to me that he despises? Does he know her? Has he had any opportunity of reading into her soul? But even if he had, if he had consciously and deliberately rejected the wife God has given him, it would still be your duty patiently, sweetly, unweariedly, to pray, to long for his return, never to give up the hope of it, and whilst rising daily higher in the upward path to which God's grace is calling you, to hold out to him the hand which was given him on your marriage-day, and trust to the end that your strong and patient love—the love of a Christian wife, not the fondness of a frivolous woman—will at last recall him to your side, and draw him to God."

"From the notes in his books, and his verses, Aunt Mede, I should think George was nearer to God than I am."

"It may be so, my child. We cannot judge of others in that respect, even when well acquainted with them, and I do not know your husband at all; but I do not reckon religious poetical effusions as any proof of a real and firm faith. Those who have read Victor Hugo and Lamartine's verses in their early days, know in what admirable language pious emotions can be poured forth, and yet how little real religion may inspire them."

"Oh, Aunt Mede, I have seen some of their writings amongst George's books, and found beautiful things in them, but they did not help me as I now want to be helped. It was like drinking wine too strong for my head, or smelling a too powerful perfume. When I read this book, I feel as if I was breathing mountain air."

"Feed on that kind of air, Rosy," Mlle. Lescalle said, with a smile. "Brace yourself with it in preparation for whatever God may appoint to your lot. I begin to think that my Rose, the child of my heart, is going to be one of those valiant women whom the Scriptures speak of, and I do not give up the hope of a little earthly happiness for her either, if she will be brave and patient. We need not despair at all that everything will come right. You and your husband are very young, two children in fact, who have been mismanaged by others, and then, left to yourselves, mismanaged one another. We must see now what is best to be done. You must let me think and pray about it. An hour or two on my knees will help me to a good thought."

Rose threw her arms round her old aunt's neck, and kissed her as she used to do in her childhood, when Mère Mede made everything straight for her.

"I will leave you alone for a while," she said, almost gaily; "but don't pray too long, Aunt Mede, for now I have begun I want to tell you much more about what I think, and wish, and mean to do, whether—" She stopped. It was easy to read the thoughts that were passing through her mind, and the connection between those words and the next she uttered. "Toinette, you know, said George was very good. It was he who made her forgive people and love God, and M. de Belmont wrote to him that why he liked him so much at college was because he was so kind to every one; and you know, Aunt Mede, that I think, I really do think, that in going away and leaving me he thought he was doing right and what was best for me."

"Very likely he did, Rosy, and we must find out the best way of undeceiving him on that point. And now your cheeks are paler than I like to see them, my child; put on your hat and go and breathe some of that mountain air you are so fond of, amidst the wild thyme and Benoit's goats. No, don't take a book with you. Look at the sky and the flowers, gladden your heart with the thought of Him who made them and you, and leave the future in his hands."

"Yes, Aunt Mede; and the road up the hill leads to Toinette's cabin. I will pay her a visit."

A moment afterwards Mdlle. Lescalle saw from her window Rose crossing the garden carrying a basket on her arm, and singing George's hymn to St. Elizabeth. She watched her graceful form, her light step, and listened to the sweet young voice caroling away as she disappeared amongst the trees, with a grateful sense that, come what might, the child of her heart had discovered the road to true happiness.

CHAPTER XIX.

AN EMERGENCY.

THE result of Mise Mede's thoughts and prayers was, that she wrote that evening a long letter to a dear friend of hers at Marseilles, one of those women whom people instinctively turn to when a difficult thing has to be done, or a great act of kindness to be performed—one of those energetic, large-hearted French souls who carry everything before them, and work wonders with a marvelous ease and singular simplicity. Later on, Mdlle. Amelie Lautard was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor. So great and obvious was her influence for good over the soldiers at Marseilles, amongst whom she indefatigably labored, that, in consideration of her services, the Minister of War, under the empire, granted her the privilege of shortening, at her discretion, in certain cases, the term of military punishment.

But at the time we are writing of, her career of charitable work was at its outset. Her father had been intimately acquainted with Mdlle. Lescalle, and she had always remained in correspondence with the little Amelie she had known and loved as a child. After many anxious reflections, she determined to tell her the whole story of Rose's marriage and of George's unrequited attachment to Mdlle. de la Pinede, now Sœur Denise at the House of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul. She knew, through Mdlle. Lautard, that this young girl had been staying a short time before at the Chateau de la Pinede, and that she had felt interested in George de Vedelles, whose isolation in the midst of his family and deep melancholy had painfully struck her. She thought that Mdlle. Lautard might sound Sœur Denise on the subject and gain from her some information as to his character and state of mind, which would furnish a clue to the most effectual means of bringing about his return to his wife and a good understanding between them.

Mise Mede was much puzzled herself as to the real truth about George. On the one hand, she had heard it positively stated that his intellect was weak, his character childish. It seemed strange that his own parents, his clever father and his loving mother, should have been deceived on that point; and though all that Rose had related and shown to her militated strongly against these preconceived impressions, it had not quite destroyed them. Then Thereson also had burst into the room where Mdlle. Lescalle was meditating, on these conflicting accounts, and, finding at last a vent for the ire which had been accumulating in her soul during the last weeks, poured forth unmitigated expressions of indignation against M. le Baron, whom she described as a sort of savage idiot, whom it would be well if Mise Rose had never seen, far less married, and who would have deserved to have had Benoit for his wife. They would have been a well-matched pair. She with her foolish gibberish and wild-عات ways, and he with his rude, gloomy, and silent manner.

In vain did Mdlle. Lescalle try to check this torrent of abuse. She could understand that under the circumstances Zon might be justified in her aversion to George, and some of the things she said made some impression on her own mind. The doubt was, whether with some amount of apparent ability when he held a pen in his hand, he was not incapable of acting rationally, or even taking care of himself, in which case it would be necessary to communicate with his parents and with Rose's father and mother, at the risk of estranging him for ever from her, or, on the other hand, of trying other means of bringing them together, removing misconceptions, and appealing to his sense of honor and duty. She came to the conclusion that this ought to be attempted if possible, and that Mdlle. Lautard might not only consult Sœur Denise, but seek out also M. de Belmont, with whom she hoped George was still residing, and find out from him the real truth about his college friend.

Such was the purport of the letter she wrote and sent that evening. During the following days she devoted herself, with the tact and ability which belonged to her character, to keep Rose's mind occupied with cheering and strengthening thoughts, to excite her to hope and yet to prepare her for disappointment. They prayed and they read together, visited Toinette, and found out other poor people in the neighborhood, sadly in want both of a little help and of moral and religious instruction. A new world, that of practical charity, seemed opening to the young girl, who had so rapidly grown from a child into a woman. It was a singular blessing for her during those days of uncertainty, that she was experiencing those first fervors of awakened faith in and love of God, which fill the soul with a strange sweetness and almost lift it above earthly cares and joys, and that she was guided at that time by one so clear-sighted and thoroughly sensible as Mise Mede. The thought had crossed her mind that her niece might, like herself, perhaps be called to a life of entire consecration to God, and the full practice of the evangelical counsels.

She remembered, how, when she was Rose's age, and the world was smiling upon her and life looking very bright and fair, a cloud, small at first, like a man's hand, had appeared in the horizon in the shape of the first news and rumors of revolutionary disturbances in the neighborhood. The great events which had convulsed her country seemed at first to have little to do with the prospects and the destiny of a young girl in the middling ranks of life, but the storm went on disturbing and at last darkening every part of France, and bringing the scaffold within sight of the humble homes of the bourgeoisie as well as the nobility. Then war to religion was declared, that war to the knife, which rouses the soul to sacrifice, to action, to heroism, and then Mdlle. Lescalle understood what God's voice was saying to her heart, she understood what was her vocation, not the peaceful cloister—convents were everywhere closed and communities dispersed—but the religious life in her own threatened home, the religious life in its essence, the religious vows, in its work amongst the poor, the prisoners, the dying, at the foot of the scaffold, in the cell of the condemned, in the caves and garrets where mass was said in secret, in the perilous services rendered to a faithful, outlawed priesthood.

She embraced this life with unflinching zeal. She thanked God that He had cast her lot in those dark days. She met dangers which brought her within an inch of death, and often felt that nothing less than the complete consecration which severs at one stroke the heart from all merely human joys, could have borne her unscathed through the fiery furnace of that terrible time. And now she asked herself, "Was it God's will that Rose should walk in her steps? Had he assigned to her a peculiar destiny, in order that, bearing the name of a wife, she should be, as she herself had been, a religious in life and heart? Was that her vocation, strangely brought about, strangely accomplished?" She watched her without seeming to do so. She sounded her heart as they sat conversing under the pines, or strolling along the mountain paths. She observed the changes of her countenance, and noticed little acts which would have escaped a less penetrating and loving eye, and soon made up her mind that whether her husband returned to her or not, Rose was not called to tread the path she herself had trodden, not even amidst calmer scenes and brighter days.

Many little indications showed her that her heart was not free, that not only had she discovered that George de Vedelles was one a woman could love, but that she had fallen in love with him since the day she had with such terrible reluctance become his wife, and he had rejected her. If for a little while they spoke of anything else, she would always revert to something relating to him, to his books, his verses, his paintings, or to the remarks she had heard him make on the surrounding scenery, to the Sisters of Charity, and Sœur de la Pinède, and Valsec, his parents, and his friends, Benoitte and Toinette.

She saw her kneeling before the tabernacle praying with intense fervor, her eyes filling with tears, and her little hands clasped together. When she came out of the church there was a sweet and peaceful expression in her face, but Aunt Mede noticed that she went and sat on a bench from whence the road could be farthest seen, and gazed wistfully upon it. When in the house, if the gate was heard to open, her eyes turned towards it with a rapid glance.

Then, again, Mdlle. de la Pinède's picture was placed in Rose's own room. With some women perhaps this would have seemed a proof rather of indifference than of love, but Mise Mede knew her niece's humble, tender, affectionate character, and felt certain that it would be free from jealousy and lovingly attracted by all that one she loved cared for. "It cannot but come right," she said to herself, and almost as impatiently as Rose looked for the postman's arrival on the day she expected an answer from Marseilles.

When the postman, two days afterwards, called at Belbousquet he had only one letter to leave, and it was not addressed to Mdlle. Lescalle, but to the Baronne George de Vedelles. Rose was sitting at breakfast opposite to Aunt Mede when Zou laid it on the table. She turned red and then pale, and her hands trembled so much that she could hardly unseal the envelope. Mdlle. Lescalle watched her with anxiety, and felt the news was bad before Rose had finished reading the letter, which she handed to her in silence. This was what George had written:

My Dear Rose—It will hardly surprise you to hear that I am about to embark with my friend, M. de Belmont, on board his uncle's ship which is going to cruise for two years amongst the South Sea Islands. I have written to my brother to request him to break this to my mother and announce it to my father. As I am of age, I have a right to act on my own judgment, and I am persuaded that for them, for you, and for myself, I am doing what is best and wisest.

I have been for some years a source of sorrow and anxiety to my parents, and often a cause of dissension between them. Jacques will certainly be elected deputy I hear, thanks to your father's exertions, and, in his new position and interests, they will find a compensation for my absence, if, indeed, any is needed.

As to you, poor child, on whom was thrust the saddest of all destinies, a union with one whom you could not look on without detestation, I hope that life will still have some charms, though I admit that your fate is a melancholy one. I have begged my father and my brother to arrange with your parents all that regards my fortune, which I wish to leave entirely to you, with the exception of a small annuity, which will suffice for my wants and tastes.

We sail on Saturday morning, and in taking leave of France and all I have ever known or cared for, my chief hope and prayer are that you, whose existence I have involuntary blighted, may still enjoy peaceful and happy days. If I was an infidel, or a philosopher of the school of our modern novelists, I would gladly put myself altogether out of your way. But as I am a Christian, though a very imperfect one, we must each bear our separate burthens, and drag on life as best we may.

May God bless you, Rose.

Sincerely yours,
GEORGE DE VEDELLES.

Aunt Mede pushed her spectacles off her nose when she had read this letter and ejaculated, "Foolish boy." Rose, who was crying, snatched it from her and said, "No, not foolish, Aunt Mede. It is a very generous and kind letter, only—only it breaks my heart."

"There is no need at all for any heart-breaking, silly child. Even if we cannot stop the departure of M. le Baron, and if he was to remain two years in the South Seas, that would not be the world's end, nor your life's end either. You are, let me see, not much more than seventeen. Dear me! perhaps that is the best thing he could have done. He may come back before you are twenty, and you will both be wiser then."

"Two years, Aunt Mede, two years would be like two centuries. O dear, Aunt Mede, can't we stop him? You see that he is going away because he thinks I hate him, and if he was to be shipwrecked and drowned, or cast on a desert island like Robinson Crusoe, I should never forgive myself."

"Well, child, I suppose the only thing to be done is to go to Marseilles and to call on Mdlle. Lantard, who has the wisest head on her shoulders of any woman I know, and if your husband has not yet sailed, to see if between her and your Aunt Mede, some means to stop him may be devised. You and I, Rose, will find ourselves rather in a scrape, if M. George made this coup de tête and we have told neither his parents nor yours of his having left you some days ago. You see, my little girl, I was afraid of their falling out. Your father and mother, I mean, and the Count and Countess, or of their all mismanaging him."

"They would have been sure to do so, Aunt Mede; that would have been the worst thing that could happen to us. Now there is hope if only he has not sailed. Let us lose no time. May I tell Simon to fetch two mules to take us to Cassio, where we shall meet the Marseilles diligence? If he will but make haste they will be here in an hour."

"Very well," Mise Mede said; and at the end of two hours—for Rose had miscalculated the capabilities of old Simon's legs—the mules stood at the door, with their jingling bells and large, wide saddles, ornamented with red tassels, and Dominique, the driver, stood alongside of them, a tall tanned, fierce-looking man, with a brown complexion and tangled black hair.

Rose had known him from her childhood, and was consequently on familiar terms with them.

"Make haste, Dominique," she exclaimed; "we must be at Marseilles before dinner time."

"You will be at Cassio, Mise Rose, in three hours; that I undertake. As to Marseilles, it is no business of mine."

"Are you going to walk all the way to Cassio?"

"Of course; my legs are, if anything, stronger than theirs," he added, patting affectionately the mules, which had certainly worked hard in their day. Then he hoisted Rose's little figure on her saddle as lightly as if she had been a bird, his dark complexion and wild attire contrasting with her delicate features and peach-like coloring in a way which would have delighted a painter.

Old Simon the while was helping Mise Mede to climb up to the back of the other mule, and they then set out at a kind of trot, Dominique keeping up with them at a pace between a walk and a run. Rose felt as though she would have wished for wings, to bear her more rapidly to Marseilles, and Mise Mede was obliged now and then to remind her that her old limbs could not stand this unmitigated speed.

As the little party was leaving the lane which led from Belbousquet into the path across the hills to Cassio, they met a peasant, who stopped Rose's mule, and said: "Madame, are you Madame de Vedelles? I am one of the gardeners at La Pinède."

"Yes. What do you want with me?"

"I have come to let M. George know—M. le Baron George, I mean—that M. Vincent, poor old gentleman, was seized last night with an attack of paralysis, and M. le Docteur says he has not long to live. He is quite conscious, poor dear man, but can speak very little. He keeps asking for M. George, and it is piteous to see him watching the door, and with the one hand he can move making the sign of the cross, and throwing up his eyes to heaven. M. le Cure has been to see him, but he will not hear of being anointed till he has seen M. George, so I have come to fetch him: M. le Cure sent me. The girl who was sick went home last week; her room has been stripped and purified. M. le Cure told me to say that there was no danger, and he wishes M. George to come without delay, for the old man may die any moment. He is conscious in a sort of way, but now quite reasonable like, and it's no use preaching to him whilst he frets about seeing M. George. M. and Madame and M. Jacques are perhaps coming home to-morrow, but by that time, 'tis ten to one, M. Vincent will be dead."

"Oh, Aunt Mede," Rose exclaimed, "I am so sorry! I know

George loves very much that old man. There is something so pretty he wrote about him on one of those scraps of paper I picked up in his room. It began, 'Old, Vincent, thou alone hast known.' How sad if he died without seeing him again, and all the family with whom he has lived fifty years away."

Mise Mede fixed her eyes on Rose, those earnest, powerful eyes, which seemed to speak her thought, and Rose's filled with tears.

"Come, my child: what are you going to do?" Mdlle. Lescalle asked, and anxiously waited the answer.

"Do you think, Aunt Mede, I might go to La Pinede with this good man who has brought the message, and will you go on to Marseilles with Dominique?"

"By all means," Mise Mede replied. "It was what I wanted you to do, Rosette. Here, Dominique, give Madame de Vedelles her bag; she is going the other way."

Rose had jumped off her saddle, and coming close to Mise Mede's mule, she threw her arms round her, looked up in her face, and said: "Kiss me, Aunt Mede."

"God bless you, my darling," the old lady said, bending down her venerable face to press her lips on Rose's white forehead. "Go, and do your best with that poor old faithful servant, and tell him that he must think of God first, and of his young master afterwards. Get him to receive the last sacraments, and who knows what may follow? Yes, yes, little woman, I know the meaning of that beseeching look. Rely on your old Aunt Mede. What can be done will be done; but remember who it is that holds the reins aloft, and knows better than we do every turn of life's road. What He does is well done, Rosy; so be off, my brave child, and do your duty. Many a more dreary ride have I taken than this one of thine—in old days, when life and death were at stake. Say your beads as you jog on, and hope for the best."

A fond embrace was given, and the old woman and the young one parted, and went on their way, each with a holy purpose, each with a silent prayer.

When some hours afterwards, Mdlle. Lescalle arrived at Marseilles, she went straight from the diligence to Mdlle. Lautard's house, but found her out. What next was to be done? It was quite uncertain when she would come home. There seemed nothing to do but wait. Waiting is hard at such moments, and she determined to try and find George de Vedelles. As Mdlle. Lautard's servants did not know where M. de Belmont lived, Mise Mede walked to the Admiralty, and there obtained his direction. Off she went to the house, the address of which had been given her, and rung the bell. She did not ask herself what she should say to George de Vedelles if she should find him at home. She thought that the promise made to God's servants, that He will put into their mouths the words they should speak when they appear before kings to bear witness to the truth, in a certain degree applies to all who plead the cause of right against wrong, of justice against injustice, even in the secret struggles of domestic life, and the obscure trials of individual souls. She could form no plan, she could find no words which might not prove entirely misplaced, according to the nature and state of mind of one she knew so little of as this strange young man, who had inspired once such aversion to the wife upon whom he had been forced, but for whom she now felt so evident an affection that if he did not return to her the bloom of her young life would vanish.

The bell was at last answered. M. de Belmont had left two days before, and gone on board his uncle's ship, which was to set sail that evening. Mise Mede's heart beat very fast.

"And the Baron George de Vedelles, is he at home?" she asked, with intense anxiety.

"No, madame; he is also on board the Jean Bart, that is to say, he slept there last night. He called here for his letters two hours ago. M. le Baron embarks also to-night for America, with M. le Comte de Belmont."

"How soon do you suppose will the ship sail?" Mdlle. Lescalle asked.

"I cannot tell exactly, madame; but I suppose towards sunset."

"How long would it take to get to it?"

"I cannot tell, madame; it lies at some distance in the bay. Dear me, M. le Comte's own servant was here just now. He would have known; but the sailors at the port, not far off, would be able to inform madame."

Mise Mede returned to Mdlle. Lautard's house, and there heard that she would perhaps find her at the military hospital, where there was much sickness just then—she helped the Sisters of Charity to nurse the soldiers.

These words made the thought flash through her mind that Denise—Sœur Denise—might be found there also, and thither she hurried with a speed wonderful at her age. Again, there was a weary time spent in the waiting-room, after sending a message to Mdlle. Lautard to say that she was there, and wished to see her on pressing business. At last she came, that good, brave woman, with her bright, fine face, her slightly hump-backed figure, so well known in Marseilles, and her cheering smile.

"My dear, dear old friend, is it you? I wrote to you yesterday that I had discovered M. de Belmont's address, and would try and see him on your business as soon as I could. Has anything happened since you wrote?"

"Yes, my good Amelie, a letter from George Vedelles came, announcing his immediate departure for America. He leaves Marseilles this evening with M. de Belmont in the Jean Bart"

"You take my breath away, my dear; but tell me quick, you still want to stop him?"

"Yes; for all sorts of reasons. It is a simple misunderstanding between those poor children—both so young, both so wrongly dealt with; a poor old servant at La Pinede is also dying, and sending for him. Rose is gone to him. My dear Amelie, all might still come right if we could stop him. But how to write a message, how to write a letter which would have that effect, and every moment is precious."

"Let us call Sœur Denise: she knows him, and we don't. I said something about him to her the other day. She told me that he is rather a strange youth, but with a great deal that is good in him, and cleverness too, she thinks, which none of his family seemed to suspect. Stop a minute, I will ask her to come and speak to you."

In a few minutes Sœur Denise came in with Mdlle. Lautard. Mise Mede, as she looked at the beautiful face under the white cornette, that face George de Vedelles had painted with marvelous talent, said to herself, "No wonder he cared for her," and there was a twinge in her heart as she thought that even her own dear, pretty, little Rose's loveliness could not stand comparison with the matchless face, the lovely figure, the commanding and at the same time most gentle beauty of that daughter of St. Vincent de Paul, that humble servant of the poor.

Seated between Mise Mede and Mdlle. Lautard, Sœur Denise listened like a compassionating angel to the story, briefly told, of those two young creatures whose fate was concerned in Mise Mede's present efforts, and when the latter ejaculated, "How to explain in a few words the whole of this strange case? How to indicate it in a way that would stop him just as the anchor is about to weigh, and he fancies he is doing right to go?"

"Would the news of the old servant's danger prevail upon him?" Sœur Denise asked.

"It might, or it might not; he might even suspect a trick to prevent his departure."

Sœur Denise leant her brow on her hands, and thought a little; then she looked up with her bright, serious smile, and said: "What a blessing it is to have given up the world! A Sister of Charity can do what a young lady could not have done. Wait a minute, I must have one word with ma sœur, and then perhaps we may be able to stop this mad departure."

She left the room, and soon returned with a letter in her hand, which she placed in Mise Mede's hands. It contained these words:

M. le Baron—Your old servant Vincent is dangerously ill, and asks for you. Give up your voyage, and go to him. You promised me that if I came to the Chapel of La Pinede on the last day of May, you would grant any request of mine, whatever it might be. I was there, and I now claim your promise.

DENISE DE LA PINEDE,
Fille de Charite.

Hopital Militaire.

"God bless you, Sœur Denise," Mise Mede exclaimed with tears in her eyes; "but let me just tell you that I am afraid of his going straight to La Pinede, and finding Rose, without having heard anything to enlighten him as to her present feelings towards him."

Sœur Denise took up a pen, and added this postscript: "Come first to the hospital. There are important reasons for this."

"Will you speak to him, Sœur Denise? Will you be the angel of peace that will reconcile him to his young wife? He never could resist you, I feel sure of that."

"I am not going to be an angel at all in the matter," Sœur Denise answered, with that playful simplicity so common amongst the Sisters of Charity. "If ma sœur approves of it, I have no objection to see the young Baron, and to give him a good scolding. Oh, here comes our messenger. Shall the note go as it is, Mdlle. Lescalle, or will you add anything to it?"

"Oh, no," both Mise Mede and Mdlle. Lautard exclaimed; and the missive was placed in the hands of a young sailor belonging to one of Sœur Denise's poor families, who promised not to lose a minute in conveying it to the gentleman on board the Jean Bart.

The bells of Notre Dame de la Garde were ringing the Angelus; the softened sound of their chimes floated in the transparent air as the setting sun was sinking into a bed of rosy-colored clouds, leaving behind it that bright, lingering light which is so striking on a summer's evening on the Mediterranean Sea.

George de Vedelles was standing on the deck of the vessel, which in another hour was to weigh anchor. Sunk into a deep reverie, he was thinking at that moment of three persons, two of whom would grieve at his departure, and one who would not know of it, or if she did, never give it a thought. There was his mother. He loved her very much. When she had been ill after her accident, his misery had showed him how strong was that love. But there had been a bitter feeling in his heart for many a long day, which had saddened his affection for her. She had been tender, very tender, to him, very gentle and kind; she had grieved at his father's harshness, and tried to make up for it; but she had not the least understood either his character, his state of health, or his sufferings of mind.

Just as much as M. de Vedelles and Jacques, she had looked upon him since his illness as a sort of grown-up child, or a nervous invalid, without energy or will or intellect. She had plotted with the others too to bring about his marriage, that marriage which had caused him such bitter humiliations. She had, indeed, had scruples on the subject, but they had been expressed too late to avail. But after resolving to abandon his home and the wife that had been forced upon him, and on whom he had been forced, now, at the last moment, the thought of his mother's sorrow haunted him. It had done so the whole of that day, but when in a café, where he had breakfasted, he had taken up the newspaper, and read the news of his brother's election as Deputy des Bouches du Rhone, his heart had hardened again for a while. They all had what they had striven for, and schemed for—Jacques his seat, his parents the full gratification of their pride in him, M. Lescalle a good settlement and the title of Baronne for his daughter. It was all as it should be, and no one had any right to complain.

"Poor old Vincent will be sorry," he thought. "Except my mother, he is the only creature in the world who really cares for me. I shall write to him from the first place we stop at." His eyes, which were wandering over the busy town he was about to leave, fixed themselves at that moment on a square ugly building which he knew well by sight, the military hospital. "Well, who knows but I may tread in her footsteps; who knows that I may not some day do as she is doing, live for God alone and the poor."

It was not the first time that thought had struck him since he had left Belbousquet. The fact was that his conscience was not completely satisfied with his reasoning, and had now and then given signs of protesting, which it was necessary to lull and the dream of a sublime vocation to be hereafter followed, proved useful as an anodyne to troublesome doubts.

These deep musings were interrupted by M. de Belmont's voice, who cried to him from the opposite side of the deck. "George, here is a sailor-boy who has brought a letter for you with 'immediate' written upon it."

The blood rushed to George's face and brow. He had no doubt some of his family, or his wife's relations, had written to stop his departure, and all the combativeness of his nature was roused. He felt almost inclined not to read the letter before the ship sailed. Then the fear that his mother might be ill crossed him. "Good God!" he immediately exclaimed, "I cannot run such a risk," and he advanced to meet the boy, who held out the letter to him.

The instant he saw the handwriting his heart began to beat violently. When he had read the few lines addressed to him, he looked pale and agitated, but did not for a moment hesitate. Going straight up to M. de Belmont, he said, "Aloys, you will think me a very strange person, but I must go back. I cannot start with you. I have had bad news."

"Your parents?"

"No; our old servant Vincent is dangerously ill, and asks for me. I must be with him before he dies."

"Well, if it had been one of your family, my dear fellow—but really, I cannot see—. After you had made up your mind that you had such strong reasons for leaving France, it does seem rather changeable. I am afraid my uncle will be annoyed. He did not want to take you. I had to argue, to urge, even to exaggerate the importance of your absentsing yourself for some time, to induce him to consent; and now, half an hour before sailing—"

"I cannot help it, Aloys."

"Oh, of course, poets are endowed with wonderful sensibility, and are very wayward also; but I think this is really an exaggerated amount of feeling. If all you have tried to convince me of is the case—if you are determined not to return to your wife—"

"Quite as determined as ever—"

"Why, then, you are preparing for yourself and her all sorts of disagreeable scenes, which you so strongly argued you wished to avoid. Come, write a kind note to this poor old man, and do not in a moment give up what you took days to decide on."

"I cannot explain to you, Aloys, all the circumstances of the case. There is a promise in question, and I am bound in honor as well as feeling to go this very moment on shore."

"Who sent this note?"

"A Sister of Charity," George replied, commanding his emotion. Turning to the young sailor, he said, "I will return with you in your boat. Aloys, let my portmanteau and bag be handed down. Good-bye, dear and kind friend; do not judge me severely; I am not as wayward as you think."

"Well, stop a minute; I must give you, if you are really going, a letter I received just now from Paris. It contains some good news, enough to turn your head. Good heaven! there is the first signal given; we shall be off in a few minutes. God bless you, old fellow! Write to me."

In half an hour George de Vedelles entered the waiting-room of the military hospital. It was full of people, and sisters in white cornettes flitted across it now and then, speaking one moment to one person and then to another. Some one came up to him and asked him whom he was waiting to see. He stammered out, "Sœur Denise." "She will be here in a moment," was the reply, and he sat down again with a strange sort of wonder that he was going to see Denise again, in such a new scene and under such different circumstances. Each cornette that appeared at the door he watched with anxiety. At last one did appear, and under it the beautiful face he had so worshipped. It was not changed—not at all changed, and yet it looked different, or else he looked upon it with different feelings. He was less agitated than before she had entered the room. He looked at her for some time previously to her seeing him.

She was leading by the hand two little children who had been visiting their father, a sick soldier and telling the person who had brought them to come again in a week's time. Then she turned to an old man, sitting with his chin resting on his stick, and joked and laughed with him till she made him look merry; and next she examined papers presented to her by a pale soldier with his arm in a sling, and gave him directions about the office where he was to apply for admission. Yes, she looked just as beautiful as ever; and each poor person who spoke to her seemed to hang on her words as if there had been in them a spell to bring them relief. It was delightful to watch her, as with a light step, a clear voice, and a pretty resolute manner, she got through her business with each of those who had asked for her. But as he watched and gazed, George felt that a change had come over Denise de la Pinede, which unconsciously was changing also the feelings with which he looked upon her. The wild, the agitating, the sentimental worship with which he had regarded the girl who, like an angel of beauty and brightness, had visited her ancestral home, and roused in him the first emotions of a romantic affection, seemed to disappear like magic in the presence of the earnest, business-like, serene, sweet-faced Sister of Charity. They melted away in the healthy sunshine of her joyous, placid countenance as the white frost disappears from the pane where it had formed fanciful pictures. By this time she perceived him, and coming up to him with a smile, said:

"Oh, M. le Baron, I wanted to speak to you."

George felt quite calm and composed.

"You must excuse me," Sœur Denise said, "if I doubted for an instant that a dying person's wish to see you, and that person an old man who has loved you from a child, would be sufficient to decide you to give up your departure. Excuse me for having thought it necessary to claim the fulfilment of a rash promise, which you had probably by this time forgotten."

"I have forgotten nothing," George answered, "and I thank you for having made it impossible for me to hesitate between two duties which seemed equally imperative."

"That of consoling Vincent on his death-bed, and the other? What was that other duty, M. George?"

There was a sort of smile on Denise's face, a look of amusement in her dark, bright eyes, which piqued George, and he answered with a heightened color:

"May I ask, ma sœur, if in writing to claim the fulfilment of my promise, and stopping my departure, you were actuated by the sole desire that I should visit poor Vincent on his death-bed?"

"No, M. le Baron, I wished also to save you from committing a wrong and foolish action."

"What do you mean? How can you judge of my reasons? You do not even know what where my intentions."

"I know this much, that you are married to a virtuous and amiable girl, and that without her consent—without the knowledge of your parents, to whom you owe respect, if not obedience; you are acting on pure impulse, and abandoning your home, your wife, and your duties in a fit of anger or despondency."

There was something so severe in the expression of Sœur Denise's countenance, that George quailed beneath her glance. He had once looked upon her as an angel sent to console him when his mother's illness was breaking his heart. Now she seemed like a heavenly messenger commissioned to upbraid him. He felt half indignant, half subdued. His cheek was flushed and his brow contracted. He burst forth in a tone of voice as loud as was compatible with the fear of being heard by some of the groups scattered about the room, and began to justify himself. He spoke of having been forced to marry a girl he did not care for. Sœur Denise interrupted him and said:

"No force should have compelled you to do that, M. George; you are a perfectly truthful person, and I am sure you will not venture to say that it was not optional for you to resist the pressure put upon you."

"My parents were bent on this marriage."

"If you were bound to obey them then, what right have you now to fly in their faces by forsaking the wife they have given you?"

"She hates me, and I can never love her."

"Are you sure she hates you? Have you tried to love her? Have you tried to make her love you? Have you forgot that you are bound to her by the vows you made before God's altar, and that you have no right to deal with her as with a stranger? M. le Baron, you are a man of honor; you would not have broken a promise you gave me, half in joke, perhaps, and you deliberately break one you made to protect and cherish this young girl whom God has committed to your keeping, and for whose soul you will have to answer, if, abandoned at the age of seventeen to all the temptations of youth and inexperience, she should stray from the path of virtue and honor. You have not thought of this; you have been deluding yourself; you have been on the point of committing a great sin. Thank God that He has saved you from it. Oh, M. de Vedelles, how blind you have been! how nearly wicked without knowing it!"

"She hates me, and my wish was to deliver her from the presence of one whom she looks upon with aversion."

Sœur Denise made a little gesture of impatience, and said:

"Because a child like your young wife turned her back upon you once and vexed you, are both your lives to be wretched? Do your duty: leave the rest to God. Would I had still, as some hours ago, the right to command you!"

"Sœur Denise," George exclaimed with emotion, "listen to me; I am not so bad as you think me. I really thought what I meant to do was best for Rose, and my plans were not selfish. I left her all the means of enjoyment I renounced, and my intention was to offer myself to work with the Catholic missionaries in the South Sea Islands, and lead, far away from Europe, the sort of life you are leading here."

Sœur Denise could not repress a smile.

"My dear M. de Vedelles," she replied, "that was a very fine dream, but it is God alone who can call people to lives of this sort, not their own deluded fancies. You have before you your path traced out. It may still be a happy one."

George shook his head.

"You can make it a happy one if you choose, even if it was full of trials and sorrows. But earthly happiness may still be yours, if you do not thrust it from you. I have a great mind to tell you a secret, in two words, for I must be off. That little wife of yours—you know I have never told a lie in my life, even for a good object—I say, your wife loves you, and is breaking her heart at your leaving her. Good-bye, M. de Vedelles! Give my kind regards to M. Vincent, and tell him that Sœur Denise will offer up her communion for him to-morrow."

As she passed through the passage into the wards, Sœur Denise met Mademoiselle Lescalle, who had been praying during the whole time of the interview. She took her by the hand and led her to the window. It was getting dark, but they could see George hurrying down the street leading to the Bureau des Diligences.

"There he goes," she whispered to Mise Mede.

"Does he know he will find Rose at La Pinede?"

"No, I thought it better not to tell him so. I think all will be right; but now we must leave the rest to our good God, and hope for the best."

CHAPTER XX.

ROSE AT LA PINEDE.

It was about five o'clock in the morning when George de Vedelles got out of the diligence at the place where the cross-roads which led to La Pinede branched off from the high-road. The sun was rising, and the birds beginning to sing. After the jolting and the dust of the drive in the diligence there was something wonderfully refreshing in the morning air and the quiet stillness of the olive and orange groves through which he walked on his way to the chateau. During the hours of darkness in the coupe of the diligence he had meditated on his conversation with Sœur Denise, and marveled at the change which he felt had come over him. He had so often indulged in walking dreams, of which she had been the object, that he could hardly realize having actually seen and spoken to her, looked in her face, and listened to her voice with so little emotion. What had become of that passion which still, a few hours ago, had seemed so strong? He hardly liked to acknowledge to himself the change which he could not but feel had taken place in the nature of his feelings. It was a relief to have seen her, and not to have grudged her to God and the poor, but the very relief of this change seemed to leave a void behind it. He had often called her in his solitary musings his Beatrice, and compared her to the heavenly object of Dante's poetic worship. He tried to reawaken in himself this vision—but no, he could not recall it such as he had so often conjured it up in the shades of night, or amidst the sunshiny hills, or on the solitary sea shore.

Instead of it he saw the image of another Denise, one beautiful indeed, and lovable as ever, but unlike the ideal Denise of his waking dreams. She walked this earth doing good, that holy and lovely Sister of Charity. She carried dirty children in her arms, joked and laughed, and moreover she had laughed at him, George de Vedelles, and scolded him, and held cheap his romantic plans of heroic self-devotion.

This all told on his feelings: she knew what she was about, that artful Sœur Denise, and she had produced the very effect which she had intended. Then those last few words she had said, that secret she had let out—Had it not also done its work? did they not occur and re-occur to George's mind during that night which seemed so long in the rumbling vehicle, and did they not haunt him yet more as he walked in the dawning light of morn up the hills leading to La Pinede?

"Your wife loves you!" Could that be possible? He had so much faith in Denise that he could not doubt that she had grounds for what she said; and if so, did not the whole position of affairs change between him and Rose?

As the glorious sun of the south rose higher and higher in the horizon, and Nature seemed to hail its beams, so did a feeling of unwon'ted warmth and joy expand in a heart that had been embittered into hardness, and clouded with dark shadows.

Suppose she did love him, that pretty little Rose; suppose she had a heart and mind capable of corresponding with the deeper thoughts and aspirations which had been struggling into life in his own soul since Denise's vocation and Toinette's death-bed had roused his latent faith, would not happiness be possible? was not night breaking on the future, which had hitherto seemed so hopeless?

Such were George's thoughts as he approached La Pinede. The gate was unlocked, and he walked up the avenue at a rapid pace and with an earnest hope that poor old Vincent would still be alive and conscious of his arrival.

The door of the house was also open; he walked into the hall, and then looked into the drawing-room. The sight which met his eyes took him by surprise. On his mother's sofa near the chimney, Rose, in her walking dress, was lying asleep, looking like a beautiful child, with her fair hair about her face, and her dark eye-lashes wet with tears. Her head was resting on one of her small hands, and the other was laid on an open book by her side.

George approached her with a beating heart, and treading as softly as he could, he gazed at the lovely sleeping face with irresistible emotion. "And does she love me?" he said to himself. "Oh, my God," he murmured, kneeling down by the couch; "let it be so," and tears streamed down his face. His eyes fell on the open book. It was the life of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, and the little hand upon it was placed on the lines he had written on the margin of one of the pages.

How much was revealed by the choice and the position of that book! He felt it; and an irresistible impulse made him bend down and kiss the hand of his young wife. Rose opened her large blue eyes, and when she saw George's face close to hers she rubbed those lovely blue eyes, and said, "It is a dream!" and turned her head on the pillow as if she wished to go to asleep again.

"Sleep on, dear Rose," he whispered; "I shall come back when I have seen Vincent."

The words, though breathed so low that he thought she could hardly have heard them, made her start up on the couch, and looking him in the face she stared at him a moment, and then said—

"Wait—wait; I must tell you—I must speak to you first—before you go upstairs."

"Am I too late? Oh, poor old Vincent! Is he dead?"

And as Rose did not answer, but took his hand in hers, and he felt her hot tears falling upon them, he knew it was so, and sobbed like a child.

"George, dear George," she said, still holding his hand in hers, "be comforted; he died so peacefully—just after receiving Holy Communion; M. le Cure gave him the last absolution and blessing; the dear old man said to me, 'You will tell M. George that I have had the last sacraments, and ask him to pray for me.'"

"Oh, you good little angel," George exclaimed; "you were with him, then, and he did not die uncomf'orted?"

"Till I arrived he would not listen to M. le Cure, and kept calling for you. But it seemed to calm him when I came and spoke of you. He wanted to send you a message."

"What message was it?"

Rose colored deeply, turned her head away, and was silent.

"I cannot tell you now; another time, perhaps."

"I guess what it was," George said gently, taking her hand in his, and making her turn towards him. "Was it to tell me that we are to love one another?"

Rose blushed, and George kissed her for the first time; then, taking her hand, he said—

"Let us go up together, my wife, and pray by the side of our dear old friend, and promise God that we shall do what he wished. Shall we not love each other, Rose, and together serve God?"

"Like the good Duke Louis and his dear St. Elizabeth," Rose said, pointing to the volume on the sofa.

George smiled through his tears, and they went up together to the room where old Vincent's body was laid out, with a crucifix on his breast, and fresh flowers, gathered by Rose, at his feet. There they renewed their marriage vows, and prayed a long time side by side.

It was five o'clock in the morning when they came down stairs and went out on the terrace, where the birds were singing, and the gentle morning breeze stirred the branches of the acacias. One of the maid-servants, who had found out George's arrival, and seen him from the kitchen crossing the hall, asked if they would have coffee under the trees, and something to eat, an offer which they gladly accepted, for the fatigues and emotions of the last few hours had rather exhausted them. The meal was a silent one. Their hearts were too full for speech, but how different was that silence from that of their meals at Belbousquet. Now and then their eyes met, and then on Rose's cheeks, which were paler than usual, a deep color suddenly rose, and made her look prettier than ever.

He could hardly believe she was the same girl he once thought so uninteresting, and in truth never had a greater change perhaps taken place in so short a time than the last few weeks had wrought in his young wife.

They had awakened in her new feelings of a double sort, strong religious impressions, and a human affection, pure, and hallowed by a sacred tie. The light of faith had shown on her soul like a sunbeam, and a timid love for her husband had arisen simultaneously. No wonder that her countenance was transfigured, no wonder that the commonplace prettiness of a thoughtless girl had become womanly beauty of a higher order. Suffering had paled her cheek, and she had grown thinner, but it had given a tenderness to her soft eyes, and a sweetness to her smile, which touched and captivated George. As to Rose, it was not quite so new to her to admire George's dark eyes and thoughtful brow. She remembered how often by stealth she had looked at him at Belbousquet. She thought of those melancholy moments when nothing but a few cold unmeaning words passed their lips, and enjoyed a silence which seemed to express more than either of them could utter just then.

But when the meal was finished they held a consultation, still sitting under the acacia trees. What should they do? George's parents were expected that evening at La Pinede. Should they wait for them or return to Belbousquet? Rose blushed and said, "What would you like to do?"

"What I should like," he said, "would be to stroll slowly, very slowly, through the woods to our little villa to borrow for your Matthias' donkey which we can bring back to-morrow to take with us some provisions and dine in the cave grove by the side of a well I have often sketched to rest at noon in the shade, and arrive at home late in the afternoon."

Rose did not answer: a large tear rolled down her cheek and fell on one of the wallflowers she held in her hand. George took the flowers from her and said—

"What makes you cry, Rose? Do tell me, I want to know."

"It is nothing," she said, raising her tearful eyes to his, and smiling. "I am so glad you are come back," and she gently laid her hand on his with so deep a blush that for a moment she looked as rosy as ever.

"But, then, why do you cry?" he asked again kissing her small hand.

"Oh, I cannot explain it."

"But you ought to tell me: you know that I must always be your best friend, your comforter, Rose."

She smiled and said, "I cried very often during those days at Belbousquet, only you did not notice it."

"Oh, will you ever forgive the odious, sulky, unkind wretch who treated you so ill, who was so cold and so unjust to you, who was determined to think you hated him? Oh, my dear Rose, you will never know, you will never understand—"

He hid his face in his hands and remained silent.

"George," she gently said, "I know—I understand it all. I know what you have felt—what you have suffered, and I am glad that it was one so good, so holy that you loved. We can think of her and speak of her together as if she was an angel protecting us."

George looked up greatly surprised. "Who told you about her? How did you hear?"

"Oh, if you knew how I have gazed on her picture, wishing I had been like her, and repeated to myself those lines beginning, 'If thou hadst been the guiding light.'"

"You are a little witch, Rose," George exclaimed, rather agitated. "no one but myself ever knew of those lines."

"Oh, sir, it took a long time to put together the little bits of paper scattered on the grass behind the old bench," Rose said with a smile.

"So you know all and you forgive me. Then you are a perfect angel," he exclaimed.

"Oh, no," she answered, "it is so easy to forgive when one is happy, and I think you have also something to forgive."

George looked up anxiously. "Had you, Rose, cared—"

"For any one else before I married you? Oh, no, never; but, George, that look when you spoke to me at the Capucins, which made you write that terrible letter, I am so sorry I ever looked at you in that way."

"Never mind how you looked at me then, Rose, so that you will often look at me as you are doing now."

And thus they talked on for some time and then George went to order the donkey and to store a basket with their noonday meal.

Rose sat on, wondering at the change which a few short hours had effected in her life. The scenes of the last night imparted a solemn and affecting character to this new-found happiness. Old Vincent's dying wish was amply fulfilled. She looked up at the windows of the room where the old man had died, and breathed a prayer for his soul. Just then the sound of a horse's feet in the avenue started her, and turning her eyes that way she saw a man trotting up the avenue. As he reached the bottom of the terrace she saw him tie his horse to a tree, and rapidly mount the steps.

It was Artemon Richer. He came up to her with a broad smile on his face, and began with great volubility to express his anxiety at hearing that she was alone at La Pinede, and that some one had died there in the night.

"It was a horrible thing," he said, "that all this anxiety and trouble should have devolved upon her. He had heard at Belbousquet where he had called to pay his respects, that M. le Baron was absent from home, that none of his family were at La Pinede, and M. Lescaete on an electioneering tour, and it had occurred to him that the services of a friend might be acceptable, or, at any rate," he added with a deep sigh, and a very sentimental expression of countenance, "the intense sympathy of one who could never cease to feel a most respectful solicitude for her happiness, and an ardent desire to relieve her of any cares or trouble which, in her loneliness, must so heavily weigh upon her mind."

Rose—partly from fatigue, and partly from the sad and then joyful emotions she had undergone—was in that state where tears and laughter are both readily excited. There was something so ridiculous in the affectation of profound sensibility which the jolly and impudent Artemon assumed, and which suited so ill with his broad, handsome, but vulgar face, that her risible nerves were stimulated beyond control, and to hide that she was bursting with laughter she put her handkerchief before her mouth. The sight of the handkerchief raised to her face instantly convinced Artemon that she was deeply affected by his sympathy, and he was beginning a speech with the exclamation of—"Ah, madame," the sequel of which was abruptly cut short by the appearance of George, who came out of the house to announce that the donkey was at the door, and the basket of provisions ready.

He started at the sight of Artemon, and so did that gentleman. Rose stood up, and commanding her countenance as well as she could, she said to her husband—

"M. Richer called to offer me his services about the arrangements with regard to poor Vincent's funeral. It was very kind of him. He did not know you had returned."

The corners of Rose's little mouth gave visible signs that she would not be able much longer to keep her countenance.

George, on the contrary, made a very formal courteous bow to M. Richer, and thanked him for his civility with a self-possession and dignity of manner that took the disappointed Artemon entirely by surprise.

"Oh, of course," he said, "as M. le Baron was at home there could be no occasion for any other assistance. Still, if he could be of any use, he hoped, as a neighbor, they would command his services—" and for once in his life Artemon became confused, and broke off in the middle of his civil speech rather abruptly, and with a heightened color.

George spoke calmly and civilly to the embarrassed visitor, hinted that his wife and himself must at once set out on their homeward way, and begged him to excuse their leaving him, at the same time begging him to rest his horse and take some refreshment.

As Rose looked at these two men as they stood side by side, and contrasted the vulgar, gigantic bourgeois with the refined, pale, and sensitive young man of high birth and gentle breeding who was speaking to him, the thought of all she had escaped, of all that had been given to her, rushed upon her mind, and this time it was tears, not laughter, she had to hide.

Artemon bowed departed, and rode down the avenue. Once he looked back, and the picture which met his eyes was, Rose mounted on her donkey and George passing the bridle on his arm. He saw her lovely face turned toward her husband with a look of inexpressible sweetness and peaceful contentment, and his attitude of unmistakable fond attention to his little wife. Did this sight enrage him, or did it give him an entirely new idea as to love and marriage—an idea tending to make him a somewhat better man, and possibly, when he, too, married later on, a better husband than he would otherwise have been. We cannot tell; seeds are sometimes sown on unpromising soil which bear unexpected fruits. Perhaps Artemon Richer derived some faint notion of the sanctity and beauty of wedded love from the glimpse he had of it that day.

CHAPTER XXI.

A STROLL THROUGH THE WOODS.

THERE are hours, even on earth, of nearly perfect happiness. Such were those during which George de Vedelles and his wife rode and walked across the beautiful hills and through the woods which separated La Pinede from Belbousquet: their hearts had been softened by their sorrow at old Vincent's death, and were prepared to welcome happiness in a spirit not of wild excitement, but of humble and peaceful joy. Every moment they became more and more at ease with each other.

The deep solitude of those shady groves; the perfume which the thyme, trodden under the donkey's feet exhaled; the fitful play of the sunshine on the green sward, the hum of the wild bees, seemed to chime in with the glad thoughts which both were dwelling on during moments of silence which seemed to unite their souls even more closely than conversation. They often thus remained without speaking, and it was not till they made their mid-day halt by the side of the well George had described, that they talked much to one another. There, sitting on the moss, he told Rose the whole history of his past life. He described to her all he had suffered from the day that—recovering from what had appeared a hopeless illness—he had begun to regain physical strength by slow degrees, and at the same time felt a deadly weight oppressing his mental faculties and his moral energies to a degree which made exertion impossible, but at the same time left him in full possession of his imaginative powers, which seemed to thrive like wild flowers in a fallow soil. "Like those wild flowers," he said, "which run over the waste grounds of La Pinede, and which for that reason I loved and pitied when—"

"When I said they ought to be rooted out. Oh, George, I have learnt so much since then. But go on, tell me all about that time of your life."

"Well, I got into the habit of taking long solitary walks; I never felt happy except when alone in the woods and the narrow valleys round Valsec. I liked to remain whole days lying down on a mossy bank, listening to the noise of the wind amongst the fir trees, and gazing on the magnificent outline of the Jura mountains. How many evenings, too, I spent gazing at the stars through the quivering branches above my head; the sights and sounds of nature in those wild solitudes filled me with new thoughts, new emotions, new perceptions, and, I may say, new powers, for though I had lost the use of faculties which had been overstrained before my illness, God seemed mercifully to make up for it by turning my mind in another direction. I discovered that I possessed a talent I had, till then, been unconscious of. I felt that I was meant to be a poet. But I could not speak to others of this gift. A sort of strange, wayward reserve took possession of my soul and made me averse to disclose what sometimes I feared was only a self-deception, a childish illusion. I dreaded my mother's questions, my father's scorn, my brother's ridicule. Meanwhile, my devotion to poetry became so absorbing that it made me silent, absent, and unsocial. I cared for nothing but to be alone, to hold converse with nature, and drink and express in verse the strange new thoughts that filled my mind. When we left Valsec and came to live at La Pinede, I beheld the sea for the first time. You cannot understand, Rose, you who have always lived on this coast; the emotion I felt at the sight of that boundless expanse of deep blue, and the sparkling silvered waves breaking on the soft sand, or dashing against the rocks, they seemed to me as if they were singing hymns of joy and praise, or sometimes whispering wailing complaints, and I longed to give words to that wild music. Does this seem nonsense to you, Rose?"

"No, George. It is all very new to me but it gives me pleasure to listen to what you say. Oh, I understand now why you were seen sometimes at night and early in the morning walking up and down the sea shore talking to yourself. People thought—"

"That I was out of my mind? I know they did. I sometimes used to see children and women too, running away as if they had seen a ghost; but I did not care about it, I was so engrossed with my own dreams. Oh, how it used to vex me when my father complained of the odious shingles on the beach, my mother of the wind and Jacques of the sameness of the sea view. It was as if people had attacked a dear friend of mine. I found it more and more difficult to converse with those who seemed to think everything I said more or less foolish. Even my dear mother, tender and kind as she always was, spoke to me and of me as if I had been a weak and fanciful child. She struggled to obtain for her wayward son full liberty to lead, on account of his health, the life he pleased, but which she supposed to be an utterly aimless one. They little knew how hard, in one sense, I worked during those hours of solitude not as a student over his books, but as a gardener who must have for his helpers the spring showers, the summer sunshine. It was a strange, lonely existence, but not quite an unhappy one till—"

George stopped, and Rose pressed his hand and said in a low voice:

"Go on, let me hear what you felt, what you hoped, and what you suffered from the day you first saw Mademoiselle de la Pinede."

"Do you really wish me to open my heart to you entirely?"

"Every corner and recess of it," Rose answered.

Then he related to her the whole history of Denise's first visit to La Pinede, of the love at first sight which had taken possession of his heart, of his hopes against hope that it would meet with a return; of the days she had spent in his mother's sick room, of the admiration and reverence with which he had watched her life of heroic perfection, and the enthusiasm which had made his love of her a worship; the despair he had felt at her retirement from the world, and the consequent despondency which had rendered him indifferent and listless to everything regarding his future fate. Here he paused, and another pressure of Rose's hand made him again exclaim—

"Oh, I never understood how wrong it was to marry as I did; how hard it was upon you; how easily we might both have been wretched for life! No thanks to me, Rose, if we are, on the contrary, so much happier than I deserve!"

"No thanks to either of us, George. Thanks to God's great goodness to us. But tell me, when did you change? When did you begin to feel that you could care about me? I have told you, sir, how I surprised your secrets, how I read what you wrote; how I heard from Toinette and Benoit that you were good and clever, and then began—"

"To love me?" George said, in a low voice.

Rose did not repeat the words, but she hid her face with her hands and tears trickled down through her slender fingers, which he tenderly kissed away.

And then he told her of the promise he had made to Denise in a thoughtless hour and the use she made of it. He related to her the way in which she had stopped his departure, and pointed out to him the fault he had been on the point of committing. He said that even during the days of Belbousquet, he had been sometimes touched by Rose's patient endurance of his hateful conduct, which he now saw in its true light, but that he had hardened his heart by a sort of perverse obstinacy, and persisted in his rash resolution.

"But," he continued, "when she told me—you must forgive her for it, Rose—that you were beginning to love your unworthy and ungracious husband, I, too, began, my little darling, to see what a madman I was to run away from one whom God had given me for my own; and when I found you at La Pinede, where you had been a ministering angel to my poor old Vincent, when I saw you in that room where I had suffered so much; when you opened those soft blue eyes of yours and looked at me with such inexpressible sweetness, I fell in love with you, dear Rose, and that is the end of my story." He paused, and then added, "the beginning of a new life."

Time passed away in those mutual outpourings, and it was long before George and Rose could think or speak of anything but their own history during the last few weeks; but before they left their resting-place—a spot neither of them ever forgot as the scene of their new-found happiness—George drew from his pocket the small parcel which Aloys de Belmont placed in his hands just as he was leaving the ship on the previous day. His cheeks flushed a little as he read a letter it contained, and then glanced at some newspapers enclosed in it; Rose watched him and wondered what it could be which seemed to cause him so much emotion. At last he said:

"Rose, I am so glad for you! I hope it is not pride that makes me rejoice at this news. Read this letter and these papers my darling, and thank God with me that I may perhaps be yet of some little use in the world, though not a deputy," he added with a smile.

They would have been a pretty study for a painter, those two young creatures, sitting on a mossy bank, the quivering light through the pine trees shining upon them through the green branches, and the expression of their faces as variable as those lights and shadows which changed with every breeze—his eager, pale face slightly flushed, his dark eyes kindling, and hers filling with tears as she read the papers he placed in her hands.

Oh, it was a glorious moment for the young couple, one of those unexpected pleasures that make the heart beat for joy. The letter was addressed to Aloys de Belmont. It was from a literary friend of his in Paris, who had transacted the publication of a volume of George de Vedelles' poetry. It had just appeared under an assumed name and its success had been instantaneous.

"Your friend's verses," he wrote, "are in every one's hands, and there is but one opinion as to the remarkable talent they evince. M. de Lamartine praises them, Delphine Gay has already recited the 'Ode to the Stormy Petrel;' people talk of nothing else. The 'Lays of Provence' have made quite a sensation. The general impression is that France possesses a new poet, and one whose inspirations are derived from the purest sources, a deeply religious spirit and an intense love of nature."

The reviews which accompanied this letter all praised the originality and beauty of George's poems. A few criticisms were mingled with the most gratifying encouragement.

This was, indeed, a filling up of their cup of happiness. Rose inserted the precious documents into her bag and would not part with it for a moment. She rode her donkey with a feeling of triumph which made her now and then break out into little incomprehensible exclamations. But when George said, "Would dear old Vincent could have known this," then her poor little heart, so full of various emotions, overflowed, and she burst into tears. If for many a year George had silently suffered from the absence of sympathy, it was amply made up to him that day.

CHAPTER XXII.

ALL IS WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

Now we must shift the scene, retrace our steps, and relate what had happened during the last two days to other personages of our story, and what had been in particular Madame Lescalle's state of mind and course of action since she had received a visit from Thereson on the afternoon after Mise Mede and Rose had left Belbousquet for Marseilles.

Her husband had been devoting himself to the business of Jacques de Vedelles' election, and his efforts were crowned with success. Thanks to his unremitting exertions, and the popular manners and gift of sneaking which his candidate possessed, the young Count had been returned by a fair majority. The news of his election reached M. and Madame de Vedelles in Paris, and made them resolve to return at once to La Pinede, where Jacques wished to invite some of his constituents, and entertain the neighbors.

It was a different kind of life opening before the new Deputy's parents. M. de Vedelles was enchanted and in high good humor, Madame de Vedelles pleased but preoccupied and anxious about her younger son, whose short and uncommunicative letters left her in complete doubt as to his feelings about his wife, and his prospects of happiness in domestic life. She longed to judge of this by her own eyes, and had been in consequence glad to leave Paris, and travel southward. It was settled that they should sleep one night at Draguignan to meet Jacques and M. Toussaint Lescalle, and on the following day return together to La Pinede.

This plan was so far carried out that they did arrive at the quaint old-fashioned hotel of that provincial town on the appointed day, and had a pleasant meeting with their son, who was radiant with delight at his new honors, and looking the picture of happiness. There was also a broad grin on M. Lescalle's face, and the reciprocal cordiality between the members of this family party as they sat down to dinner left nothing to desire.

It was a lovely evening, the same evening on which George de Vedelles had stood on the deck of the Jean Bart, on the point of sailing away from France, and on which Rose had knelt by the side of the dying old servant at La Pinede, as the setting sun poured into the room its last bright beams. Acacia and catalpa trees shaded the window of the inn where the de Vedelles and M. Lescalle were enjoying a good dinner, and the reminiscences of the electoral struggle, so happily successful. Under the shade of those lovely trees they sipped their coffee, and continued this interesting conversation. They would all most likely have slept very well that night, and dreamed of balloting urns and huzzas, and speeches on the hustings and in the Chamber, if, just as they were wishing each other good-night, and going to their respective rooms, a messenger had not arrived post haste with two letters from Madame Lescalle, addressed one to her husband, and the other to the Comtesse de Vedelles.

"What can have happened?" M. Lescalle thought, and Madame de Vedelles said. Of course, as happens in such cases, in the twinkling of an eye, and whilst opening these missives, all sorts of terrible possibilities crossed their minds.

The contents relieved them from the fear of some absolutely fatal announcement, but left them agitated, perplexed and bewildered. What a dreadful specimen of the art of tormenting it is to leave people in suspense as to some communication, the nature of which they cannot guess at, and about which imagination is allowed full play! Madame Lescalle's letters proved a wonderful instance of this kind of infliction. The one to her husband was as follows:

Mon Ami—Finding from your last letter that you were to dine and sleep at Draguignan to-day, to meet the Count and Countess de Vedelles and their eldest son, I think it my duty to inform you that it is of the most urgent importance that they and you and your sister, whom I have also written to, should meet me to-morrow at Belbousquet, to confer on a subject of the deepest gravity, upon which it is necessary that some decision should be at once arrived at.

Your daughter's happiness is at stake, and so is the honor of our family. An immediate separation between her and her despicable husband must be legally arranged. We are not going to be trodden under foot by these aristocrats, and our child despised and insulted. I have not been so explicit in my letter to the Countess.—("Explicit, indeed!" M. Lescalle muttered between his teeth, as he glanced down the page, and saw that it ended only with these words.)—I have contented myself with telling her that it is absolutely necessary I should see her and the Count, and that from ten o'clock in the morning I shall be awaiting them and you at Belbousquet.

The Countess had changed color whilst reading Madame Lescalle's short note to her. She handed it to her husband, and then said in a quiet manner, though with a trembling voice, to M. Lescalle: "Can you throw any light on this summons? I see you have also received a letter from your wife."

M. Lescalle resolved in his own mind to make light of the matter until more was known on the subject, so with a shrug he said "My idea is that Madame Lescalle has planned a little practical joke in order to have the pleasure of assembling us all at Belbousquet, which she has been dying to show to Madame la Comtesse."

Madame de Vedelles' face showed how little she could accept that supposition. The old Count's brow darkened, and he sat with a curled lip and an expression of deep displeasure, which made Jacques go up to him and say, after reading Madame Lescalle's note:

"I have no doubt as to what has happened. The young people have had some little dispute. Madame Lescalle, naturally enough, has taken her daughter's part and a tragical view of the matter. Mothers fire up easily on such matters, don't they, madame?" he said, going up to his mother, and putting his arm round her waist. "Now, I really think the best thing will be to accept Madame Lescalle's rendezvous, and post off as fast as we can to-morrow to meet her and our young couple. Is not that your opinion, M. Lescalle?"

"Indeed, I quite agree with you, M. Jacques. My wife, incomparable as a wife and mother, has one only defect, and that is to fly into a passion on trifling occasions. She goes off like a rocket, and out again just as fast. I need not say," added the little man, drawing himself up, "that if M. George de Vedelles has insulted or ill-treated my daughter——"

"If such were the case," the Count interrupted, "which I cannot and will not believe, you could not be more indignant or more ready to take her part than myself."

Drawing Jacques aside, he added in a low voice, "Would to God I felt sure that such had not been the case. One can never foresee what that wretched boy may take it into his head to do."

"I am not a bit alarmed," Jacques answered in the same tone. "It is a child's quarrel, if quarrel there has been; and perhaps, after all, as Lescalle said, it may be only a bad joke."

Then he soothed his mother, and persuaded her to go to bed, and arranged with M. Lescalle that a calèche and post horses should be at the door at an early hour in the morning, that they would go straight to Belbousquet, and thence late in the evening to La Pinede. Then he smoked his cigar under the trees, and said to himself:

"If these foolish children should have quarreled, and a feud arise in consequence between the de Vedelles and the Lescalles, what a marvellous piece of luck it is that my election is an accomplished fact."

To return to Madame Lescalle. On that eventful day, when she had sent by a special messenger—a most unwonted piece of extravagance, justified in her opinion by the necessity of speedy action—the two letters which were doomed to disturb the night's repose of the travelers at Draguignan, she had undergone a great revolution of mind.

Therese, freed by her young mistress' absence from the domestic duties at Belbousquet, had locked up the pavilion, and walked to La Ciotat. There, at last, in the store-room, where she found Madame Lescalle, she had been able to relieve her heart by giving a free scope to her tongue. We need not repeat all she said to that lady. It can be easily guessed in what high colors she painted all she had heard and overheard during the last weeks, and how her hatred of George de Vedelles made her describe his conduct not only as it must naturally have appeared to her, odious, but positively brutal. If he was not mad, she declared he must be wicked, and if he was not wicked, he must be mad. In any case, she could not keep silence any longer, and now that he had abandoned his wife——

"Abandoned Rose! What do you mean?" Madame Lescalle exclaimed.

"Did not Mise Rose inform madame that M. le Baron left Belbousquet last week, and that she has been there alone ever since, that is to say, she was alone till last Saturday, when Mise Mede came to stay with her."

"Good heavens! and why was I not told of this? I shall go at once, and inquire into the matter. Get me my shawl and bonnet, order the donkey-cart."

"Madame must take the keys with her then. I brought them with me. Mise Mede and Mise Rose went out at daybreak on Dominique's mules. They said they should perhaps be absent a day or two."

"My goodness! what does all this mean? Everybody is gone mad, I think, Aunt Mede among the rest. Those devotes are all more or less insane. What is M. Lescalle about, I wonder! Since he has taken up the de Vedelles, I have had neither help nor comfort from him—nothing but running up and down the country to get that proud, impudent fellow Jacques elected—a Legitimist too—a pretty sort of candidate for my husband to put forward. Here is his letter; instead of coming home to-night, as was expected, he stops at Draguignan to meet the old Count and Countess on their way back from Paris. I must write to them all. Something must be done. Rose is as good as unmarried now. Still she will always be the Baronne de Vedelles. I wonder what has become of that fada."

Here the thought crossed her mind that George's disappearance was perhaps a good riddance. Then other thoughts followed. Her daughter, if legally separated from her husband, would have a right to her marriage settlement. Therese had ventured to confess to her mistress that the evening before her departure she overheard the Baron saying to his wife (she did not mention that she had listened through the keyhole), "I shall leave you in possession of my fortune."

This was a very interesting sentence, and the whole situation of affairs began to assume a new aspect in Madame Lescalle's mind. There was much that rather smiled to her in the future that her active imagination was beginning to sketch out. The Baronne George de Vedelles, with a good income, the cashmires and diamonds of her Corbeille, perhaps a carriage and a servant with a livery, living in her father's house, and going into the world of La Ciotat, and perhaps of Marseilles with her mother, whose protection would be necessary to her, formed rather an agreeable vision in that mother's eyes. What at first looked like a great misfortune, was assuming another aspect. Rose used to say she did not want to marry, that she wished to live at home with her parents.

"Dear me," thought Madame Lescalle, "this will be just what she desires, only with a title and an income in addition, which will make her one of the first ladies in the town."

It was wonderful how quickly this idea grew and expanded, and embellished by being dwelt upon, to such a degree indeed, that in the course of a few hours Madame Lescalle had arrived at thinking nothing more desirable could have happened than George's disappearance, and her greatest fear now was that he might return before steps were taken for the legal separation, which she was now bent on bringing about.

Thus inspired, she wrote her letters to her husband and the Countess, and took care to make them as vague as possible, and couched in language which would ensure compliance with her summons. When once she had confronted the Vedelles, with her husband by her side, whether with Rose's consent, if she found her returned to Belbousquet, or presuming it if she was still absent, no stone would she leave unturned to clench the matter, and bring it to an issue.

There was something essentially combative in Madame Lescalle's nature. She liked strife and agitation as much as some people appreciate calm and repose. All the year round she was striving to get up struggles with her husband, her aunt, and her servants. Life was dull to her without some one to dispute with. As to M. Lescalle, he was too absolute in some respects, and too yielding in others, to afford much excitement of this sort; Mise Mede never quarreled with any one. The servants were her chief resource, but it is not exciting to dispute with persons obliged to submit to one. The prospect, therefore, of an encounter in which she felt hers would be the part of an injured mother, standing up for her child, gave her quite a genuine relief, and she prepared for the combat with considerable zest.

She and Therese went to Belbousquet that day, and she felt that by establishing herself there she would be mistress of the situation. In case M. Lescalle should not at once take her part, or should hint at the possibility of a reconciliation between George and Rose, she prepared some magnificent appeals to the feelings of a father, some vehement protests against again exposing her child to the brutal neglect of her unworthy husband, and a declaration that though noble blood might not flow in their veins, honor was as dear to them as to any aristocrat in France, and she, for one, would never be trodden under foot by the great ones of the earth. It was all very fine. She paced up and down the veranda, spouting these sentences, and they sounded well in her own ears.

She was not aware that two dark, wild-looking eyes were staring at her through the foliage. They were Benoit's, who kept watching the red-faced, plump, excited little woman, as she would have done an angry turkey-cock. People were to her like curious animals, and she hoped that if Monsieur came back, he would see Mise gesticulate, and stomp up and down, talking as fast as the rooks up in the evergreen oaks. But she instinctively kept out of her way, and this was prudent, for Thereson had not prepossessed Madame Lescalle in her favor.

Early in the morning this lady was seated in the little drawing-room in an expectant attitude. She had studied her dress, prepared her attitudes, and again rehearsed her speeches. The chief difficulty was to know whether to treat the de Vedelles, when they arrived, as friends or foes. If they did comply with her summons, especially if they and her husband arrived together, it would not be possible to receive them as enemies.

After a long and weary lapse of time, at last, late in the afternoon, the sound of a carriage in the lane was heard, and the party from Dragnignan came in sight. The Comtesse de Vedelles' anxiety had gone on increasing all the way, and when on arriving she saw neither George nor Rose, but only Madame Lescalle, who was looking grave and consequential, her heart sank within her.

"Where are our children?" she asked, with emotion.

"Ah, where are they, indeed! Madame la Comtesse," was the answer. "My daughter is with her aunt, Mademoiselle Lescalle; as to your son, God only knows where he is."

"Good heavens! what has happened?" Not only did Madame de Vedelles ejaculate these words, but the Count and Jacques made similar exclamations, and M. Lescalle said—

"Good God, madame! what has become of him?"

"Be seated," Madame Lescalle answered in a solemn manner; "there is no reason to suppose that anything has happened to M. le Baron de Vedelles; his disappearance is in keeping with the whole of his conduct since his marriage. He has shown his wife nothing but hatred and aversion; he has treated her with the most studied and insulting neglect, scarcely vouchsafing to speak to her. The faithful and devoted servant who followed my daughter to this solitude can bear witness to his savage, rude, brutal conduct—"

At these words Madame de Vedelles burst into tears; the faces of the two fathers expressed different, but strong, sentiments of indignation. M. de Vedelles said—

"I cannot condemn my son without a hearing. If he has acted as you describe, madame, I will disown and disinherit him. But, for God's sake, is there no clue to his movements? Does no one know where he is?"

"Why did not Rose let you know at once that he had left her?" M. Lescalle asked. "Did my sister know of his departure?"

"All I can tell you is that your sister carried off Rose with her yesterday morning. I have neither seen nor heard from them for some days."

There was a pause. Poor Madame de Vedelles seemed stunned. She thought George so incapable of taking care of himself that it made her tremble to think of him alone and amongst strangers. She turned and looked out of the window with a mournful, wistful expression; remorse and grief were brimming up in her heart and filling it with bitterness. The old Count had no remorse, but kept saying to himself that this son of his, once the joy and pride of his heart, had become a source of endless misery. He felt exasperated against Madame Lescalle, whose every word wounded him to the quick, and yet he was too just and too much afraid that there might be grounds for her resentment, to give way to his own.

M. Lescalle had listened to his wife's denunciations with anxiety, and felt at a loss what to say or what part to take on the subject. The silence lasted for a few minutes, and then Madame Lescalle, gathering up all her energy, again recapitulated her charges against George, and, raising her voice, said that under no circumstances and in no case—she solemnly declared it in the presence of M. Lescalle, who, if he had any sense, honor, or right feeling, would support her, and in that of the Comte and Comtesse de Vedelles whose rank and position in no way abashed her—she should not consent to her daughter remaining with a husband who spurned and despised her. She should take her back to her paternal home, not an aristocratic one, indeed, but where, under her mother's protection, she would be shielded from insult and ill-usage.

M. Lescalle ventured to interrupt his wife's flow of language by observing that Rose would have to be consulted on the subject. This remark roused all Madame Lescalle's ire, and she burst forth again into a fresh torrent of accusations against George, which made the Countess look every moment more miserable, the Count more exasperated, M. Lescalle more distressed.

The only person in the room who did not seem at all agitated was Jacques. He listened to this flow of words with great composure. It was in his nature to take a very sanguine view of things, and he sat near the window pulling the ears of his dog, which had followed him into the room, with the resigned look of a person waiting for the cessation of a troublesome noise. In the midst of one of Madame Lescalle's most startling bursts of eloquence he stood up and said—

"Dear me! there they are in the garden, George and Rose, walking arm-in-arm."

Every one rushed to the window. Rose had just got off her donkey, and was looking at her husband with such an unmistakable expression of affection and happiness that Madame de Vedelles, eyes filled with tears of joy, and Madame Lescalle felt as if a glass of water had been suddenly dashed into her face.

George and Rose crossed the parterre, came into the house, and started with surprise when, on opening the drawing-room door, they saw the family party assembled there. No one knew exactly what to say or do, so great was the revulsion of feeling on every side. Madame de Vedelles and Madame Lescalle seemed, for different reasons, ready to faint. Jacques alone was self-possessed. He went up smilingly to George, and said—

"Congratulate me on my election, George. I suppose the news had not reached you in this desert?"

"Oh!" exclaimed George, "would dear old Vincent had heard it; he would have been so glad."

"Vincent!" the Count and Countess exclaimed at the same time.

"We heard he was ill," Madame de Vedelles said; "but, oh, is he dead our dear, faithful old friend?"

The Count walked to one of the windows and turned away to hide his emotion, whilst his wife shed tears she did not try to disguise.

"George" she said, "were you with him—did you comfort him for our absence?"

"No, mother," he answered, taking her hands between his own. "I arrived too late, but my dear little wife was with him during his last hours. M. le Cure told me that she had soothed and consoled and cheered him. He gave her messages for us all. Come, Rose, and tell my mother all about it."

Madame de Vedelles opened her arms and clasped her young daughter-in-law to her breast, with feelings too strong for utterance. Not to Vincent alone did she feel that this fair, gentle girl had proved a ministering angel. George was not the same morose, dejected being he had been for the last four years. She saw it in his eyes, she perceived it in the tone of his voice, and when, kneeling by her, he pressed his lips on the clasped hands of his mother and his wife, she could only look up to heaven in silent, ardent thankfulness.

Madame Lescallo had gazed in silence on this scena. She was fairly bewildered at a change which, to do her justice, did take her by surprise; but there was no mistaking her daughter's countenance and manner; it was impossible to make her out as a victim, and the good side of her own heart asserted itself—she was glad Rose was happy. She said to herself—not quoting Shakespeare, but her wits jumping with those of our great dramatist—“All's well that ends well,” and looking at her husband, ejaculated—

“Well, but what does it all mean?”

The notary rubbed his hands and twinkled his eyes and smiled, as if to convey the idea that he had known all along there was nothing the matter.

Meanwhile Jacques had been opening a newspaper he had brought from Marseilles, and glancing over its columns he suddenly made an exclamation.

“Any important news?” his father asked.

“Important domestic news,” Jacques answered, “if this paragraph is not a hoax.

They all gathered round him, and Jacques read as follows—

The secret regarding the authorship of the volume of poems which made so great a sensation during the last few days at Paris, has transpired. It is now said in literary circles that the young poet whose first efforts have been so eminently successful, and to whom it is anticipated that the Prix Monthyon will be awarded this year, is the Baron George de Vedelles, son of the Count of that name, well known as a distinguished member of the magistracy in the west of France. This young man is only twenty-one years of age, and bids fair to rival some of our most eminent modern poets.

“Good heavens!” Madame Lescalle exclaimed, “you don't mean to say that you have written a book?”

Rose burst out into a joyous laugh, and clapped her little hands together.

He was answered by a smile and a flush of pleasure on George's pale cheek. Jacques threw up something, the newspaper, or his hat, in the air. The notary embraced the Count, who felt so happy that he did not resent it.

“Oh, if Aunt Mede was only here!” Rose cried out; and it seemed as if that day all her wishes were to be granted, for almost as soon as she had uttered the words, Mdlle. Lescalle appeared. She had received her sister-in-law's summons, but not till late in the day. Madame Lescalle had not felt anxious that Mise Mede should join the family council, and had purposely sent her note so as not to reach her quite in time. Now her arrival was a welcome event. She had much to hear, much to see, much to guess at, and much to thank God for, that dear Mise Mede, and it was well she was there to suggest that they had all better depart, and leave the young couple to themselves and to the peaceful enjoyment of their new-found happiness.

As she opened the door leading out of the drawing-room, Benoit was discovered behind it. The little goat-herd had an inveterate habit of eavesdropping, but no one thought at that moment of reproving her. She darted up to Rose and said—

“Mise, is Monsieur what he always said I was, a poet?”

Upon which Rose—they were all a little beside themselves just then—hugged her and said—

“Yes, he is, and I shall read you some of his verses.”

On a lovely morning in May, two years afterwards, M. and Madame George de Vedelles were sitting on the grass of the little lawn at Belbousquet, and their beautiful boy of fifteen months rolling near them amongst the daises. George kept catching at his son's little fat legs, which made him shout with laughter, whilst Wasp, rather jealous of the baby, uttered short barks to attract his master's attention.

On a rustic arm-chair, close to this group, Mise Mede sat knitting stockings for her poor people. Rose had on her knees a newspaper, and divided her attention between it and the frolics of George and her boy. Suddenly she uttered an exclamation which made her husband turn towards her his handsome head, into the dark locks of which his baby had been sticking daises and blades of grass.

“Read that,” Rose said, with tears in her eyes. He took the paper and perused, with visible emotion, the paragraph which his wife had pointed out to him.

It was a description of the fearful ravages of the yellow fever in South America, and the announcement of the death of several Sisters of Charity in the hospitals, where day and night they had been nursing the sick. “Amongst others,” it went on to say, “we regret to state that Sœur Denise, so well known at Marseilles as the friend of the poor, and who, in the world, was so much admired as Mademoiselle de la Pinede, has fallen a victim to the raging pestilence. R. I. P.”

“What different paths there are to heaven!” George ejaculated with a sigh. “Hers has been a short and glorious one. To her we owe it, Rose, that, thank God, we aim at the same end, though by a different road.”

“Is not our road too smooth, too bright, too happy?” she said, drawing close to him and laying her hand on his shoulder.

“My own darling,” he answered, “it is indeed beautiful and smiling now. But when we love anything on earth as I love you and that baby, the thought will sometimes arise that grief must come some day to you or to me. One of us, Rose, will have to go first, and leave the other behind. Heaven cannot be reached, without previous anguish, by those who love each other as we do. She went straight, an end to the goal, nothing weighing her down or keeping her back. We must not weep for her.”

There was a moment's silence. Then the baby tottered up to them with a ball in its little hand and threw it to Wasp, who played with it and with the boy in a wild, frolicsome style. The parents smiled, and soon had to play too, whilst Mise Mede looked with rapture on the scene.

George kissed her wrinkled brow, and said—

WRECKED AND SAVED.

PART I.

CHAPTER I.

PPETER SANDS stood, as to relations, alone in the world; but he had had many friends raised up for him.

He had been saved from a wreck.

On the southwest coast of England he had been washed on shore in a storm, tied by a silk handkerchief to a hen-coop; and besides this child, who, apparently, was about two years old, only two sailors were saved. They, on recovering their strength, were questioned about the boy. They could not give any account of him. They belonged to a Portuguese vessel laden with fruit. Passengers had been on board who were believed to be friends of their captain. One of the sailors said he had seen a child in some one's arms; they had had plenty of work to do, and no time for observation. So the child, whose young flesh was bruised, and whose life was at first despaired of, remained unowned.

He had been thrown on the beach of a sea-coast which bounded a property, on which there was a prosperous village, skirting the sea, and running up a sheltered valley to the mansion of the proprietor, who was Colonel Penwarne. The mansion stood high above the village, on a fine lawn surrounded by magnificent trees.

A man who was a gardener, and who will be called James Gardener in this story, found the boy. He declared his desire to adopt him; he was a widower who had one child of his own, a girl called Mary, twelve years old. But Colonel Penwarne had himself determined to bring up this boy, and bring him up in the Catholic faith. James Gardener was of no religion. A clever man, but one who, having no faith, still was said to lead a moral life and give no bad example. His wife had been a Catholic, and his daughter, Mary Gardener, was of her mother's faith. James had a widowed sister to live with him called Mrs. Mills. Mrs. Mills took in washing, and she was bringing up her niece to the same work. They were glad to have the care of the shipwrecked child, and Colonel Penwarne paid for his maintenance.

The boy grew up, and showed a decided taste for machinery. There were mines not far off, and on any holiday Peter was sure to be where the great water-wheels were going round, and the stamping-mills were at work. He was a good boy, sweet-tempered and docile. He grew up well-looking, with large, soft, dark eyes. He was fond of learning, and his friends encouraged him to work with his slate and copy-book; and they always made him speak plainly, and observe good manners.

Colonel Penwarne took constant care of Peter. The boy had been conditionally baptized by Father Joseph, the priest who lived in the village, and he had then received the name of Peter Sands. As he grew up, there was something about him which every one remarked. It was a visible superiority in mind and manner. Colonel Penwarne never passed him without stopping, and frequently inquired about his learning. He would sometimes stop his horse when the boy touched his hat, and put him through a sort of catechism.

"Now, Peter, you may put your hat on. Tell me, if you please, how old you are?"

Peter, who loved the Colonel, and knew him well enough to reply quite boldly, would answer:

"I don't know, sir."

Then the Colonel would laugh, and hold up his riding-whip in a threatening way; but Peter could only smile, for he knew it was done in joke.

"If you don't know, do you think you could guess?"

"Yes, sir. I guess I am fourteen years old; for it is over twelve years since Mr. Gardener took me off the rocks, and they then supposed I might be two years old."

"Ah, that was sad, very sad, my boy!"

So said Colonel Penwarne one well-remembered day.

"Very sad, my boy. But Almighty God gave you your life, and so remember to make a good use of it. Never let it be said of you, Peter, that it would have been better or you to have died upon the rocks, beat by the waves of the sea even to death. Now, Peter,"—then this lad of fourteen looked up into the Colonel's face—"now Peter, remember this: we ought every one of us to die rather than commit a mortal sin; and we are, as Catholics, bound never to follow in those foolish ways which end in sin. We are all bound to this obedience. But I consider you as doubly bound. Why was your life given to you when you were born of the poor mother you know nothing about? Why were you born. I ask?"

"To love God, and to serve Him in this world, and to be happy with Him forever in the next."

So Peter answered in the words of his catechism.

"Yes," Colonel Penwarne said on that memorable day; "yes. And if you had died in your innocence, a poor baby, on the rocks, what would have been your state?"

"Believing that I had been baptized, I say that I should have been at this moment among the saints in heaven."

"Right, Peter. And do you think that God gave you life and not death for a good or a bad purpose?"

"O Colonel, how could a bad purpose belong to the intentions of God?"

"Again right, quite right, Peter. But to what good end were you reserved?"

"To win, by a good life, the reward of a good soldier of the Cross," said Peter, remembering that he was speaking to one of the bravest soldiers who had ever served his country. "To do good, and to be good."

"Very well. You are instructed. And where will you get the strength to be and do as you say?"

"All the children of Holy Church find safety in the Church, knowledge in her teaching, and strength in the Sacraments."

"And whose name do you bear?"

"Your own name, Colonel Penwarne; and it is the name of the first of the Apostles. The Holy Father the Pope is also known as Peter in the Church, as being in Peter's place, and acting with his power."

"And who gave him that power?"

"God Himself."

"And who gave us the Church?"

"Our Lord Jesus Christ, the great Head of the Church, true God and true Man, to keep us all together as one family, and to teach us all truth."

"And how many Sacraments have you received?"

"Four," said Peter; "Baptism, Penance, Holy Eucharist, and Confirmation."

"And who give these Sacraments?"

"Priests; and Confirmation is given by a bishop; and baptism can be given by a lay person if a priest can't be had. And priests are made by bishops, who govern the Church; and our bishops have come down straight from the Apostles, and the Apostles were made by God the Holy Ghost, who came down on them visibly on the day of Pentecost: and the Pope is the successor of St. Peter."

The boy had got very animated by this time, and Colonel

Penwarne was smiling.

"And how many Sacraments have I had?" asked the Colonel.

"Baptism, Penance, Holy Eucharist, Confirmation, and Matrimony," said Peter, as fast as he could speak; and the Colonel smiled again.

"And what Sacrament is that which I shall never have?"

"Orders," said Peter.

"Tell me something about 'Orders.'"

"By that Sacrament priests are made."

"And what can priests do which I can't do?"

"They say Mass and give absolution."

"And what is Mass?" asked Colonel Penwarne.

It seemed to Peter at that moment as a very solemn question. He had often been asked this question in the catechism, and answered it very often also. He had answered it with a heart full of holy fear, and with knowledge and thankfulness, in many places, many times—at home, at school, and in church; but now, as he stood under the spreading bough of the summer sky, at the top of the rocky lane leading down to the vilage, and on to the sea—now, as he gazed up at Colonel Penwarne's face as he sat his horse so well, and looked so grand and yet so kind—now, Peter felt that the great truth he was to utter would never come more solemnly from his lips than at that moment.

He said, "The Mass is the unbloody sacrifice of the Body and Blood of Christ."

Colonel Penwarne took his hat from his head, and Peter uncovered his head also. "Tell me more," said the Colonel; and Peter went on readily.

"The Blessed Eucharist is the true Body and Blood of Christ, under the appearances of bread and wine. The change is made when the words of consecration ordained by Jesus Christ are pronounced by the priest in the Mass. Thus our Lord gives Himself to us in this Sacrament."

"And when were you last present at this?"

"This very morning, Colonel, when you and Mrs. Penwarne were at Holy Communion together, when I served Mass, and said the Confiteor for our Communion."

"Peter," said this brave good soldier, with a sweet smile, and putting his hat on his head, "take this." He dropped a rosary, with a silver crucifix attached to it, into Peter's hand, "Think of us some time when you say us. Pray for us now, and at the hour of our death. Keep holy. Lead an industrious, prudent life. Do good to souls when you can, for the love of our Lord. Do a good labor for His dear sake. Now, how do you get on with Mr. Breward?"

"Pretty well, I hope."

"He has just been speaking well of you. He says you have a wise head for your age, and a skilled hand. He will get you on, Peter, if he can. Good-day—good-bye."

And Colonel Penwarne rode on.

But he did not move twenty yards from the spot where Peter stood watching him. The horse fell as if shot, and lay for a moment like a dead thing. He rose, but Peter was by Colonel Penwarne's side as he lay with his head against a heap of stones. The horse rushed violently to the foot of the hill. People in the nearest cottage heard the sound of the runaway creature, and came in alarm and astonishment to see what was happening. Some seized the horse; others ran up the hilly road. They saw Peter, who had pulled off his jacket to roll up for a pillow and place under Colonel Penwarne's head, and when Peter saw them he beckoned anxiously for them to come yet more speedily.

When the first got to him—he was a sailor called Roper—Peter said,

"He has spoken twice. He said, 'The priest,' and then 'Home.' I'll run now. O Roper!" And then Peter burst into an agony of tears.

"Ah, yes; you've lost your best friend. Here, stay here; I'll run for Father Joseph."

"No," said Peter; "others are coming. Some, I hope, have gone for the doctor. I'll go; I'll obey him all my life."

So he ran, going over the hedges and across the fields, till he reached the priest's house, and found that he had gone three miles off, on a sick call.

But he and the priest's boy took blankets and a shutter; and as they fell in with some people to help them, they were as quickly as possible by the Colonel's side.

"He is dead!" said a gray-haired old man. "He has never spoken. He gave one stifling sort of sigh, and that was death."

By this time the doctor had arrived.

And then a sad procession was formed, and they went back up the hill into the wood, and among the flowers and shrubs that made the ornamental ground around Penwarne.

They stopped under the shadow of a group of chestnuts. The doctor had gone on and entered the house. Servants came out running towards them; and then once more the villagers went forward with the solemn burden of a good man's corpse.

CHAPTER II.

Peter followed the bearers of Colonel Penwarne's body up to his house. He had often been there before. But now there seemed to be an almost awful sadness about it.

Round the door and on each side of it there was a sorrowing assemblage of servants, and coming forth from the porch was seen an elderly lady, with quick, short, trembling steps, and by her side a girl, about twenty years of age, and as they met the body the bearers stopped, and they both dropped weeping on their knees.

Peter knew them. They were Mrs. Penwarne and her niece, Lady Edith May; for Mrs. Penwarne's sister having married Lord Greening and died, her only daughter, Lady Edith, was living at Penwarne during the time of her father's absence in the East Indies.

Peter did not wait to see any more. He went away noiselessly and got into the entrance-drive; then across the farmland, where the unconscious cattle were standing knee-deep in the great pool, round by the group of elms that cast a dark shadow on the quiet water, and on to a stile, on the other side of which was the public road. Peter sat on the top bar of the stile, and there, sheltered from the sun by the branches of a huge holly-tree, he gave way to his grief; covering his face with his hands, he sobbed and wept as if his heart were broken.

But he had not come to the stile without a motive. He knew that the priest would pass that way on his return to the vilage, and he waited to ask him to go straight to Penwarne.

Soon a man came up the road.

"Have you seen Father Joseph?" asked Peter.

"No. He went to Stonemoor this morning."

"I know that. I am waiting to see him pass. But I thought that, if he had passed already, you would have met him."

"True. But I have not met him. However, you may have to sit there half the day. What's the matter?"

"Mrs. Penwarne wants Father Joseph," said Peter. He could not bring his courage up to the point required to speak of Colonel Penwarne's death to a stranger.

Then the man went on his way; and when Peter saw that he was alone he jumped down from the stile, and on his knees began the prayers for the dead.

Father Joseph came soon after this, and to him Peter could speak, and tell all that had happened. He told it speedily, and Father Joseph listened.

"Can you take my pony home, Peter? I will go to Penwarne across the fields."

So Peter mounted the stout pony, and Father Joseph got over the stile and was quickly out of sight. He had hardly said a word to Peter, and yet his lips had been moving, and the boy had heard his voice.

And now Peter was alone again, going down the dusty road slowly, which was just what the tired pony seemed to like.

He got to the chapel-house safely, and took the good little least to its stable. Finding no one there, he gave the pony its hay and water, loosened its girths, and began to do the groom's work, in which he had been instructed; for he was fond of horses; and the coachman at Penwarne used to teach him in leisure hours, telling him that he liked a man to be able to ride and drive, groom a horse, and handle harness, saddle and bridle as one who had a knowledge of most things.

Peter was one of those people who can learn and do learn.

He knew, what we ought all of us to know, that the seeds of knowledge grow to their perfection in the ground of humility. He had a teachable spirit; and he never thought that he knew everything when, in truth, he had only begun to learn something.

Peter was neither vain nor self-conceited; and, so far, he had succeeded very well in life. In fact he was just the boy who succeeds, for he was willing to learn and humble enough to listen; he was quick to understand and wise to remember; then, too, he was diligent in the practice of what he had learnt, and faithful to do well what he had undertaken to do.

He was clever, methodical, thoughtful, industrious and faithful. It may be said that it was his nature to persevere and to conquer. But there are many things which learners find in the path of perseverance which are by no means pleasant; and to conquer and overcome, and put a law on one's actions and a curb on one's tongue—never to give way to cowardice, never to turn aside with the discontented—all that was more than Peter's nature could have done without help, and that help he got by keeping God in all his thoughts; and the grace so to live in the presence of God he got by prayer, and by going to Mass and the Sacraments.

When people said, looking at Peter, "There goes a clever boy," they would have been near the real truth if they had said, "There goes one who is good."

This boy was in many things very different from other boys. Other boys had fathers and mothers—they were members of a family, whom they loved, and they were loved again. They had parents to honor and to obey; friends and relations to listen to and to respect. But Peter was alone. The waves of the sea had cast him on the sands of the shore. He had never seen a relation of any kind in all his life.

He had, however, a good, strong, loving heart, and he loved God. He thanked God for all the mercies that happened to him, and for all the friendship and kindness he had found in the world; for the mercy that had taken care of him in infancy, brought him up as a child, and kept and taught him.

He heartily loved those who had made a home for him. But had not all been the gift of God?

A father and mother have duties towards their offspring, but the kind people who had cared for Peter had had no duties to fulfil towards him. Their heavenly Father had put it in their hearts to be kind to Peter, and they had fulfilled their hearts' desire. Peter was grateful to them, and he loved them. But when he thought of father, mother, and friends, he looked to the Church, and found father, mother and friends there.

All this was present in a wonderful way to Peter's mind as he groomed the priest's pony on that memorable day; for had not Colonel Penwarne been his best friend, and had he not left the earth and appeared before his God?

Peter prayed. What could he do but pray? Had not this friend paid for his maintenance, sent him to school, inquired as to his tastes and disposition, and put him in the way of making the most of such talents as had been given to him?

All this was true, and young and lonely as Peter was he felt that there had been about him the sunshine of prosperity. The question very naturally rose in his heart as he stood there at his work, "What will happen to me now?" But as soon as the question came the answer followed upon it. "The will of God." Yes; that had come, and would come, and whatever it was, he must be willing to accept it.

Then he remembered the rosary he had had given to him by his friend and benefactor, and he took it quickly from his pocket. He kissed the cross, and recollected those last words that desired him to pray for his friends as well as for himself. "Pray for us," he sobbed forth, resting his hot forehead on the mane of the patiently standing pony. "Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us;" for the friend who, since these words had been spoken, had gone forth from this earth to join the holy dead, and for himself, who had to stay and work out his salvation according to God's will.

These thoughts brought the use of prayer, and the certainty of death, and the great responsibility of life very close to Peter's mind. The truths which belonged to religion seemed to have suddenly got so full of life that all smaller things were lost in the contemplation of them.

What does it profit a man if he gain the world and lose his own soul?

He had said it often, and learnt it in his catechism; but what had happened now had made him know, and feel for a fact, that life is indeed given to us for the purpose of loving and serving God in this world, and living with Him forever in the next.

So Peter there and then made a strong resolution to live as a Christian ought to live, so that death could never take him unprepared. And he prayed a strong prayer, and a very sincere one that God would help him to keep his resolution, and that our Lady, like a mother, and St. Joseph, like a true friend and protector, would have a merciful care over him in life and death.

Just as he had got so far in his pious thoughts he was interrupted.

Some one came to the stable-door, and Peter heard a voice he knew very well say, "Ah, good lad; thank you. I was wondering who was here with the pony. Ah, I see. We have one more friend gone into eternity with a heart full of faith and prayer, and a life of good works. Now mind what I say—trouble seems to plough up the heart. And what good is this ploughing? I prepare the place it passes over for the growing of good seed. The seed springs fast. The dew of heaven and the gracious rain falls, and are quickly drunk up by the prepared soil; so will the seed spring in your heart all the quicker for this great grief. Mind—yes, mind this, Peter: that you bring the seed safely to the well-grown ear, and reap it so-and-for the great harvest, which is the judgment-day of God. A great deal of trouble we must take with our hearts," said this kind-voiced person; "we have got to do the daily care for ourselves, keeping our hearts clear from evil thoughts, and from the dangers of our forward will, just as we should keep our grounds and gardens clear of weeds, and protected from evil accidents; and we never need be afraid of failing strength, for we know where to go for the Bread of life; and the cleansing fountain is open to us in the Church—the one Holy Catholic Church."

Then the person who thus spoke stepped forward to the boy's side, and put the key of the corn-bin into his hand.

"There, take out the right measure, and don't keep the good little beast waiting for his food. I see you have got the water; and then, if your duties allow of your helping me, I shall be glad of your services in the sacristy."

"I can come, Mrs. Beauchamp," said Peter. "No one will expect me to-day. Is there anybody with you?"

"No, I am quite by myself. I gave Millicent a holiday, and she went off to Treddington at five o'clock in the morning."

Mrs. Beauchamp was Father Joseph's sister. She was several years older, and she acted as his housekeeper. Millicent was her servant, a wise-hearted woman, who had lived with her fifteen years, ever since her thirteenth birthday. So Peter finished his stable-work and followed Mrs. Beauchamp into the priest's house.

CHAPTER III.

From the house Mrs. Beauchamp led the way into the sacristy; and there Peter saw that work had to be done in preparation for Benediction, the hour for which was four in the afternoon.

It was not the first time that Peter had helped in this work, and he now began to do his part without a word being said or a single direct on given.

In the years that followed Peter often thought of that hour. It would come back to his mind like a picture, and his thoughts would rest upon it. For memory will often bring back a time which, when it was passing, we never tried to remember. Back it comes, often after many years, with many little particulars—the hour, the sunlight, the very shadows on the wall. And so this hour in the sacristy, on this solemn day of Colonel Penwarne's death, in after years came back to Peter with a comforting sense of a holy time—a time of solemn consideration of the last things and the last hours of life.

Mrs. Beauchamp never spoke; neither did Peter speak. He had not been brought up to be a selfish chatterer, fond of hearing his own voice; he seldom spoke to his elders or his superiors till he was spoken to; but he could talk very well for his years, and no boy living could give a more straightforward answer, or tell the truth, and the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, better than he could.

But now in the sacristy he worked on silently, knowing what Mrs. Beauchamp wanted, and doing for her all he could.

They draped the altar and placed the lights. The fine summer weather had covered the earth with flowers, and never had the chapel looked more bright or shown a more joyful aspect than on this memorable day. Peter seemed to see it all, as has been said, when memory reproduced this day in after years. The roses—some stiff and upright, and dark damask red; others white as driven snow; others, again, trailing their small-leaved branches, covered with the bright golden buds of the yellow brier, and some blushing a pale pink of the most delicate beauty. Before St. Joseph were white lilies, and geraniums blossomed at our Lady's feet.

Then, in the midst of all, a tall young figure, wrapped in a long gray cloak, the face hidden by a veil, walked quickly, with noiseless steps, up the centre alley of the little church, and Peter knew it was Lady Edith May.

She stopped by the bench which the family from the mansion always occupied, and she knelt down where Colonel Penwarne had been in the habit of kneeling. Then she dropped her face on her hands, and her whole figure shook with emotion.

She rose in a few minutes, and came on with the same rapid step to where Mrs. Beauchamp was standing. Then Mrs. Beauchamp pointed to the sacristy-door; and Peter went on before her, while she waited for Lady Edith. When Peter saw those two enter the room, he was going to leave it by the outer door; but Mrs. Beauchamp made a sign for him to stop.

"You may be wanted," she whispered.

Lady Edith turned quickly to Mrs. Beauchamp; and Peter saw such a sad face, it brought the tears into his own eyes to see hers. She laid her head on Mrs. Beauchamp's shoulder, and gasped forth these words, with choking sobs between:

"I came to say that I think—this afternoon—I can't play."

It was Lady Edith who always played the organ on Thursday afternoons: an organist from Treddington, a town six miles off, came every Sunday.

"Yes, I understand. We can do without you," answered Mrs. Beauchamp, in a soothing voice.

"I was afraid there might be a difficulty, because Miss Appleton is from home."

Miss Appleton sang very well, and was able to lead the choir without the help of music, and she always played the organ when Lady Edith was away.

"O, we can do," said Mrs. Beauchamp. "I'll see to it. We have many faithful hearts among our singers, and the soul that is faithful can always do what is expected of it."

This was not the first wise sentence that Peter had heard from this good woman's lips that day, and he never forgot it. When memory brought back the bright, flower-decked altar, and the sorrowing figure of Lady Edith May, there always came the words, as in a whisper, "A soul that is faithful can always do what is expected of it;" and he would treasure the thought up as a strong truth, to be a help to him in an hour of need.

Lady Edith went into the organ-loft, and Peter put the sacristy quite tidy. Mrs. Beauchamp, after this, sent him into the priest's house, remaining behind to speak to Lady Edith. When she entered the kitchen she found that Peter had been wiping knives and getting the dinner-tray ready, remembering that Millicent had been away ever since five o'clock in the morning, and that Mrs. Beauchamp had undertaken the arrangement of all household things. Father Joseph having gone from home, Mrs. Beauchamp had evidently not sent, as was usual on such occasions, for Mary Gardener to help her.

She smiled to see him so busy; but great tears were standing on her pale cheeks, and she could evidently hardly trust herself to speak.

They went on about household things without any words, till Mrs. Beauchamp asked if Mr. Breward was expecting Peter.

"No," said the boy, "he won't expect me, I am sure. Everybody at Treddington and Stonemoor knows about our trouble by this time; and Mr. Breward would make sure that I should stay."

"Yes; I suppose the news must be known everywhere. Did you stop at James Gardener's last night?"

"Yes. I came back to go to my duties. Mr. Breward knows."

"I'd keep you for a week if I could," said Mrs. Beauchamp.

"O, I should like it!" Peter stopped his work, clasped his hands, turned away to hide his face, and sobbed aloud. The thoughts of a few days of rest, of peace with his sorrowing heart, of being engaged in some labor for those he loved, came with such sad comforting sweetness, that he could not for a few minutes control himself.

"Mr. Breward would have no objection if he were not over-busy," said Mrs. Beauchamp quietly; "and you could go to Stonemoor after Mass to-morrow morning, and get his leave, and bring home a bundle of what you may want. Do so. I will tell Father Joseph. I am thinking that Mrs. Penwarne may like to see you; and if she did, I should be sorry not to have you on the spot to wait on her immediately. I will write a note to Mr. Breward. You can live here. I may be glad of a messenger, and there may be many things to do."

Every word this kind friend said seemed to have healing in it. Peter's heart thanked her. He felt very naturally that he had no spirit to go to work. To occupy his whole mind with the things doing at Stonemoor would be impossible without such a struggle as he seemed too young to make. What Mrs. Beauchamp had said was full of comfort to him.

"Ah," he thought, "in a week's time I could go to work again with a brave heart. What a mercy it will be to work about here for a few days! O how thankful I am!"

Mrs. Beauchamp, who had known Peter from the very first, who had held him when her brother had given him conditional baptism, and had never withdrawn her gentle supervision from him, knew as well what was passing in his mind as if he had found words to explain it to her. She had fixed her large, examining, gray eyes on his face for a moment, and read all that he felt.

"Let that be a settled thing," she said, in her quiet way; "and now, if you will lay the cloth in the dining-room, I think we shall have Father Joseph back directly, and I will put out your dinner at this end of the table, and just go away to make myself tidy."

So she followed Peter up-stairs, and made the dining-room look neat and pleasant, and then went down the passage to her own room.

Good Mrs. Beauchamp was thinking as much of the living as of the dead. She had kept this boy by her all the morning on purpose. She had not wished him to be talked to by gossiping people, who would have undoubtedly made many unpleasant observations. She knew the world well, and the world as represented in the village of Penwarne was a very talkative world.

One person would have torn the boy's heart by insisting on hearing every particular, just for the sake of telling it all again; another would have consoled with him, and have said that he must remember he had lost his best friend—the friend who had paid for his maintenance, and given him his clothing, and got him his education—and it would have been said how he must look after himself now. And, of course, some would have wondered if Mr. Breward had ever been paid any premium with him, and have supposed that he would now find himself turned out upon the world. Mrs. Beauchamp wished to keep all such gossiping talk away from Peter's ears. She herself had many thoughts as to what the boy's future would be; but she believed—and she prayed that Peter might be taught to know—that whatever happened in regard to him would be the will of God, and, therefore, the right thing and the best thing; the thing to bring him to his perfection, and to unite him to our Lord.

"Whatever happens is right. It is our evil way of taking it that makes it wrong." This was one of the sayings that many remembered as having come from her lips; and certainly there was a power in what she said which her hearers felt and remembered.

All things considered, Mrs. Beauchamp was glad to keep Peter near her for the next few days, and as he was quite at home in the priest's house, she felt no difficulty as to what to do with him.

From infancy Peter had been at home in that holy house. Millicent had been three years in Mrs. Beauchamp's service at the time when, amidst the rain and wind, the beating of the waves, and the cries of dying men, that infant had reached the shores in safety. She had helped to teach him Catechism, made him say his hymns, encouraged him in useful learning, and made work a matter of play to him whenever he came to the house. At the school there were holidays on Saturday, and Peter had generally spent at least half that day at the priest's house, sometimes with Father Joseph in the garden, often with Mrs. Beauchamp in her room, and at all odd times with Millicent.

He was by nature a very handy child, and idleness was his aversion, James Gardener, with whom he lived, used to say he was a little vexed that he did not seem inclined to take to the gardening. "He likes flowers—ah, and fruit, too," with a laugh, "when they are come and ready for him, but he has no love of the labor that has to be given to their cultivation."

On which Mrs. Mil's, his sister, who had from the first acted a mother's part by the boy, would say with a smile, but still with a touch of reproof in her voice, "Nay, James; but he never gives you any unwilling work, and does he not read those gardening books aloud all the evening long?"

"Why, yes; you are just proving the truth of my words. He likes to know about the science, as I may say, but he would rather handle a steam engine, or even a pump handle, than my spade. He would invent the way to throw the water over the top of a tree, but he would not find any entertainment in digging the soil round its roots."

"It's all according to nature," Mrs. Mills would reply, "but I always expect to see some good come to Peter."

"Well, Mary, have you not something to say?" James would ask of his daughter, who was not a person of many words.

"Say? What, about Peter? Why, then, Peter is Peter. No one ever expected him to be just exactly like other folks. I say to aunt often that he is the cleanest I'd wash for. He dearly loves his bath. The sea saved him, and I suppose he has loved it ever since. Roper, too, says 'he is very steady.'" Mary was engaged to be married to Roper, and Roper was the sailor who first came to Peter when he was kneeling by Colonel Penwarne's side.

Thus it will be seen that Peter Sands had many friends, though he had no relations, and that he deserved, as far as was possible, the good opinions that had been formed of him.

But on this day secretly every one wondered what would become of him now.

CHAPTER IV.

The priest came home in time for his dinner, which this day had been long waiting for him, his usual hour being half-past one.

"Sit down there, Peter; I shall make a hurried meal to-day. Sit down while I talk to you. I have been with Mrs. Penwarne, and I have had to go to Treddington. Mrs. Penwarne would like to see you, Peter."

"When?" he asked, with a gasp and quite under his breath.

"To-morrow. A priest who is staying at Treddington will be here to-night; he will say Mass in this church. I shall go to the mansion and say Mass in the chapel; I can take you. If Mrs. Penwarne is well enough I think she will be sure to see you. You must take the rosary Colonel Penwarne gave you, and try to tell her exactly, and in as few words as you can, all that passed—when you met him on the mill, I mean, immediately before his death."

"Will Mrs. Penwarne want to have the rosary?" asked the boy. "I should find it hard to part with it."

Father Joseph raised his eyes from his plate, and looked at Peter.

"O, I think I would give my life to console her," cried Peter, scarcely able to keep from loud weeping. "I don't mean that I should have an unwilling heart about it, only a sore heart. Things may be very disagreeable and against one's desires, and yet we may have a good consenting will. If you think, Father Joseph, that she wishes for the rosary, I give it to her in my heart now—there!" He laid it on the table. "I give it, if she likes it, and I hope her possession of it may not be made sad by a knowledge of what the trial of it is to me."

"I think," said the priest, "that Mrs. Penwarne will never desire to undo any act of her lost husband's life. I think she wants to see you. O, you have put your rosary in your pocket again, have you?"

"Please to go on and tell me why she wants to see me," said the boy, with a smile.

"Because to you his last words were spoken, and you can say what thoughts his last words expressed. Yours was the last face he looked on in life; you are the last witness to speak to the holiness of his heart, his love of God, and his loyalty to the Church. Peter, that man had won a great name for himself on earth, and he had nobly filled a great place; but such words as he said to you, such reverence as habitually dwelt in his heart, were his greatest riches and his highest honors. Peter Penwarne lies dead, and what is it that we all dwell upon for our consolation? Why, this, and this only—that he was a good Christian, a holy son of Holy Church."

Father Joseph rose up and said grace and a prayer for the dead.

"I think you will be wanted this evening in the organ-loft," he said; which Peter took for leave to go, and he therefore went quickly to Mrs. Beauchamp's room.

It was a pretty room, a part of the old house which had been added to for the church, and to give the priest a pleasant library. The western sun came through the white blinds, and made the wood panels which, instead of paper, covered the walls very bright and beautiful, and there sat Mrs. Beauchamp.

She rose up when Peter entered, unlocked a heavy door, and took a square box from the cupboard behind the panel.

"I'll follow you," she said; and so Peter carried the case which contained the monsternace into the sacristy.

Before half an hour had passed the little church became quite full.

That day it seemed as if everybody's heart longed for the house of God, there to pour forth grief and get healing. That day, hearts having been suddenly softened, sadly bruised, and some, perhaps, half broken, everybody had a prayer to say and a grace to ask for; and everybody could give thanks, because he who had been so suddenly taken away from them had lived a life of readiness to meet death.

This was the way in which sympathy for the bereaved Mrs. Penwarne was shown; the people flocked to church, and, after Benediction, to the confessional, to make ready for the offering of the next morning's Holy Communion, because the soul of the greatest of all them, from the depths of a great humility, asked their prayers.

This afternoon, when Lady Edith May knelt in her uncle's place, how many loved her!

When the hands of the Lord pressed upon us, at His own good time, are we not a live, every one of us, to the truth of our being a member of one family, living in one faith, moved by one love, approaching by one way to one end, to that great day, the day of death, "the day for which all other days were made?"

One overpowering sensation of sympathy pervaded the whole place. "Pray for us sinners, now, and at the hour of our death," was said as with one heart throughout the whole church; and the comfort of that human sympathy, the source of which is in the Sacred Heart of our Blessed Lord, was felt by Lady Edith as an inexpressible blessing, and she gave God thanks.

And so that day passed and the evening came, and Mary Gardener, that short-spoken, hard-working daughter of James Gardener, in whose house Peter had lived, put her head just inside the priest's door, and said:

"Isn't Peter coming to speak to aunt Mills before night? She'd take it kindly, and it's no more than decent, I should say." And then, before it was possible to get any answer, she turned away.

But Peter was just outside near a hawthorn-tree, through the branches of which the last rays of the setting sun were blazing, and he said:

"Let us go together."

And Mary, with her ungainly ways, smiled a shy sort of smile and walked on, her tall, gaunt figure towering above Peter's head, though he was a very tall youth for his age.

"There is only aunt and father at home," she said. "I'm going to have a walk with Roper, and then we take a bit of supper with his mother. He's off again to-morrow for a ten months' absence, he expects, and there is so much washing and ironing; he is obliged to have patience, and wait my time. Father says he hates so much slop about. But somebody must wash. And my mother died when I was but thirteen years old—that was the year that you came ashore—and he would not have wanted to work for aunt Mills and me too. And now I am twenty-six, and I don't believe I've cost him a sixpence since I could do a day's ironing. If aunt and I had not had a trade on our hands I wonder what we would have done, if he had died instead of the good colonel. We've been saying so to him to-day. He's very hard sometimes. He would dearly like to live like a king and keep us as two servants on no wages, and then where should we be?"

"Why, Mary," said Peter, "I never heard you say so many words together before in my life."

"Well," said Mary bluntly, "and you never may again,"

CHAPTER V.

James Gardener's cottage was a remarkably pleasant-looking place: a good brick cottage, with white chimneys and a slated roof, with a green-painted porch covered with roses and honeysuckle, and a glass-roofed orchard-house at one end, where, in large pots, grew dwarf peach-trees and plum-trees, apricots and nectarines.

A thatched tool-house stood near, over which the branches of a fine westeria hung from the limbs of an old apple-tree, round which it climbed, making it full of beauty with its drooping flowers. There was a large garden attached to this cottage, and rows of evergreens and great towering pear-trees made shade where the paths went, and sheltered sunny seats. There was a pond too, where gold and silver fish were bred, and where the water-lilies lifted up their flowers like ivory cups among the floating leaves. The pond was large and edged with stone, and over this edge James Gardener dipped his watering-pots, and no greater delight had young Peter ever felt than the delight of helping to water the plants on a summer evening. Not that he cared so very much about the plants; it was the fun of dipping up the water that he enjoyed most. Here the boy had had a happy childhood, and here he still at times occupied his little bedroom; but many nights in a week he occupied a room at Stonemoor, in the place where the foreman of the stone and iron works lived; for the walk from Stonemoor to Penwarne was long and dreary, and Colonel Penwarne and Father Joseph had so arranged as to prevent his returning every night.

Peter, as he walked up to the garden-gate and said "Good-night" to Mary, who walked on, saw James smoking a pipe in the porch, and he received a smile and a nod from Mrs. Mills, who was busy at some work immediately opposite the window; but there was a seriousness about the woman's smile and a gravity on the face of the man, who slowly smoked his evening pipe, which belonged to the moment, and grew out of the event which had marked that day forever for all the inhabitants of Penwarne.

Peter gave his hand to James Gardener, but they neither of them spoke. It was Mrs. Mills' voice that uttered the words, "Come in, Peter. I want to see you." Then Peter walked into the house.

"O my dear boy," cried the motherly voice of that kind-hearted woman, "this is a bad day for you and all of us, but O, for you? I have thought of you all day. Don't let it bear you down too low. We have all something to suffer, and the troubles that fall on us when we are young we grow accustomed to.

"For me?" said Peter, at a loss to know for the moment how he was so distinguished. "Why for me so much more than for others.

He spoke quite naturally. He really did not quite understand Mrs. Mills.

"Now don't let the bad pride get over you," she said. "Don't you stand there a fine lad, brought up as carefully as any gentleman, and is there a living soul from whom you can take a bit of bread and not feel it is a charity? and you not able to get your own living yet, or earn as much as would pay for the good clothes you wear? James has been talking of it all day, and tired out both me and Mary. You know that a man may be a hard man, and yet good and kind in his way. He says we must look after another lodger, for your month will be up next week, and the colonel always paid by the month, and kept in advance."

"O!" said Peter, resting long on that little world, with a volume of deliberation in the tones of his voice.

"He—I mean the Colonel—notwithstanding your having lived so much at Stonemoor, has just to keep you a home here among your old friends, gone on with his payments. He has paid seven shillings a week for your board, three shillings a week for your room and your seat by the fire, and one shilling a week for your washing; and there has never been a quarter in which he has not given me half a sovereign for looking after you, which truly I would have done for no more than the pleasure and company you have ever been to me. O, you'll keep good, my dear lad; you'll avoid a devil's ways, you'll live a good life! Peter, I pray you may never fall, now that you must begin upon a new road and take care of yourself."

To find himself quite the prominent person in the story of this sad day's events was felt to be a strange thing to Peter. He knew the truth of all Mrs. Mills had said; but he could not bring his mind to dwell on himself, nor his heart to trouble over himself just then.

"There is plenty of time before next week," he said.

"Very true, very true. And Mary and I would go away and take a house for ourselves, only she's going to marry Roper; and if we left James to get a housekeeper he'd marry her, I suppose; and we have fairly muddled our brains to-day to try to get up some little plan to serve you, but we feel no wiser than when we beg n."

"Thank you," said Peter. "You will never be other than thoughtful for me, I know. But it is of no use to think of too many things at a time. I am going to Stonemoor to-morrow, and I shall get Mr. Brewar's leave to spend a week at Father Joseph's. Mrs. Beauchamp says I can be useful, and before the week is over I shall know more than I know now. And just at present I'd rather be among old friends."

Peter's voice failed. He could not say a word more, and Mrs. Mills loved him all the better for his emotion. "I only wanted to prepare you for anything that James might say. He is sure to say something. He has worked himself up, and he is hard on some points; he always was—yes, very hard. Here he is."

And James Gardener at this moment sauntered into the room, holding his empty pipe. "Good evening," he said; "I have been having thoughts about you all day."

"Thank you," said Peter.

"Next Monday you begin life for yourself. You know that, I suppose?"

"Indeed I don't," said Peter.

"Well, I do," said James Gardener, in a voice that had some smothered anger in it; "I don't let my lodgings without security for the payment. I sold myself free to let my pretty bedroom next week, and I have a man in my eye who will do for the purpose. I can't afford to lose money. I have worked hard for what I have got, and a man naturally values worth and beauty which he has stored for himself, and arranged to his own taste and fancy. I don't suppose that, for its size, there is a prettier tenement than this in the whole country. I am proud of my place, and proud of myself for having made it what it is. I don't wish to be hard on you, Peter. You have grown up under this roof, and strengthened your limbs at play in that garden; you are young to be left to your own resources, and this place may be above you now. You must have learned to rough it one day, and as you have lost your patron you will have to begin at once. Don't be down-hearted; I will stand your friend all my life, and I am honest in saying so. It has been a sore struggle with me all day—and the women have been vexed with me—but I can't keep things wearing out my mind. I have other matters to dwell upon. I felt obliged to speak out, and so I sent Mary to bring you here. Perhaps she did not say that I sent her?"

"No; she did not say that," answered Peter.

"Well, that's no matter; she brought you, and there you are. There is nothing disagreeable between us, I hope?"

"Nothing at all," said Peter bravely. "All you say is true. It is more than I have had time to think of. It would have a lot come to me to-morrow, I am sure. Of course I know that I have the greatest possible loss in Colonel Penwarne's death." He felt surprised at himself that he was able to say those words quite calmly. "Of course I know that I have no chance now of many advantages that, had he lived, might have been mine. But I can't say that I feel cast down on that account. I shall be very sorry to leave this pretty place, for I have never had any other home—O, I shall be very sorry! I love it dearly!"

"Well, then, it's all square and straight. We, who have been always like father and son, can go on in our friendship; and I hope that, wherever you go, you will never pass us by, but look in upon us whenever you can, and right glad shall we be to see you. I suppose you will make some bargain with Mr. Brewar, and stay at Stonemoor. But you will often be here on Sundays. Come in, and be at home here if you do. But, my lad, I'm truly sorry for you. You can't be one of such a house as Brewar's without money. He wants many hands, but not the hands of young learners like you. Ah, fourteen is early years at which to begin a self-supporting life. Keep steady, Peter, and let me hear what you settle on. Good-night, lad." So they shook hands, and Peter walked away thinking.

CHAPTER VI.

By eight o'clock the next morning Peter Sands was at Penwarne, and the first person he saw there was Mr. Bloomfield; he was butler at the mansion. His child, a girl of about seventeen, waited on Lady Edith, and did many things in the house under Lady Penwarne's maid, who was a widow, a woman of true piety, and very clever. She liked Helen Bloomfield very much, and Helen liked Mrs. Brading. Of course they all knew Peter Sands.

Peter and Mr. Bloomfield served Mass together that morning. The butler was a man of full fifty years of age; he had been in India with the Colonel, and had lived with him both before and after his marriage. He was, in fact, quite one of the family, and his conduct had always shown that their confidence in his goodness had not been in any way misplaced. Mr. Bloomfield liked Peter, and had a real interest in him, and Peter himself rejoiced in this good man's opinion.

The household and Mrs. Penwarne were at Mass.

Afterwards, Father Joseph took Peter to a room where he saw Mrs. Penwarne; it made him tremble to look at her. She was wrapped up in a warm cloak, though the summer sun already shone hotly; she looked worn and shrunk, and she smiled so sadly when she saw Peter that it required all his strength to keep him from shedding tears.

There was not a single moment of awkwardness. Lady Edith was there and Mrs. Brading, and they stood by the dear lady's chair, and Father Joseph began to speak to Peter.

By a few questions he opened the subject of that last interview, and the boy knowing what was desired, and being helped by the priest, told in a connected manner how everything had happened. His voice faltered once or twice; he could not venture to look at Mrs. Penwarne, but he went on bravely, answering the priest's questions, and getting on to that part of the story where he had to speak of the rosary, which, as he spoke, he took from his breast-pocket, and placed in the hand the listening lady eagerly extended for it.

Up to this moment Mrs. Penwarne had never spoken. But when she took the rosary in her hand, and found that Peter's story was ended, she said, "Come here."

Peter went to her, and stood by her chair, Mrs. Brading making room for him.

"Take this again," she said; "a better gift no man could give to you. Remember what he said, and be good. I will never forget you."

Then she got up. It seemed to Peter as if she had suddenly grown old and infirm. But she was gone, and Mr. Bloomfield came in and reckoned Peter to follow him. Everything was ordered for Peter as if he had been one of the household. And then a note was given to him.

"You must take this to Mr. Brewar," said Father Joseph. "It is to ask him to come here to speak to me about you on Saturday next—it will be the day after the funeral. And think over everything yourself, as well as you are able, and tell me all that you may have in your mind. Mrs. Penwarne will have to go away from this place. With as little delay as possible she wishes to fulfil her husband's wishes and carry out his intentions. He always intended to help you on in life. Say your prayers and think; but don't talk. Idle words are lost strength; and you will want all your strength at this crisis in your life."

The experience of the evening before had been sufficient to make Peter acknowledge the wisdom of Father Joseph's advice. He had felt very oddly—he could not explain to himself how he had felt—at James Gardener's, when the new position in which the death of Colonel Penwarne had placed him was brought before him in plain words.

He was not able to support himself. A conceited ignorant lad might have said that he was. But Peter knew better. He knew that he was being brought up for a place in the world which he could not occupy independently for years to come. And in the mean time he knew that he must depend on the mercy of friends. He argued through the whole matter as he was walking to Stonemoor, with the note to Mr. Breward in his pocket.

"If I am helped by friends," he said, "I must be thankful to God and to them. I have had to be thankful to friends ever since I was an infant. If friends are lost, and if there should be none to succeed them, I can go on being grateful for the favors I have already profited by. What I am friends have made me. I have not had any claim on them; I know that. It has all been pure Christian charity. Once Lady Edith said that it was a pleasure to help the deserving, and very often a duty to help the undeserving. I remember her saying it in the school some time ago. I remember how I felt it, and how I made a resolution to be a pleasure to my friends while I was taking their favors, and in future to be, in my turn, a blessing to some one else, if I ever had the chance."

Such ideas occupied Peter's mind as he went on his way. In this manner he was strengthening himself to meet all the village talk of his being a charity-boy. "I am just what God made me," he said to his arguing self, by way of a concluding remark, "and I humbly pray that I may in the future be that which He expects and commands me to be."

And so, having made his mind up to this straightforward course, he delivered the note, saw Mr. Breward, got his leave for the week's absence, and returned to Father Joseph with Mr. Breward's promise to be at Penwarne the next Saturday afternoon.

And so the week went on. All preparations for the funeral were finished; and on Friday the body of the good man who had been like a father to the people was consigned to the grave. There had never before been such a funeral in that place. Peter was among those who served at the altar. Every heart was saying, "May the souls of the faithful departed, by the mercy of God, rest in peace!"

It may be safely said that not one selfish thought was in Peter's mind that day.

Then there was the reading of the will.

Father Joseph was at the mansion. The family solicitor, Mr. Bennet, was there. Before this gentleman went away, he sent for Mr. Bloomfield, Mrs. Braiding, and the housekeeper. When they entered the dining-room, they found there the priest and Lady Edith.

"I sent for you," said Mr. Bennet, "at Mrs. Penwarne's suggestion, to tell you some part of your late master's will—such points as particularly concern this household. Everything of every kind belongs to his widow, subject to certain legacies, which are to be paid by the executors free of legacy duty. Among these legacies are, to every servant one year's wages. In addition to which will be paid to every servant who has lived over four years in this service four pounds for every year of such service; to every one who has lived over six years in this service, six pounds for every year of service; and to such as have lived over ten years in this service, ten pounds for every year of service. Mr. Bloomfield has lived for over thirty years, I think. To him there is a further legacy of four hundred pounds, and an annuity of twenty pounds. To the boy who was washed ashore here twelve years ago, and whose maintenance and education Colonel Penwarne took on himself, there is a legacy of one thousand pounds. The trustees of this legacy, which was left to him more than seven years ago, are Father Joseph and Mr. James Gardener, in whose house the boy has been brought up.

"Now good-bye," said Mr. Bennet. "We have all of us lost a most excellent friend. I shall be here again soon to settle some affairs with Mrs. Penwarne. The whole of this property goes, I am sorry to say, to a very distant cousin of the Colonel's. The only landed property he had to leave are his estates in Wales and some farms in Buckinghamshire. The future possessor of this place is a man not much over thirty, who has never seen it, and who is a Protestant. There was a mixed marriage, and he was brought up by his mother, his father dying when he was young. He lives abroad, and is in the wine-trade. Good-bye once more." And Mr. Bennet made a hasty retreat, saying he should go to the stables and see after his gig.

Bloomfield followed him.

Father Joseph and Lady Edith went into the garden, that spread away from the end of the house to the grove of beech-trees; and the servants got away to their own rooms. The news of the destiny of old Penwarne fell upon them as a sorrowful blow. They had never heard of it before. But so it was; and all life seemed to change. They could scarcely spare even one thought to themselves or Peter Sands.

CHAPTER VII

But those outside the house had more leisure for thought, and idle tongues were even unusually busy.

There are always plenty of people in a village like Penwarne whose tongues are forever wagging as to their own troubles and their neighbors' doings.

Great surprise was shown over the news of the large sum of money left for the use of Peter Sands; and the greatest imaginable ill-nature was exhibited on the occasion. What had that boy done, people would like to know, that he should be remembered in that manner?

They gossiped over the news. O yes; they were not going to say anything against the servants. They had worked for it. And the Colonel had been very rich, and he had no living children, and he could afford to be generous. But that boy! What had Peter done? They should like to know that.

"You stop," said a harsh voice, well known as Mary Gardener's, to such talkers by the village pump—"you stop. It is not the way to put it. The question is, not what has Peter done, but what has the Colonel done? That is the question. He was rich, as you say; and generous, as you say also—and he has done right. Would there have been any justice in his supporting a boy, and paying well for every bit he ate, and even for lodging, clothing, and washing, and giving him a good education, and then leaving him to the work-house? The Colonel has done in his death what he would have done in his life if longer days had been given to him—and I wish you would all hold your tongues."

It was strange to hear Mary talk, who was the most silent person in the village. Some people said that she had never said ten words together since her mother died; others, that her father was a very hard man in private, and that she had had a very difficult life to keep it all pleasant, and that many words had never done with James Gardener, who was a worse man than he seemed. However, whatever the man was in the eyes of Him who sees in secret, he was a great personage now, being associated with Father Joseph as trustee for Peter Sands.

Perhaps other people were found who secretly suspected James Gardener of being worse than he looked.

Mr. Bennet appeared at that pretty cottage-door one afternoon, and went through the orchard-house to see James Gardener; and he began by saying, "The choice of you as one of the trustees for the boy Peter was made seven years ago, when that boy was only seven years old. I want you to refuse to act, and I ask you to give it up. I will prepare a legal document by which another trustee can be appointed, and I think it had better be done directly."

"Why?" asked James Gardener, with a face full of amazement, for truly he had never in his life felt more astonished.

"Because Mrs. Penwarne and others wish it. As executor to the will, jointly with Mrs. Penwarne, I wish it."

"What have I done? Why do you wish it?"

"It is no disgrace that I want to put on you. It is, to speak plainly, because you are not fit for the post. In the seven years that Peter Sands has lived since you were named as trustee the boy has shown great genius, even extraordinary capacity. The trustees have under the will power to apply this money to his use before he is of age if it should be for his advantage to do so. I think he may enter on a life as to which you cannot be the best judge of its requirements or its necessities. I should like to see a man of a different class of life appointed—of a higher education. We all think so. We mean no harm to you. But I assure you, you will do well for yourself to get rid of all responsibility in this matter."

"But I like the responsibility, and I won't get rid of it," said James, with a smile.

But the smile had no effect on Mr. Bennet. "Take a week to consider it," he said, and walked away.

Mr. Bennet went to the priest's house, and spoke of his visit. "Why do you think evil of James Gardener?" asked Father Joseph.

"Well, I don't exactly, But I have had in this week two telegrams from Richard Penwarne, the next heir, and this morning a long letter. I never saw him in my life. It seems that as soon as Colonel Penwarne was dead the man wrote to Richard, his heir. By some means unknown to me he had got acquainted with Mr. Penwarne's address, and knew that he would succeed the Colonel. He tells him that he applies for the place of overlooker of the grounds, and he follows up the application by testimonials, and gives references to Fr deote, the great gardener at Treddington. So Mr. Penwarne answered my telegram announcing his relative's death by another, desiring me to act for him; and this morning's letter tells me to give James Gardener the place he applies for, and to leave the estate to the bailiff, who must, for the present, live in the mansion. He says he has got to start for the Cape in a few days, and that he can't visit England till next year."

"And what have you done?"

"I have sent my brother, who is associated with me in the business, as you know, to the South of France to see Mr. Penwarne. In the mean time I say nothing to James Gardener. But I don't like him."

"And is everything to be arranged thus speedily?"

"Yes; and at Mrs. Penwarne's request."

"I know that she and Lady Edith go to London on Tuesday."

"Yes, and I don't believe that she will ever come back. But mind I don't like James Gardener."

"You must not prejudice me!" said the priest, with a smile. And so they parted.

CHAPTER VIII.

The meeting that had been appointed to take place at Penwarne with Mr. Breward, on the subject of Peter Sands, had occurred, and had ended in a manner satisfactory to all parties.

Mrs. Penwarne had herself seen Mr. Breward, and he had heard a few facts from her own lips as to Peter, which had made him answer her with great kindness and liberality. She told him that Colonel Penwarne, seeing that Peter showed a mind and abilities above the usual level, had determined to do as much for him as might be necessary to get him the fair reward of industry and intellect, but always with the understanding that he turned out good and steady, as well as apt to learn and willing to work. Dying as he had done, the thousand pounds left in his will represented his good intentions, but that something more would be required to represent the care that, had he lived, he would have bestowed on the boy.

"Can you help me?" had been Mrs. Penwarne's final words to Mr. Breward.

"Of course," he had replied. "The first thing he wants is a home."

"Yes."

"I cannot take him in myself. I have had a great charge thrown on me—a youth of nineteen, not too steady, early allowed to frequent dangerous places, and to be in bad company. He is as much as Mrs. Breward and I can look after. But I think my two aunts would take him in as a lodger, at any rate for a beginning."

"The Miss Lances?"

"Yes. They have had a friend, a lady, living with them; she has gone, and I think they might be persuaded."

"And as to terms?"

"I can't be sure—board, lodging, and washing. There is a very good bed-room, one end fitted up as a sitting-room. I'll let you know. It would be a very genteel sort of home. A worse place, as the opinion of the world goes, however, would do for a working youth. I don't hide that from you. Only I don't know of any at this moment."

"I should like to place him at your aunts'—his case is peculiar—and for six years I will undertake that he shall be provided for. I hope he may be those years with you."

Mr. Breward said he hoped it also; that he liked Peter very much. Even for the sake of her to whom he spoke, he would do his best for Peter.

"But, indeed," he said, "I find no fault with the lad. He is a model of diligence, and I trust my nephew may profit by his example. Our Fred has never had Peter's good teaching. He is my sister's child. She was never a Catholic. I got the grace of conversion and married a Catholic wife. My sister was my senior, and married a man in a good partnership in the coal-trade. Her husband died and left her with this only boy. Prosperity was the ruin of her husband. His recklessness and drinking brought him to his end in a hurry."

Mr. Breward was saying all this as he walked away from Penwarne in Father Joseph's company.

As the priest asked him to go on, he entered into more particulars, and said that his nephew, Fred Drake, would inherit an independence, and that he kept his brother-in-law's share in the coal company, and overlooked and managed the corresponding share of work for this youth's benefit. He said he should give up the Stonemoor branch of business as soon as Fred was twenty-five, at which time, by the terms of the partnership, he should be free, and Fred could act for himself.

"That," he said, "will be in six years' time, just at the date of Peter's being paid his thousand pounds."

When this had been said the priest and Mr. Breward had reached the point in their walk where their ways separated, and after saying "Good-bye" very kindly, Father Joseph took his way to the village.

He met James Gardener, who stopped and said he wanted a word with him.

"Why, sir, should the lawyer want me to retire from my trusteeship?" he asked.

"I can't tell you exactly. He had a strong opinion that a different sort of person would be desirable. There are great and unusual powers given to the trustees in this case, and I am quite certain that when last I spoke to Mr. Bennet I should have been glad to retire from the responsibility myself. But all that is over now. We shall have no need to act on our discretion, as the will allowed. Mrs. Penwarne has taken all upon herself. She pays for Peter for six years, at the end of which period we go out of office."

"Six years!"

"Yes. We don't know his exact age, so a term was fixed. He will be somewhere between twenty and twenty-one by that time. Mr. Breward finds him work."

"And no pay?"

"Yes; as may be agreed on. He will take that for himself. He will have to clothe himself; and we can trust Peter."

"And the interest on the thousand pounds?"

"It will be lodged in the three per cent. Consols, as the will directs; and we have only twice a year to sign a paper by which Mr. Bennett will be enabled to invest the interest for the increase of the principal. It will be an additional two hundred pounds for the boy. Good-morning."

So the priest hurried on; and James Gardener stood still.

The hungry look of this man, whose one fault was a guilty greed of gain, was fixed on Peter's money. "Six years! I shall be only fifty-eight. I will never lose sight of that money. If I get what I have asked for, I shall be well off. I have got my savings. I'll buy a share in the coal company. I'll be useful. They shall not be able to do without me. I know more of Fred Drake than any of them. Six years! It's odd. Both the boys come into their money at the same time. I'll make my fortune that way. I'll do something to astonish the world one day." And James Gardener, with his avaricious throults, feeling his heart on dang'rous food, stood still, pretending to find something to do with a honeysuckle in the hedge loaded with flower, and enjoyed himself.

And now let us turn to Peter, and see how he took his good fortune. It came on him suddenly, after having been called a charity-boy, and after more pity and good advice than has been recorded here.

He was told the whole truth simply.

He put his cap on and went up to the mansion, and asked to see Lady Edith.

She came to him where he stood alone in the housekeeper's room. She was young, not more than twenty years of age, and she was very beautiful, at least in Peter's eyes, for he felt how gracefully she walked, and saw how her black hair was wreathed about her small head by Helen Bloomfield's clever fingers. He felt her sweet, slow, quiet smile, that always seemed so good and true, and he had a strong opinion as to her holiness.

When she came into the room she looked strangely, for her heavy black dress made her seem older. She was pale, and her voice was low and sad.

Peter stood there with a flushed warm face, and bright earnest eyes.

He had to keep his hands tightly clasped as a sort of discipline to prevent his saying too much or speaking too eagerly.

"I am come to say that I am thankful. I have been told, Lady Edith could you tell Mrs. Penwarne?"

"What am I to tell her, Peter?" she asked gently, with a smile covering her quiet face, as she looked at the agitated boy.

"Tell her—tell her that I know—know how good he has been to me; how good she is. I can't say any more—"

"Yes, you can," said the lady.

"What—what must I say? I can say anything. I should have dropped under the weight of it all if I had not seen you, I think. I was sure you would speak for me. What else can I say?"

"O Peter!" The soft dark eyes were fastened on Peter, almost with laughter in them. But they said something to the boy, and he dropped upon his knees.

The tears in his eyes fell now, and he cried out, not loudly, but from the very depth of his grateful soul:

"O Sacred Heart! O Sacred Heart! Heart of Jesus! All the good thoughts they had towards me were the inspirations of that Heart; from the Heart of Jesus flows all good and all joy."

CHAPTER IX.

"Yes," said Lady Edith, when the boy rose from his knees; "I can now say to my dear aunt what she would like to hear. And I can now give you this—" She held a paper in her hand on which some writing showed.

"It is her writing!" exclaimed Peter, his voice trembling with happiness.

"She thought of writing a note to you, to say good-bye. You may never see her again, you know. But instead of a note, such as she might have written, she gave me this paper with a few words on it only. They are the words of one whom the Church has honored, whom we are taught to love." Then she gave the paper into Peter's hands, and he read these words:

"Let us belong to God by love, to our superiors by submission, and to our neighbors by charity.

"We must fight against ourselves to the end, and die with our arms in our hands, for the crown is given only to the victorious."

Peter folded the paper, and placed it between the leaves of a prayer-book he had in his pocket, and then after a few more words he left the room, and, knowing his way quite well, he ran down stairs and out into the shrubbery which sheltered the court at the back of the mansion, and so got out to the public road which led down to the village. He did not loiter. He had one thing more to do before he could rest a moment on the way. He got to the priest's garden, ran through it to the door of the church which Father Joseph used, and was soon on his knees before the Blessed Sacrament.

This boy had never known a relation in his life. He had never had a real home, and as yet he had never earned a day's payment for a day's work. Yet he was there well clothed, well fed, safely housed, wise with good teaching, full of health and vigor, with good prospects in life, and his baptismal innocence unstained by wilful sin. The Church had been his mother, her devout children his friends, her priests his teachers, her promises his inheritance, her Sacraments his strength; and now, on his knees before our Lord, he made his thanksgivings, and he asked for help: "Lord, teach me to love Thee!"

His soul knew, without any more teaching than God had given it, that "the love of Jesus is never idle in the heart in which it dwells." In these few words he asked for more than any tongue can tell.

One day more made the village desolate. Mrs. Penwarne and her niece left the place. A crowd of people went up the hill and lined the road from the entrance gate to the distance of full a mile, and most of them had some little token of mourning about them.

The carriage moved slowly on.

Mrs. Penwarne had had it opened that she might see the faces of many friends as she said "Good-bye." She was in tears, and yet she looked at them, spoke once or twice, and waved her hand in affectionate farewell when the coachman stopped his horses at the turn into the great road to the railway station at Treddington.

Then Lady Edith desired the servant to close the carriage, which was done; and so the sight of their long loved friend was lost, and the people, many of them with hearts full of prayer, returned to their homes.

Several gentlemen from the neighborhood met Mrs. Penwarne and her niece at the railway station, where they remained till she was gone. It was known before night that Mr. Bloomfield had received a telegram to say that they had arrived safely in London, and found all things properly in order.

There was plenty of talk in the village that day.

All the servants had been discharged except Mrs. Brading and two footmen—the elder was to be in the butler's place. All the servants who were discharged and left at Penwarne had leave to stay in the house for a month on board-wages if they liked to do so.

Mr. Bloomfield was going into the coal-trade at Treddington. Mr. Breward had found an opening for him. He had already suited himself with a home. His daughter was to go into a house of business. James Gardener was appointed to the sole care of the grounds, gardens and woods, at a high salary, out of which he was to pay for all extra services, which at many times of the year it would be necessary to find for the woods and the ornamental pleasure-grounds. He was appointed to this by the new possessor of the estate, and Mr. Reves, the bailiff, was to take charge of the mansion and live in it as soon as the servants should have departed.

These arrangements were enough to keep people talking, and talk they did, with all possible freedom. In the midst of it Peter had his trials. Rude lads tried to get some fun out of annoying him. James Gardener, with a little ill-nature, encouraged them. They touched their hats, and called Peter "Squire."

Peter remonstrated once, twice—then threatened, "If you insult me by trying to make me ridiculous, I'll teach you manners."

"Get away to Treddington," said Mrs. Beauchamp, laughing, "and don't try to teach people what they have no desire to learn. Forget and forgive, and don't look so hot over it!"

"But it is the month of July," expostulated Peter, glad to turn what had vexed him into a little merriment.

"You will be wanted to take the 'writing from dictation' class in the adult school to-night, and to lead the singing. We have to arrange it all on a new plan now we have lost Lady Edith. And, Peter, shake hands with all the young men and bid them good-bye. Ask for their good wishes in the work of making a home for yourself. Part in a friendly way with those who are older and worse off than yourself, and don't mind about boys and children. Go and get the books out; we shall be very busy to-night. After you have prepared the rooms go to James Gardener and bid him good-bye, and go to Mrs. Roper for the same purpose. I would not have you go anywhere else. I want to go to Treddington myself to-morrow, and you can drive me in the pony-carriage."

So Mrs. Beauchamp set Peter to work, and arranged for his departure from Penwarne.

PART II.

CHAPTER I.

It is almost impossible to imagine any house of its kind more perfect than that occupied by Miss Jane Lance and her sister. These ladies were between sixty and sixty-five years of age; very good, decidedly well-looking, always well dressed; models of neatness and niceness, and perfectly well-mannered.

In former days they had kept a young ladies' school, and many residents in Treddington had received their early instructions at their hands. Mrs. Penwarne knew them well, and Lady Edith knew them also. Colonel Penwarne had been in the frequent habit of calling to see them, and fruit, flowers, and game—through summer and winter—had regularly been sent to them by his orders.

These good ladies were converts of about ten years' standing, and even their most disapproving neighbors could not do other than admit the firmness with which they had carried out their convictions, and the quiet consistency which marked their daily life. They had now two pupils, their nephew's little girls, and they had had a lady living with them for two years. This lady had lately gone with some friends to New Zealand.

Into the room occupied by this friend Peter Sands had been introduced by Mr. Breward, on the evening of the day when he had driven Mrs. Beauchamp in the pony-carriage to Treddington, with the boy employed to take care of the pony in the seat behind, who took Peter's place and drove his mistress back to Penwarne, after she had paid a visit to Miss Lance and her sister, and left Peter Sands standing by Mr. Breward's side at the door of his new home.

Having brought him to his new home, in the midst of scenes very different from all that he had left—among new friends, and surrounded by new duties—we must let three years pass over Peter's life before we look at him again.

After three years.

From nearly fourteen or fifteen years of age to probably nearly eighteen.

What was Peter like?

Let us take a look at him. He is in rather a remarkable situation.

He is, in fact, on the roof of Miss Lance's house, just where a stack of chimneys comes up, and there, where the flat roof allowed it, he has constructed a roomy place for plants and flowering shrubs, with a glass roof, and warmed by the heat of the kitchen flue. He is most successful in his gardening in this situation, and supplies Miss Lance with roses in the winter; and dwarf fruit-trees—plums and peaches—beautiful both in fruit and flower; and as to camellias and azalias, all Treddington comes to see them as they adorn a flower-stand in the drawing-room.

James Gardener comes too, and admires and laughs. "How would never have grown them," he says, "if it were contrivance had not been necessary for collecting, heating, and getting water, and keeping an equal temperature, and such like. It was always the machinery part of a thing that pleased Peter Sands."

Peter has become a very fine young man; tall, strongly made, and decidedly good-looking. He has improved in every way. His education has gone on. He has gone to an evening class, and has been found to have a decided turn for mathematics. He works at learning Latin with the priest, and he can talk French with Miss Lance and her sister, and little Annie and Jane Breward, with considerable fluency.

He is in Mr. Breward's counting-house, and gets a respectable salary.

He does not live for himself alone.

Those words which were among the last ever spoken by Colonel Penwarne, "Do a little labor for His dear sake," have lived in Peter's heart and borne good fruit.

He is a member of the Society of St. Vincent of Paul, he belongs to the Young Men's Catholic Association, he serves Mass daily, and is steady at his duties; and perhaps it ought to be mentioned in his praise that he is not spoiled by the interest taken in him by Miss Lance and her sister. They admire and love him. They pray for him, and give thanks for him too. There is not anything within their power that they would not do for Peter Sands. And Peter is grateful. He knows how good they are, and he yields to their wise wishes for his improvement.

They have provided the means for his obtaining a good knowledge of English literature; they have been great helps to him in his scientific pursuits; and Miss Jane, who was really a learned woman, had been a great assistance and pleasure to him in the study of mathematics.

These dear ladies were glad not to sink into idleness after lives of teaching and learning, of reading and thought. They were very glad to be of use to their young friend, and they had reason to be gratified at the youth's progress.

Life had become a prosperous thing for Peter Sands; and prosperity is a trial—we all know that. Yet, perhaps, all this prosperity was a less trial to Peter, because of a certain simplicity of character which belonged to him, and which the early, faithful, persevering teaching of holy friends had fostered and strengthened.

The youth still carried about with him the spirit of his childhood. There was meekness, frankness, and candor in all his conduct. The aged loved him, the poor welcomed him; children ran to him as if he were still a child like themselves. And this was because he was a Christian; because he not only knew the Catholic faith and believed it, but because he also practised it always; because he not only loved God, but served Him in his duty towards his neighbor, and his forgetfulness of self.

By his distaste for all that was against the Catholic Church, or in any degree contrary to Christian morals, or injurious to Christian perfection, he showed his love for God. And yet he was not quick to see evil in his neighbors; he lived in holy ignorance of other people's faults, and by giving them credit for the sincerity that lived in his own heart he led many to righteousness, without being aware of the good he was doing and had done.

Such a youth was Peter Sands.

Mrs. Beauchamp, who watched him closely, and gave him many a prayer as she sat busy over her good works in her pretty little paneled parlor, said that he owed something to the fact of his being so truly an orphan, without parents or relatives, without a friend from any family connection. God alone had given him all that he had; God alone had raised up for him friends, teachers, home, sustenance, and the very garments that for many years had clothed him.

Millicent, the maid servant at Father Joseph's, used to consider all this sometimes. She had lived there since her childhood, as we know, and was a faithful friend in the household.

"Do you ever think it all through?" she said one day to Peter. "Do you ever think how few human attachments you have any right to, and what such a state should do for you?"

"I am free to serve God," answered Peter. "Free to do a little good for His dear sake; free to be thankful, and to count up His gifts, and to say after every reckoning, 'God alone!'"

Such was Peter Sands after these three years. And now let us look at our other friends and acquaintances.

Father Joseph's hair was grayer, and he stooped a little. In all other things to outward eyes he was just the same. Peter used to get to Penwarne, occasionally, and if he could get there very early on a summer morning, he would serve Mass as if he had never left the village and was still a young boy. On such days he would enjoy a ramble down the sands, standing still for a moment's thought where the pile of rocks stood, beneath the shelter of which he had been washed ashore, scarred and bruised, but saved for a good life by the will of God. He would then visit old friends. He would have tobacco for one, a packet of tea for another, smiles and happy words for all. Old Mrs. Roper lived now with Mary Gardener, in the pretty house which had long been Peter's home. James Gardener had prospered; prospered wonderfully. He had taken a house at Treddington, near Mr. Bloomfield's coal-stores—he was in partnership with Mr. Bloomfield—and his sister, Mrs. Mills, he had placed in his new house to keep it, and look after the counting-house; to keep all clean and safe, and be a useful matronly help to Mr. Bloomfield and his daughter. Helen Bloomfield was in a dress-maker's house. She lived there. But when her father could have her at the house near the coal-stores she went gladly, and many a happy hour did she pass with him, Mrs. Mills acting as her friend in many ways, and growing very fond of Helen. It pleased Mrs. Mills to find James Gardener prosper so well, and grow rich so speedily. Her rooms were gay with flowers from Penwarne, and she made her brother's bargains with the fruit-shops at Treddington, and proved herself to be a valuable steward to him in such matters. James Gardener lived in the gardener's cottage at Penwarne. He had the gardens in his own hands, and made money by them.

Penwarne House had been let for the last two years.

The heir had come to England and visited Mr. Bennet. He had looked over Penwarne, and pronounced the mansion to be too large for his own occupation. He had said that it required a man of fortune to live in it, and keep up everything properly. And so it had been let to a wealthy tenant, who was equally kind to Catholics and Protestants, and very civil to Father Joseph.

Mrs. Roper and Mary Gardener washed for the mansion, and as Mr. Cleverly disliked all trouble, and wished to make the term of his tenancy easy and comfortable, he let the first arrangement go on with James Gardener, and himself purchased the fruit and vegetables required for the house.

A small greenhouse and garden were kept apart for Mrs. Cleverly's pleasure, and James was paid for keeping them in order. It turned out to be a very profitable arrangement.

James Gardener entered into many very paying speculations; not only in plants, shrubs, and trees, but in buying and selling timber. He had built some small houses, bought land, let it out at high rents as cottage gardens, and, being liberal with labor, gifts of seeds, and valuable advice, he became a very popular landlord. It was evident that he was growing rapidly rich, and people began to wonder where the money came from.

Then it was said that James Gardener had been a saving man all his life, and had wisely kept his money safe till he had his investments making sure, speedy and rich returns. And James was happy. He loved money with all his soul.

CHAPTER II.

Peter Sands did not lead a dull life at Treddington. The ladies in whose house he lodged saw many friends, and they all got to know and like Peter. Mr. Breward, too, finding Peter so thoroughly well conducted, and so entirely to be depended upon, introduced him to many persons whose acquaintance was a credit to him.

He had another and a very powerful reason for making Peter known to persons whom he valued: he did it for the sake of Frederick Drake. He wished Peter to influence his nephew. Though Drake was not a Catholic he was one to acknowledge merit, and to distinguish good from evil, and he liked Peter. They had become close friends before this three years of Peter's residence in Treddington had run out; but this friendship bore sorrowful fruit often, and Peter was often sad about Fred Drake. The young man was in Mr. Bennet's office. He was clever enough, of a lively disposition, and fond of society. In fact he was too fond of company, and he liked the society of those who flattered him. This evil had taken deep root in Fred's heart before he knew Peter. On knowing him he felt a longing for his praise; but though he found his new acquaintance a cheerful educated companion, he did not get from him that wordy praise which his heart hungered after.

It was not a good youth's real heartfelt approbation that Drake craved after; what he enjoyed was praise; the incense of flattery was dear to him; he would do anything to get it. He was the victim of self-love.

But there was, nevertheless, a great deal of good in Frederick Drake.

Talking, boastful, conceited, worldly company had made him what he was. He knew that he should be what his small world called quite a rich man in a few years' time, and so he worked only just enough to keep his place and avoid Mr. Bennet's displeasure; and he put no heart into his work at all.

Peter was too modest a youth to be over ready with advice; but even Peter took Fred to task at last. And, in fact, up in that glass-roofed bower which Peter had on the roof of Miss Lance's house, they once got quite angry over it. Frederick said that he was then twenty-two, and that he had been a petted boy, and had begun life late; that he had very large expectations from the coal company, in which his late father's share was of considerable value, and he thought that he ought to have been placed in the office of the coal business, and not at Mr. Bennet's. Also, he thought that there had been a great injustice in postponing his coming of age till he was twenty-five. "I ought to have had it all now," he said angrily. This was Fred Drake's view of his position.

On the other side, Peter pleaded in this way—that he had been brought up to the profession of a gentleman; that the coal-merchants, in whose firm his father had been, had made their own bargain when Fred was an infant in his mother's arms, and that they had not wanted his services as a boy. That, ever since his father's death, three hundred a year had been received from the firm, of which two hundred a year had been used to pay off the principal and interest of money borrowed on that security to pay off his father's debts, and that these debts would be paid in three years' time, when Fred would either go into the business himself or receive seven thousand pounds, at the option of the members of the firm. "You will," concluded Peter, "be, at twenty-five, a member of a good profession, with a fortune of seven thousand pounds, no one having lost a farthing by your father, and yourself being uninjured."

When Peter, on this memorable summer evening, said this, Fred laughed—"Which is all you know about it," said Fred.

But Peter reminded Fred that he could not help knowing the truth; in his position, trusted in various ways by Mr. Breward, he had been told the circumstances, and made familiar with the accounts. "You know this," he said.

"And do you suppose I have lived on the beggarly allowance of fifty pounds a year made me by my uncle? The rest of the hundred a year is supposed to pay for my beard and lodging in his family. Of course I know that he invests it, because he said that it may buy me furniture for a house in the days to come; but still I have for myself—for clothes, pocket-money, amusements, everything—this paltry fifty pounds a year. Why, it can't be done."

"You don't subscribe to more amusements than I do: you are not dressed better; you have no more ready cash; I have only forty pounds a year for all you reckon up. I am in as good company: I—"

"O, stop. Yes; you are in as good company—yes, a good deal better company. You are steady, charitable, with a sovereign for the priest, and more for education. O yes; don't get so red. Don't I know? And you build a greenhouse, and row a boat, and study geology, and have a collection of fossils—"

"I'll give you a thrashing if you don't stop, or kick you down-stairs, which would be easier," said Peter quietly.

"Why, so you may, and so you could; but don't you know that it is bad company that spends your money? What is a pack of card-sharpers and money-lenders got to do with good company? Was it good company that took a hundred pounds out of my pocket at the last Treddington races?"

"But that was all settled. Mr. Breward got to know, and he spoke to you, and paid it."

"It was paid—that is, one hundred was paid out of that store that he has laid by instead of taking it from my board—yes; but, Peter—"

"Well?" It was quite a terrible moment to this youth, for he felt that something bad was coming. "Well?"

"That was scarcely half of what I owed. He was so good and forgiving about it, I had not the heart to tell him that he had heard only the half of the folly I had committed. So I had to get the rest."

"Get the rest!" exclaimed Peter.

"Yes, of course. I was obliged to do it. There would be a clamor if I had not paid the debts of which my uncle did not know."

"And how did you get it?" asked Peter, very quietly.

"Of course you know."

"I know that there are money-lenders, who would advance you small sums for a larger sum to be received in three year's time."

"Just so," said Fred, nodding his head.

"And which of them accommodated you?"

"James Gardener, of course."

Peter felt as though he had been stabbed; but he hid the pain by turning his head aside, and pretending to be attracted by the view that lay spread below them.

"Look out, Fred. See the shipping, the wharves, the store-houses; the masts are as thick as a forest; well, not all the wealth there represented could stand what you are doing, if carried on perseveringly by lavish hands like yours. You are not fond of work. You have not the perseverance, perhaps not the constitution, to make your fortune for yourself. You have had a sum of money secured to you, and you are spending it; that is, you are giving it away to money-lenders before you have seen it yourself. How much do you think is gone?"

"A thousand pounds," said Fred.

"It's tea-time," said Peter. "Will you go home and bring your accounts to my room, and let me look them through with you? I have rather a head for that kind of thing, you know."

Peter spoke very quietly. He was afraid of vexing Fred, and making him repent of having trusted him; and he was longing from the bottom of his heart to do him good. He would not wait for an answer. He took Fred with him to Miss Lance's tea-table. He even stayed there while Fred sang songs to Miss Lance's accompaniment. But at last, about nine o'clock, he had Fred safe in his room, with all the sad truth spread out before him.

A far worse story it was than even Fred himself seemed to know; and there were a few bursts of desperation from the misguided man while the whole history was being revealed by Peter, and placed in black and white before him.

There must, however, be just a word of mercy spoken in Fred's favor. Until he entered his uncle's house, his bringing up had been one continued act of indulgence. His own desires had been his only law. The effects were now sad indeed.

CHAPTER III.

In this way, and with this knowledge, closed the third year of Peter's life at Treddington.

Time went on; a fourth and fifth year passed.

Peter had risen to a place of trust. All Mr. Breward's accounts passed through his hands.

It was a great deal to do, and it required a steady head and extraordinary accuracy.

Peter had invented an improvement to the ordinary machinery used in Mr. Breward's works at Stonemoor, which resulted in a great saving of labor and risk to the men, and of money to their employers. This thing had been the work of his leisure hours. All his days were absorbed by the accounts, and his daily labor was of an anxious sort. Peter, however, stood it well. He liked Mr. Breward very much, and he would have done anything for him.

Mr. Breward looked on Peter with gratitude as well as pleasure, and the dear Miss Lances were prouder than ever of him. In fact all Treddington by this time took an interest in Peter; and not only Father Joseph, but also the priest of the Treddington mission, Dr. Beauclerk, watched him with joy and thankfulness.

When his invention was completed, and liked by masters and men, Mrs. Penwarne was written to, and she sent Peter messages through Father Joseph, and she asked him to come to London and explain his work to her. With extreme pleasure Peter went to London, and was taken by Dr. Beauclerk to Mrs. Penwarne. He was so happy, he could have knelt to thank her for all she had done for him. So genuine, however were his feelings that she felt all he wished to say; she knew him for what he was, and he had an inexpressibly pleasing sensation of being understood as he answered her questions and stood happy beneath her smiles.

Peter and Dr. Beauclerk lunched with Mrs. Penwarne. She sent her servant's away, and Lady Edith, who was there, said, "You and I, Peter Sands, must wait on our elders to-day." And this they did, as far as such attendance was needed; and then he returned to the station by himself, for Dr. Beauclerk was going to spend a few days with a friend.

Before he left Mrs. Penwarne's presence she had said these words to him: "When your salary was raised about two years ago, you refused to take any longer the money I had paid Miss Lance for your living there. I ought to say that they refused to have a higher payment when I offered it to them, as you grew into manhood. I laid by the money when you no longer accepted it; you will receive it next year with the money left you by my husband. What I gave you only represented in some degree the faithful interest with which he would have regarded you had he lived. My young friend, I ask your prayers."

Then he began to speak, or rather to try to speak, for his heart was too full for him to say what he felt; but she stopped him.

"Lay up any gratitude you may feel for him and me in that Sacred Heart where we shall be sure to find it. I am old, Peter," she went on, with her calm eyes fixed smilingly on the young man's face. "Death is near. Death, it is said, may overtake the young, but the old go forth to meet him. Well, remember this, in the life that lies before you, that God, in His might and mercy never deserts those who serve Him—never! Never leaves those to themselves whose faith and devotion are known unto Him."

"That is how we pray," said Peter.

"That is what we experience," said Mrs. Penwarne. And so they parted.

As Peter came back in the railway-carriage, those words, "whose faith and devotion are known unto Him," seemed to be all round him, as it were, in the air. Mrs. Penwarne's sweet gentle voice seemed to linger in his ears.

When he reached Treddington he went straight to the Catholic church. He walked in and knelt down. Several people were there saying their evening prayers. Still in his heart those words were sounding, and that strong assurance that under no conceivable circumstances should that soul be deserted or left in any way alone whose faith and devotion God knew. The words were familiar enough, but they seemed to have gathered a remarkable power that day. Then Peter went home, was happy and merry too, with Miss Lance and Miss Jane; he met Mr. and Mrs. Breward there, and the two young girls and Frederick Drake. Fred sang out of tune, and his cousins laughed at him. Peter tried a trio with the girls, and they had an encore. He told them of his visit, of all that could interest or amuse his hearers, and went tired, but well pleased, to rest.

He paid one visit to his bower among the chimney-stacks. The pale clear light of a full moon fell upon Treddington, and lighted up the dooks, and fell on the broad water, which heaved gently beneath the sky. The shadows were broad and black; the outlines of the buildings, distinctly marked, gave grandeur to things which were not worth a second glance by day. A great silence seemed to have fallen on that populous city, so full of life, so crowded with human interests, where the battle of good and evil went on ceaselessly, and where the cause of Christ in each human heart was being lost or won. Peter turned his eyes from the view of the town so full of life, so crowded with souls, and looked at the opposite side of the landscape which was spread at the back of the terrace of which Miss Lance's house was the most spacious, standing at the end, and having a garden at the back and a shubbery at the side. There lay a long level tract of grass-land, where a river flowed which now shined in the light like silver by the side of the walk through the long meadows which led to the cricket-ground, and by which he often walked to Stonemoor. The contrast of the two scenes was great, and his heart seemed to swell with many meditations.

How much would he, Peter Sands, in the life of his manhood have to do with all he then looked upon? He could not live forever protected and believed in as he then lived in his fair, prosperous and successful youth.

Then he remembered the last gift that Mrs. Penwarne had sent him, nearly five years back, by the hands of Lady Edith; and standing there, so near heaven as it looked, and so above the world, he repeated the words that written paper contained:

"Let us belong to God by love, to our superiors by submission, and to our neighbors by charity.

"We must fight against ourselves to the end, and die with our arms in our hands, for the crown is given only to the victorious."

So ended the day,

The next day ended in a very different manner.

Once more the moon rose with its full, fair light, as full and fair as the light of the night before, to the gazers on the quiet open country and in the noisy, crowded streets; but Peter had walked to the top of the town, where the streets had come to an end, and there he loitered, where well-built brick cottages stood at short distances by the wayside. He waited for an omnibus which would soon pass by.

It came, and he got up to an outside seat, and went as far as where Mrs. Penwarne, on the day of her departure, had taken her last leave of her village friends, and proceeded to the Treddington railway station. Just where Lady Edith had ordered the car iage to be closed, and where their last leave had been taken of Penwarne, Peter Sands got down; he saw the omnibus go upon its way, and he stood still, lonely and thoughtful.

CHAPTER IV.

In a minute more Peter was going at a good pace down the hill to the village of Penwarne. He passed the stile on which he had sat watching and waiting for Father Joseph on the day of Colonel Penwarne's death. There was the same sort of bit of dry earth as that on which he had knelt down when he found himself alone, and prayed for the dead. Five years had passed, and, with him, all things had changed. He, the village boy, the child maintained and taught by the bounty of Colonel Penwarne, was there again—a man. A man in independent circumstances, with excellent prospects in life; admired, respected, sought after, trusted.

Up to that day how plain his way had seemed to be! how easy it had been to walk in it! But now something had happened, and his way was dark. He wanted guidance, and he was going to seek it of Father Joseph.

He got to the priest's house. It was approaching ten o'clock at night. "Can I sleep here?" he asked of Millicent, as she opened the door and let him in with words of welcome.

"I suppose so; there is no one here, and the spare room is always ready. Does Missis expect you, or have you written to Father Joseph?"

"No; I am not expected. Let me see Father Joseph directly."

"He is in the church," said Millicent.

On that Peter went by the priest's door through the sacristy into the church, and he saw there Father Joseph on his knees. He knelt down in his sight and prayed heartily till the priest rose up, when he followed him. "Why, Peter!"

"Yes. Let me stay here for the night."

"Of course, There is nothing wrong?"

"I want to speak to you. Can I have half an hour directly?"

Father Joseph brought Peter to his own room. He closed the window, through which a strong fragrance from the sweet-brier had suddenly reminded Peter of old days; and then he drew a dark curtain close, and lighted the lamp.

Peter seated himself, produced a pocket-book, and said, "I have been thinking myself half crazed. I can't act for myself; I have been miserable. It seems to me as if I could have borne anything else in life better than the thing that has happened. And yet I have made up my mind what to do; only I can't do it without your help; and if I could I wouldn't. The decision must lie with you."

"What is the matter, then? And what is it that you wish to do?"

"This is it," said Peter. He dropped his face in his hands for a minute, as he sat with his elbows resting on the table; and when he raised his hands, it was a puzzled and very anxious countenance that the priest looked on, and it made Father Joseph feel astonished.

"Tell it all simply—tell all, straight out," he said, speaking very seriously, and with that gentle air of holy authority that Peter had always loved to listen to and obey.

But now Peter began to make a bargain. "Everything must be in perfect confidence. You will promise solemnly never to betray what I shall say to you."

"Speak out. Tell all. Don't make conditions. If you cannot trust my judgment and my discretion, don't speak at all."

"Father," said Peter, pleadingly, "it is about some one—not exactly about myself. Mr. Breward has been robbed, and I know all. And I want—well, promise to treat this as a confidence which is not to be betrayed."

"I promise," said the priest.

"Then look here." Peter took out of his breast-pocket a small tied-up parcel, and as he opened it he said "This morning Mr. and Mrs. Breward went off early to take their little girls to school at Boulogne. They are going to be absent ten days; they are going to spend a day at Amiens, and they are going to Paris." Father Joseph signified by a movement of his head that he knew all that.

"Yesterday I was all day in London," said Peter. "This morning I went to the railway-station to see Mr. Breward off, and be of use to them if I could. After he was in the carriage—there were other people with them—he took a card out of his pocket, wrote a few words on it, gave it to me as I stood by the window, and said, 'See to it, will you?' I answered 'Yes;' and the train went off. Well, there is the card;" and Peter put into Father Joseph's hand a card with these words on it, written under Mr. Breward's name:

"I received ninety-seven pounds this morning, and gave it to Fred to place in the bank for me."

Father Joseph read the words, and said, "Go on."

"Fred was at Miss Lance's last night. He was rather odd and agitated, sang out of tune, and did not take his cousin's laughter with as much good temper as usual. As I walked back with the card in my hand it all came before me very vividly. I had known that Drake had frequently got himself into money difficulties. It was then ten o'clock, and the bank could only be just opened. I went straight to Mr. Breward's house and asked for Fred. He was gone out. I went to Mr. Bennet's office. He had not been there. I went to the bank and saw Mr. Maynard. He had not been there. I retired to Mr. Breward's. I found Fred in the dining-room, and he was drinking wine—helping himself to what had been left on the sideboard. I made no observation on that. But it was very unlike Fred to drink in the morning. He has no had propensity of that kind as far as I know, and I think I know him well. I said, 'I want to have that ninety-seven pounds banked, Fred. Come and do it. I am going to balance books to-day.' He turned white and hastily drank another glass of wine. 'What do you know about it?' he said. 'Don't I know all about it? Does it not come into my business to know? I promised Mr. Breward—' I never said any more. Fred staggered towards me. I thought he was trying to strike me. I took him by the shoulders and flung him into a great chair. I know how to manage Fred; you must believe me there. Sharp words are the best weapons. I said, 'You give up that money, or I'll expose you.' I held him by his collar. I said, 'No nonsense. You know you are not fit to be trusted with money. You know I may be called to account for not having cautioned your uncle against you. An unexpected payment was made only this morning after the trunks were coded, and you have the money. Come with me to the bank immediately. I suspect you—I have reason to suspect you. Why were you drinking before twelve o'clock? Answer me about the money.' I shook his senses into him as he sat staring in the chair. 'Come,' I said, 'out with the truth, and make haste too. Where's the money?' Then, half choked as he was, with his own agitation and my usage of him, he gasped out, 'Hold, hold! I have not got it. I—I—I've paid it away—borrowed it—only borrowed it; I'm going to confess it all when my uncle comes back.' I would not listen to that sort of thing. And at last to make my story as short as I can, I got out of him that he had paid the ninety-seven pounds to a man to whom he had made a boast of having the money, and who had obtained power over him."

"And you have long known that he was untrustworthy as to money matters?" said Father Joseph.

"For two years, at least, I have known that he spent, gambled, and made bets on the turf, beyond his means, and that he had gone to money-lenders, and that he had been accommodated by their giving him the sums required, on his placing in their hands security for repayment; the sums to be paid exceeding very largely what he had received—to be paid when he received his money in a year's time. Fred's character is guessed at, and he will never be received into the firm. He will have his seven thousand pounds, and so be got rid of. I know that. I have been hard at work with him all day. He would not have three thousand pounds of his own if he were to get it all directly and pay up his liabilities. How much he will sink in another year, if he can't be helped out of his troubles, nobody knows."

"And who is his enemy in all this? He must have dealing with some one who takes Satan's side in this matter. Who is he?"

"James Gardener," said Peter.

And then there was silence between those two for a moment, for Father Joseph was shocked, and for the moment, puzzled.

"Peter," he said, "have you any idea what it would be best to do?"

"I know what I want to do—what it would be best for me to do."

"Tell me."

"This is it. The whole story has been revealed to me. Fred has not concealed anything. I know all. His enemy throughout, his tempter, the suggester of evil, and the man who has stolen his money from him, and greatly enriched himself by iniquitous gains, is James Gardener. There is a second sinner who pretends to lend the money, but he is James Gardener's tool. He lends little more than his name, that Gardener may not get talked about. James Gardener makes it worth this poor wretch's while, of course; but when Fred's affairs come to be settled the money will flow into James Gardener's pocket, for he has all the securities; and he has this morning walked off with ninety-seven pounds in hard cash. This money must be repaid immediately. It cannot be got from James Gardener without a thorough exposure of all his transactions, and that would be his ruin. He saved my life; he found me on the rocks; his sister took care of me; and for twelve years James and his daughter and Mrs. Mills gave me a good home. Though they were paid, they did that for me which I would now repay. So my desire is this. There is money which I can have with the leave of my trustees. You and he can give your consent, and I can go to London to-morrow, get the money, and lodge it in the bank before three o'clock in the afternoon. This will give us power over James. We will use this power in this way: Mr. Breward shall hear of the state of his nephew's affairs, and he shall know that James has made himself sole creditor. An arrangement must be come to by which James shall immediately receive a certain sum, and by this payment Fred must be free. Then we will get Fred Drake out of Tredington. This morning's work, which was a barefaced theft, and known to be a theft by James Gardener, who, in fact suggested it, has put the power into our hands. By paying back the money I can hold James to the course I have mentioned. Will you consent?"

"Where is James?"

"I sent a messenger to him this afternoon. I told him to come here to-morrow at ten o'clock to meet me, as he might be required to give his signature with yours to a paper of importance, and that he must not fail to be punctual. I received an answer to the effect that he would be here as desired."

"And when he comes, what will you say?"

"I will say everything to him that I have now said to you. I shall tell him all I know. I shall say that Fred is to be saved; and I will put all the money-lending, everything, except this morning's theft, into Mr. Breward's hands, or into the hands of some one whom he shall appoint to-morrow."

"Let me thoroughly understand you. You will tell Mr. Breward all about his nephew, only concealing this morning's theft; and you will cover that with money of your own; paying it in to-morrow before the bank closes, in order to save James Gardener, who saved your life as an infant, from ruin."

"Yes."

"I cannot consent to that," said Father Joseph. "Why should not this man Gardener refund the money himself?"

"O, he shall if he will, of course," said Peter. "But that must be the next consideration. I will do nothing to make him. I could not make him pay the money without handing him over to the law, and that is the thing I want to avoid. But he shall be an honest man if he will."

"Now, Peter, listen to this. Mr. Breward has a right to know all about his own affairs, and all about the conduct of his nephew concerning them ; and you have no right to conceal anything."

CHAPTER V.

"Did you intend to try to keep this repayment of Mr. Breward's money a secret always?" asked Father Joseph of Peter the next morning, as they sat together after Mass.

"I did, though I hate secrets," said Peter. "If Fred would tell his uncle himself that he had stolen his money I should like him all the better for it. For myself I still wish two things ; not to be the means of ruining James Gardener—I wish to hide his sin, and to make amends for it ; and I wish by this act to bring him to come to an immediate settlement with Fred, and to deliver Fred from temptation in future. As to the money, I don't care about that. Fred may repay me if he pleases, and if ever he is able to do so ; and even Gardener may refund the money—perhaps he will. The real use of my money is that, with your help, I can put the right sum into the bank before three o'clock this afternoon. That is enough for me to think of at present."

"There comes James Gardener. He is punctual," said Father Joseph.

There was no time to be lost. As soon as he was seated Peter began. "I have sent for you because I thought your signature might be wanted ; but first of all"—he looked straight into James' face with his honest courageous eyes—"it is no use mincing matters, and the plainest words are easiest understood. Yesterday you induced Frederick Drake to steal ninety-seven pounds of his uncle's money, and you received the same, knowing it to be stolen. In fact, by threats and hard talking you made Fred steal it. It must be repaid. It must be in the bank to-day. If not paid to-day, I shall charge both Fred Drake and you before the magistrate."

"You speak loud, young man."

"No, I do not," said Peter. "But I speak plainly, as I must speak. I have here all Fred Drake's accounts with you ; every letter and every document is in my possession. All that has been going on between you is now come to an end. But Mr. Breward's money is my concern, and must be this day refunded. Where is the money?"

"You have no proof that I ever had it."

"You deny it?"

"I said you had no proof."

"Then I give you in charge." Peter rose from his seat, and said, "May I drive back in your pony-carriage, Father Joseph? I shall scarcely be in time if I walk—you know what I mean."

Peter looked very pale.

Then Father Joseph spoke, "Gardener," he said, "your own conscience is your best adviser. You received this money?"

"He owed me that, and more."

"That is, young Drake owed you that, and more?"

"But I won't convict myself."

"He has given you up—Drake has. Peter Sands wants to keep this last act, in which the bank and Mr. Breward are concerned, separate from all private accounts which may lie between you and Drake. This can only be done by refunding the money. It is right for you to do so."

"I can't, sir."

It seemed that this wretched man was unable to do other than utter the truth in the presence of God's priest.

"Do you realize the consequences? Peter Sands cannot do other than have the culprit secured. He cannot join in cheating Mr. Breward."

"I do not deny that I took the money, because he owed me that and more. But I cannot repay it to-day. I have to give three days' notice where I have placed it. It is not in my power to raise ninety-seven pounds by three o'clock." The man who now saw his position, betrayed his misery by a sob. "I must abide the consequences. I can't do it. I could do it three days hence, and I will do it. Won't that do?"

"We cannot have any secret about it," said Father Joseph. "This youth, this Peter Sands, whose life you saved, desires to cover the debt by money of his own, which you, and I, as his trustees, could enable him to get this afternoon. To-morrow is the day, as he has told me, on which he sees and signs the bank-books in Mr. Breward's place. He desires to shield you, knowing the ruin that exposure must bring on you ; but by this act he not only wishes to save your character, but he wishes to conceal yesterday's theft—I call it by no milder name—from Mr. Breward. But I will not consent to his misleading Mr. Breward. His employer has a right to know what he knows. So I only mention Peter's wishes to convince you of his good-will. I refuse my consent to any secrecy between him and his employer. By your own act the money can be placed to Mr. Breward's account three days hence. Mr. Breward will have the circumstances pointed out to him, and the wrong day of payment will be explained in the only honorable way—by telling him the truth. The ninety-seven pounds will appear in the next month's account with the bank, and not in this month's account—this month's account will be made up to-morrow."

It would be impossible to imagine anything more utterly fallen and miserable than was James Gardener's whole appearance and manner. He would have given up all his ill-gotten gains, from the first beginning of his evil courses, to keep the transactions of the morning before from Mr. Breward. He said that he knew Mr. Breward's disposition, his severity, his determination of character, and that he would never forgive him for having had anything to do with his nephew, or interfering with his affairs.

It wrung Peter's heart to listen to him.

But Father Joseph was firm and resolute.

"I can do no other than I have said. You must make out an order for the ninety-seven pounds before you leave this house ; and you and I must go together to the bank where you have deposited your money without delay. In this way public exposure may be saved ; and when Mr. Breward arranges his nephew's affairs with you, which he will do on his return—I shall hasten his return, if possible—you will find, I think, that you can trust his kindness. He will neither wish to expose his nephew nor you."

Peter had not had to say more than a few words. The priest's pony was harnessed, and all three left the house together. James Gardener, accompanied by Father Joseph, went to the bank where he deposited money, and arranged for the ninety-seven pounds to be paid to Mr. Breward's account at the bank at Treddington in three day's time ; and then Gardener went back to Penwarne on foot, and Father Joseph drove to Miss Lance's house to tell Peter that the thing was done.

At kind Miss Lance's he found Peter involved in another distress. Drake had been there to find Peter, and hearing of his having gone to Father Joseph, he had exhibited so much distress that the dear ladies had tried to comfort him, and of course asked what was the matter ; and Frederick Drake had told all. It almost made Father Joseph laugh to see Peter's face as he said :

"I couldn't have kept the thing quiet, however much I had tried. While I was planning the way to make restitution in secret, Frederick was explaining it all."

For James Gardener's sake, Father Joseph now told Frederick Drake to hold his tongue.

"We can depend on both of you," he said to the good ladies ; "and I command Frederick, in honor's name, to hold his tongue."

"You are no better than Gardener," he said to Fred. "You have no right to fling a stone at him. You were willing to fall and glad to be tempted. If you were a Catholic, my poor young friend, I should speak differently. But this I can say to you—that people who, to show their own penitence, betray the sins of their neighbors, are not often believed in. Don't talk about James Gardener ; think of yourself. It is not rue that, if you had not been so easy a prey, he would not have been so great a sinner?"

All this was said boldly, and, in a way, even cheerfully.

The Misses Lance gave their word that they would not talk, and they asked Father Joseph to luncheon. As it still wanted an hour to that meal, the young men sauntered away to talk together, and Father Joseph went to see Dr. Bauclerik.

Before the evening came, the good spirits of Frederick Drake were pretty well restored; and Peter Sands himself breathed freely when he found, after three days' time, that the ninety-seven pounds were safely lodged and placed to Mr. Breward's credit in the Treddington bank.

CHAPTER VI.

The ten days that Peter had to live through during Mr. Breward's absence from home were ten days of heart-ache and brain-puzzle.

Drake was so queer that he did not know what to make of him. Mr. Bennet had been displeased at his inattention to his office duties, and had threatened to complain of him to his uncle as soon as he returned. Of course Drake brought all his griefs to Peter. He said he was broken-down, poor, and miserable; that he dreaded the exposure of his folly to his uncle, and yet he longed to have everything known, as the only way to get strength for himself and protection against Gardener. He said he hated Gardener and was afraid of him, and that he should not be surprised at any vengeance that James Gardener might take upon him.

Then also Peter had sorrowful suspicions as to Fred drinking more than was good for him; and, after the experience of one evening at Mr. Breward's house, he had steadily refused to go again, but had made Drake free at any time of his own room, and of his glass bower on the house-top.

So it happened that from morning till night Peter had no time to himself. And when he went to rest he lay awake haunted by thoughts of Drake, and unhappy at speeches that young man had made. All these undisciplined speeches tended towards one idea—that Fred Drake hated James Gardener. The poor young man reckoned up the money he had actually spent; then the money that his uncle might consider to be the honest interest on the borrowed money; then a further sum which probably would be paid as a bonus to James Gardener if he consented to a private arrangement of these money affairs, which were unquestionably disgraceful to Drake, without giving unnecessary trouble. Drake now knew that he would never be admitted into the firm from which he drew his money. He could not be described as the kind of character to do credit to a large business, conducted on honest principles, by a set of thoroughly steady men—he had lost that chance of improving his fortune; and he had greatly diminished the sum of money they had agreed to pay him. Past folly, present pain, and future need, were very unpleasant subjects of meditation to this misguided young man, who acknowledged his wilfulness only with an angry repentance and a vindictive feeling towards James Gardener, which it greatly troubled Peter Sands to see.

However, there was nothing to be done but to bear it; and bear it Peter did as well as he was able. But his life had grown heavy with this trouble weighing on it, and he looked out for something to console himself with.

He visited the poor and needy, comforted the afflicted, and taught the ignorant. Still, wherever he went the thought of Fred Drake haunted him. It was a sad thing to think of Drake's bitter spirit and sore heart; of his angry regret, which was no true repentance, but a vexation of spirit which led to no good result, but often to the terrible indulgence of drinking.

This foolish youth hated the past, which he could never recall, and deadened the regrets of the present moment by taking more wine than was good for him. Most heartily did Peter desire the return of Mr. Breward. In the meantime he had to do the best he could for Fred; and it was a wearing work.

It came naturally to Peter Sands at this time to pray frequently. He had been taught to mark the day with many pious ejaculations, and to give his hours and the work that filled them up to God. But now those holy thoughts came oftener, and many true thanksgivings came also; for he had been strengthened from childhood by the Sacraments, kept safe by good teaching, and, by good guidance, kept in the way of life. He felt very strongly that he had more to be thankful for than other men; and he prayed for a heart of love. "Lord, teach me to love Thee!"

Once, during this weary ten days, after having long listened to Fred Drake's bitter, discontented moanings, Peter took his hat and stick and started on a walk by himself, longing for the refreshment of pure air, eager for exercise, and wanting to be alone with the smiling earth full of the promise of harvest, and the quiet unclouded sky. This was on the afternoon of a sweet, calm day, and he walked with vigor like one rejoicing to be at peace and alone. He returned from this country ramble by a way which brought him into the middle of Treddington, and he found himself close to Mr. Bloomfield's house, occupied by Mrs. Mills as housekeeper. Peter knocked at the door, and his old friend appeared. She greeted him very kindly.

"I was just wanting something to do me good," she said, "and here you are! I could not have been sent anything better."

She took him to her own sitting-room, where everything was in the finest order, and where every moment she expected the arrival of Mr. Bloomfield's daughter Helen. She came before their first greetings and mutual inquiries were over, and she and Peter were very glad to meet. He saw Helen but seldom, for she was as a rule engaged all day, and Peter spent his evenings either at Mr. Breward's or at home.

They talked of old times and present times; and they found that quite enough, without speculations as to the future.

They talked of Mrs. Penwarne and her trusted maid-servant, Mrs. Brading. They spoke of Lady Edith; and Helen could have talked of her all night. Everybody was talked of: Mrs. Beauchamp and good, hard-working Millicent; and of the pleasure it always was to get to the village of Penwarne for a day. Then they talked of the tenants at the mansion; and Mrs. Mills praised them, and said how kind both Mr. and Mrs. Cleverly were to her brother, James Gardener.

"O," said Peter, not wanting to talk of James, "how is Mary, and how is Mrs. Roper? I had not time to go and see the dear old cottage the last time I visited Father Joseph. I hope they go on well."

"They are well enough," said Mrs. Mills. "Next to myself, Mrs. Roper is the best person Mary could be with. She falls out with her father. He wants to smarten her up a bit, and she won't listen to it. If she has work enough she is satisfied; and she was born to the wash-tub. Besides, Mary has a wonderful deal of faith. She never had a clever tongue, but she ever had a strong heart; a heart of faith it always was. She never loved talking, but her soul could converse with the saints; ah yes, and with their Divine Master. When she used to be in trouble she would say to me, 'What a mercy it is that God knows—knows without explanations—knows all things! What is the use of much talking? There's my heart; and He knows all things.' Mary had always a heart of faith. She early took God for her friend, and she never doubted nor questioned. But she provoked her father, who never understood her. And he disliked her being of her mother's religion; but I never did. I used to say to him, 'Let the girl alone. There's her and Peter Sands, and they behave themselves always—why should you vex your own child when you never vex Peter?'"

"That is true," said the young man; "I never remember his saying a word against the Catholic faith either to me or before me."

"No; he never did. He dared not, because of the Colonel. And you were a sharp one, and might have answered him. I used to marvel over it often. But Mary has got to bear the storm singly now, and she has had a good deal to bear lately."

"I am sorry," exclaimed Peter. "What has the trouble been about?"

"You know that she and Roper have been long going to be married."

"Yes, I know that."

"It was to have been this month, and it is not to be."

"What, broken off?"

"No; not broken off, but put off. It is her father's doing, and I don't know the end of it."

After this Peter bade Mrs. Mills good-night, and set off to walk through Treddington to the terrace on which was Miss Lance's house. As he was going on at a steady pace, he saw a face he knew, and stopped. "Why, Roper!" he cried, and stretched out his hand.

"Thank you, sir," said the sailor, with a fine smile spreading all over his face. "I have not seen you for long, and they tell me you are up in the world; climbing the ladder, I hear. I always wished you well, and I am glad to have my wish."

"Many thanks to you," said Peter. "You've had a long absence."

"Nearly five years. And I have to go again. That's bad, sir."

"Were you thinking of a holiday?"

"Yes; and a wife. But the father puts me off; and Mary made a promise about not marrying without her father's consent. Put off for two years. I've no trust in James Gardener, and I never had. He loves nothing but money. He promised Mary fifty pounds to start with; and now he says, with oaths and anger, that he has been robbed, and it will take him two years to put the money together again. Now I'd take her without a penny. The money is nothing to me. But he had often promised Mary, and she wants to keep him to his promise. But, above all, she has promised him to help to make up his loss, and so between them I am to go again to sea, instead of settling down as we had intended. It's a trial; and I disbelieve every word James Gardener says, which makes the trial greater. But there is no turning Mary. She has been a good daughter from her earliest years, and she will stay the same to the last. But that man has dealt falsely with me, and I'll make him understand that I know it."

And so Roper passed on, and Peter's thoughts went back to the ninety-seven pounds that Gardener had been made to refund, and he sighed to think that his old friend Mary had suffered because of it. When a man does wrong there is no knowing how far the evil may reach, or who or how many may be injured by it.

With this reflection Peter reached the door of Miss Lance's house, and just as he got there he saw a man turn suddenly away, and, by the dim evening light, he saw the man disappear round the corner of a house which stood in the angle of the road leading down to the meadows, which lay between the river and the back of Miss Lance's house.

Peter knew the man immediately. Indeed the man made no attempt at concealment. It was James Gardener; and he faced round for a moment and cast on Peter a vile look of hatred, such as it is to be hoped seldom disfigures a human countenance. It made Peter start. But Gardener was gone in a moment, and Peter entered Miss Lance's house, and heard himself called from the drawing-room.

"We are going to try this glee," said Miss Jane. "Come and take your part. It is not difficult. You will sing it at sight."

There, just arrived, stood Drake.

CHAPTER VII.

Peter took his part in the song pointed out by Miss Jane Lance, just giving a smile to Frederick Drake, whom he had seen already that day.

Peter did his best, which Miss Lance pronounced to be really very creditable to him, and he and Drake profited so far by instructions and repetitions as to sing their song very well before the practising was over. The Misses Lance were going to give a little concert soon; they only waited for the return of Mr. and Mrs. Breward. Many of their old pupils resided in the town and neighborhood, and there were to be many meetings and much private practising before the grand rehearsal, which was to precede the full-dressed entertainment of music and dancing which these ladies were preparing for their friends.

The assizes were to occur before long. Miss Lance called it quite a time of rejoicing, because no case of importance would have to be tried. They thought of fixing their party a day or two after this event, before a barrister of their acquaintance, a Mr. Monitor, would have to return to London. This gentleman had long been known and admired at Treddington. With the Misses Lance he was a friend and a hero. They had educated two of Mr. Monitor's nieces, and they were now rejoicing over the probable presence of this gentleman at their musical party. They called it a musical party; they said the dancing would not be much, just "a hop" after the supper; and the supper dwelt as much in Miss Lance's mind as the music did in her sister's.

On the night, however, of which we have been speaking, after the practising, and the cake and wine duly brought out for the young men's reward and refreshment, Peter said to Fred:

"I saw Gardener near the house as I came in. Had you been having an interview with him?"

"No," Fred answered hurriedly. "I hope I may never see him again. I could kill him!" He uttered the last words in a peculiarly vindictive manner, hissing them forth under his breath.

Peter said no more, and he did not ask Drake to come to his room and smoke as he sometimes did, though he was not a smoker himself. He let him go home, and only said, "Go to bed, and get a good night's rest. You really want it."

Fred answered, "Yes, I do," and shook hands cordially and went out quietly enough.

The days following passed without any event worth recording. As has been said the money was paid into the bank to Mr. Breward's account, and, except that Frederick Drake was in bed one day with a violent headache, all things went on easily till the night before the day fixed for Mr. Breward's return.

On that night Peter met Mary Gardener at dusk in the street, and she stopped him, saying,

"Do you know where my father is?"

"No," said Peter; "I have not seen him for about a week."

"Have you seen Roper?"

"I saw him last on the very night when I last saw your father."

"I am here to get hold of him. He and father must not meet. There's a trouble between them. For the first time in my life I shall be glad to get him off to sea."

"It's money, of course?"

"O yes; it is money, it has always been money; money makes more mischief than all that's in the world besides."

"Not money, but the love of money," said Peter.

Then Mary laughed.

Peter did not choose to ask Mary what the particulars were of this quarrel between Roper and her father; she went on, saying she should look in at a public-house—a house which bore a tolerably good character—where she thought she might find her father. "Mr. Bloomfield knows about it," said Mary, "and he has told me to bring him there."

Peter continued his walk, and then went home.

The next day brought back Mr. Breward. No sincerer welcome ever met any man. He was well, and Mrs. Breward was happy as she could be without her little girls. But they had seemed quite contented to stay in their school at Boulogne, and Mrs. Breward was satisfied.

The day of their return was all talk and rejoicing and welcomes; the next day was business. As had been arranged between the young men, Father Joseph was to call on Mr. Breward, and in his presence the story of the money and of Fred's folly was to be truly told. And exactly as it had been planned, so it was done.

Peter began his story from the moment when Mr. Breward gave him from the window of the railway-carriage, the memorandum about the ninety-seven pounds. Then he turned to Fred, and said:

"Tell your own story for yourself."

Fred looked pale and miserable. He trembled in every limb.

"Yes; tell it yourself," said Mr. Breward, in a kind encouraging tone. "It will be all the better for you. You will have a manly satisfaction in getting it off your mind. No one here is going to do anything but make a thanksgiving for the stop that has been put to that course of imprudence into which you had been tempted. Let me hear it all from yourself."

But Fred could not, or would not, do as his friends wished him to do.

"It is hard, it is so difficult, to accuse oneself. It is next to impossible to say by what steps one went, when every step was ruinous."

"Well, so far that is good; you have made an honest admission," said Mr. Breward.

He still spoke in an encouraging sort of way, and not at all like the angry guardian of an unworthy youth. He was treating Fred like a man; and Father Joseph was there with approval in his heart; and Peter sat nervous and unhappy, because his friend, for whom he suffered, could not find courage to throw off the chains of self-love, and speak the plain words of one who desired truth, and only the truth, even though the truth must be against himself. But Frederick Drake had no such moral strength as his friends desired to see.

"I must know everything. I must be told all the particulars," said Mr. Breward, "or I can't act. I have got to settle all your affairs for you. I want to make for you the best bargain I can consistently with honor, so I must learn every circumstance. Tell me yourself, Fred. There need be no concealment between you and me."

But Fred Drake was the slave of self-love, and he could not tell his own story for himself and against himself. What seemed so easy to Peter was too great a thing for Fred to do.

Peter, who so often, as a good Catholic, in the Sacrament of Penance, had laid bare his heart with Christian simplicity in a good confession, would have had no difficulty in telling everything he had done, and why and how he had so done, to a man like Mr. Breward, who had a right to know, and whose wish was to help and to rescue; but it was not so with Fred. He could not overcome his self-love any further than to say to his uncle:

"Peter knows it all, sir. He has got it all out of me. He has seen everything. He has made out the accounts, and got all written down. I know I have been a fool. He will tell it all. He knows how to do it, and I don't."

Then, without any more words, Peter began to speak. He turned to the table, and placed some papers before him, to which he referred occasionally; and he told the whole story, from the first time when Fred took to gambling to the last, when he consented to a theft.

He spoke steadily, keeping all emotion out of his voice, and all blame or judgment of any sort out of his manner; just as if he had been a mere machine used by Fred, and never as if he were speaking on his own account, did Peter now tell the whole tale from first to last, and lay before Mr. Breward the calculations which showed the exact state of Fred Drake's affairs.

When he had finished, Mr. Breward said, "Thank you." Two very common words, certainly; but there was something in his voice and manner which said that Peter had done him a great service, and deserved his gratitude.

Fred jumped up from his seat, and gave a loud sigh, like a groan, clasping his hands above his head.

"Very well. We must place this in the right hands, and get it all settled forthwith." Mr. Breward said this in a tone of great determination. "We can't do our own work here, Fred. You must not have a word of any kind with this man Gardner. He shall be dealt with as well as justice can allow, and he shall have more than he ought to have. He can't be a very old offender in this line, we know. All shall be done by some one on whom we can rely, and you may be no worse in the end for this disagreeable experience. Now let us shake hands." He held his nephew by both hands for a moment and looked him in the face. "No man ever had safer friends than you have had; and your worst—nay, your only—enemy is yourself."

Fred looked relieved, and smiled.

"You give me a bad character, sir," he said; "but not worse than I deserve."

But after this Mr. Breward only said,

"Remember what I have commanded about Gardner. You must not exchange another word with him; and you, Peter, if you should see him and he offers to talk to you, say that you are pledged not to say a word on this subject. Not one word. You know nothing. I am not going to tell you what will have to be done. You are in ignorance, and you are pledged not to hold any conversation on the matter."

Both the young men agreed to this. And so ended Mr. Breward's welcome home.

CHAPTER VIII.

When Peter Sands rose up from his night's sleep, the day after the interview recorded in the last chapter, he felt as any one might be supposed to feel who had been with a friend while he had undergone a painful operation, and suffered by sympathy with him.

He had really suffered while giving, in Fred's presence, the full account, as far as he knew, of all his follies and misdoings. But he had suffered more afterwards. Under the excitement of the moment he had found words to express exactly all he had to tell, but after the excitement had passed he wondered that he had been able to do it. It was like making a man's confession for him. He rose early, not much rested by his sleep, and feeling weary and feverish. He went out earlier than usual, and took his way straight to the Catholic church.

It was before the hour for the usual daily Mass. He had known that it was too early; he had gone there for a quiet holy hour and to pray. Presently he saw a strange priest come in and kneel down. He had entered the church by the door of the sacristy. After a short time this priest returned to the sacristy, and Peter was again alone in the church.

He was saying the rosary, and using the rosary that had been given him by Colonel Penwarne on the hill, on the morning of the Colonel's death. Before using these beads, Peter had always made the custom of saying the prayers for the dead, and had said these prayers on that morning.

Just as he had finished his rosary the strange priest came back and looked towards him. Peter got up and went to the sacristy.

"Are you Peter Sands?" asked the priest. "If you are, you will serve my Mass."

Peter immediately prepared the altar, got the priest his vestments, and served Mass. There was not, through the whole Mass, any other person in church.

When Mass was over, Peter returned to his place, made a thanksgiving and left the church.

He walked towards the docks; walked farther than he usually walked when he went out before breakfast, and so returned in a hurry and rather overheated to Miss Lance's house. As he was going quickly through the streets he met James Gardener, who stopped, and, in an angry authoritative voice, said he wanted to speak to him.

"Stop," said James; "stop, when I tell you."

But Peter passed quickly, saying, "Not now, not now." And with a sense of relief he found himself inside the house-door, where a fragrant scent of coffee filled the pretty little hall, and Miss Jane's kind voice said :

"You are so hot ! You should not have walked so fast. You know we should not have minded your being late. It is not good for you to be so hot before breakfast."

Peter made no answer to this. He talked of other things, and tried to eat his breakfast as if nothing had happened ; but in his heart he was sorry that he had met James Gardener.

After breakfast he went to his work as usual ; he came back to luncheon, saying he had to go to Stonemoor for Mr. Breward in the afternoon. The pony, ready to be mounted, was brought to the door by Mr. Breward's stableman, and Peter rode away.

"He is not quite like himself to-day," said Miss Lance to her sister.

The reader knows that they were very fond of Peter.

Miss Jane replied that the idea of his being a little overwrought had occurred to her, and that she had heard that Fred Drake had again given him trouble, but she knew no particulars ; their own servants had heard something from Mr. Breward's servants, and they had just mentioned the fact to her.

"Fred ought to profit by Peter's example," said Miss Lance gravely.

"And so he may, poor youth," exclaimed Miss Jane. "Good example is powerful always ; and Peter is so steady."

The ladies went to their different occupations, and thought no more of Peter, who was riding through pleasant lanes to the open country which led to the works at Stonemoor. When he got there, there was an honest welcome ready, for Peter was greatly beloved by the men. Before he left them to return to Mr. Breward, two of the men, who had known him long and were accustomed to call him their "young master," and who also loved and admired him—these men, in the hearing of four or five other men, and evidently with the consent of all, surprised Peter greatly by cautioning him against James Gardener.

Peter stopped them quickly.

"Why, he was as good as a father to me," he said, "when I could not take care of myself."

"That may have been easily enough," said a man called Simon Lyster. "James Gardener could always work where the pay was sure and more than sufficient. But something has happened. He has been carrying on his courses a little too openly, and flying at too high game. There has been a great commotion at the mansion. He has, it is said, been drawing one of their men-servants into betting and bad company, and set him on making dishonest speculations. It has reached Mr. Cleverly's ears, and he has told Gardener that he will have to go. The man had had a legacy, and as he had been in the family from childhood he had saved money. He has nothing left now, and it is said that Gardener has grown rich on the spoils of many such foolish people, and Mr. Cleverly is intending to punish him. He came here this morning, expecting to see either Mr. Breward or you. His idea is that you have discovered things to his disadvantage. We gathered this from his threats and conversation. He can't be far off now. He is half mad with anger. Go home by the public road and not by the riverside, as you do sometimes. It is bad to face a man in James Gardener's humor, unless you are every way more than a match for him."

"I know nothing of any evil conduct of his towards Mr. Cleverly or any of his household," said Peter steadily. "I am obliged to return by the public road, because to-day I have no time for a ride for pleasure. I have to keep an appointment at five o'clock ; and I should be very sorry, even if I were more than a match for James Gardener, to lift my hand against him. He has, in fact, no cause for any ill-will to me."

"Well, then, good-day," said the man ; "but don't scorn advice ; keep away from James for the present."

"Thank you. I'll remember what you have said. Thank you many times ;" and Peter rode away. He did not meet either man, woman, or child on his road back to Treddington, and he left his pony at Mr. Breward's stable and went into the house to conclude his business with his master. After that they talked together for a few minutes, and Mr. Breward said some kind things to him.

Then he said, "I had my first interview with Gardener to-day. We came to no conclusion. What was said was only to open the matter. I let him know that I was aware of all that had passed, and that I intended to bring all matters between him and Frederick Drake to an immediate conclusion. He was surprised. I would not let him talk. I was peremptory. I said, 'I give you a short time to think things over. I don't want to be unjust nor even unkind ; though you deserve severity, you will not get it from me.' When he wanted to say more, I told him I had not yet made up my mind as to what I should say to him. I said that I should take advice ; and then I made him go, or rather I parted from him by going myself. I shall now consult Mr. Bennet."

While Mr. Breward was saying this, Peter was thinking whether or not he should repeat what the man at Stonemoor had said to him. And he decided that he would not speak of it. There were several reasons, not any of them of great weight, which made him decide on silence.

Peter did not go every Saturday to Stonemoor ; Mr. Breward went himself very often. But on this day Peter had gone, and gone earlier than usual, and he had been detained there a little on account of his conversation with the men. All that had been said came to his mind strongly, but he determined not to tell Mr. Breward. It was now after four o'clock in the afternoon. He had to keep his five o'clock appointment with the choir-singers, who depended on his punctuality. He disliked throwing stones at a fallen man, and it was no business of his to talk of anything that had occurred at the mansion. He shrank from saying that he had been cautioned not to encounter James ; he felt that it would be making a sort of hero of himself if he repeated all the men had said ; and certainly, as it was all gossip and had nothing to do with Drake's affairs, there was no necessity for his repeating what had passed at Stonemoor. It ended, therefore, by his determining on silence, and his going off to the choir-practising in the Catholic school-room, which occupied him till nearly eight o'clock, when Dr. Beauclerk asked him to come and take supper with him.

It was always a great treat to Peter to do this. Dr. Beauclerk was full of learning, and had the pleasantest possible way of imparting knowledge. In Peter this good and learned man had an intelligent listener, and their conversation together often got animated with the most agreeable liveliness ; often also overflowing with wisdom of the highest kind.

This evening, Peter, who was a modest-minded man, a stranger being present, spoke very little, but he heard much that interested him ; and, not feeling it right to remain longer than seemed to be necessary, he left Dr. Beauclerk early, and, making a bow to the stranger, he was leaving the room, when this stranger stopped him.

"I shall see Mrs. Penwarne to-morrow," he said ; "she will be glad to know we have met. She has often spoken of you. I remember you when I came to Penwarne, after the Colonel's death. We shall meet again one day, and then we can improve our acquaintance."

Peter's face was flushed with pleasure.

"O sir," he said, "I owe everything to the Penwarne family ; to cease to be grateful to Mrs. Penwarne, and, indeed, to Lady Edith also, would be impossible. I owe everything to their goodness."

"If to them you owe your Catholic teaching, you do indeed owe them everything. I am related to Lady Edith ; our fathers were cousins. I am a religious—a Benedictine—and you can call me Father Dunstan. Good-bye ! I shall be glad to meet you again."

At this moment the clock that stood on the stairs, and which struck the quarters, gave out a quarter to nine, and Peter, saying he should just have time to get back by nine o'clock, went away.

He walked a short distance in the direction of Miss Lane's house, and passed Roper in the street. The man touched his cap, and said "Good-night!" Neither of them stopped. But when Peter had gone a few steps farther he remembered that he had promised, a few days before, to get a garden-tool for Miss Jane Lance. She had broken the cutter with which she trimmed her grass edgings: the handle was still quite sound, and she had asked Peter to get her a new iron cutter in place of the broken one. This he had promised to do, saying he could fasten the handle in for her himself.

The events of the last few days had driven this little commission from his memory, but now that it had suddenly come to his recollection he resolved to turn back, late as it was, and get it.

This he did. It was Saturday night, and he knew the shop would be open. He bought the cutter. Several workmen were there, overlooking some tools. There were some large clasp-knives on the counter of a superior sort. They took Peter's fancy and he bought one, putting it into his pocket without having it wrapped up.

The garden at the back of Miss Lance's house opened into a road, and on the other side of this road were the sloping fields the Long Meadows, which skirted the river.

It was now a quicker way home for Peter to get down by some back lanes into the meadow-walk by the river, and then to cross up the road and get to Miss Lance's house by the back garden, than to go by the streets and enter by the door at the front of the house; so Peter ran down the lane at the side of the shop, and was soon in sight of the Long Meadows stile.

It was not moonlight, and the sky was cloudy; here, near the river, a mist was rolling up, and you could not see to any very great distance before you. But the way was familiar to Peter. All the year round the river-path by the Long Meadows was known to him—sometimes fishing, sometimes trying his skill at sketching, sometimes in spring getting frittalaris for Miss Lance, who greatly delighted in these beautiful wild flowers. Then this path led also to the cricket-ground, and two miles of hard walking by the river's bank took you up to the unencultivated land, across which there was a path to Stonemoor. Peter knew every step of his way quite well, and he walked on through the mist, which gathered thick sometimes, and then rolled away till he could see every thing around him plainly enough.

It had rolled away when he got to the stile.

The stile was made of granite posts and cross-pieces. As Peter placed his hand on the top stone, to throw himself across and drop to the other side, he thought, "How slippery the fog has made the stone!"

As he dropped on the other side his foot slipped and he fell; he just saved himself from really lying prostrate by his right hand, which touched the mud. But he was active enough to save himself in this way; and he stood safe and upright, only rather astonished at the accident, in a shorter period of time than it will have taken the reader to arrive at this account of his safety.

He recovered himself in a moment, and only his right hand reached the ground.

On he went for a short distance through the meadow; then he turned across the turf on his left hand, and so reached the gate which opened on the road nearly opposite the garden-door.

The door was not locked. His right hand felt painful, so he opened it with his left. This made more noise than usual, on account of his being awkward with the latch. Hannah, the servant, ran out.

"O, is it you?" she said. "I thought some one was playing tricks with the door."

"I opened it with my left hand," said Peter, and he walked into the house.

Miss Lance was in the kitchen, giving some directions as to the next day's housekeeping.

She spoke to Peter. He stood there answering her, when Hannah walked in, having locked the garden-door for the night.

"You have hurt yourself," said the woman. "Why, Mr. Sands, what is the matter?"

Peter looked pale; the wristband of his shirt was spotted with blood and dirt.

"I fell as I got over the Long Meadows stile; or I should have fallen if I had not recovered myself by pitching on my hand. But I did not know I had cut it. I haven't cut it. I'll go to my room. No, Miss Lance, don't touch me." Peter was pale and troubled, because the thought came back to him of the top stone of the stile feeling strangely. What could it have been? "Don't touch me; I'll go and wash. Give me the kettle, Hannah."

"I'll bring the kettle," said the woman. "I am always careful as to falls. I'll carry it. There! Go first up-stairs."

When Peter and Hannah entered the room, which has been described—the long, narrow room with the bed at one end, and the other end fitted up as a sitting-room—Peter said:

"I feel queer. I must have given myself a shake. Help me off with my coat."

Hannah performed this service, and then said:

"Shall I take the things out of your pockets?"

He said, "Yes;" adding, "I bought a new knife, and when I fell over the stile it dropped out of my breast-pocket. You may think what a jerk I had. I picked it up and put it back. It will want wiping, for the ground was wet with the mist as well as slippery."

"Here it is," said Hannah. "But it has not a mark on it. This knife has never touched the ground!"

"But I picked it up. The light glittered on the new steel at the back of the handle, or I should never have seen it at all."

"Ay!" exclaimed Hannah; "but here is another;" and she threw it from her into the basin she had just filled with water.

Those two looked in each other's faces.

"God grant thou hast done no wrong this day," said Hannah.

As she spoke there was a loud sound of voices in the street, just below the windows.

Hannah opened the window and called out:

"What is the matter? Don't stand gossiping—a parcel of lads and men should know better—just under our windows with your noise."

Hannah was a well-known personage, and no unruly play or grouping of persons for gossip and laughter was allowed opposite Miss Lance's house. But now some one looked up and said:

"It's a bad job, missis. James Gardener lies dead by the Long Meadow stile, and it is thought that some one has been hard upon him."

"Dead!"

"Yes, dead. Has been dead about half an hour; not more, 'tis fancied."

"What is doing with him?"

"He's carried to the shed by the station. Simon Lyster, going back to the meadows with his dog, found him—that is, the dog found him and gave a piteous howl; so Simon began to search, and there he lay."

"In the path?"

"Just out of it; by the ditch that runs down to the river by the side of the hedge."

"Come the first thing to-morrow, and tell us what is known," said Hannah.

She shut the window in a hurry, for Peter had given a groan and fallen back on the bed in a fainting fit.

Speechlessly and with a horrible feeling overpowering her—a nameless feeling, for she did not know why she suffered—she recovered Peter, and said:

"Now get to bed, and get there quickly. There is more water in the kettle. I am coming back in a short time; I've got to tell the ladies. But do you obey me; wash, and get to bed."

She left the room; and Peter, after cleansing his stained hand with plentiful ablutions, obeyed her as a child would have done. He was so troubled that he was glad to obey and not to think.

PART III.

CHAPTER I.

Now in her heart, Hannah believed that Peter Sands had met James Gardener, and that, under provocation, in a moment of fiery passion, he had struck the man a deadly blow, and become his murderer.

But Hannah was still Peter's true friend.

It was no business of hers to give utterance to any suspicion. It was clearly her business to speak only to facts, and not to say more about them than the truth demanded. She left him in his room, and went down stairs to the drawing room, where the Miss Lances were sitting.

"Ladies, did you hear the talking in the street? I opened the window to disperse the gossipers, and they went; but they told me this—James Gardener's dead body has been found by the Long Meadows stile, just by the side of the ditch."

"I thought Peter came home that way," said Miss Lance.

"So he did. And you, ma'am, heard what he said."

"What is the meaning of it? What are you looking so oddly for?"

It was Miss Jane who said this, and indeed it was enough to alarm any one to see the strange expression on her sister's face, and the unusual look of anxious determination on Hannah's.

"Please, Miss Jane, don't be nervous. It only means that we are in the middle of very awful facts."

"Yes. You have said well, Hannah. Now, sister, just listen to what we say. Of course, Peter will be had up as a witness. Then we may be called on to speak as to what passed when he came into the house."

"I never heard him come in," said Miss Jane.

"That was because he came in by the back door," said Miss Lance. "All the interest lies in the fact that he did not come by the usual way through the streets to the front of the house, but he came by the Long Meadows, and he fell as he got over the stile, and saved himself by coming down on his right hand with such force as to hurt his wrist. The fog, he said, was so dense at one moment, though it rolled away the next, that he did not make his footing sure, and he found the stile and all about it slippery. Then, when he got to the garden door, he tried to open it with his left hand, because his right wrist was paining him, and the awkwardness of the attempt was heard by Hannah, who went out and met him. I stayed in the kitchen, and when he came in I thought he looked pale; he had mud on his sleeve. Hannah returned from locking the door. She said to Peter, 'You have hurt yourself.' Then he told us of his fall. But he said he could not account for blood on his hand and sleeve. He did not know that he had cut his hand, or any way broken the skin. He said he would go and wash, and was going to carry a kettle of hot water up-stairs for himself, but Hannah would not let him. She went up after him. Now, Hannah, what happened next?"

Then Hannah told all that has been just said as to the knife. How that Peter had desired her to take the knife from his pocket for him, as his wrist was stiff: how he had thought that it would be dirty from the mire into which he said he had jerked it by the fall; how the knife was perfectly bright and clean, and how she had found a second knife just like the one he had bought that evening, and how this second knife was soiled in a way too terrible to think of, and how she had dropped it into the basin of hot water that was just before her.

Then came the account of the voices below the window, and of her inquiries, and the answer that had come, on which Peter had fainted—fainted for the first time in his life.

She told, too, how she had recovered him, and left him to go into bed, while she had come down to tell, as she had now done, the whole story to Miss Lance and her sister.

Still in her heart Hannah believed that Peter had killed James Gardener.

Not, as she said in her heart, not like a murderer—not of premeditated malice, but in some angry moment, by the force of a blow, directed by chance to some dangerous part—a blow to which that man must have provoked him.

This was just what the good woman felt, and the way in which she argued. And she knew that, in Mr. Breward's absence, Peter had trouble with Frederick Drake. She knew that Gardener had visited Drake, that they had come to high words, and that in some way Gardener had gone off triumphant, and left Drake in angry despair, so vexed, so self-blaming, so wretched about something which he vowed he could not help, that he had called for wine, and, in spite of the servant's remonstrance, had taken much more than was good for him.

Hannah knew this. And she knew that Peter had been sent for to keep Drake quiet and bring him back to his senses. It was well known in the house—and, indeed, no one had tried to conceal it—that Peter had been Drake's faithful friend, and a very firm friend, too; that he had issued orders to Drake, and that he had been obeyed; that he had commanded Drake to have no further dealings with Gardener, and that Drake had told the servants to refuse Gardener admittance; that Gardener had forced himself into the house on one occasion, and that he had to be turned out, Drake having taken refuge in his room and locked his door.

Of these details of what had happened in Mr. Breward's house in his absence she knew more than Peter knew, so she had ground for her fears, and her fears were so strong as to make her believe that Peter had, under some strong provocation, or perhaps in consequence of personal violence, killed James Gardener that night at the Long Meadows stile.

Or, perhaps, he had not known that he had killed him; he might have left him knocked down and disabled, and, perhaps, the first knowledge of his being actually dead had reached him through the voices in the street, and so sent him fainting on the bed.

So Hannah argued; and so she really believed. But she was never going to put her belief into words. She would be Peter's friend to the last.

Miss Jane Lance had listened with a frightened face to all her sister had said: and to Hannah's continuation of the narrative both sisters had given a perfect attention.

Miss Lance did not speak; but Miss Jane, in a trembling, hurried manner, with a poorly acted appearance of indifference, said,

"Well, it is very disagreeable. But all we know is that the man is dead—died in a fit, perhaps, or from an accident; what can it be to us?"

"No, no, sister," said the elder lady, very gently. "Do not let us pretend to an indifference which we cannot feel. People are sure to fear that Gardener has been killed. It is for the public safety that every suspicious thing of this nature should be inquired into. It is plain that Peter must have been on the spot immediately after the—the—perhaps the murder. Plain speaking is best, I think. Evidences of foul play—or what has the appearance of foul play—have come into this house with him. He will be a witness, and called on to give evidence of what befell him, of what he felt or saw; Hannah too, possibly: I may myself be called on, for I was one of the first to see him on his entering this house after coming straight from the place of the murder. Very disagreeable things have come into this house to-night. We have nothing to conceal. But we must not try to appear indifferent."

"O, I am not indifferent," said Miss Jane; and, leaning back in her chair, she burst into tears.

With a sickening intensity she knew that Peter would be suspected. He must be looked on as a suspected person; and suspected of what? Of murdering a man who had taken care of his childhood; whom he had once, in his innocent infancy, loved as a son loves his father. How could any one bear to have Peter Sands suspected of such a deed as that?

To be suspected of that! Could any man, however good he might be, ever recover such a blow as even a suspicion of this nature must be?"

Peter, in her mind, was already separated from all good men, by being the object of a vile suspicion. And he so young: all his friends happy in his promising youth.

Was all this youthful promise to be blighted by a suspicion such as that which she was sure would now be entertained? She dropped back into the depths of the great chair in which she was sitting. O, if he had only died! Death would have been nothing to this!

While one sister was thus disabled and dismayed, the other, casting her fears aside, as it were, was vigorous to think and act.

"Where is Hester?" she asked.

Hester was the house and parlor maid, and Hannah was the cook.

"A merciful Providence made me send her early to bed," answered Hannah, with unaffected solemnity. "The girl had had a headache. I sent her up-stairs just before I went to the garden door. Her attic being at the back, she has neither heard nor seen anything."

"That is well; now we can take counsel together. Hannah, I shall let you out at the front door; knock gently to be let in again. I do not want Peter to hear you. Go to Mr. Breward; say only this—that he must come to me. Peter Sands has sprained his wrist, and he has something to say about the Long Meadows stile. Bring him back with you."

So Hannah went away, the door being carefully shut, and making no noise. Then Miss Lance went up-stairs, and knocked at Peter's door.

"Oh, come in. Is it you, Miss Lance? I was sure some one would come directly. Hannah promised to return."

"You fainted; but you look hot now."

"I am very hot. Is it not dreadful? Is the knife still in that basin of water?"

"Yes. I see a large unopened clasp-knife there."

"It ought to be all told," said Peter, as he sat up in bed, with his eyes bright and his face flushed, "And I believe that I have hurt my wrist. You know that that is not my knife. My knife is on the table. I picked up the other from the ground after I fell. I saw it by the light striking on the steel at the back, and I never doubted its having jerked out of my pocket. O dear, what a sad and horrible thing this is! Poor James! and I am so disabled. How I wish I was not in this fever with my wrist! I'll have a surgeon to look at it. I never was ill in my life, that I can recollect. Look at it, Miss Lance. But all this while we ought to be telling everything we know. I wonder what o'clock it is."

Miss Lance quieted Peter by looking at his wrist. It was certainly very seriously hurt.

"Indeed we must send for help," she said, "I will send for Mr. Carter."

"But I ought to speak about the knife and my fall and the stile. It is all evidence, you know."

Peter leaned back his head, exhausted by the feverish anxiety of his mind, which with the pain he was suffering, bewildered him.

"I have already sent for Mr. Breward."

"O, thank you. I am very glad."

"Keep quite quiet. I shall return very soon."

"What a trouble for you!" said Peter.

The words followed Miss Lance as she left the room.

She went down to the hall and opened the house-door. She had heard some one come, and she expected to see Hannah; but it was Mr. Breward, and he was there alone. He explained this by the first words he said:

"Hannah spoke of his wrist, so I sent her to bring Carter. Is he really hurt?"

"I think so. But we want to speak of James Gardener. Come here."

She showed Mr. Breward into the room where her sister sat, and told him very quickly all their story. Her concluding words were these:

"It is just so much that we should do wrong to conceal it; and it is at the same so little that it seems useless to speak."

"Exactly," said Mr. Breward, with a grave face. "Yes, I'll go and see him. I know my way. Stay here, and bring Carter up when he comes."

So Mr. Breward went alone to Peter Sands, and once more the events of the evening were told.

CHAPTER II.

"Peter," said Mr. Breward, after hearing the whole story, "is this all you have to say—all?"

"All. Of course I was surprised to find my cuff, sleeve, and hand soiled, as you know. I have never asked about my shoes; and the knife just stays where Hannah dropped it, in a fit of disgust or fright. I remember she said something of a wrong having been done, and I stared, terrified, puzzled—I can't tell how I felt. I was in great pain; my head began to swim. Then came the voices, and we heard that James had been found by the stile; and I knew he must have been close by when I got over it; and that the soils were—well, I knew. And I fell down faint."

"I hear Carter. He is coming up-stairs. Peter, I think we should send for the superintendent of police. These things you have told me are evidence; but whether of any use we can't tell. We must send, I think. You would not prefer secrecy?"

"No, no. Let there be no secrets," gasped Peter. The pain in his wrist at that moment quite took his breath away. Mr. Breward observed the change, and saw the effort that accompanied the words. He could not tell what to make of it.

Mr. Carter entered the room, and went to work immediately on Peter's wrist.

"We must have hot vinegar and bran poultices now," he said. "It is a bad sprain."

So for a time all attention was given to the injured wrist, and Mr. Breward sat down-stairs with Miss Jane. He had said to her that he must go to the superintendent of police, and send him to hear Peter's story.

"They will think that he did it," she said.

It made Mr. Breward start to hear this plain statement.

Poor Miss Jane, whose mind had been occupied for the last hour with this possibility, felt relieved when she had uttered the words. It seemed to lessen her dread. She felt that she shared her grief with a strong man, and that she had got rid of a painful responsibility by speaking these words.

"Yes, it is true," she went on; "they will say that he did it. But I know it must be gone through. I know the man must come. I know Peter Sands must suffer the suspicion, and the degradation that such a suspicion must inevitably bring with it. O, yes, I know it all; and I don't dispute a word you say. But to see a good youth ruined for life in this way, to know that he will live with the disgrace of having been suspected of a murder fastened upon him, is too much for me to bear quietly. And now, if the man is to come, send for him, and make haste; anything is better than waiting with one's heart full of fear and vexation. Never mind about night or day. Of course the police are not going to bed, with a dead man at the station, and the evidences of a possible murder at the Long Meadows stile. Send or go to him directly. I could never sleep with this misery on my mind. And if you would send for him, or bring him, there would be something done, and one might get rest and strength for whatever is to come to-morrow."

And then Miss Jane hid her face in her handkerchief, and smothered her sobs.

"I believe you are right," said Mr. Breward.

He took his hat from the table and left the room. In another moment Miss Jane heard the sound of the closing of the house-door.

While this was going on in the sitting-room, Miss Lance and Hannah were with Mr. Carter in Peter's room.

The surgeon did his work skilfully and kindly. He felt Peter's pulse, and gave a glance at Miss Lance.

"You have some one here whom you can send to my house for a draught, which our young friend will be all the better for taking," he said. "If you have no messenger I will come back, or send some one myself."

"I can go, sir," said Hannah. "Miss Lance won't mind being left; and if anything unexpected occurs the other servant can be called up. You must wash your hands, sir. No, not there, if you please." And Hannah threw a towel over the basin where the clasp-knife still lay in the stained water. "Into this room, sir."

So Mr. Carter followed Hannah, and made his hands clean from the vinegar, and went down-stairs and out of the house without knowing any of the particular circumstances that had attended Peter's fall.

When he was in the hall he said to Hannah,

"Don't let Sands be excited by anything. He has had a shock. If he has not heard of this poor James Gardener's murder, don't tell him till I have seen him again."

"Murder, sir?"

"Yes. Have you not heard?"

"We heard of his death; found by the stile, we heard."

"I am afraid that I have not used a wrong word," said Mr. Carter. "I wish it may be found that I have. Good-night."

"I shall be after you in a minute, sir, for the medicine."

"O, yes. I will go back and prepare it immediately."

Hannah stood still, considering many things; then she walked into the sitting-room to see Miss Jane, and there she found Mr. Breward, who had returned, and a person whom she knew well by sight—the superintendent of police.

"We were waiting for Mr. Carter to leave the house," said Mr. Breward. "We can go up-stairs now."

"He is not to be excited, sir. I am to follow Mr. Carter for some medicine. He found him rather—"

Then Hannah felt that the superintendent's eye was on her, and she also felt that she had done wrong in admitting that Peter's state was one of excitement and agitation.

Perhaps Mr. Breward also had some such thoughts in his mind, for he said,

"Peter Sands himself sent for Mr. Marston; and if you are to fetch medicine you had better go at once."

Then he led the way up-stairs, and Mr. Marston followed him.

It was no more than just eleven o'clock. It will be remembered that at a quarter before nine Peter had left Dr. Beauclerk's house, and all that had been related had happened in rather less than two hours. It must have been not more than a quarter after nine when Peter fell at the stile; in about ten minutes after that Simon Lyster must have found James Gardener's body; and by half-past nine Peter might have got to Miss Lance's house. It was a little after ten when the voices were heard under the window, and now, as Mr. Marston went up-stairs, the clock had just struck eleven.

The superintendent and the most sagacious of his staff had been quietly making observations and collecting evidence for about an hour and a half. It was wonderful how much they had learnt in that time. However, it was not Mr. Marston's part to gossip. He was ready to hear anything, but he had next to nothing to say.

When he entered Peter's room he found him sitting up in bed, carefully propped against a pile of pillows, with his wrist and shoulder enveloped in many wrappings, and finally in a blanket. He smiled as the superintendent came into the room; but the smile was a sad one.

"I am sorry not to have been able to come to you," said Peter; "but for the moment I am disabled."

"You sent for me," said Mr. Marston.

"Yes. I want to tell you all I know."

Then the tears came into Peter's eyes, and his voice was

"You must forgive me," he said. "He was once like a father. His house was my home."

"Yes, I know," said Mr. Marston.

He spoke in a firm sort of way, as if he wished to check all expression of feeling as being against the transaction of business, but not at all as one who could not understand feeling. It was evident, however, at this moment that the superintendent of police considered all mere feeling out of place. His "Yes, I know," stopped Peter at once; with an effort he recovered himself, and in a moment was nearly as calm as Mr. Marston himself.

"Tell me just what you want to tell me; you sent for me to say something. You are to understand that we are seeking for facts that may guide us towards the discovery of the person who caused the man's death. It was not an accident, you understand. His death was caused by a blow. Now everything you say may be used in evidence; so I caution you. I shall not ask you a single question, but I shall take down what you say, and use it if desirable."

"I wish to tell you everything. I wish to put you in possession of all that has occurred to me."

Then Peter began with the clock striking a quarter to nine on his leaving Dr. Beauclerk's, and his intending to come home by the direct way through the streets, saying that he changed his mind going to the ironmonger's to order a garden-tool; that when there he found a good many people in the shop, but was nevertheless quickly served; that, as he was leaving, his eye was attracted by a quantity of knives on the counter, lying on an open sheet of coarse brown paper; that he bought one of these knives, and put it in his pocket, refusing to have it wrapped up.

He told how, on leaving the shop, the thought crossed his mind that he would get back by the meadows; and he told the way he took, and how he found the white mist curling up from the river, and how he came on at a good pace till he reached the stile.

Then he entered as minutely as possible into the circumstances of the fall, and of his picking up the knife, thinking it was his own. After this he spoke of his walk home, of his coming into the light of Miss Lance's kitchen, of the mud and stains being found upon him, of his getting up-stairs followed by Hannah with the kettle, of his cautioning her to take his knife out of his pocket—two knives being found, and of the soiled knife being then in the basin of water into which Hannah had dropped it.

The superintendent walked to the basin.

He called Mr. Breward. They pointed out something to each other.

"We must take possession of this," he said; and then returning to Peter, he looked at him.

"That is the whole story," said Peter Sands. "There may be mud on my boots—"

"Hannah has cleaned them," said Mr. Breward. "I asked her. She said your walking through the meadow, up the slope to the gate, had thoroughly wetted them. They were wet with the moisture on the grass; and having a moment's leisure, she cleaned them."

"Well, that is all, then," said Mr. Marston. "I hope your wrist will be pretty well to-morrow."

"It is better already for Mr. Carter's treatment."

"Good-night, then." And both Mr. Marston and Mr. Breward left the room.

Soon after Hannah and Miss Lance came in; the quieting draught was administered, and took speedy effect.

Peter Sands was asleep. The little household went to their bedrooms. The sense of a present danger, and a prophetic fear of a coming trial, were upon them. But they could only hope and pray.

CHAPTER III.

The coroner's inquest was a matter of speedy performance. The man had been murdered. It was for the police to find out the murderer.

James Gardener had received two blows; one was undoubtedly from a fall.

There had once been a gate where this stile now stood, and a low moor-stone post had stood by the side of the path, with an iron hook in it to hold the gate open for the convenience of the farmer who rented the meadows. The position of the gate had been changed, and a stile had been placed where it had stood, as there was a right of way for foot-passengers, and the path could not be blocked up.

The low stone post with the iron ring had never been moved.

A violent fall had brought one side of James Gardener's head against this stone; but on the other side of the head there was a mark which was said to have been the cause of the fall and of his death.

It was not large. It matched one end of the large clasp-knife which Peter said he had picked up. It had possibly been thrown with tremendous force, and with a deadly aim.

It came to all minds, with the strength of complete conviction, that the owner of that knife was the slayer of that man.

There was a day and a night of continued excitement; there was not, perhaps, a living soul in all that seaport town of Tred-dington, who was of an age to speak on the subject, who did not express some interest in the discovery of the murderer, and was not in some way busy in the matter.

The most silent man in the place was Fred Drake. He seemed like one struck with a sickness of the heart because of the death of his enemy. And he had hated him; and he had thought that he wished him dead; and he had said in his anger that he could kill him. And now the man so spoken of was dead, and he had been killed; and from every heart there went up a wonder and a great cry—a question as to who had done it.

It did not seem to Mr. Breward an unnatural state for Fred to be in. He felt very kindly towards his nephew, and told him he was sorry for him; but when Fred wanted to visit Peter, Mr. Breward said that Mr. Carter's orders had been so positive as to his patient being kept as quiet as possible, that he would not allow Fred to do more than write a note.

"I won't let you two lads get talking together," he said; "you'll worry Peter into a fever. You are a sad, selfish fellow, you know, Fred; you would gossip him dead, and never know it till it was too late."

So Fred Drake had to bear his burden as well as he could; but he was haunted by the thought of that man being dead.

After one day had passed Mr. Breward received a note from Mr. Bennet very early, before he was out of the room. It contained a few words only: "Come to me immediately, if you can. I want a word in private on important business."

Mr. Breward in less than ten minutes after reading this was at Mr. Bennet's door. He found that gentlemen airing himself on the door-step apparently, but really waiting anxiously for his arrival. As soon as Mr. Breward saw his friend, he also saw that something very serious was the matter. "What is it?" were his first words. "Anything concerning Fred Drake?"

"O, no; Fred is doing well. Come here, into my room." Mr. Bennet led the way into the house, and into the room on the right where breakfast was laid. He stood still, and faced round on Mr. Breward, and said, "Marston, the superintendent, has been here, and—we must manage it the best way we can. They must take Peter Sands into custody on suspicion of being the murderer of James Gardener."

"He! impossible! You can't believe it?"

"No, I don't believe it; but my belief or disbelief is nothing to the purpose. They have got a chain of evidence, and they would have had him in custody by this time, only the Miss Lances are so respected that, feeling the young man was safe, the first thought was to come and tell me, and you must see, I break it to them. But I know the story which has been put together, and Peter will have to be committed to jail; and if no other man is found with a grave load of suspicion attached to him, he will be as surely tried for murder as we are now here talking of it."

"It will be the most unheard-of piece of infamy."

"No, no," interrupted the lawyer; "the whole must go by evidence."

"But he did not, could not do it."

"Then he won't be hung," said Mr. Bennet.

"Hung!" The horror in Mr. Breward's face, and expressed by his voice, was such that Mr. Bennet began to expostulate with him.

"Don't be unreasonable," he said. "Unreasonable people never do any good; and that poor fellow is likely to want as many sensible friends as he can get. A man has been murdered. It is the duty of the police to try to find out who did the deed. The only person who can be proved to have been near the place is Peter Sands. He can be proved to have been at the stile close on the moment of the murder. He had provided himself with a knife, which he used, though not as knives are used usually. He knew that James Gardener had been inquiring for him; he had been told that he would be at Stonemoor to see after him that very evening. He had been cautioned; yet he went purposely, and after starting to go back by the streets, the very way in which he would be sure to meet James Gardener, if he had kept his threat of seeking him at Stonemoor in the evening. He returns to Miss Lane's house blood-stained, agitated, injured in the wrist; the place bears the marks of a struggle; and no other man can be found who was near the place at the time, or of whom Gardener had ever said an evil word, except your nephew, who was safe in my house with my wife and her half-sister, who is staying with us, during that time when the crime was accomplished. It is not wrong, certainly, to bring Peter Sands up on suspicion of the murder."

"But you can't believe him guilty?"

"What does that matter?" asked Mr. Bennet. "Is the law of the land not to take its usual course because you and I like Peter Sands, believe him to be an excellent youth, and because he is loved and admired by many respectable persons, and lodges with two charming old ladies? I will grant to you that I consider it one of the most unfortunate, vexatious trials that ever fell on the friends of a good youth. As to Peter himself, I am extremely sorry for him; and all the more sorry because I can see farther into this case than you can. Poor as the evidence is against him, there is not a particle of evidence against any one else. He had been threatened by Gardener. Gardener wished to meet him, and felt himself to have been injured by him irreparably. I never liked Gardener; years ago I said so, and wanted the trusteeship to be vested in some one else. I think myself that there might have been some encounter between them, and that Peter might have acted merely in self-defence."

"But Peter never saw him," said Mr. Breward.

"I am not obliged to believe that," said Mr. Bennet.

This speech vexed Mr. Breward. Mr. Bennet was his friend, and he loved him. But Mr. Bennet not being a Catholic, did not know how severe a judgment he was passing on Peter Sands by those words that he had said. He was calling Peter a liar. For on such an occasion to conceal the truth, when he was pretending to tell it sincerely, was to be base and deceitful in the greatest degree.

Mr. Bennet saw that he had annoyed his friend, and so he went on to justify himself. "You know," he said, "he has not told all the truth about the knife."

"He said that he had bought the knife that evening."

"Yes; but the young man who served him has been got at, and he said at once that he had sold him two knives. He sold that evening, to two different persons, at different times, to each two knives; and one of those persons was Peter Sands." Mr. Breward sat down. He had been standing till this mo-

"This is what I would advise you to do," said Mr. Bennet. "Let me send for the priest from Penworne. I speak to you as a lawyer. Peter will probably be remanded, and had up again in a day or two. Father Joseph will have more influence in making Peter tell the whole truth than either of us can have."

"I should like to have Father Joseph here; but Peter needs nothing to make him tell the truth. If he says that he bought one knife, then he didn't buy two."

"Well, but the man who served him will swear to it."

"Then he'll hang Peter, perhaps; but he will hang him unjustly."

"Well, well; what I would impress on you is this: feelings are of no use. It is no use to be vexed, or to waste time in standing up for Peter's honor or veracity, or even to talk of religious teaching. Appearances are all against him. A man has been murdered at the stile. Peter was there. It is next to a miracle that he should not have seen the body if the deed were done before he got there; yet he did not see it, and Simon Lyster did. Of course there was a mist; but I must come back to what I began with. Feelings are of no use. Facts have to be dealt with. We will send Fred for Father Joseph. They had better come straight to where the magistrates will be—the town-hall. I suppose the concourse of people will be great. In a place such as this there is never any doing a thing quietly. Fred can bring him there, and go in my gig. Now you and I had better go to the Misses Lance at once; you can go up-stairs to Peter, and I'll stay down with them. We'll send Fred before we go; there will not be anything done till we are there, and the magistrates ready. Fred can make it all fit in. There is time," looking at his watch, "for a cup of coffee, and we have forgotten our breakfast."

"I am not inclined for food," said Mr. Breward.

"If you had done as much disagreeable work as I have had to do, you would be glad to keep your brain steady and your body strong. I always eat and drink. Wholesome food, taken as far as possible with the usual regularity, is a necessary of life."

CHAPTER IV.

This morning Peter Sands was sitting at the reading-table, which was at the end of his room.

He rose up with a smile when Mr. Breward came; but his face was pale, and the smile was not very cheerful.

"Your wrist is better," said Mr. Breward; "but you must have had a dull Sunday yesterday. I would not let Fred come to see you. The doctor thought you were excited, and he wanted you to be kept quiet. Tell me about your wrist."

"It is very much better—nearly well. It is not my wrist that troubles me—and Fred wrote me a note. So they say James Gardener was murdered?"

"Yes; such is the opinion. The magistrates will meet before twelve to-day. You will have to go, Peter."

"O, well, I can go. I was not intending to stay in all day. I shall get to work again, I hope, soon. Being my right hand it makes me useless to you." And Peter once more gave one of those melancholy smiles.

"It is a dreadful business," said Mr. Breward.

He felt so miserable and so awkward. It seemed to be quite impossible for him to tell Peter that he was suspected of being a murderer.

"Yes; too dreadful. I can't get it out of my head. Not that I try; for me, certainly, it would be unnatural not to think of James Gardener."

"I wonder who murdered him," said Mr. Breward.

"Was he murdered at all?" said Peter. "I must think it was some strange accident. Until I found it proved undoubtedly to the contrary, I could never believe that Gardener was murdered."

"I am very glad that Fred Drake was safely housed all that with accounts still unsettled. The language Fred had used had often been so intemperate, I am thankful to think that every hour of his time for the whole afternoon of Saturday can be accounted for."

"Why, no one could suspect Fred!" said Peter, with an air of surprise. "They might sooner suspect me, I think."

"And you will be suspected!"

Mr. Breward had said the words now; and as soon as they had left his lips he wondered how he had found strength to say them.

Peter saw by Mr. Breward's face more than even his words had spoken. He saw in the lines of anguish, which were not to be controlled, that he was already suspected. He stared at Mr. Breward. He was speechless. He seemed to be suffering some great change—the change of all exterior things. He grasped the elbows of his chair; he had no voice for speech. His great helplessness in the midst of this indescribable woe came like a weight crushing him.

"Yes," Mr. Breward went on, "you will have to go through this great trial of suspicion. Do yourself justice; be as strong as you can. You will have friends by your side. And there is nothing vindictive in it. It arises from the unhappy circumstances—it is the law of the land."

"And it is the will of God," said Peter.

"That is right, my friend," said Mr. Breward eagerly; "that is the way to take it." And those two grasped each other by the hand.

"When shall I have to go?" asked Peter.

"They will come. The superintendent of police will come, and you will go with all of us to appear before the magistrates. Fred is gone for Father Joseph. My dear boy, my dear Peter, I did not know till this moment how I loved you. Have faith in God, and in the friends He has given to you."

"Is it as bad as that?" asked Peter, with his sad smile, and looking at the tears in Mr. Breward's eyes.

"O, it may not be bad at all; and Mr. Bennet is with my aunts. He has told them. He came on purpose to tell them, and I came up to you."

"I think I will go down-stairs to them," said Peter. "I am so awkward with my left hand. Will you give me my hat? Thank you. Now God's will be done!—whether honor and liberty, whether the jail and the gallows, God's will be done!"

He spoke with a sweet quiet steadiness.

"He never did it," said Mr. Breward in his heart. "If I had ever held a different opinion I should change it now."

They entered Miss Lance's drawing-room. Both the ladies got up and went to meet Peter.

"This is a great grief," said the elder one; "but we must not make more of it than it is. There stops the cab, and you have to leave us. You leave a home and friends. Remember your home; remember your friends! O, Peter!" and then Miss Lance could say no more.

Peter held out his hand to Miss Jane and turned away. The superintendent of police was in the room, and a constable was behind him in the passage. In a hurry all the men went out together.

"With me, sir," said Mr. Marston; and Peter, jumping into the cab, found one of the men there, and was followed by the other. Mr. Breward and Mr. Bennet walked by themselves.

Not a single word passed between Peter and his companions while they went on in the cab.

When they stopped, the first person Peter saw was Dr. Beauclerk. He gave his hand to Peter with a look which went to the young man's heart; but not a word was spoken. Then came Mr. Breward and Mr. Bennet. Mr. Maynard the banker was there; and he stretched out his hand to Peter, who took it with an honest smile. Many others were there, and Peter knew that many had come in kindness to him; but he said nothing, and no one spoke to him.

The magistrates were there, and a chain of evidence was begun upon; but Peter said, interrupting the policeman:

"May I not tell my own story?"

at his clerk, who sat at a table near him; but the clerk held down his head, and evidently did not intend to speak unless he was openly appealed to.

"Mr. Bennet, speak for me. I want to tell my own story. I know it is irregular."

There was some talk among those assembled there.

"Is Mr. Bennet watching the case for you? Is he your appointed legal friend in this matter?"

"No," said Peter. "I want no advice, and I can speak the truth for myself."

People consulted again together.

"After the evidence has been heard you can speak."

Peter was silent.

Then came the evidence of the knife.

The ironmonger in whose shop Peter had bought the knife said it was such as he sold, and bore the mark of the maker with whom he dealt. He said that the knives had only arrived on that Saturday afternoon, and so could not have been sold on any other day. Then the superintendent said he was prepared to prove that two knives had been sold to Peter and two to another person on the same evening.

The other person was a stranger to the shopman; indeed, he knew very few people as yet, being himself a stranger in the town. But the other person was a much older man—a rough-looking man, with black hair: not a man in Peter's position of life. He might not know that man again; but he knew Peter. He had seen Peter before, and asked who he was. He knew Peter very well by sight. He had sold him two knives, and had been paid for them that night. There was more evidence from people who had seen Peter that night, and could speak to the way by which he went home; and then, on repeating his request, Peter was allowed to tell his own story. He told it in his accurate way, as he had already told it in Miss Lance's house; but it ended in his being committed on suspicion of being the murderer of James Gardener. He was committed on remand. The investigation would go on; but, in the midst of great regret, Peter was taken to jail; and Mr. Breward went back to tell his aunts what had happened. He found that Dr. Beauclerk had got there before him.

Father Joseph and Fred Drake had arrived before the case was finished, and now Father Joseph had stayed with Peter. He was to be the first friend who would see him in jail.

The first questions asked of Mr. Breward by his good aunts were, how Peter had behaved, and how he would be treated. He satisfied them on both points. He had behaved surprisingly well—yes; just with the natural openness and simplicity of a man who was good, and innocent of the charge made against him.

"He spoke for himself, and spoke clearly. But that about the knives is very queer. One can't help feeling that whoever owned that stained knife was the man who killed James Gardener."

"But Peter says he only bought one knife, and only possessed one such knife."

"Yes; and we believe him."

"Then he is innocent; and an innocent man can't be punished."

"But we must prove him to be innocent," said Mr. Breward.

Then these kind ladies knew how great a danger surrounded their young friend; how hard it might be to prove the truth; and how condemning was the evidence about the knife.

"But it is a lie," said Miss Jane.

"Can you prove it to be a lie?" said her nephew. "There are two—Peter and the shopman—and, speaking of the same transaction, they contradict each other. Peter may be supposed to have an interest in telling a lie; the shopman cannot be suspected of any desire to convict Peter. When he was asked to give an account of the transaction he gave it. He did not know what Peter had already said. He did not expect that their accounts would differ."

"I am sure that Peter is right," said Miss Jane.

"So am I," said her nephew; "but who can prove him right?"

He got up and said "Good-bye." The ladies, once more alone, wandered together up stairs into Peter's room, and up to the glass bower on the roof, whence they could see the walls of the jail where Peter waited. They were very miserable. They had not anything to do but to pray; and pray they did. No souls ever prayed more sincerely for help from Heaven: they were ready to say that there was no help in man.

CHAPTER V.

Peter was not without sympathy. He was well treated. He had a courtyard to walk in, and he could have all that he required. But he was in jail as one suspected of being a murderer.

Can any one imagine what that must have been? It was true that of the friends who knew him scarcely one believed him guilty. Father Joseph had left him with the most consoling words, both as to help and confidence. He had commanded him not to grieve.

"You have had nothing but good happen to you all days. Be content to suffer. If you have shown a good example in prosperity do not shrink from the opportunity of serving God in adversity. Be faithful still. Be trusting still. Still live close to God. Be content to suffer." His words stayed in Peter's mind, and they strengthened him.

He conformed to rules without a word; submitted to all that there was to submit to without an observation; saw his friends when they were allowed to visit him, took what they provided for his comfort with cheerful thanks, and sent pleasant messages to Miss Lance and her sister.

He was remanded twice. It had got to be wearing to human nature. At last he felt quite as if people were planning against his life. He could scarcely keep from complaining when his friends visited him.

Mrs. Beauchamp came, and even Mrs. Mills; she came with Mrs. Beauchamp. She wanted to cry over Peter, and to tell him that she would never believe that he had murdered her brother—"no, not whatever they did to him!"

It made Peter shrink away from her. How could any one be supposed to believe such a thing? and what could be done to him—to him, an innocent man? The more he heard that Dr. Beauclerk had gone to London to talk to Mrs. Penwarne. He had a strong temptation to wish that his life had never been saved—to wish he had died in his infancy on the rock where the waves had cast him. But he flung the temptation from him. Could he not give glory to God under all and any circumstances? Would he turn away from the will of God? Was it of any fault of his own that he was in this trouble?

Only for a moment now and then was he overtaken by human fear and dread, and by a sense of the injustice he was suffering. His usual demeanor was one of calm, courageous patience, and his general state of mind was entire submission to the will of God.

Peter, after having been twice remanded, was sent back to prison finally committed to take his trial for the murder of James Gardener.

His agitation of mind was very great. And yet not more than a Christian might show; not more than was to be expected of a man in the greatest of all earthly dangers, and unable to help himself.

He knew, however, that God had given him friends, and he was thankful for them.

The assizes at which he would be tried for his life would soon be held; there would be no time to lose, and he knew that every possible effort would be made for him. He knew also that to make these efforts, and to do all that could be done to prove his innocence, was right. It was right to give his will up to God, and he gave it in daily acts of entire submission; it was also right to strive for his acquittal, and to take every effort that friends could make towards that end as expressions of the love and care of his Heavenly Father.

He prayed for God's blessing. He prayed for strength. Every day his courage increased; a calm, strong, enduring state of mind was attained to; it might be called the perfection of fortitude.

Mr. Bennet had undertaken the management of his case. Neither good-will, nor energy, nor knowledge, nor money was wanting. Publicity was courted; and far and wide, through Europe and Asia, in America, wherever correspondence could reach or newspapers could penetrate, the account of this murder and the whole story of the life of the suspected man was read and listened to and talked about.

Among Catholics prayers went up to the throne of grace. Priests remembered Peter at Mass. Holy Communion was offered up for him by the people.

Mrs. Penwarne had desired that no effort should be spared; Lady Edith had written a note to Mrs. Beauchamp, and she had sent it by Father Joseph for Peter to read. And while this man waited through the days and weeks before his trial could come on, words that had been said to him seemed to fill the air around him, as if angels were whispering these consolations there.

He was a man who could not be idle. His love of reading failed him; under the circumstances in which he lived he could not give his mind to outside things, but his love of drawing came to his help. There was a touch of sadness about the occupation too. The drawing might be something to leave after him. He had a supply of paper, pens, and ink. All the scenes that he found impressed on his mind he put on paper, working them carefully up, like woodcuts, with pen and ink. There was Stonemoor, and the men grouped together telling him of James Gardener's threats; there was Penwarne village, the mansion, the great headlands stretching out into the sea, the priest's house, the church, and the church-yard with the cross that marked where the mortal part of Colonel Penwarne waited for the resurrection of the just.

Doing these occupied his evenings. His days now had dreadful interviews in them—interviews with Mr. Bennet and other men of law, who never argued on the theory of his innocence, as it appeared to him; but always as if he were guilty, and as if it required superhuman efforts of ingenuity to save his life.

At this time of severest trial Peter reaped the fruit of a life in good company, and blessed by habitual acts of piety.

There were no evil memories nor bad thoughts to interrupt the inpourings of divine grace. When a good thought came to him it came in its own purity; and not an idle habit nor any practice of vicious self-indulgence ever came in the way to stop him in his prayers or to prevent him from the performance of the devotions most necessary in his present condition.

The good things that he had heard and liked to hear came to his mind vividly as healing applications to his wounded spirit. So came Mrs. Penwarne's last words:

"Remember this, in the life that lies before you—that God, in His mercy and might, never deserts those who serve Him—never! Never leaves those to themselves whose faith and devotion are known unto Him."

Such words now seemed to have been prophetic. He accepted them with all his heart. He said they were true. He cried, "Lord, I believe, help Thou my unbelief."

When, at times, anguish overcame him he would cast himself at the feet of his Divine Lord. He would fling himself for consolation on that Sacred Heart, from which alone perfect help can come, and where only perfect sympathy can be found.

He had had his sleepless nights, he had shed his bitter tears, he had gone through those terrible torturing conflicts which a man, whom the world believes to be guilty of a hideous crime, and who knows himself to be innocent, may well suffer; and now he had to go through the trial of waiting. He must wait—wait while friends prayed and legal advisers worked; he had to wait for the day of trial, and then to accept its results. Every help, spiritual and temporal, was his. But the general feeling was that he would be found guilty.

CHAPTER VI.

As soon as Peter was committed for trial the Miss Lances had sent for Mr. Breward.

They had had a profound talk together as to who were to be employed in Peter's case. Lady Edith May had also written for her aunt on this point. It was understood that neither trouble nor money was to be spared to do all that could be done for Peter Sands.

"I wrote to Mr. Monitor," said Mr. Breward, "but he would rather not undertake the case. He tells me so in a private letter."

"He has been very successful," said Miss Lance.

"He is, above all others, the man we want," said Mr. Breward. "I think you had better write to him."

"O, we will write," exclaimed Miss Lance. "We will write to-night."

"Make a personal favor of it. He names another. But Bennet says he can't do without him. We want himself. However, there must be no time lost."

The letter was written, and the result of the letter was that one evening Mr. Monitor entered Miss Lance's drawing-room, and announced that he was come to tea.

After a few words he said:

"I have been to see the young man in whom you are interested. We have been—all three of us—Bennet, Breward, and myself. How very good-looking he is!"

Miss Jane felt as if she could have boxed her friend's ears.

"I suppose," she said, "that we must submit to everything—even nonsense about beauty—to save the life of an innocent man. Are you going to prove him innocent?"

"No, Miss Jane; I am going to save his life."

"That is doing things by halves."

"I think it must be sufficient for the present emergency. Now take me a walk. We can go just where we went that night, or we can be content with a stroll in your garden."

The garden was fixed on. Mr. Monitor loved flowers. He walked and talked. He went through the house. He sat in Peter's room and wrote some letters. They showed him Peter's glass bower, and they took a good-night glance at the prison-walls; which little bit of romance they had now got into a habit of performing every night. The next day Mr. Bennet, Mr. Breward, and Mr. Monitor all lunched at Miss Lance's house. They were dreadfully cheerful; at least so the ladies thought. It made them sad all the evening to think of it, and they went crying to bed.

Just before the day fixed for the trial these gentlemen were again together at Treddington, and they had an hour's talk in the evening at Miss Lance's. The ladies were present.

"Some one," said Mr. Bennet, addressing the two ladies, "has spoken falsely as to those knives. Not a shadow of suspicion falls on any one but Peter. Character will go a great way. Appearances are against him. And appearances must be met by appearances. Help me to think of the best witnesses to his character that we can get together. Of course the shopman is mistaken about the man who bought the knives."

"And is that the best you can do for him—just to get him off, not to prove him innocent? It will be against him for the whole of his life."

Mr. Bennet did not contradict Miss Lance. She said to Mr. Monitor:

"Is that all you can do?"

There was bitter disappointment in her manner.

"We won't let him be hanged if we can help it, Miss Lance."

"And don't you believe him innocent?"

"My opinion has nothing to do with it," he said. "In fact an opinion would only be an embarrassment. The opinion that must be forced upon the jury is that there is not evidence enough to hang him."

"But he is innocent."

"We will hope so."

"He ought to be proved to be innocent."

"At present we have no means of proving that; Mr. Bennet will bring persons to speak to his character. But, no doubt, there will always be persons to believe that he did it. That is a great misfortune, but we can't help that." This was all the consolation the Miss Lances could get the day before the trial.

They complained to each other; they complained to Hannah. Then that good woman closed the door and fell into a fit of weeping.

"Ah, dear ladies," she cried, "All cannot think as you do. I believe he did it. Not another soul near the stile; the instrument of death found in his pocket; a lie ready made in his mouth. The man's gray hairs on the knife, the blood-stains, the wrist wounded, probably in the struggle; the knowledge that the man had threatened to do him harm and to waylay him, and he had been unlike himself for days. No doubt the deed was done in self-defence, but who did it if Peter Sands did not? Only against Peter had Gardener any feelings of vengeance. I can't but believe that he did it, though were I on the jury, and sworn to convict only on the evidence, I might rightly say that the evidence was not enough to prove him guilty. All Treddington will believe him guilty before this day week. The best we can any of us do now is to hold our tongues."

So these words represented popular opinion.

The good ladies felt it terribly. But they were faithful.

"If he had done it he would never have denied it," they said.

At last the day came, and Peter Sands was to be tried for murder.

Nothing could keep the Miss Lances out of court. They would stand by him to the end. Mrs. Beauchamp and Mrs. Breward were there, and Dr. Beauclerk and Father Joseph with them; and with Father Dunstan, the Benedictine, was a lady of seventy years of age, perhaps, not known to any of Peter's friends except to those who were with her.

She was stately-looking, and attracted immediate attention. She was dressed in black silk, and she wore on her head something which had more the appearance of a hood than a bonnet; her face was easily seen, and was of considerable beauty. She was so placed as to be able to see the prisoner, and yet so as not to be seen by him. She took an opera-glass from a black-silk bag, and used it frequently. She was observed to look with great intentness and very frequently at Peter Sands.

Many persons asked the name of this lady, and many more speculated silently as to who she could be. At last some one said that she was Dr. Beauclerk's mother, and this seemed to satisfy people. This was not true, but as she was living in Dr. Beauclerk's house there seemed to be no reason to doubt the accuracy of the information.

This lady remained in court for some time, and then left, being taken away by Father Dunstan.

The business of the trial proceeded as speedily as it could do.

There were no difficulties in the opening of the business.

The court was densely crowded. The prisoner was very pale, very quiet. He gave one glance round, as if to see what friends were there, and then, as if satisfied on that point, his eyes wandered no more; but he appeared to be listening with unmoved attention to the story of his supposed guilt, which was now laid before the judge and jury, before a great assemblage of people, before his own best friends, before God and his Guardian Angel, and which on every point was to be proved by trustworthy witnesses, and which seemed at every step in detail to make him guilty of a deed he had never done.

It was a well put together story. Peter listened to it with intense attention. He could not have contradicted a single word till the story came to his buying the knife.

The history began very early, even with Mr. Bennet wishing James Gardener to retire from the trusteeship, to which, by Colonel Penwarne's will, he was appointed. All the story of Fred Drake and the ninety-seven pounds came out; all that he had done and said as to James Gardener. All the anger James Gardener had shown against him. All that this man had said at Stonemoor—the opinion of the men that James would try to do Peter some bodily injury; and the very words were repeated which James had used when threatening him. Great stress was laid on Peter being earlier than usual at Stonemoor on that Saturday, because he had got an engagement to keep with the choir-singers, and it was shown that James Gardener might have been expected to visit Treddington that night, as he often did on Saturdays, and that if, according to his wild threats, he had again visited Stonemoor to seek an interview with Peter, he might have been sure to have been met in the Long Meadows, and that accordingly there Peter did meet him, and there, under more or less provocation, had no doubt accomplished his death.

Such, in outline, was the story to which Peter listened. It was made to hold well together, and it was put with great force by the counsel against him, and proved by witnesses at every point. Father Joseph, Fred Drake, Simon Lyster, and Mr. Breward were brought forward. One after the other they were handed over to Mr. Monitor for cross-examination, who received them with a pleasant smile, and did no more than ask one or two questions in a gentle friendly way, as if to make one or two points of the story still clearer than they already appeared.

The first day of the trial was over, and everything seemed to be going against Peter. It was as if his best friends had been made to testify against him.

When the second day came, the young man was examined who had sold him the knife. He gave his answers calmly, and with apparently the most perfect truth. But when he was handed over to Mr. Monitor he was not treated as Peter's friends had been.

Mr. Monitor had still the same gentle manner, but there was an earnestness now about him which evidently excited the attention of the court. The jury looked lively, and the young man nervous.

But Mr. Monitor had no intention of alarming this youth at all. He asked him how long he had been in Treddington. How it was he knew so much of Peter Sands. Had he ever spoken to him?

No; he had heard him sing. He had heard him sing several times at a concert and at church. He had often attended the Catholic church on Sunday evenings. Peter Sands sang in the choir. He liked to hear him.

Was the shop in which he served a well-frequented shop? Were there a great many people there on the evening in question?

Yes, an unusual number. It was because of vessels being going to sail that night and on Sunday morning. Sailors came in and made purchases. They often bought knives. They bought small metal plates also, and they had purchased a great many knives on that night.

Did he think that the dark man to whom he had sold two knives was a sailor?

He could not tell. He might have been.

"And how many articles did you sell to the prisoner that night?"

He had sold two knives.

"You must answer my question," said Mr. Monitor, with a smile that struck everybody who could see him. "I have no doubt of your good faith, and that you intend to answer rightly. You are on oath, you know. On your testimony a great deal depends. Now listen to my question again. How many articles from your employer's shop did you sell to the prisoner at the bar on that day?"

With a little confusion the young man said: "I don't know how to answer any better. I sold him two knives."

"But you must mark my words. I did not say how many knives; I said how many articles did you sell to the prisoner at the bar?"

"Two."

"Now consider—two?"

"Yes, two."

"Can you remember giving him two articles which he had that night purchased?"

"Yes."

"On your oath, remember, Now take time to consider. Not one only, not three, nor four. Don't hurry yourself—I have no wish to confuse you. I depend on you for the simple truth as you know how to tell it."

"I sold him two articles; I gave two articles into his hands. They were two knives."

"Did any one else in the shop serve him with anything?"

"No, sir."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure. I saw him come in, and I watched him out."

Mr. Monitor made a sign to some one, who placed on the table before him a piece of iron like a half-moon, used for cutting grass edgings.

"To whom did you sell that instrument on that Saturday night?"

There was suddenly a noise—a confusion in the court. Some one had forced a way in; the judge was being spoken to. "Never mind the noise. Did you sell that to any one that night? Don't be afraid."

"I sold it to Peter Sands."

"That is, you sold him two articles, as you have answered on oath, and quite correctly—this instrument and a clasp-knife."

The judge was speaking to some one by his side, but the attention of the jury was riveted on Mr. Monitor.

"Do you wish to correct yourself? Will you now repeat—on oath, mind—that you sold two knives and this instrument to the prisoner?"

"No, sir."

There was now a considerable stir with those who conducted the prosecution and among the jury; the judge rose.

A telegram from the Home Secretary, accompanying the copy of a telegram he had received from Rio Janeiro. The captain of the vessel Fair Lady, sailing from Tredington, telegraphed that one of his crew had given himself up as the man who had caused the death of James Gardener by an untoward accident, which he had not expected to end fatally. The coming trial of a man for Gardener's murder having been seen in a newspaper, he telegraphed to stop the trial, and to know what was to be done with the sailor, whose name was Roper.

There was now some talk as to the trial being delayed; but this was even angrily contested by Mr. Monitor.

He said he had two witnesses to bring forward to prove that the instrument before them had been brought home by the prisoner on that Saturday, and with that his case would then be over. The case for the prosecution had broken down. No doubt, two knives had been sold to some young man who looked more like a gardener, and was more likely to buy an edging-cutter, than the prisoner. The salesman, with his head full of Peter's singing, and the chorus of some favorite song probably ringing in his ears, had confused the two persons, and believed that he had sold the two knives to Peter, and the knife and edge-cutter to the other customer. He had given his evidence with honesty of purpose, and had made no more than a natural mistake. He had not been thinking of what he was about. The two customers had very probably stood side by side. Now that the salesman himself abandoned his own story, the true story—that is, the prisoner's story—revived. The stained knife was not his knife; and it was a fact that he had picked it up, as he said he had done. After that there was no case against him. As to returning Peter Sands to prison and delaying the trial, the idea was monstrous. Mr. Monitor said he cared nothing about the telegram. It might be all a hoax, a practical joke—he cared nothing about it. He had concluded his case, and he demanded a verdict; he was sure that there was no ground for a verdict against the prisoner. No jury could convict him.

There was more said, with considerable confusion and much consultation. But at last Mr. Monitor got his way.

The judge addressed a few words to the jury, and a verdict of "Not guilty" was brought in immediately.

One woman, unseen and unnoiced, burst into sudden tears.

She hid herself away, choked her sobs as well as she could, and begged pardon in her heart for judgment which, if not rash, had certainly been harsh—for she had been quick to forget the evidence of a good life, and ready to believe evil—and this woman was Miss Lance's Hannah.

"I will never judge another as long as I live," she said in her heart, as she hurried home. "May no one ever judge me as I judged him!"

And yet Hannah loved Peter, and only to the ladies whom she served had she ever uttered her judgment. But she had been quick to believe evil because her feelings had been excited and her heart troubled, and because as James Gardener was dead she could not help jumping at the conclusion that somebody had killed him!

CHAPTER VII.

"Don't talk, Miss Lance. Can't you order dinner? I am exceedingly hungry."

"Really, Mr. Monitor, you are provoking. You were so gentle, so vexatiously quiet."

"O, no; not at last. Why, I scolded everybody, Miss Lance. That is what makes me hungry."

"I can't help wishing for Peter."

"He is best where he is. Father Joseph carried him off. Mrs. Beauchamp was watching for him as if he were her natural prey; and Dr. Beauchamp and that grand old lady are gone after him. You know she is his grandmother."

"For shame! But there is our nephew. Dinner will make you hold your tongue."

They were all so excited after getting back from the court that they could not talk sense. Such, at least, was the account the Miss Lances gave of themselves.

"We felt," said Miss Jane, speaking the next day to Mr. Breward, "as if we must either laugh or cry. I would rather have cried. But we had asked people to dinner, and we could not cry before company. We laughed, therefore, instead; but we made up for it afterwards. We cried all night."

"Are you always as glad as you are now when you have won a cause?" Miss Lance had asked this of Mr. Monitor, and he had answered her:

"I always feel the thing a good deal. But I have not always old friends by me with whom I can grow young and play the boy, by way of gentle refreshment. I like my line of practice; but I have had enough of work, and would rest if I could. I still say that my line of practice suits me. I like to save a man's life."

"Whether he be guilty or not?"

"Yes; quite regardless of innocence. I ask myself this question, if the man is guilty—Who made me to differ? have I ever had his temptations? was he ever instructed as to the end for which a man is born? was he ever told what that end is?" Miss Lance bowed her head. "If Peter Sands had been hanged he would have gone to heaven." Again Miss Lance bowed her head. "You can guess all I mean, I think." She looked at her old friend with her eyes full of tears. He got up and walked away.

But that night at supper, Mr. Monitor's health was proposed by Mr. Breward, and he returned thanks in a lively little speech, asking to give a triple toast in return.

"Gossiping Newspapers, Ladies' Gardening, and The Electric Telegraph."

This gave rise to many questions. Miss Lance in a walk round the garden had mentioned the instrument for cutting the grass edging, and the probable mistake had crossed Mr. Monitor's mind immediately.

"O, you should have told us," cried Miss Jane; "it would have been such a comfort."

The barrister's face was "too bad;" all present saw it, and answered with a laugh.

Another day dawned. Mr. Monitor was gone; the judge was gone; the jury were all of them at their home again, and pursuing their employments; Dr. Beauclerk had gone to London to see Miss Penwarne; and the good old lady in black was Mrs. Beauchamp's guest.

With her, too, was Peter Sands.

Father Dunstan had gone back to his college, and he had taken Fred Drake with him on a visit. He had taken a fancy to Fred, and Fred had yielded to Father Dunstan's influence. Mr. Breward hoped for good fruit from this friendship, and Mrs. Breward and the M. s. Lances both hoped and prayed.

They looked back and saw how much Fred's folly had had to do with Peter's trial and Gardener's sin and perhaps death. Mr. Bennet had already set to work to arrange for his friend the payment of Drake's debts, and the settlement of the money questions which had arisen between him and Mary Gardener; for her father had died without a will, and to all that he possessed his daughter would succeed. Mary had been told this, and she had received the news with the most entire indifference.

"He has no freehold property," Mr. Bennet said to her; "he has done much in the purchase of the last years of leases, and has made a good thing of many of his purchases. If you will let me advise you, I should say that you had better let things alone—his investments are respectable, and will last your life. They will bring you in about a hundred and fifty pounds a year.

But Mary heard listlessly. She thanked Mr. Bennet, and said, "Don't be hard on anybody, and never let me touch ill-gotten goods."

No more could be got out of Mary. But when she went to her aunt, who was waiting for her in Mr. Bloomfield's house, she said, "It will be fifty pounds a year for you, and Roper, and for me. I can never marry now. I hope he'll take the money.

But we may say here that Roper never did take the money. He came back to England, and was put on his trial; his story was true, and his punishment not great.

He had been coming from Stonemoor, and had overtaken James at the stile. He had reproached James with being the selfish cause of his marriage with Mary being again postponed. James had got violently angry, and had struck Roper, who in self-defence had had to use Jam s Gardener roughly. After Roper had got over the stile, James, from the top of the stile, called to him; when he turned his head he found a sharp stone flung at him, which, but for his dexterity in shielding his face with his arm, must have done him serious injury. He ran back toward the stile, but, remembering that he had not another moment to spare, turned again immediately, on which another stone was flung. On this he flung at Gardener the clasp-knife he had bought and had yet in his pocket. Gardener was still leaning over the top bar of the stile. It had seemed to Roper that he had dropped down to avoid being struck.

Roper had now made as much haste as he could to the house of a friend in Treddington, whom he had promised to see before he sailed. He said nothing about James Gardener, and he remained with his friend about half an hour. He then went to the vessel, walking fast, and meeting Peter Sands, as has been said, just after Peter's leaving Dr. Beauclerk's house.

As to the knives, Roper's story explained that matter in this way. He said that, on the afternoon spoken of, he had bought two knives, one for himself, and one for a friend who had commissioned him to make the purchase. He had not had any intention of buying a knife for himself when he first entered the shop; but, having executed his friend's commission, he was tempted by the remarkable superiority of the knives to buy one for himself.

On his friend showing his knife, the vessel's cook sent his nephew, a fine youth, to buy two for him; and this young man was buying these knives when Peter Sands was in the shop.

Peter Sands must have passed the stile very quickly after Gardener's death; according to the medical evidence, he must have lived full half an hour after being struck, and falling from the stile, according to Roper's story.

He had had time to recover so far from his fall as to drag himself off the the footway to the place where Simon Lyster's dog had found him. Every one hoped that in that half hour he might have had the strength to recommend himself to the mercy of God, and grace to make acts of contrition.

All this came out after the examination of Roper, and after such a time had passed as the circumstances made necessary.

In the meantime everyone had talked of Peter Sands; everybody was full of good-will towards him; and many tried to show it in some way or other, according to their ability.

But Peter was like a man suddenly recovered from a mortal illness. He did not know how to bear his sense of safety, or what to do just at that moment with his life. The weeks he had been in prison had enfeebled his health. He felt as if the sight of the waves, and the freedom of the breeze that blew about him, were more than he could bear.

He had been told in prison that Mr. Monitor did not believe that the evidence was enough to hang him; but that there was no evidence forthcoming by which he could be proved to be innocent. He had known that he might go forth from prison free to live; but he knew that he should be suspected forever of being a murderer; and the weight of that humiliation, and the perpetual sense of so great an injustice, would have been more than a high-spirited man, in the strength of his healthy youth, could have borne without an overpowering gift of grace.

He would rather have died unjustly, if his innocence might have been afterwards proved, than go about as a marked man—as one who had disgraced the memory of Colonel Penwarne, thrown shame on Mrs. Penwarne's goodness, dragged the name of Catholic through the mire, cast aside God's grace, and insulted the Church.

As such he would be reviled, and as such he would be pointed at—a hypocrite, a sinner, a thing to be avoided, a being to be banished from good company, a living example of the evil depths to which a man might fall—a man loaded with favors; a man apparently living a holy life. As such a being he would, he believed, pass from those prison-walls into a world which would fall away from him in horror.

What good would life be to him if his innocence could not be proved?

So, at last, the great final struggle came. He was to give up his good name; and it was dearer to him than life; ten thousand times dearer—as to such a man it was sure to be.

No one but Father Joseph had known of this great struggle in all its bitterness. He prayed; he brought all his natural strength of brain and heart to help the supernatural work that he asked of our Lord to accomplish in him—the willing renunciation of his good name, if such a renunciation should be expected of him.

Yet he was innocent, and God knew it.

And it was his duty not to be a scandal.

His cry to Mr. Monitor had been "Prove me innocent!" His entreaty to Mr. Bennet had been in the same words. "Even if I die—if they kill me—never cease your efforts till I am proved to be innocent. Remove from religion the great scandal of the sin of which they believe me guilty."

Much as these men had felt the misery that Peter was going through, they yet had told him the truth—that he would have to live; and that his innocence could not be proved.

Such was the sentence that he was to bring himself to suffer.

It was to God alone that, up to this moment, he had owed all things; and now he was to prove that God alone was sufficient for him.

The world—perhaps even his best and dearest friends—would look on him as dishonored, and for all life disgraced. God alone knew that he had not dishonored his holy religion nor disgraced his teaching.

At last he had consented to this loss of all things.

And whatever favor he had gained by a good life in the sight of heaven and before man, it is certain that, by this submission, he accomplished a victory over himself which was most acceptable to God. It was putting God's will before his own will in the most trying moment of life. So just as he had taken up his cross, and made ready to endure a life of ignominious suspicion, the cloud passed away. He was free and he was innocent. He was now a hero in the world's eyes, because he had suffered unjustly.

Everybody was ready with sympathy, with congratulations, with assurances of regard. The whole world in which he moved seemed to be thankful on his account. Every imaginable expression of friendship and admiration poured in upon Peter. He might have been anything or had anything that the world could bestow.

But there were a great many practical people who wondered why all this had happened, and who asked for a reason for what they had seen.

It is quite certain that many things are suffered in this life for which there seems to be no reason, and which might very easily have been prevented, as we think, when all is known.

Peter, in spite of shaken health, and a spirit sorely tried, came out of prison a better man, a stronger man, a man living closer to God than when he went in.

But there was a very curious fact to come out on this strange trial, of which we must now speak.

As far as our human eyes can see, nothing but Colonel Penwarne's death would have brought Father Dunstan to the mansion; or sent him, at that time, to say Mass in the Catholic church in the village. Father Joseph, knowing that he should be so far engaged as to want help in the parish church, had gone to Dr. Beauclerk, and through him the assistance of Father Dunstan had been obtained. At Penwarne, Father Dunstan had heard all that there was to tell of Peter Sands, and he had never forgotten him.

The grand old lady in black was Father Dunstan's mother. She had lived in London for about three years, and she had become well acquainted with Mrs. Penwarne and Lady Edith May.

When Peter's great trouble fell upon him, she heard from them every particular concerning him, and she determined on going to Treddington to see him. This lady, who was by birth a Portuguese, had been twice married. By her first husband she had one daughter, who had married an Englishman. They had suffered shipwreck on their passage from Lisbon to Liverpool, and with their child had been lost. She now expressed her conviction of Peter Sands being this child. There was a curious identity as to time, age, and destination. She had at that time been in the West Indies with her second husband. All enquiries had been made; her son-in-law's friends had written to her; but there had been a fixed belief in the loss of all, and no idea had ever arisen as to the child having been saved. She told Peter what she believed. She wished to adopt him as her grandchild. She produced a miniature of his grand-father, and no one could deny that there was a remarkable likeness in Peter's face to this picture. She said she had observed his countenance as he stood on his trial in the dock, and that the likeness he showed to her first husband as she watched him through her opera-glass convinced her heart of his relationship to him. And now she proposed that he should go to her estates in the West Indies, and take the management of her property there as the assistant of her agent, who had grown infirm, and had suggested that he should have a younger man associated with him.

Peter accepted the offer gladly; and within the month he was sailing to his new home, with Fred Drake by his side, whose thorough change of heart was to be rewarded by a year's travel, and who had chosen to see life in the tropics in company with the friend to whom he owed so much.

For many a year the people of Penwarne have talked of Peter Sands; his example still lives in the village, and the story of his steadfastness encourages the young. He has never forgotten his friends, neither have his friends forgotten him; but the Miss Lances declare they shall never get over parting with him.

They have, however, consoled themselves in some measure by letter-writing; and though mounting the steep stairs to the top of the house, where the glass bower still stands, has with increasing years become a difficulty, it is a difficulty surmounted occasionally, when one sister says to the other, "Ah! there's the jail, and the meadows, and under that holly is the granite stile. It is like looking on Peter's youth."

After this comes the prayer for final perseverance, in which we all can join them.

The Little Spouse of the Blessed Sacrament.

CHAPTER I.

THE lights were extinguished, the people were gone, the orange and the myrtle, the rose and the jessamine, were fading on the floor, and Jesus, who, in the sacrament of His love, had upon that day presided visibly from His altar-throne over the devotions of His creatures, was once more concealed beneath the veils of the tabernacle, where, for more than eighteen centuries, His love had held Him captive. It was the feast of His Most Sacred Heart, which comes to us in the midst of the fervid days of June, as if to remind us of the love with which He burns for us, and of the love with which He would have us to burn for Him; and during the sweet service of the evening benediction, the lovers of that most blest devotion had knelt before Him—some in joy, and some in sorrow; some with souls consciously burning in His embraces; others without any sensible perception of His presence; but all with the prayer of Jacob upon their lips and in their hearts: "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me." And He did bless them in that hour; He would not be less merciful than His angel—He would not deny the petition which His ministering spirit had been unable to refuse; but high above the altar, in the hands of His priest, amid clouds of incense, and dying strains of music, and tinkling of low bells, and falling of fresh flowers, He poured out upon them His parting benediction—such a benediction as He had already breathed upon His disciples when ascending from them into heaven—a benediction as full of mercy, as full of love, as full of majesty, as full of power, and falling upon hearts, if not as faithful, at least, it may be said, as full of faith. For in that mighty multitude not one was found to doubt of the reality of His presence among them; not one who, with beating heart, and bowed down head, and spirit rapt into hushed and voiceless adoration, did not kneel before his Eucharistic Saviour in the full conviction that His eye was on them, and His heart was with them, and His lips unclosed to speak His blessing, and His hands extended to invoke it on their heads; and with such a faith as this among them, who shall wonder if, when the service was over, and they once more went forth to their homes, it was with hearts lightened at least of half their cares, filled to overflowing in the consolations showered on them by that presence, made even "as a plentiful field which the Lord hath blest," beneath the gifts and graces imparted in that blessing? They were gone, but not all: one there was who yet knelt before His altar, attracted, compelled, chained to it, as it were, by the fascination of His presence. To that wrapt up, bowed down spirit, He was invisible, and yet most visible; He was silent, and yet most eloquently persuasive of His love, and if He were held apart and separated from it by the door of the tabernacle, yet did He draw it to run after Him in the sweet odor of His ointments, until love made Him all but tangible to its spiritual embraces. And in whom, do you think, and in what visible form was this spirit of love and devotion enshrined? It was no aged priest, grown grey in the service of the altar, who now knelt at its foot. No cloistered nun, who had identified herself with the Lord of the sanctuary by a life-long renunciation of His enemy, the world. No high prince, descended from his throne, to adore Him with the Magi. No courtly dame come hither, like another Magdalen, to lay her beauty, her tresses, and her perfumes at his feet. It was but a poor beggar girl, who, in her innocent years, and her tattered rags, and her humble station, seemed an earthly embodiment of His favorite virtues. If she were alone, or if the crowd were still around her, she knew it not, for her whole soul was with the Silent Dweller in the tabernacle, feeding upon His sweetness who Himself doth feed among the lilies; and yet in that hour a human eye was fixed upon her, and a human mind was speculating about her. Nor was it for her beauty, although the beauty of devotion, the true beauty of the seraph, was beaming from her features. Nor was it for her picturesque appearance, although her rags were disposed as only a lazzaroni of Naples knows how to dispose them—color contrasting color, and patches of black, and scarlet, and yellow, and rich brown mixing together just as they would have been mingled by the cunning of a painter. Nor was it for her youth, although she was but a mere child; children as young are, thanks be to God, no rare sight in Italy, kneeling before His altar. The eye was fixed upon her, in wonder how the human form could remain so still—the mind was engaged in speculation and in question, as to what visible influence it was which could give such deep meaning to that childlike brow, such seraph beauty to those childlike features.

"How motionless she is!" thought this second watcher in the temple, "and how very fair. I wonder how long she will remain in that attitude of prayer. Oh! that I were a painter, that I might give her to the world as my vision of an angel. Surely, she must weary soon. I will wait and speak to her as she is leaving the church."

But minute after minute passed away, and she did not seem to weary. The rays of the setting sun streamed full upon her kneeling form, gave new richness to her many-colored costume, and fell with an almost unearthly radiance upon her brow; and no weariness was to be found upon it—no change of attitude which might convey the idea of bodily or mental fatigue. It was all repose—thought in repose; repose in thought—as if body and soul were both reclining in the arms of one invisibly beside her. And now the watcher herself began to grow impatient—twice she arose, as if to rouse the child from her devotions, and twice she desisted from her purpose, for each time she approached that kneeling figure, a kind of awe, for which she could not account, came over her own spirit—it seemed so like an irreverent intrusion upon the communications of the invisible Creator with the visible creature. Half in wonder, half in vexation, she retired to her own seat, and as she did so for the second time, she discovered that she was not the only one engaged in a similar scrutiny. A door, which she had not perceived before, was open, and an old man was standing near it, not merely watching the child, but making signal after signal that she should approach him. They were all unheeded, for they were all unseen; and then he advanced into the church, his feet falling without sound among the flowers that carpeted the pavement; but when he reached her side he also paused, as if in doubt whether to disturb her or to leave with her God. It was, however, only the hesitation of a moment; directly afterwards he touched her on the shoulder, whispering something at the same time in her ear; and apparently in obedience to his summons, the child arose and followed him to the open door, which closed immediately upon them, greatly, it must be owned, to the disappointment of the old lady, who had been an interested witness of the scene.

"My poor Agnese," said the old man, with a compassionate smile, "for a moment I forgot your misfortune, and beckoned as though you could see me."

"I knew that you would have work for me this evening," said the young girl, in a voice which fell like soft music on the ear, it was so plaintive and so sweet, "and so I thought I would wait until you came to call me."

"And then forgot the old man, in thought of Him to whose service the old man would call you," returned her companion with a smile.

"Yes, Francesco."

"I should like to know those thoughts, my child. Strange it is that one so young should find within herself the source of such deep and holy meditation."

"Not so strange, Francesco; remember I am blind."

"You are right, my child; the good Jesus never withholds a gift without replacing it by another tenfold its value; and so, perhaps, He has but blinded you to the things of this earth, in order to give you a facility for discerning the glories of His invisible kingdom, in a manner not often granted to His poor creatures while yet in the body."

"How do you see Jesus, Francesco?" said Agnese, abruptly. "I know that, God and man, He is on our altars, but then I know not well what an altar is like, and I have never seen a man."

"When I kneel before the altar," said the old man, in the tone and manner of one describing what he sees, and what he is seeing at that moment, "I first say to myself, Jesus is in the tabernacle, I know He is there; I believe it as if my very eyes beheld Him. He is here in His divinity—in His humanity He is there. Methinks, therefore, that I look upon Him in the human form which He took from Mary, but which is now all light and radiance—radiant in its own glorified nature—but yet more radiant in the glory of the divinity, by which it is imbued, and penetrated, and filled to overflowing. I behold Him a God, and yet a man—a man, and still a God; and if the awed majesty of His heavenly Father be throned upon His brow, yet is it mingled with that sweet and gentle look, which made Him on earth so like His Mother."

"Go on, dear Francesco," said Agnese, sitting down at his feet, and covering her face with her hands; "go on; I love to hear you."

"Yet doth He wear the garment of His shame, but now woven of the light which the Lamb sheds over His loved in heaven, flows it in robes of brightness to His feet. Yet doth He bear the crown with which our sins have diademed His brow, but now the lustre of millions of millions of diamonds seems concentrated in every thorn. Yet doth He show those wounds which, in His hands, and feet, and side, He refused not for our love; but for the blood once shed therefrom, streams of glory and of sweetness are pouring from them new. And beneath this glorious veil of His humanity methinks I discern the light inaccessible of His divinity dwelling within the sacred heart, as in its temple, and from thence pouring itself forth in floods of grace, and gladness, and mercy on His creatures. Within that sacred heart is love, and peace, and holy calm, a silence inexpressible—around it are spirits bowed, cherubim and seraphim, in reverent adoration. There have the weary of earth found rest at last, and the saints their exceeding great reward, and Mary herself her heaven of heavens. Methinks that He is inviting me, even me, the most sinful of His creatures, to the embraces of that most sacred heart—that He holds out to me His wounded hands—that, out of the very depths of His tenderness, He is speaking to my soul, and fixing on me those eyes which once were fixed in dying sweetness on His Mother; and so, in awful and yet most calm affection, I kneel before Him, and press to my lips that robe which once imparted of His virtue to the sick woman of the Gospel; and kiss those feet which were not refused to the embraces of Magdalen; and inhale the fragrance of those wounds, once terrible in their gore, but now so beautiful and so sweet—sweet with the 'smell of Lebanon,' the odor of His ointments. And then at last," continued the old man, and his voice grew tremulous and 'full of tears,' "it seems to me that He permits me to a yet closer union with Himself, that He even says: 'friend come up higher,' that He folds His arms around me, that He lays my head upon His sacred bosom, breathing of paradise, that He draws me even to the centre of His sacred heart, and in its holy stillness imparts to me those lessons of heavenly love and wisdom, which once by His living lips, He gave to His disciples. And what are those lessons, dear child, if they are not contained in such words as these?—'Blessed are the poor in spirit; blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted; blessed are the merciful, for they shall find mercy.' Or again—'Learn of Me, for I am meek and humble of heart, and you shall find peace in your souls. My yoke is sweet, and my burden light.' And I listen, dear Agnese, until my very heart and soul seem steeped in the sweetness of these words as in the dew of heaven; and then I say, not indeed by lips, but by the internal language of the spirit: 'Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth; Thou hast the words of eternal life; say to my soul, I am thy salvation.'"

"That is very beautiful, and of great devotion," said Agnese, and for an instant there was something of sadness in her sweet, low voice; "but then, you know, I cannot think or feel that way, because I cannot see; therefore, I cannot image to myself what Christ is like in His glorified humanity."

"Then tell me, Agnese, what it is that draws you to His altar?"

"I can hardly tell you, it is so much easier to feel than to describe. I am drawn to Jesus, I know not how—embraced by Him, I cannot tell you in what manner. It is as if a spirit of awe, and power, and majesty, and greatness, was overshadowing the sanctuary, awing and hushing every creature into silence; around that holy spot do angels and saints keep sleepless watch, and the Mother of God is ever there. I do not see them, but I feel them at my side; sometimes in silence they adore; sometimes in strains of sweetest music they sing His praises; and ever and always they cast their crowns before Him, and send up incense from their golden horns, and scatter the flowers of Paradise at His feet; and so it seems to me, that all the perfumes of the earth are not so sweet—all the music of the earth is not so full of harmony and love—all the brightness and glory of the earth are not and cannot be so glorious and so bright, as is the Holy of Holies where Jesus ever dwelleth in the tabernacle of the altar. Francesco, I do not imagine that I see Him there; for methinks the light of God, which is in Jesus, and which Jesus is, must be as darkness itself to human eye and human understanding. Neither do I know what sight of earth is like, but this is my thought of the light of heaven, and from out that visible, tangible darkness, Jesus draws me to Himself until my soul seems to leave the body, to be lost and swallowed up, and forget itself in His immensity; or rather perhaps it is that He Himself draws near to me, nearer and nearer, closer and closer, until He is in my heart, and in my soul, and in my very body filling every sense with joy, satiating every feeling with delight, forcing me to weep tears of delicious sweetness, and to say, as it were, in my own despite: Lord, let me never see; it is joy enough to feel Thou art so near."

It was no child who spoke such words as these. For a moment Agnese was not a child; she looked and felt like a seraph at the altar. So Francesco fancied, as he looked upon her, but he did not tell his thought. He remembered that her angel, who saw the face of the Father in Heaven, would have reason to complain if he injured the humility of the little one by words of praise; so after a moment's reverent pause, he only said:

"Agnese, your words reminds me of a story which I read many and many a long year ago, about a child, not older, if indeed as old, as you are."

"Tell it to me, if it be about Him, Francesco," said the child, "particularly if it be true. There, now I have settled myself nicely at your feet, and I shall listen quite at my ease."

"I cannot answer for its being entirely true, and it is so long since I read it, that I almost forget it. She was an orphan, brought up from her earliest infancy in a convent of which her aunt was abbess. I think her Heavenly Father must Himself have chosen out this sanctuary of peace for His little one, in order that no obstacle might be opposed to the graces which He had reserved for her innocent soul, and by means of which He so drew her to Himself, that, from the earliest dawn of reason, her thoughts seemed to turn as naturally to Him as the thoughts of other children do to the toys and ornaments of her age. From the moment she could speak, her words were of Jesus; from the moment she could walk, her feet ever turned towards the altar of Jesus; spiritually every day, and every hour of the day, she united herself to Him by her fervent desires; although far too young to be received into sacramental communion with Him, yet was this the object of her most earnest aspirations, of her unceasing petitions. Day after day she used to accompany the nuns to the church, and to watch them with eyes of envy, as two by two they approached the altar, and two by two returned to their places; and when she saw them depart in peace, because their God was with them, she would prostrate herself at the feet of the abbess, and implore her with many tears to give to her this Jesus, in whose embraces she herself was so happily folded."

"And they would not?" said Agnese, in a tone of deep sympathy.

"She was so young, my child. But, young as she was, God had given to her a faith, a perception of the real presence of Jesus in the sacrament, which saints deem themselves happy to attain after years of penance, solitude and prayer; and often she has been heard to say in her sorrow: 'He is near, and I cannot approach Him; He is here, and I cannot possess Him; He is with all the others, and I alone am deprived of His embraces.' Of her it might be truly said, that she mourned like the dove, whose sweet name she bore, for she did languish and pine until her bodily health sank beneath the vehement desires of her soul. Her step grew languid, and her cheek grew pale, and her soft eye softer and softer still, and yet, within its depth of softness (so the old legend tells us) a light, as if of heaven, did dwell; and still the languid step led her to the altar, and the weary head was bowed before it, and the eye was turned in patient sorrow towards the dove that watched above it, floating calm, and silvery, and pale, beneath the lighted lamp of the holy place, and seeming to tell, even in its outward form, of Him, the peaceful and the pure, who night and day reposed within its bosom."

"Him, Francesco! do you mean Him? Was Jesus really dwelling within the dove!"

"In those days, Agnese, the Blessed Sacrament was not kept upon the altar; it was placed in a silver vessel, suspended from above, and most often, I believe, fashioned in the likeness of a dove—a dove, chosen, perhaps, because of the sweet and loving qualities with which our fancy has invested her. Yes, and I may also say, within which God Himself has chosen to surround her, making her ever, as it were, His messenger of peace to mankind. And so it may have seemed right and fitting to the early Christians, that she, who brought the olive branch to Noe, should likewise bear Him above that altar, to which never would He descend except in thoughts of loving kindness to His creatures."

"A dove," said Agnese, thoughtfully; "that is for meditation, is it not?"

"True," said the old man; "so she would also remind them how they were to meditate like doves before Him, and how they were to put off their rough, ungainly notions, and to put on His meek and dove-like spirit, for He was a very dove in heart, and He came to us through the dove-like Mary."

"Tell me now about the child, Francesco, and what was her name. Did you not say that she was the name-sake of the dove?"

"She was called Colomba; I know not whether for her sweet and quiet disposition, or for the sake of her silver favorite and companion at the altar."

"That is well, Francesco; but I am called Agnese, and that is better still. For I am the namesake of the Lamb, and not of the chalice in which He is contained."

"Colomba grew so weak at last that she could neither walk nor stand, and then they would carry her to the church and lay her on the pavement just beneath the silver guardian of the altar. Here they used to leave her—for she always was best pleased to be left alone with Jesus. But often they watched her through the hours when she deemed herself unseen—and those who did so have left it on record, how she would lie motionless as one in a slumber, her hands folded on her bosom, her eyes lifted to the dove, which through the feeble light and gloomy shadow, seemed watching her from on high—and ever and anon, after a long and loving silence, she would say, in a voice so sweet and sad, it might have been the very mourning of the quiet bird she looked on—'Oh, that the dove would descend and give Him to my prayers.'

"One day she seemed so feeble, they almost feared to move her, but she prayed so earnestly to be carried to the church for the last, last time to visit Jesus, that the nuns had it not in their hearts to refuse her petition. So they bore her to His altar, and then, yet more earnestly than she had ever done before, she besought them to leave her to herself. It always appeared strange to them afterwards that they should have done so; they did not understand their feelings at the moment; but later they confessed to one another that a kind of awful love had crept over their spirits, she looked and spoke so like a creature acting and speaking under the influence of the Spirit of God, her very words penetrating their hearts with a kind of celestial sweetness, such as they had never felt or known before. It seemed almost, to them, as if some hidden influence had left them no choice but to obey her.

"One there was, however, not quite so submissive to the wishes of Colomba; this was her little sister, who was passionately attached to her, and to whom she herself was fondly devoted. The child, it appears, could not bear to leave her, ill and alone, in that gloomy church, so she hid herself behind one of the pillars, and watched her from a distance.

"Then, as ever, Colomba folded her hands upon her bosom, and lifted her eyes to her silver dove, and said so softly and beseechingly: 'Oh, that thou wouldst descend and give Him to my prayers.' And then—scarcely could the child believe her eyes—slowly and steadily, through the dim shadows of the evening, the dove descended—the light of the lamp above gleaming brightly on its silver wings—and, as if some secret spirit gave her power, Colomba rose to meet it. And her folded arms were folded still, and her head was bowed in lowliest prayer, and she knelt, yet scarcely did she seem to touch the pavement, and a soft and silvery mist seemed floating around her, as if to fold her from all mortal vision. And then, in fear and wonder, the child ran to summon her companions; but when the nuns returned with her to the church, the dove had re-ascended to its former position, and the child lay once more stretched upon the pavement—peace on her brow, an unutterable expression (it could not be called a smile) yet resting on her lips. The nuns were frightened at her stillness. They drew near, but she did not move; they spoke, but she did not answer. They kissed her, but no look of gratitude was returned for their embraces. Still seemed the bird of the sanctuary to brood over the fair child, but Colomba no longer had need of its assistance—closed were the eyes which had been fixed upon it so often and so long, hushed was the voice which had called it from on high. The dove's celestial habitant had taken her to Himself, and the child was dead."

"Francesco! But He had come to her in her dying hour?"

"Who can tell," replied Francesco. "This much, indeed, is certain, that when the dove was lowered, one was missing of the sacred Hosts which had been confided to its keeping; and so the nuns were left uncertainly to conjecture, that Jesus, whose delight it is to be with the children of men, would not refuse Himself to the embraces of this child, nor suffer her soul to go forth from her body until He had blessed it by His sacramental presence. And—but you can guess the rest, Agnese. The joy was too much for her wasted frame—she died in that moment of unutterable bliss.”

There was a long pause, and when Francesco looked again upon his young companion, he saw that she could not speak, so fast were the tears streaming from her blind eyes.

“To die of love! it was indeed a death to die, more blessed than any life could be,” he added. There was another pause, and then Agnese whispered, in a voice which seemed, to the old man’s fancy, as the very echo of Colomba’s:

“Oh, that the dove would descend once more, and give Him to my prayers.”

“We must have patience a little longer—fanciullina mia. You are older than the little Saint of whom we have been speaking, and soon Padre Giovanni will begin to talk of our first communion.”

“Soon! do you think he will talk about it soon, Francesco?” said Agnese, her whole face lighting up with a look of joyful surprise.

“I must not reveal the Padre’s secrets,” said the old man, smilingly; “only wait a very little longer, and then we shall see; but in the meantime, dear Agnese, we will work for Jesus with Martha, that we may have the happiness of resting afterwards at His feet with Mary. See, here are the little corporals for the wash; and remember, dear child, we are rather in want of them just now.”

“Nay, my child, you must not sit up all night to do it. The sweet Jesus would never demand such a hard task of His little one. Time enough, if you bring them to me in the evening.”

“You shall have them in the morning, Francesco,” replied the child, in a tone of quiet resolution. “Adieu, Francesco.”

“Adieu, my child. What have you done with Perletta?”

“Well, you have kept her a long time waiting. You had better make haste and seek her, else, if you leave her alone much longer, perhaps she will take it into her head to go home without you, as she did once before, Agnese.”

“She has never played me such a trick but once, Francesco. No, no; there is no fear of Perletta; she is grown very patient.”

“Well, I am glad of that, Agnese. Adieu, my child.”

Francesco left the vestry through another door, just as Agnese opened the one by which she had entered it with him, stumbling as she did so over the old lady whom she had so long and unwittingly left waiting on the outside. Determined not to leave the church without speaking to the child, and yet feeling too weary and tantalized to remain patient any longer, she had just made up her mind to break in upon her conversation, when, as we have seen, Agnese opened the door, and in her blindness stepped directly upon her feet. The sufferer uttered an involuntary scream, and then, as sufferers will upon such occasions, she could not resist saying in a petulant tone:

“You have hurt me, child; if you had not left your eyes before the altar, you might have seen that you were walking quite over my feet; one would fancy you were blind.”

“Pardon me, Madam,” said the child, in a voice of distress, but which had not even the shadow of impatience in it—“pardon me, for I am blind.”

“Blind! Good God!” cried the old lady, “how cruel I must have appeared!”

And then she looked more steadily at the child, and she saw that although the young face was turned towards her with an expression of sympathy in suffering, the eyes were not lifted to hers as they would so naturally have been. The lids were closed, the long lashes swept over her cheeks—there was no temptation to raise them, for sight there was none beneath.

“Alas, poor child!” said she again, struck by the meek and holy expression of that face; “how long have you been thus? or were you, indeed, as I should think, born blind?”

“I know not; but I do not remember ever to have seen the light, Signora.”

“And are you here alone? have you no one to lead you home, my child?” asked her companion, now in a tone of tenderest compassion.

“Si, Signora; Perletta is waiting for me at the porch, and I can always go as far by myself.”

Without saying another word the old lady led her down the aisle, as far as the open gate of the church; there the child paused, and thanked her gently for her kindness.

“I will trouble the Signora no farther,” she said; “the dog will see me home. Perletta, Perletta!” but no Perletta, answered.

“My child, no dog is here,” said the old lady, anxiously. “I fear it has forsaken you.”

“What shall I do!” said the poor child, sadly, “My God! what has become of Perletta? Never but once before did she desert me in this manner.”

“Whither do you want to go, my child?” asked the old lady, more touched than ever by her forlorn look and evident distress. “Tell me where you wish to go, and I will gladly lead you thither.”

“The Signora is very good; I thank her with all my heart,” said the child, submissively. “It is only to my grandmother; she sells lemonade in yonder grove; perhaps the Signora knows her already, for she often deals out iced waters to the fine ladies who leave their carriages to rest beneath the shadow of the orange trees.”

“The old woman who serves out water from the fountain, is your grandmother? I know her well; many a time have I tasted her delicious lemonade. Come, my child, we shall soon be there, and your grandmother shall give me a glass of iced water for my reward.”

“He will give the Signora a better one, some day, I hope, for her kindness to His poor blind lamb.”

“Tell me, what is your name, my child?” the old lady asked again, as they took their way to the orange grove.

“I have said it, Signora—it is Agnese; that is for lamb, you know. So they call me Blind Agnese; and sometimes in sport, the children name me, also Little Spouse of the Blessed Sacrament.”

“Little Spouse of the Blessed Sacrament!” said the lady in an under-tone; “what a strange name, and what a strange child. And does not this blindness grieve you?” she said aloud.

The question sounded cruel, and the lady felt it did; yet she could not resist the temptation of trying to penetrate the secret feelings of this child, who had interested her so strangely.

There was no trace, however, of pain or regret upon Agnese’s face as she answered:

“It would grieve me sadly, Signora, were it not for Him.”

“For whom, my child? the old man I saw speaking to you just now?”

“No, Signora, not Francesco, though he is a kindness and a comfort also. I spoke of Francesco’s Master and mine—of Jesus—of Him who made us both—of Him who dwelleth ever with us on our altars.”

“You speak of God, my child,” said the lady, reverently. “He, in truth, is everywhere; but you cannot see Him on the altar.”

“No, Signora; but I know Him to be there. I feel that He is with me, and I with Him, and so I do not want for sight to see Him.”

“And is there nothing, then, you want to see?” The old lady went on, as it were in her own despite, for she felt all the danger of awakening regret in so thoughtful a mind. “The light, for instance—the glorious light of Heaven—the sun, the moon, the million of millions of stars that tell us of the glory of their Maker?”

“No,” said the child, “for I have Him who made them, and He Himself is the ‘light of the world.’”

“Or the beautiful face of nature—the deep valley, the mountains—your own Vesuvius?"

"I have Him," said the child in an untroubled voice, "and He is mightier than all His works."

"Or the buildings of your city—the stately palaces, the sainted temples? Yonder little church, for instance, which we have just quitted, and which might have been the work of angels or of fairies, it is so spirit-like and full of grace?"

"These are but the creation of man, Signora;" and there was a shade of grave rebuke in Agnese's voice; "and if I long not to behold His works, shall I sigh to look upon His creature's?"

"Well, Agnese, the flowers, at least, are His own lovely work of love; tell me, do you not sometimes sigh to gaze upon the flowers, which He has scattered so profusely over this soft southern land? Never have I walked before among such flowers, with their velvet-like richness of touch and hue, and their perfume, which comes over one's senses like a dream of beauty."

"They are soft to the touch, and sweet to the senses," Agnese answered, after a moment's pause. "And He was called the 'flower of the root of Jesse.' So they must be precious things, those flowers! But yet," she added, in an assured and earnest tone, "I do not regard them, for I have Him, and He made them, and beautiful as they are, He must be a thousand million of times more beautiful than they are."

"Happy child," said the lady, sadly, "He hath, indeed, robbed you of your sorrow; would that I knew where you had found Him, that I might go and seek Him also."

"Do you not know where to find Him?" said Agnese, in great surprise. "He is ever on the altar; if you are in sorrow, go and seek Him there, and He will speak sweet comfort to your soul."

"Tell me, fair child, who has taught you to think and speak in this manner?"

"Francesco, Signora; he has taught me to know and love Jesus on the altar."

The lady did not answer. Something in the child's voice and manner had recalled sad memories to her mind, and her tears were falling fast; nor did she seek to check them until they had nearly gained the fountain, and the grove to which their footsteps were directed. There they found Agnese's grandmother plying her usual trade before a table, made very gay to look at, by the four painted stakes, placed one at every corner, and decorated with images of Saints, colored flags, and bunches of lemons, and bouquets of flowers, to say nothing of the ten already lighted lamps gleaming like fire-flies among the shadows of the trees. A cask, in the form of a drum, filled with clear ice, and water from the fountain, was placed on this table, which likewise displayed an abundance of clean glasses and lemons for the preparation of iced lemonade.

Many and grateful were the thanks of the old dame to the good Samaritan who had brought her back her blind one; and having accepted a glass of iced water, and pressed an alms into the unwilling hand of Agnese, Lady Oranmore stepped into her carriage, which had followed her from the church, promising herself, however, to return the very next day, and renew her acquaintance with the fair child of the fountain.

How often, during her drive to Naples, did the words of Agnese recur to her memory—"If you are in sorrow, go and seek Him on the altar, and He will speak sweet comfort to your soul." She was not a Catholic, that old lady, or she would have better understood the deep meaning of these simple words—the holy truth, that He, whose dwelling was in the bosom of His Father, could yet find no peace for His loving heart, until He had made Himself a home among the children of men, until He had imparted unto them the sweetness of that humanity, all the bitterness of which He had reserved for Himself. And so He came to us, the Virgin's child, the meek and holy Jesus, to dwell forever with us in the Sacrament of His love, never again to be absent even for an hour, from the world of His redemption and especial predilection—ever living for us, with us, and among us. In the noontide glare, in the midnight gloom, in the crowded city, and in the lonely country's most lonely places, still and forever to be found upon our altars, from thence giving rest to the weary, comfort to the afflicted, calmer and holier joy to the glad of heart; leaving it to no creature of earth to say that he had sought his Lord, and had not found Him, or that he had been near Him, and had not been invited to the embraces of His love. Happy they who seek the invitation, and happier they who hear it, and obey it, by dwelling, if not always in the body, at least always in spirit and desire, beneath the shadow of His altar. These are they of whom it has been truly said, "They shall eat the honey with the honey-comb," for they shall taste and see that the Lord is sweet; that they shall find the tears wiped away from their faces; they shall draw water in joy from the fountains of the Saviour; and they shall testify to the truth of the promise made to us by His own living and most sacred lips, a promise only not oftener fulfilled in ourselves, because we seek not its proper fulfilment in Him—"Come to Me, all you that labor and burdened and I will refresh you."

CHAPTER II.

Sign the cross, and strike the breast;
Banish looks of lightsome cheer—
Heaven's monarch, mortal's guest—
Lo! our Jesus draweth near.

One thou lovest, Lord, is ill,
As of old, is now the tidings,
And, as then, it finds Him still
In His love that call abiding.

"Sign the cross, and strike the breast," etc.

Quicker even than He went
To the loved of Bethany,
Now with thoughts as fondly bent
On this loved one cometh He.
"Sign the cross, and strike the breast," etc.

If His own no longer flow,
Still He dries the sinner's tears;
If no grief is on the brow,
Still, its look of love it wears.
"Sign the cross, and strike the breast," etc.

If no more from out the grave
He doth bid the dead arise,
Still, the sinful soul to save,
On the sinner's heart He lies.
"Sign the cross, and strike the breast," etc.

Bids him put aside his fear,
Bids his trembling all to cease,
Whispers in his dying ear
Words of pardon, hope, and peace.
"Sign the cross, and strike the breast," etc.

Jesus, when my hour is nigh,
Let me rest Thy arms within;
Thus to die is not to die,
'Tis but to quit a world of sin.

Sign the cross, and strike the breast;
Banish looks of lightsome cheer—
Heaven's monarch, mortal's guest,
Lo! our Jesus draweth near.

Seated in her balcony, amid orange trees and myrtles, and all the sweet growth of that southern clime, Lady Oranmore listened to the soft voices of the singers as they slowly approached the palazzo where she dwelt. It was midnight, but she had not been able to repose as yet; her thoughts were running on the blind Agnese; and the look of inexpressible peace, which could give such beauty to those pallid features, haunted her still; and the inexpressible devotion of that voice, as once, and once only, it had reverently pronounced the name of Jesus, still seemed to ring in her ears.

Over and over again she asked herself, why it was that she ever knelt with an unsatisfied heart and a cold and hungry spirit before the self-same altar, where this poor child had but to come to be replenished with delight. Yes, and Lady Oranmore could not deny it to herself, with heavenly wisdom also—the wisdom so often withheld from the proud, to be lavishly bestowed upon the humble and the poor. Alas!—like Pilate, Lady Oranmore asked: What is truth? and, like him she waited not the answer, but, impatient of her own feverish fancies and sleepless couch, she rose, dressed herself hastily, as I have already said, and stepped out upon the balcony. It was a lovely night—such a night as that on which the prophet looked, when he declared that “the heavens show forth the glory of God, and the firmament declareth the work of His hands.” The deep blue sky of Italy seemed to grow deeper still, as Lady Oranmore gazed upon it, until she felt as if she were looking into it, and through it, and beyond it; and from out of this azure setting the stars met her glances with looks so conscious and so calm, that she could almost have persuaded herself theirs was the light of angel eyes, not merely watching over a sleeping world, but engaged in penetrating into the hidden depths of her soul, and reading all its secrets. The calm night air soon soothed the perturbation of her spirits, and she was fast sinking into a sort of dreamy calm, when the first notes of the Hymn of the Blessed Sacrament fell on her ears; and here a door and there a window opening, told how all the people were now astir, some going forth to join in the procession, others content to sit in their balconies and mingle their voices with the burden of the song. The voices of the singers were sweet and true, and the air they sung most touching; and ever and anon the tinkling of the little bells, which announced the presence of the Blessed Sacrament, filled the air with a melody so spirit-like and sweet, one might have fancied them rung by the hands of the angels who invisibly crowded round the sacramental presence of their Lord. Lady Oranmore looked and listened like one entranced. Holy stars, and silver moon, and perfume-breathing flowers, and calm of sea, and hush of earth, the silent heavens, and the voices of His adoring creatures, all seemed mingling together to do Him honor in the lowly state in which His love had laid Him. For one brief moment, the very sweetness of Jesus Himself seemed to fill her bosom, and she believed in His sacramental presence with a faith as firm as the most undoubting of His worshippers. Tears gushed into her eyes, she clasped her hands, and exclaimed aloud, unconscious that she was repeating the very words of the hymn to which she had been listening—“Oh, so to die is not to die! Good God! To go to Thee with Jesus in my bosom!” By this time tapers began to burn in every balcony, light flew as if by some invisible communication from house to house, from window to window, and the street, which a few minutes before had been as dark as night and the tall shadows of buildings could make it, became bright and glittering, as though a shower of stars had suddenly descended upon its gloomy places. Not a window without its light—not a black speck left to mar the effect of the general illumination. The mighty faith of the people stirred the heart of the lady to a yet higher pitch of enthusiasm, and, by an impulse for which she never afterwards could account, she stepped back into her chamber, lighted a taper at the night lamp left burning there, and, setting it among the flowers of the balcony, knelt down to worship Jesus as He passed. The procession was almost beneath her window as she did so. Surrounded by a guard of honor, the priest who bore the Blessed Sacrament walked beneath the canopy, of which the silver bells announced his coming to the people; and among his immediate assistants, some carried banners and crosses, and others sent up clouds of incense from their silver censers; while the people followed, some near and some at a little distance, some with the intention of attending to the dwelling of the dying person, but the greater number merely dropping into the procession, and after walking with it a short space, returning to their homes. Lady Oranmore thought of His entrance into the cities of Judea, and of His meek and holy bearing, and of the crowds that gave Him welcome, and of the little children who sang hosannahs, proclaiming Him their Saviour—and, won by the self-same spirit of love from whence they took their inspiration, for a little while she believed as they did. But her faith, alas! like theirs, was fleeting; and, as He who had inspired it passed slowly out of sight, it would, perhaps, have also faded from her bosom, had not her eyes fallen upon the form of a child—of Blind Agnese—for what child save Blind Agnese could have been found with courage or devotion to wander through the streets at that late hour? Lady Oranmore was neither young nor active, and though well acquainted with Naples, she was timid, as people often are in a strange and crowded city. Even in the broad daylight she had never ventured in the streets alone, yet now she could not resist the impulse which prompted her to cast a large mantle over her shoulders, to quit the balcony, descend the stairs, and join the procession, side by side with the Little Spouse of the Blessed Sacrament.

The wide street and the open square were soon left behind, and poorer grew the aspect of the houses, and poorer still the class of persons who joined in the procession as it passed along; but still the harmony of the hymn was heard, new voices linking themselves on to the silver chain, just where the old ones dropped it; and still the streets, however dark and squalid they might have been before, put on a robe of light and brightness to welcome its approach. At length it paused in one of the dirtiest of those dirty streets of which there is no lack at Naples. The song was hushed, the tinkling of the bells was heard no more, and in their stead arose the low murmur of prayer, as the people fell on their knees in all the mud and filth of that most filthy pavement. They thought not of these things, however, for they were in the presence of Him before whom cherubim and seraphim do veil their faces; and how should dainty thoughts and earthly niceties intrude upon their minds? It was in truth to no kingly palace, to no lordly possessions of the earth, that the King of kings had come in person. The dwelling into which the priest now entered could only have been willingly chosen by voluntary poverty, or unwillingly forced upon that which was involuntary. At another time Lady Oranmore might have trembled to find herself alone and unattended in such a place at such an hour; but now something which was neither curiosity, nor yet devotion, nor yet a settled purpose of any kind, seemed to draw her footsteps onward. She felt as if she were obeying an invisible spirit, and as if that spirit resided in the person of Agnese; and, acting still upon the same irresistible impulse, when the child arose and followed the priest into the house, she forgot her native shyness, and stepped over the threshold with her.

In a miserable room, on a miserable bed—if, indeed, the head of reeds and Indian straw could be so entitled—the stricken deer of the flock was lying. It was no sudden accident or sickness which had brought her there. The wasted form, the sunken cheek, the hectic color, all told of the slow progress of that disease which inch by inch bears its victim to the tomb.

Confession had probably gone before; all the history of that young life had been told to God and to His minister, and the words of peace and pardon had been poured into her ear—the “go in peace” of the Saviour who now had come in person to fill her heart with hope, and her soul with joy; and hope, and joy, and heaven itself, were all so vividly impressed upon her pallid face, that, but for the poverty in which she was enveloped, and the lights around her bed, and the tears of the widowed woman (so soon to be a childless mother) who knelt beside her, she might have seemed to the excited imagination of Lady Oranmore, not a dying woman, but an angel—not a spirit ascending to the sky, but one descending thence, to speak by her looks of the happiness of heaven. She felt all this, for she had hardly time to think it, or to place herself on her knees in a distant corner, where she could see, without being seen, before the voice of the priest was heard, the mother hushed her sobs, and the girl seemed to try and still her labored breathing, in order to catch the import of his words. It was the Sacrament of Extreme Unction which he was about to administer, and Lady Oranmore soon became absorbed in her deep attention that most touching ritual, by which the Catholic Church invokes the pardon of an offended God upon every faculty of the dying person. The service was in Latin, but the priest translated each separate invocation into Italian, which every one present understood, and none seemed more entirely to comprehend, or more fully to enter into their spirit or their meaning, than the invalid herself. She answered every prayer as well as her failing voice would let her, holding out her hands spontaneously, and it almost seemed joyfully, for the sacred oil with which they were to be anointed; and when the last and most sacred of all rites was given—when Jesus, as the Viaticum, the companion of her voyage descended into her bosom, such a sweetness stole over her pale face, that Lady Oranmore felt as if she could have gazed upon her forever. Never before had she seen such a conscious joy in the hour of death. But the priest and the people were all departing, one or two Sisters of Charity alone remaining to aid the mother in the last offices of her dying child; and thus reminded that she herself was only an intruder, she turned to look for the child who had so unconsciously conducted her thither. Agnese was kneeling a little apart, in the very attitude in which she ever knelt before the altar, only now she held in her clasped hands the string by which her dog was fastened, while the animal itself lay at her feet still and quiet, as if accustomed to such scenes, and possessed of an instinctive consciousness of their awful nature. In a few minutes more, however, the child arose, laid a piece of silver on the pillow of the invalid, and glided softly to the open door. Lady Oranmore followed her directly into the open street, which, lately so full of light and people, was now as dark and silent as the grave; and she could not help shuddering at the idea of this poor child, whose misfortune would have rendered her so peculiarly helpless in the hour of danger, walking alone at that late hour through the deserted city. Suddenly, as this thought crossed her mind, she resolved to follow and to see her to her home; but she did not tell Agnese of her intention, nor did she even acquaint her with her presence, for she had a sort of desire to accompany her without her knowledge, and to behold her in a place where she could not be supposed to be influenced by the presence of strangers.

In taking this resolution, no thought or fear of personal annoyance presented itself to her. She was little in the habit of calculating consequences, and at this moment was wrought up to a pitch of enthusiasm which carried her so far beyond the ordinary rules of prudence, that she ever afterwards felt as if throughout the night she had been acting in a dream. With all her courage, however, perhaps she was not sorry to find that Agnese's route, traced out for her with unerring certainty by Perletta, brought her to a part of Naples with which she herself was perfectly acquainted; so it was with more of curiosity than of any other feeling that she followed the child into one of the poorest houses of the poorest streets of the city, and up flight after flight of stairs, into a small, close room, where, by the light just dawning in the east, she could dimly discern a table and a chair, and in one corner something like a bed, with a human figure stretched upon it.

"Agnese," said a voice from beneath the coverlet, which was unmistakably that of the old dame of the fountain.

"Grandmother," replied the child, kneeling by the bed.

"Where have you been, my child?"

"I have been with Him, mother; He went to visit Sister Rosalie."

"Sister Rosalie! who is Sister Rosalie, Agnese?"

"She is of the Order of Penance of the Blessed Father, St. Francis. All Naples know her well, mother. She lived among the poor, and served them as she would have served Jesus Himself, had she lived in the days of Magdalen and Martha."

"Mother," said Agnese again, after a little pause, "when I heard His bell, I guessed it was to the poor He was going; so I took the piece of money which the lady gave me, for Rosalie is very poor, and the little she has she gives to those who are even poorer than she is."

"It is well, my child; you did right. Now come to bed, Agnese; it is time you took some rest."

"Say rather it is time to rise, mother, for day is dawning in the east, and I have promised Francesco to bring him the corporals this very morning. Sleep still, dear mother. I will call you when your hour arrives."

The old woman made no answer—she was already fast asleep and then Agnese set about her task with as much precision as if in perfect possession of her eyesight.

Lady Oranmore watched her for a few minutes; but fearing the old woman might awaken and discover her at her post, she at last reluctantly withdrew. The church bells were all ringing, and the people everywhere astir in the city, by the time she gained her palazzo; and feeling far too excited for sleep, she ordered her carriage, and drove at once to the Church of the Blessed Sacrament, with the intention of questioning Francesco concerning his blind protegè. For this purpose she thought it best to go at once to the door by which she had seen him enter the church in his search for Agnese; but it must be confessed that when he himself opened it to her little tap for admittance, she felt rather embarrassed how to begin the conversation. After the awkward pause of a moment, however, she succeeded in shaking off her little hesitation, and in saying, with all the frankness so natural to her—"You will think me mad, I suppose, if I tell you I have come to make inquiries about the blind child I saw you speaking to yesterday. She has interested me most strangely."

"The Signora's madness is not so strange to me," said the old man, with a smile, "for it is one in which I share."

"But who is she—what is she—what makes her so unlike other children of her age?"

"Who is she? She is Blind Agnese. What is she? A little beggar-girl—that is her only dignity, except when children call her in sport, 'The Little Spouse of the Blessed Sacrament,' so devoted is she to this mystery of love. And what makes her so unlike other children? Even He Himself, who loves them all indeed, but who seems to have called this one more especially to live at His feet."

"I can comprehend this child being very dear to God, but I cannot fathom the mystery of such deep thoughtfulness in one so young."

"That is as much as to say we cannot fathom the mystery of His deep love for His creatures. But if the Signora will believe me, there are many little ones full as thoughtful as Agnese, only we do not often see them, for they perish early— young flowers they are, forced into premature bloom, to be cast on the path of the Lamb in heaven. And then," yet more earnestly the old man went on—"and then, you see not, lady, that God is so good! He seldom denies one gift without bestowing a greater in its place; and if Agnese is blind, He has yet given her to behold her Saviour in his own Sacrament of Love, by a clearness of spiritual perception which the saints might even envy."

"And has she been ever thus?" returned Lady Oranmore. "Was she never a child like the rest? Or is this a second nature, the offspring of her misfortune?"

"She has been thus ever since I have known her, but possibly it is a mixture of nature and of grace. There was a calm and thoughtful nature to begin with, and the grace of God took that nature and replenished it with sweetness."

The old man raised his eyes to heaven, his countenance overflowing with the very expression of sweetness of which he spoke. Lady Oranmore began to think him almost as interesting and quite as incomprehensible as Agnese herself. She had yet to learn the spirit of joy which Jesus pours out upon the soul that touches Him, as it were, in the Sacrament of His love.

"Tell me how you first became acquainted with her, for you say, 'since I have known her.'"

"It was about this time last year. I had some corporals and other linen to be washed for the altar, and I went into the church to seek for some child who might do it—"

"Child!" echoed Lady Oranmore; "I should have thought an older person better suited to the task."

"It was only a fancy of my own. The Signora must understand I always give them to a young child to wash. It seems to me He will be best pleased afterwards to repose in the Blessed Sacrament upon linen which only such innocent hands have touched. And then, He so loved the little ones—the sweet and loving Jesus. Surely the Signora has not forgotten how He bade them to approach, and would not have them to be forbidden, seeing that of such is the kingdom of heaven.”

Lady Oranmore was silent. The loving faith of the old man seemed to rebuke her own hardness and incredulity of heart. And, finding she made no answer, Francesco proceeded :

“As the Signora already knows, I went into the church, and there, just as she beheld her yesterday, was Blind Agnese kneeling before the altar. It seems to be her natural position. I never saw her in any other at her prayers. Not liking to disturb her, I went back again, and returning in half an hour found her still in the same attitude of devotion. This gave me a feeling of curious interest about her, so I waited until she rose of her own accord, and then followed her to yonder orange grove, and to the fountain, where an old woman sits preparing iced water and lemonade. If the Signora ever passes that way and feels weary with her walk, she will find a chair placed pleasantly in the shade—the perfume of the orange and acacia will revive her—the lemonade is excellent—and then the Signora will be doing an act of charity to Blind Agnese, for that old woman is her adopted mother.”

“God only knows to whom the orphan really belongs. I questioned the old woman, but all she could tell was that she herself had been an itinerant water-seller, and that one day, in the course of her trade, she had offered refreshments to a foreign lady sitting at the corner of the street with an infant in her arms. The lady eagerly accepted a glass of water, but before she could carry it to her lips she fainted away. Happily, she had fallen into the hands of a good Samaritan. The old woman had her carried to her own home; but it was a hopeless case—the poor lady was dying.”

“Dying!” said Lady Oranmore, in a strange, unnatural tone. “Of what, I pray you, was she dying?”

“Poor lady! of hunger in the first instance, but I fear of a broken heart in the second. She had not long to live, but she had time, at least, to tell her story before she died.”

“And that story?”

“It was a sad one. She was not of Italy; but in the distant land from whence she came religion, it seems, is made a subject of oppression; and he who dares to worship God after the fashion of the ancient Church is liable to fine, imprisonment, and perhaps to death.”

“No, no,” said Lady Oranmore, “not now to death, my friend. But tell me of the lady.”

“Her mother, it seems, was of the king’s religion, and made it part of her creed to hate all who did not think fit to profess it.”

“Was it thus she spoke of her mother?” Lady Oranmore asked, in a quick, agitated voice.

“Alas, no, Signora! Her words were full of tenderness and love. It was I who spoke in the bitterness of my soul, to think how religion could ever be made a source of disunion between child and parent.”

“Her heart was always loving and forgiving,” said the lady, with difficulty repressing her tears.

“The Signora knew her, then?”

“Go on, friend. What next?”

“But little, Poor lady! her story was as short as it was sad. She married a Catholic, became one, and displeased her mother. Still, in her husband’s love and the approval of her own conscience, she was happy; and so she might have remained to this very hour, had it not been for another law of that unhappy land, by which, as well as I could understand it, one brother conforming to the king’s religion might claim the property of the elder.”

Lady Oranmore groaned aloud.

“The gentleman,” pursued Francesco, “was one of three brothers; and the youngest of the three was such a one as I have described. So one night just after the birth of the poor, blind child, he came, claimed the property as his own, turned the sick lady, the new-born babe, and another child, some years older, out of the house, and sent them adrift upon the world.”

Lady Oranmore now sobbed aloud.

“The Signora has a good heart—she can feel for the distress of those poor outcasts of religion. That night she took refuge in the house of a poor retainer, who braved the anger of the new lord to show his gratitude to the old one. It was necessary, however, that they should fly the country; for the renegade, not content with reducing his brother to beggary, had likewise accused him of malpractices against the government. On hearing these sad tidings, the mother of the lady relented; she came and begged her daughter to reside with her; but the wife felt it both her duty and her happiness to cleave to her husband; so a very few hours afterwards they were together on the wide waters of the ocean, seeking with their poor blind child, in a foreign land, the protection denied them in their own.”

“And the eldest child?” asked Lady Oranmore quickly.

“Ah!” said Francesco, shaking his head sadly, “that was the deepest grief of all, I think, to the dying lady. She could not tell what became of it. It must have been left behind in the hurry and confusion of their flight, which of course, was made in the hours of darkness. But unhappily they missed it on boarding the vessel in which they were to sail, and no entreaty could prevail on the captain to delay their voyage, even for an hour. Poor mother! She never mentioned her lost one without piteous moans. The murder of her husband scarce seemed to have made such an impression on her mind.”

“Murdered! Good God! was then poor Edward murdered?”

Francesco looked enviously at the lady.

“Ill-luck attended them from first to last,” he said. “They were scarcely in the Italian seas before their vessel was attacked and taken by pirates. The poor gentleman fell fighting gallantly under the very eyes of his unhappy wife.”

“Alas! alas!” cried Lady Oranmore, weeping; “my poor, unhappy May, a prisoner in the hands of pirates!”

“She was not with them long. Two or three Neapolitan vessels were in sight, so the pirates took everything of value out of the ship, and set it on fire. The lady was rescued from this grave of mingled fire and water, and landed on the coast from whence, with her infant in her arms, she begged her way to Naples. Happily she had learned our language from her husband, who had been brought up among us—education being, it seems, one of the blessings denied in his own country to men of the proscribed religion; and yet, starving, heart-broken, helpless, and a stranger, how she managed to make her way so far has ever been a mystery to me.”

“Go on, old man! What next? I conjure you what next?”

“Why, finding herself so near to death, she sent for a priest to make her peace with heaven. From him she received all the last rites of our holy religion. The old woman has often told me since, that it was a touching sight to see; for nothing would content her but she must have her infant in her arms when she received Jesus in the Viaticum; so I always think it was then and there the child imbibed her strange love for Him in His Sacrament of Love. Surely He passed in that hour from the bosom of the mother into the heart of the child.”

“And then?” sobbed Lady Oranmore.

“And then,” echoed Francesco, “she died as might be expected. In peace she died. God stilled the violence of the storm which had swept her young days in sorrow into the grave. To His fatherly tenderness she consigned her child; and in the sacramental embraces of her Saviour she herself went down to death, amid such sentiments of love and peace as St. John may have felt when resting his head on the very bosom of the living Lord.”

“I had forgotten. She gave a packet to the old water-vender, larging her to keep it safely, together with the signet-ring which she wore upon her finger. Poor thing, she fancied some of those whom she loved so well might one day come and seek her out, and adopt the poor blind child for the sake of its mother. She was mistaken, however; years have passed away, and Agnese knows no other relative than the poor old beggar-woman whom Providence sent as the protectress of her infancy."

"Old man! old man!" cried Lady Oranmore, wringing her hands in anguish, "accuse me not—I am the mother of that unhappy creature."

"Yes," she continued, after a long pause, during which her sobs and tears had prevented her from speaking; "I quarrelled with her because she obeyed the dictates of her own conscience, and became a Catholic; and when I afterwards beheld her driven a fugitive from her native land, I stole her eldest child, intending to undo the wrong I had done her, by making her heiress of all my wealth. I had not had the child a year when it disappeared, and God forgive me if I have done him wrong, but I have ever believed it was stolen by its unnatural uncle, and perhaps put to death, lest it should hereafter prove a troublesome claimant of his wealth. But you wrong me if you fancy I abandoned my unhappy May without inquiry as to her fate. I did all I could to find out the place to which she and her husband had retreated. You see yourself this was no easy matter, and it was all the more difficult because of the wars which so often interrupted the communication between the countries. Unable, however, any longer to endure the suspense, I have spent the last two years wandering about Italy, seeking my lost child from city to city, but until this day without the slightest clue to the right one."

Francesco was moved at her evident distress.

"Providence has been good to the Signora," he observed at length; "He has been over her in all her wanderings, and has at last guided her to the very spot where she may recover all that remains to her of the treasure she has lost."

"Old man," cried Lady Oranmore, dashing away her tears, "where is this precious packet? Come with me, I pray you—I must see this old woman this very instant."

"It is not in the possession of the old woman, Signora; she confided it to the care of the nuns of the Perpetual Adoration; their convent is not far from hence. If the Signora pleases, I will gladly guide her thither."

"I thank you," said Lady Oranmore, lowering her veil and rising from the low stool upon which she had been seated; but she staggered, and would have fallen, had not Francesco given her the support of his arm.

"The Signora is not well," he observed; "had she not better defer this visit?"

"No, no," cried Lady Oranmore, impetuously; "anything is better than suspense. I must see this packet. Yet surely, I have not a doubt, Agnese is my grandchild—the child of my poor unhappy May."

Francesco was well known at the convent, and the superior-ess made no difficulty in submitting the packet and the signet-ring to Lady Oranmore's inspection; the latter gazed at it long and silently through her tears.

"Yes," she murmured, "it is her own handwriting, I cannot be mistaken; and this is her signet-ring, which I gave her myself on her wedding-day. I must have this packet," she said, suddenly looking up; "It will be needful should the identity of the child be disputed by her relations."

The superior-ess colored; but no human respect could deter her from her duty.

"The Signora must pardon me," she said; "I doubt not it is all exactly as she says, but the packet was entrusted to my care; and should any others hereafter inquire for it, how am I to show that I was justified in delivering it now?"

Lady Oranmore pulled a pocket-book from her bosom; it contained a lock of golden hair, and a few papers, yellow and worn, not so much with age as with constant reading, and perhaps also with the tears of the reader.

"Here," she said, "is all that remains to me of my ill-treated child. Never does this packet leave my bosom; sleeping or waking it is ever on my person. See, here is the copy of her marriage certificate—the original, I do not, is sealed up in your packet, and here is a long letter, addressed to me, on her change of religion; it is in English, so you cannot understand it; but here is something that you can—the note in which she informed me of the barbarous conduct of her brother-in-law. Happily she wrote in Italian, that it might not be deciphered, should it fall into hands for which it was not intended. Read it, read it."

The superior-ess took the note from the lady's trembling hand. It told, in sweet and touching language, the misfortunes of the writer—of her husband's flight, a few hours after the birth of his child, on a groundless suspicion of treason—of the rage of his brother at the escape of his victim—of his cruelty in turning her and her children out of their home—and the blindness which had fallen on the youngest, in consequence of cold caught by the sudden exposure. It named the place to which she had retreated, and the arrangements which her husband was making for their flight into Italy; and it ended by a moving appeal to a mother's love for an only child, beseeching her to pardon and send her such a benediction as, had she been dying, she might have craved at her hands.

It was impossible to doubt the evidence of this note: handwriting, seal, and signature, all perfectly agreed with the packet already in possession of the nun. She no longer had any difficulty in surrendering it into the hands of its new claimant. Lady Oranmore eagerly broke it open, and found it to contain, as she had expected, the marriage certificate of May Netterville, with the copies of the baptismal register of both her children, as well as the beginning of the Gospel of St. John, which, in Ireland, was generally suspended from the neck of a newly-baptized infant.

"Yes," said Lady Oranmore, "it is sufficient; this will make Agnese the heiress of her mother's fortune, and, perhaps, even the lawful claimant of her uncle's ill-gotten wealth, should the man ever become a Catholic again, as, in a fit of remorse, I sometimes imagine he will."

She spoke in English; the superior-ess, therefore, did not understand her; but there was a harshness in her tones which she did not like; and how indeed, could it be otherwise? The voice is so often an index to the thoughts, and Lady Oranmore's were at that moment less with her unhappy child, than with the man who had done her wrong.

"There is a lock of hair which has escaped the Signora's observation," said the mild religious, hoping thus to call her to her gentle meditations.

Lady Oranmore took it up. It was, indeed, a lock of her own hair; and tears gushed in torrents from her eyes at this new proof of the enduring affection of her child.

The superior-ess saw that she had produced the wished-for emotion, and she went on, although with some embarrassment, caused by the fear of giving pain.

"There is yet another visit which, perhaps, the Signora would like to make before she leaves the convent," Lady Oranmore shuddered; she felt she was summoned to the grave of her child.

"It is true," she stammered; "I had intended to have asked it as soon as I could find courage."

The superior-ess took her arm, and in a few minutes they were in the little cemetery belonging to the convent. A lovely spot it was, shut out from all save the eyes of heaven, by the tall ilex trees with which it was surrounded—each little lowly grave was surmounted by a cross, telling of the hope of those who slept beneath, but bearing neither name nor date upon it. Name and date were unheeded there, for the slumberers in that sanctuary of peace were all the faithful spouses of a crucified God, who had written their names in the palm of His hand, from the day when, by their life-long dedication to His service, they had spiritually died, for His love, to the world and themselves. One grave there was, however, which was not so nameless—it was beautiful with many flowers springing from the turf, and white with the blossoms of the orange and the myrtle, which had fallen in showers upon it; and the cross above it bore a prayer for the repose of the soul of May Netterville, to whose remains the rare privilege of burial within the cemetery of the convent had been accorded, because (so the inscription stated) she had died far from her home and her own country, poor and alone and friendless in a foreign land. The superior pointed to the name, and then, with intuitive delicacy, silently withdrew, leaving the unhappy mother to her own reflections. Bitter, very bitter, because mingled with much of self-reproach, they must have been; and when, half an hour afterwards, the nun returned, she saw that Lady Oranmore had been weeping violently, and guessed from the disordered state of her dress and bonnet, that she must have been prostrate on the grave of her child.

"Weep not for her, dearest lady," said the nun, kindly; "she died happily, and she rests in peace. See, we chose the sweetest spot in all the cemetery for her, just beneath the shadow of this beautiful myrtle, and we took all the rarest flowers of our garden to plant them on her grave. We did not then know that she had a mother; but I well remember it was agreed among us to receive her precious remains with all the love and reverence a mother's heart would have been consoled to offer, or see offered to her child."

Lady Oranmore could not speak her thanks just then, but before she left the convent, she pressed Mother Matilda's hand to her lips, and besought her, in moving terms, to continue her kind care of the grave where all her own hopes of happiness lay buried. Then, with a myrtle branch, which she had brought from thence in her hand, she left the convent, leaning, as before, on the arm of the good Francesco.

"And now where does the Signora wish to go?" he asked. "She is tired, and would she not like to go to her palazzo for a little repose?"

"No, no," said Lady Oranmore, "I can have no repose until I have embraced my grandchild. Let us seek the old water-seller at her stall."

"Ah, poor Benita!" said Francesco, shaking his head; "it will go hard with her to lose her darling. I greatly doubt she will break her old heart."

"I should be very sorry so to grieve her," said Lady Oranmore, compassionately. "Think you she would come with me? I would gladly give her a home."

"It is kind of the Signora to say so; but no—I think Benita would not be happy that way either; she is too old for new friends and a new country. Better to promise the child shall sometimes return and visit her."

"That I can readily do," said Lady Oranmore, sighing, "for I also have an attraction in the grave of my child, which will often bring me to revisit this land."

"Yonder is the orange-grove where we shall find Benita and her grandchild; and now that the Signora has found her own, may heaven prosper her as she deals rightly and fairly by the child whom Providence has so wonderfully restored to her care."

Lady Oranmore changed color; her conscience told her she was neither going to act rightly nor fairly by the child or its dead mother; for well she knew that mother's heart, and she felt that May Netterville would rather have bequeathed her little one to the care of the poorest beggar in the land than to the guardianship of anyone who would tamper with her faith.

"But, what then!" thought Lady Oranmore, seeking her excuse, as all worldly-minded people do, in the expediency of the thing. "The happiness of my poor May is no longer dependent on the religion of her child; and, besides, she did not bequeath Agnese to me. I found her for myself; and this surely gives me a right to do as I please; and if I do not please to bring her up a Protestant, she will not only lose her chance of the broad lands of Netterville, she will even forfeit all right to the estate she ought to inherit from me: for the next in succession is a Protestant; and I know him too well to suppose he will forego his legal claim from any sense of justice towards me or mine."

By such a train of reasoning as this she contrived to stifle her own scruples on the subject; but feeling instinctively that her arguments would have little weight with Francesco, she made no other reply to his observations than the very significant one of quickening her footsteps on her way to the fountain.

Three days afterwards Agnese knelt for the last time before the altar of the Blessed Sacrament in her favorite church and Francesco, stood beside her; she was in tears, for she had that morning bid adieu to the kind old woman who, for so many years, had cherished her as her own; and now a yet more cruel separation was awaiting her in her parting with Francesco, and her farewell to the dear little church where she had enjoyed so many hours of calm and heavenly devotion. Little less sorrowful was the old man himself. Something there was in Lady Oranmore's manner, which made him tremble for the future religion of his darling, and he was sorely perplexed how to fortify her against this danger, and, at the same time, to avoid filling her mind with fear and distrust of one whom it would be her duty henceforth to reverence as a mother. Small time had he to revolve the matter in his own mind, for a servant entered the church to say that the travelling carriage was at the door, and her ladyship desired the presence of Agnese. The child arose; but Francesco laid his hand on her shoulder, and said to her, in a voice so solemn that she was startled by its strangeness.

"Tarry yet another instant, my child, and listen to my words. Agnese, Jesus is on the altar; He is looking on you—listening to you; and if ever, on this holy spot, you have promised to be faithful to Him in the Sacrament of His love, renew that promise now; give it into the hands and the heart of the Immaculate Mother, and she will place it for you in the sacred heart of her Son."

These words of the old man seemed to penetrate Agnese's very soul; she sank on her knees; and said, in a low but earnest voice:

"I do promise to be faithful to Jesus, even unto death."

"Unto death," repeated Francesco; "aye, that is the right word for the child of martyrs. Be faithful to Jesus unto death, if you would have Him faithful to you unto life everlasting. Agnese, they may seek to make you desert the religion in which He alone is to be found; but believe them not my child. Never pray in a church where He is not."

"I will not," said the child: "but how am I to know?"

With something like inspiration, Francesco answered:

"Ask whether a lamp is burning before the altar. If there is not, leave the church; for Jesus is neither in it nor of it."

"I will, Francesco."

"You may have much to go through of trouble and persecution, my child. But here is a picture; it is of the sacred hearts of Jesus and Mary, and they are wreathed together by thorns."

Agnese kissed and placed it in her bosom.

"Thorns, Agnese," proceeded Francesco, "are rude to the touch, but the flowers they guard are always the most safe, often even the most full of sweetness. What heart so pure—what heart so sweet—what heart so sorrowful as the heart of the Virgin Mother of God? And of her it is written, 'She was a lily among thorns.' Think of this, my child; and should the thorny diadem ever descend upon your brow, receive it lovingly and thankfully, seeing it will make you resemble her."

There was so sad a foreboding in Agnese's heart as she listened to these words, that, in her fears for the future, she almost forgot her present sorrow, hardly heard the remaining words of Francesco, was hardly conscious of his final benediction, although she had fallen on her knees to receive it, hardly even felt Lady Oranmore embracing her as the child of her lost May. She only knew distinctly that she was leaving the land where Jesus dwelt upon every altar; and, sinking back in a corner of the carriage, and burying her head on the neck of Perletta, the little Spouse of the Blessed Sacrament murmured through her tears:

"Oh! that the dove would descend and give Him to my prayers!"

CHAPTER III.

"Oh! that the dove would descend and give Him to my prayers!" It was Agnese's last prayer on leaving Naples; it was her first on arriving at Oranmore Castle. Her troubles, in fact, seemed about to commence just where most little heroines of romance find a termination to theirs—that is to say, in a loving protectress and a magnificent home.

Not that she had felt positively unhappy during the journey; her feelings had been rather stunned than excited by the sudden change in her position; she could not perfectly understand its reality, or comprehend how it was that a few days before she had been the grandchild of a poor water vender, and now stood precisely in the same relationship to a lady ranking among the richest and noblest in the land. Neither did she imagine herself so entirely separated, as in truth she was, from all she loved and cared for upon earth. She would revisit Italy; so Lady Oranmore had promised her grandmother; she would sit once more beside Benita, near her orange-shaded fountain; she would kneel with Francesco before the altar of the Blessed Sacrament; and then nothing, she knew, could separate her from Jesus; His altars were everywhere, and He was everywhere on His altars; and never did she pass a single day during their journey without seeking Him there.

Long before Lady Oranmore or her attendants were awake, Agnese was on her way to the church of the town or village in which they had spent the night. And for this happiness she was indebted to the unerring sagacity of Perletta, who knew her wishes quite as well as she did herself. She had only to say, "Alla chiesa! alla chiesa!" and Perletta looked to the right and looked to the left, pricked up her ears, and set off directly in the direction in which the church bells were ringing; nor did she ever fail in the object of her search. Sooner or later the church was found, and the blind child conducted through the gates, and along the aisle, and up even to the very rails of the sanctuary; and there Perletta would coil herself comfortably up into a little round ball, and fall fast asleep; while Agnese, on her part, reverently knelt down to pray, by the modesty of her attitude and the tenderness of her devotion unconsciously preaching the sweet Jesus to all who saw her.

It cannot be supposed that Lady Oranmore particularly fancied these lonely expeditions, yet she did not forbid them, because unwilling to commence her guardianship by such a disagreeable act of authority; and finding, at last, that Agnese always returned without accident, she took confidence in the good guidance of Perletta, and lost all her anxieties on the subject, if indeed, she did not forget it altogether. Her memory, however, was suddenly refreshed by a rather unpleasant incident which took place on their arrival at Dover. They had only landed the night before, but, though feeling sick and giddy from the rough sea voyage, Agnese could not resolve upon giving up her visit to the church, so she rose early, and descending into the street, shook the ribbon round Perletta's neck, and said, as usual, "Alla chiesa! alla chiesa!"

Alas for poor Perletta! For once her sagacity was completely at fault. She had hitherto always had a clue to her destination in the ringing of the bells, the thronging of the people without, the low murmur of prayer within; but now in vain she snuffed the air, in vain she ran backwards and forwards, up the street and down the street. The poor dog was completely bewildered. It is true she came to a church, but the doors were closed; the bells were silent; not a creature was lingering near it. Perletta was not used to see deserted churches, so she very naturally passed it by. Her next essay was the market-place. There was plenty of people here, and something more than the murmur of voices among its buyers and sellers. But Perletta understood markets quite as well as she did churches; and being a dog of sagacity, she knew that this was not precisely what Agnese wanted; and therefore she trotted on until she arrived at the theatre. It so happened that a celebrated actor was to perform there that night, and hundreds of people were already at the doors to secure themselves places. Perletta began to think she was right this time, but a kick from an impatient by-stander speedily convinced her of her error, and howling with pain, she ran off so fast that Agnese had some difficulty in keeping up to her paces. On their way back, they once more stumbled on the church; and this time the bells were tolling, for a funeral was to take place there that day. What wonder if Perletta was deceived! She trotted up the steps, and finding the gates still closed, very contentedly coiled herself up at their entrance, thus giving Agnese intelligibly to understand that she had accomplished her mission, and would go no further. The blind child took the hint and sat down on the steps, resolving to wait there until the church should be opened. But minute after minute passed away and no one came. And now the poor little Italian began to shiver in the cold; yet, perhaps, it was not altogether the unaccustomed rawness of a British morning which made her tremble; there was a vague fear also falling around her, which seemed to penetrate and chill her very heart. It was so strange to her that a church should be there, and no one to enter it; that the bell should be tolling, and no one be found to obey the summons. Poor Agnese! she was not much of a philosopher, I am afraid, for at last, finding herself disappointed in her hopes, she could scarcely tell wherefore, she put her arms round the neck of her faithful Perletta, and burst into tears. Her foreign dress, her desolate attitude, the dog, which everywhere betrayed the secret of her blindness, soon drew a crowd around her; and innumerable were the conjectures, some in jest and some in earnest, elicited by her singular appearance. "Who is she? What is she? Has she lost anybody, or has anybody lost her?" Sometimes the spectators addressed these queries to Agnese, sometimes to each other. The child grew every moment more bewildered. She felt the crowd pressing heavily around her; she heard their questions, though she could not understand their import. And once she even rose with the intention of making her escape, but suddenly recollecting her inability to do so, she sat down again, trembling violently, and weeping more bitterly than ever.

"Do be quiet," said an elderly gentleman; "you terrify the child with your chatter. What is it, my little one, and why do you weep so sadly?" he added, addressing Agnese.

The blind child did not understand this speech, but she answered in the only English word she could as yet perfectly pronounce—

"Church—Church!"

"She must be a furriner," said a sailor. "They are used to having churches always open in furrin parts."

"That's it," said another. "Look at all her furrin gewgaws. I suppose that this little Papist spawn is one of the party from the packet last night."

"A Papist!" said a tall, evangelical-looking person, with a vinegar aspect; "the Lord preserve us! It would be a charity to send her to the poorhouse, poor benighted individual!"

"It would be a greater charity to see her safe home to her friends, I should say," said Agnese's self-elected champion, indignantly eyeing the vinegar-faced evangelical. "Harkce, Mr. Sailor, what inn did this foreign party put up at?"

"Star and Garter, sir; and I won't take upon me to say this young un was among them. But there were some furrin parrots, that I'll take my oath of, they were chattering at such a precious rate as they stepped out of the packet."

"Well, we can but try. Come along, my little maid. I will see if I cannot make out your friends for you," said the gentleman, taking her hand; and Perletta starting forward at the same moment, Agnese had no choice but to obey.

The inn was easily found, and Agnese restored to her grandmother, who had begun to feel exceedingly alarmed by her absence.

"Explain to your grandchild, madame," said the old gentleman, with a caustic severity of phrase, which might hardly have been expected from one of his singularly mild and benevolent appearance, "that we are a commercial people, and have no idea of giving more than is asked for anything, however important. Six days in the week we keep for ourselves, the seventh we give to God. 'Tis what He Himself demanded, and we stick to our agreement. We are too business-like to do more than is necessary; it would be a waste of both time and capital."

The old gentleman spoke in a kind of jesting earnest, and Lady Oranmore felt so provoked both at the truth and freedom of his words, that she did not thank him, perhaps, quite so graciously as she might otherwise have done. The reserve did not seem at all to afflict him, however; he patted Perletta on the head, shook Agnese by the hand, and, in reply to her little speech of gratitude, uttered in Italian, but made quite intelligible by its tone and manner, he only answered:

"It is nothing, my child—absolutely nothing; only as you are a Papist, and do not belong to this mereantile people, perhaps you had better go back to the land from whence you came. I am told you can there waste your time in the churches all the day long, if you like it; if, indeed, waste of time it be, to bestow it on Him who is Lord of time as well as of eternity."

He laid his hand on her head as he spoke, in token of farewell; and the action recalled Francesco so vividly to her mind, that Agnese burst into tears. The stranger cast one more glance of compassion upon her, bowed to Lady Oranmore, and abruptly quitted the room. As soon as he had fairly closed the door, the latter tried to make Agnese comprehend the inutility of seeking for open churches in England upon any day but Sunday. Had she told her the sun had left the heavens, the blind child would probably have been infinitely less astounded. To all her ladyship's arguments as to the necessity of attending to business, the duty men owed to themselves and their children of unceasing toil from morning until night, Agnese only answered:

"Then He is left alone, no one to pray to Him all the week long! no one to worship Him; no one to love Him; and yet, He is there only that we may love Him and speak to Him quite at our ease."

Lady Oranmore felt at last she was only wasting her rhetoric; she had ceased to argue, and endeavored to console the weeping child by assuring her that, on their arrival at Oranmore Castle, she would take her to the village church which she had always been in the habit of attending herself, and in which on Sundays, at least, she might pray all the day long, if she liked it. Agnese did not seem quite so enchanted with this assurance as her ladyship expected; in fact, she began to doubt seriously as to the nature of her grandmother's religion. The prediction of Francesco appeared on the point of fulfilment, and she felt it was not, perhaps, in vain that he had required her so solemnly to promise to be faithful to Jesus even unto death. How far she was right in her conjectures my readers already know; but, although Lady Oranmore had fully resolved upon changing the religion of her grandchild, she yet shrunk from inflicting the pain which she felt such a resolution would cause to its object. The possibility of Agnese's resisting her authority never, for an instant, occurred to her mind. "Such a mere child," thought she; "what on earth difference can it make to her?" And yet, something in her own heart told her there was a difference—a difference which she had felt herself—a difference which would be yet more distasteful to the feelings of Agnese, than she was forced sometimes to acknowledge she had found it to her own. She determined, therefore, to do nothing in a hurry, but to wait until Agnese's Italian recollections had faded away, and until her young heart should have been chilled into indifference by the absence of all the sight and ceremonial of the Catholic Church—which she fancied had nursed it into its fervent religion—before venturing to propose a new form to its worship. She little knew the strength of the mind, young as it was, with which she had to deal; still less did she comprehend the enduring character of that faith which had early stamped itself on Agnese's heart, for she felt that she herself at the same age had been totally without any fixed religious principle of any kind, and that, at the bare instigation of a superior, she would have gone quite willingly to any church, chapel, or meeting-house in the land. With such a recollection in her own heart, it was not difficult to argue herself into a belief in the growing indifference of Agnese—a supposition, certainly, in some degree countenanced by the quiet way in which the latter received the customary Sunday speech of "We cannot go to church to-day, Agnese; the weather is too cold, or too damp, or too foggy. Remember we are not in Italy, dear child." Poor Agnese! she remembered it a l to well; but she also had taken her resolution "to wait and see;" and strong in her determination of passive resistance, she suffered nothing of this bitter recollection to be visible in her manner as she left Lady Oranmore's presence, and sought in the solitude of her own little turret-chamber spiritually to unite herself to the various services of her Church.

After the accomplishment of this first beloved and, for her, daily duty, there was nothing the lonely child loved so well as to ramble by the sea-shore, under the guidance of Perletta, or to sit and muse away the hours on the sunny spot which she had chosen for her summer seat among the cliffs. I know not by what secret instinct she was led, yet certain it is that she chose the holiest spot in all the country round, and one which the peasant never passed but with bare head and reverent mien, for the scene of her lonely meditations. And it was fair as it was holy; lovely even in its ruins was the little church which crowned the cliffs, and looked down, in its calm sanctity, on the broad waters of the Atlantic, beating idly and angrily against the rocks below; lovelier, still, if possible, the quiet cemetery by which it was surrounded, and in which every wild flower the country-side could boast of seemed to have made for itself a garden—primrose, and violet, and wood anemone, and wild sorrel clustering among its tombs in rich abundance, and contrasting their scentless blossoms with the sweet flowers of the May, and the meadow-sweet, and that white wild rose which is so fragrant and so fair, that though it blooms freely by the wayside, is not out of place in the garden of a monarch. Agnese could not see them, but the summer's breeze often reminded her of their presence; and something there was in their soft perfume, recalling the orange-scented groves of her native Italy, and bidding her dream sweet dreams of the land, which now, more than ever, she deemed the land of Jesus. She did not know that a church, where once He dwelt upon the altar, was close at hand, or that her favorite resting-place was a tombstone, beneath which, perchance some village saint lay buried. But there was a holy stillness ever resting on the spot, which soothed her spirits; and so, by degrees she came here oftener, and lingered longer, until the servants learned to seek her, whenever she was missing, among the ruins of St. Bride's; and the very country people came to call her lowly resting-place among its tombs, the summer seat of Lady Oranmore's blind child. Here she nursed in her soul that deep thought which Lady Oranmore fancied had disappeared, only because it was no longer visible on the surface, but which, in truth, became all the deeper, now that it could no longer flow forth into the observance of religion. Had she remained in Italy, in the free exercise of her religion and under the guidance of its ministers, thought would have resolved into action, and action would have been made pleasant and sanctified by thought. As it happened, her life became one uninterrupted meditation; and a state of things so unnatural to one of her tender years soon told its tale upon her bodily health. She had not been three months at Oranmore before there seemed every probability that the observation of Francesco would be realized in her regard, and that the flower would early fall which had been forced into premature bloom and sweetness. Lady Oranmore watched the vivid flush on the cheek, and the strange brightness of the eye, and she trembled for the life of her darling; but she could not penetrate the secret of her malady; she had not sufficient sense of religion herself to be able to comprehend how its deprivation might affect a mind which like Agnese's, had fed on it from infancy. She knew not how the daily prayer of the blind child was for the dove that it might descend—how her nightly dream was of the dove, that it had descended. Neither did she see the bitter tears in which she was accustomed to indulge, when believing herself alone and unwatched in her lonely rambles on the cliffs. One there was, however, not quite so ignorant of Agnese's sorrow—one, ever hovering near her and around her, even when the child fancied herself alone; and sometimes a light step in the grass, or a sigh, or a long drawn breath, almost betrayed the presence of this invisible guardian. This had occurred so frequently of late, that by degrees a kind of mysterious awe began to mingle with her musings; she never felt as if she was quite alone. It was always as though a spirit were lingering near; and one evening (it surely could not have been her fancy) she even imagined a sweet low voice pronounced her name: "Agnese!"

Trembling violently, she started to her feet, but no answer was returned to her eager questions, only she thought she heard a deeper sigh, and then a receding footstep, and then all was once more silent as the grave. Agnese sat down again, for she felt she could not stand, and her heart throbbled so wildly that she almost fancied she could hear it beating; a few minutes afterwards she was once more startled by the sound of her own name, but this time it was Lady Oranmore, who came to tell her that the next day, being Sunday, she would take her if she liked, to divine service at the church of Oranmore. Agnese listened, but she was not glad, and she thanked her, but it was mechanically. There was no real joy in her words and feelings. She did not feel sure Lady Oranmore was a Catholic, and it was therefore with depressed spirits and trembling heart that she prepared the next morning to accompany her to church.

If ever our angel-guardians give warning of the presence of danger, as I devoutly believe they often do, by their secret inspirations, to the innocently unconscious, Agnese received such a warning in the hour when she stepped over the threshold of that church. She felt as if the very air were too heavy for her breathing. The service had commenced already, she paused for a moment, in hopes of catching those dear, familiar sounds to which she had listened from her childhood, until it almost seemed as if she understood them by mere force of intimacy with their terms. Alas! the language that now met her ear was not the language of the Mass, by which the Catholic is made equally at home in the observances of his religion, whether he attends them in the wigwam of the savage Indian or the cathedral of the civilized European. It was not the language of the Mass, and the words of Francesco flashed upon her memory.

"No! no! not here!" she said, quick as lightning, resisting the hand which urged her into the well-cushioned pew of the Oranmore family. "Under the lamp! under the lamp! It is there I ever pray the best!" "There is no lamp here," said Lady Oranmore, thrown off her guard by the suddenness of the request, and closing the door of the pew, into which she had now drawn her grandchild almost by force. Agnese heard, and for one brief instant there was a struggle such as seldom occurs more than once in the life of a human being, but which, sometimes earlier, sometimes later, is almost sure, not only to come at last, but to be made, far oftener than we imagine, the turning-point at which the happiness or misery of an eternity is decided.

"What will Lady Oranmore say? what will the people think?" It was so her human nature questioned; and in truth it required something of the faith and courage of a martyr to brave the scrutiny of the hundred eyes that would be fixed upon her if she attempted to leave the church. But it must be done—no Latin Mass, no lamp. Jesus was neither in the church nor of it, and not another instant might the Little Bride of the Blessed Sacrament kneel before an altar where He was not. One prayer to Him—one word to Perletta, and, before Lady Oranmore could interpose to prevent it, the pew door was unfastened, and the long length of the church traversed with a steady heart, although it must be acknowledged a most uncertain footstep. Up to this point Agnese had managed to restrain herself to a walk; but no sooner had she gained the portals of the building, than, yielding to the fear of being pursued, she shook the ribbon round Perletta's neck, and set off at a rapid pace towards her summer seat upon the cliffs. There, casting herself on her face, she burst into tears; by degrees, however, her agitation subsided, and she fell fast asleep, yet even in her dreams the scene of the morning was not absent from her imagination, and more than once she murmured half aloud: "Jesus is not here; where is He, then? my God, my God, where is He?" "Jesus once was here," said a sweet, low voice in her ear. Agnese started up, fancying at first the words to be only a portion of her own dream. But now she was wide awake, and still the plaintive melody of that voice was heard. "Time was that He was here, and yonder church was His house and home. But sacrilegious feet have defiled that sanctuary, and sacrilegious hands have overturned the altar, and now the thistle and wild nettle grow, and the fox has made for itself a home, even here where He once dwelt in the very sacrament of His love for man."

"Where am I? where am I?" said Agnese, scarcely able to believe her own ear, and tempted to fancy she was again in Italy, or dreaming of it, so familiar were the thoughts of the invisible speaker, and so familiar the soft Italian in which those thoughts were uttered. "Where are you?" returned the voice. "In the churchyard of one St. Bride's—on the very spot where, if tradition tells the truth, St. Patrick built his first altar, and said his first Mass in the land of Erin."*

"Then I am close to the church of Jesus, and I knew it not," said the wondering child.

"To what was once the church of Jesus. The church is now in ruins; and they who have made it so have run a public road right among the tombs of the desecrated dead. Well! well! nature has been more considerate than man, as they say she ever is in this land, and so she has made the holy resting-place of our fathers beautiful in flowers, some of the pale blossoms she has garnered here even vieing, methinks, in beauty with the fairest that you know of in your own fair land."

Agnese was too much lost in astonishment to answer; and after a moment's pause, the invisible went on:

"Would that you could see them! The crowds of primroses; the clusters of white roses; the delicate little harebell; the wood anemone; and that other, the wild sorrel—the fairest flower that grows, to my mind—'lady-flower,' I would name it, if I had my way; it is so fragile and so fair that it looks like to Mary, and ought to be called after her. There, I have gathered some of each for you, and they shall be to you as a relic of this holy spot, where (so the poor people say) no worm or creeping thing is ever found, to defile the slumbers of the dead below, or to mar the beauties of the flowers above."

"Come hither," said Agnese; "I am blind, and I cannot see; but if you are not the guardian spirit of these tombs, come hither, and take my hand in yours and lay my head upon your bosom, and speak to me of Jesus. Never have I heard anyone speak of Him as you do, since the day I left the land where He is everywhere, and everywhere people love Him."

Agnese felt the unknown draw near; and the hand that was laid on hers was small, and soft, and delicate, evidently the hand of a girl, and a very young girl too.

"Neither a spirit, nor yet of Italy, am I," the voice replied; "although I use its language."

"Not of Italy!" said the blind child, sadly. "Then you know not of its churches, where the lamp ever burns, and where Jesus ever dwells."

"Do I not?" said the voice, with a sudden quickness. "To what purpose, then, have I listened so often to tales of that fair land, and of one sweet saint who sleeps among its flowers?"

There was something inexpressibly mournful in its tones, as it added, after a moment's pause:

"My child, no blood of Italy is flowing through these veins; yet I have dreamed of it so often that it seems to me as if the kingdoms of the earth were set in array before me I could choose it out among all the rest; and oh! believe me, I should choose the fairest."

"And the holiest," said Agnese, eagerly.

* Tradition in the north of Ireland.

"I know not that. It is holy, indeed, to cling to the thought of Jesus, as they do in your land; but holier still, to suffer persecution for His sake; and that is what we do in ours."

"Halloa, young woman," cried another voice; "saw you ever a man pass this way within the last half-hour?"

The new speaker was a hard-looking, elderly man, standing on the other side of a hedge and deep ditch which separated him from the churchyard. He spoke in Irish, probably imagining he would be more easily understood in that language; but Agnese's unknown companion answered him in English; and the voice, so lately full of plaintive melody, was now as clearly expressive of cold contempt as were the words it uttered.

"Squire Netterville is early in the field this fine Sunday morning. Well, the better day the better deed, I suppose. And what may be the present game—a rebel or a priest?"

"If it were a rebel, I need not go much farther," returned the surly voice, in the same language in which he had been addressed. "Every Papist is alike a croppy—man, woman and child—all tarred with the same brush."

"True; and not very extraordinary either. When the brush is in such clumsy hands as Squire Netterville's, no wonder we all take a touch of the tar. Why, they say the very parson in your fine church up yonder is not altogether free of taint. To be sure he is only a wolf in sheep's clothing—a cowardly renegade—so Squire Netterville will know how to excuse him."

"Will you give an answer to my question, or shall I jump over the hedge and thrash one out of you?" roared the man, stung to the quick by the biting sarcasm of the speaker.

"Mother of heaven!" burst from the lips of the terrified Agnese, who now pretty well understood English, the language in which the conversation was kept up: but her companion only answered:

"To thrash a woman! Truly it would be a deed worthy of Squire Netterville's ancient fame."

"See if I don't, then," cried the man, stepping back a few paces, and taking a flying leap at the hedge. Unluckily for him, however, he missed his footing, and tumbled hopelessly into the ditch, from whence he emerged in a very deplorable condition, covered with mud, and not altogether free of blood, drawn from him by the thorns and briars which had saluted his descent.

The ironical laugh of his tormentress rang through the air.

"Squire Netterville has dirtied his coat; but, if report speaks true, it is not the first time he has daubed his escutcheon by a full."

Squire Netterville was busy at the moment in brushing the mud off his coat; but he looked up scarlet at this wicked allusion to his apostasy, and shook his horsewhip in the air. Suddenly, however, changing his intention, he caught Agnese roughly by the arm.

"Here, you beggar's brat, take this fi-penny, and tell me whether you saw anybody pass this way of late."

"I am blind, sir; I cannot see," cried the terrified child, trembling from head to foot beneath his grasp.

"You lie, you young rebel!" growled the savage, with a terrible oath, whirling his horsewhip at the same time so close round the head of the shrinking child, that it lifted her curls from her brow. Twice he repeated this manœuvre; but the third time it would have descended in right earnest had not some one suddenly flung her arms round Agnese, and received on her own person the blow that was intended for hers. It was her invisible friend who thus interposed in her behalf; and she was a young girl, not, perhaps, more than sixteen years of age. Yet was there no sign of fear on her flushed cheek or in the proud eye which she fixed upon the squire. He himself seemed to quail for a moment beneath its steady gaze.

"Squire Netterville surpasses himself this morning," she said; and it was impossible for human voice to convey deeper abhorrence than hers expressed at that moment. "To hunt an old man as if he were a mad dog, is not enough for a zeal like his; he would set the seal on his good deeds by the murder of an innocent child."

"You have seen him, then. Now, hark ye, young mistress! if you will not tell me which way he took, I will leave a mark upon you which you shall carry with you to your grave."

"You have done that already," said the girl, drawing one hand across her brow, from which the blood was flowing rapidly.

"I will do it again, then, if you don't choose to answer my question."

"Now, look you, Squire Netterville," the girl answered proudly, "and mark what I say. I might pretend I didn't know the man for whom you are looking, or that I hadn't seen him; but I scorn the poor evasion. I do know him; and I have seen him; and I know which way he went, and where he is at this moment. And now, if you flog me alive for it, you shall not get another word from me about him."

"I will flog you alive—both of you," shouted Netterville. "Here, you little wretch," he cried, shaking Agnese by the arm; "have you found your tongue yet, or do you want a cut of the whip to make you speak?"

"I am blind! I am blind!" screamed the child, clinging with all her might to her self-elected champion.

"Peace, child; he shall not harm you," said the latter.

"Shan't I though—shan't I?" vociferated Netterville, lifting up his whip, and making a cut in the air, which, however, fell short of its object, and descended right upon Perletta, who had sprung up on hearing the screams of her mistress.

"Curse the brute—it spoiled my aim," said the savage, dealing at the same time a kick at poor Perletta, which sent her flying through the air. "Here, Rover! Rover!" he added, whistling, and making a well-known sign to the fierce blood-hound by which he was accompanied.

"Do not set the dog, Squire Netterville, do not set the dog. It will destroy the poor beast," said Agnese's defender earnestly, stooping as if to pick up something from the ground.

"That's what I intend him to do. Here, Rover, have at him, my boy—have at him!" said Netterville, patting the blood-hound encouragingly on the back.

"You will have it, then," retorted the girl.

And still holding Agnese with one hand, she drew the other suddenly back, and flung a heavy stone at the dog before the squire could interpose to prevent her. Never was stone sent with a truer aim or better will; it hit the savage beast right in the eye; and howling with pain, and half blinded in his own gore, Rover rushed ingloriously from the field of battle. Netterville uttered a fearful imprecation.

"If you have injured him, I will wring your head off your shoulders; any how, I will teach you what it is to meddle with my dog, my young mistress."

And half beside himself with passion, it is hard to say what he would not, indeed, have done to his daring antagonist, had not another man shouted out from the other side of the hedge.

"What are you doing here, squire? Why, the priest was down on the beach half-an-hour ago; one of our people saw him sneaking about. There, let the children alone. If you have a score to wipe out with them, it will keep for another time, I suppose.

"Ay, ay; it will keep," said the squire, with a brutal laugh. "And I am not the man to forget it either. You are down in my book for a drubbing; mind that, you she croppy," he added, scowling terribly at Agnese's defender, while he turned to the blind child herself with something like an awkward attempt at good nature.

"There, little one, I suppose you are blind as you say; so pick up that fi-penny yonder, and buy a plaster for your dog."

"Touch it not, child," said the young unknown, fearlessly and authoritatively to Agnese—"touch it not! The coin of the blood-hunter can bring you nothing but sorrow. And you, bad man, take back your money and enjoy it while you may, the curse of the widow and orphan is on it; and the day is coming when the wealth so won in crime will heap shame, and woe, and degradation, and fruitless tears, and vain repentance on your head. And now, why are you so still? and why do you stare so wildly? Away! away! the chase is onward, and the prey escapes while you linger here."

The squire did, indeed, stare wildly at her; but the man who had come to seek him having, by this time, cleared the ditch rather more successfully than he had done himself, took his arm and drew him rapidly down the mountain path.

"Do not cry, dear child—do not cry," said the girl to Agnese, her voice resuming all its former tenderness of tone; "they are quite out of sight now; and the dog is not much hurt, and will, I am sure, be able to lead you safely to the castle."

"Oh, do not leave me?" cried Agnese; "I dare not go home without you."

"Well, then," said the other, a little reluctantly, "I will walk with you as far as the gates of the avenue."

But when they had reached this point, Agnese clung to her still, and cried so piteously that, almost in her own despite, she was forced to proceed with her to the castle. Lady Oranmore met them on the steps, and nearly forgot Agnese's bold secession from the church in terror at the vision of her pale face and the blood-stained forehead of her companion.

"It is nothing," said this last in answer to her ladyship's horror-stricken looks; "at least, nothing but what they may look for, who find themselves abandoned to the tender mercies of Squire Netterville."

"Netterville again!" cried Lady Oranmore. "What wickedness is that man plotting now?"

"Nothing new, madam," said she; and the girl's kindling eye strangely contradicted the assumed nonchalance of her manner. "Only plying his ancient trade more vigorously than ever—hunting priests and Papists from land to water, and from water to land, as if they had only been sent by Providence to serve as otters or wild foxes for his especial amusement."

Lady Oranmore shuddered. She had once detested priests and Papists as much as Squire Netterville himself; but of late her thoughts on the subject had been rapidly changing. She made no direct reply, however, although she kindly, and almost affectionately, joined Agnese in her entreaties to her unknown protectress, that she would come in and suffer the wound on her forehead to be properly cared for. They were both refused with a look of proud embarrassment, which Lady Oranmore took at first, for natural timidity; so she would listen to no excuse, hurrying her guest with a kind of good-natured violence into the castle hall, and from thence to her own private sitting-room, to which none but her especial favorites ever found admittance. The blood rushed into the stranger's face as she crossed the threshold; and for a moment she stood gazing so silently around her, that Lady Oranmore might have again have fancied her overcome by shyness, had not something in her look and attitude contradicted her idea. In spite of her shabby dress—for, to say the truth, the close, black gown she wore was both old and faded, and deserving of no better title—in spite, too, of her blood-stained features, and the uncouth bandage which she herself had wrapped around her forehead—the girl still looked as if to tread the hall of princes was no new thing to her.

She was thinking (that was plain,) but not of the splendors by which she was surrounded, although it might be of some distant memory to which they were associated; for she sighed deeply, and there was a look of sad pleasure mingled with the pain expressed upon her most speaking features.

"I have never seen you before," cried Lady Oranmore, suddenly; "yet is your face familiar to me as if I had known you from your mother's arms."

The girl sighed more deeply than before; and withdrawing her eyes slowly from an arm-chair of antique fashion, on which they had been a long time riveted, fixed them steadily on the speaker's face, and said, after a moment's pause:

"Have you never felt that before, Lady Oranmore? Have you never found a conversation—a turn of thought—a mere word, perhaps, come upon your ear as if it were the echo of one long listened to before? it is so, likewise, with pictures and with landscapes, and it may well be with faces also. We look upon them as if they had been with us in a dream."

"Strange girl!" cried Lady Oranmore; "what is your name?"

"Grace," answered her visitant, shortly, and with emphasis.

"Grace what?—you have another, I suppose."

"I have no other, lady; or, if I ever had, they have taken it away—they who hate us for our race and for our country—but yet more, thanks be to God, for our religion."

"You are a Catholic, then, and have suffered for your faith?"

"I have suffered in the person of those I loved. My father had a brother, who, being of the law religion, the law gave him the right to dispossess his elder of his fortune. He had no scruples in his conscience—no kindness in his heart to deter him from the deed—and so he did it; and the poorest tenant on the land was on that day a richer man than he who, a few hours before, had been lord of all."

"Good God, whose child are you?" cried Lady Oranmore, in great agitation, catching the speaker by the arm.

"The child of oppression, madam."

"But you are so like—your story is so like"—faltered Lady Oranmore.

"Like the story of many another crushed heart and fallen race in this unhappy land," the stranger coldly rejoined. "Nay, if fame speaks rightly, lady, even among your own kith and kin such things have happened."

Lady Oranmore dropped the arm she held, and breathed a long-drawn sigh.

"Stay with me, child," she said, at last. "If you have no home, no relation, no friend, you shall find all these in me."

Moved, it would seem, by a sudden impulse, the girl stepped forward, knelt down, and kissed Lady Oranmore's hand. There was nothing abject either in the look or manner with which this lowly action was performed, although there was something of humility (all the more touching, perhaps, for the proud heart from whence it came) mingling with the deep and passionate gratitude by which it was inspired.

"Stay with me," repeated Lady Oranmore, earnestly, as she felt the girl's warm tears falling on her hand.

"I thank you, madam, for the kind thought and the kind word; but God is good, and He has not left me friendless. And as for my home, it is better than His who had no spot whereon to lay His head; and so it is surely good enough for one who would fain, though she does not, follow in His footsteps."

"Indeed, but you do, though," said Agnese, for the first time joining in the conversation, "You bore the hard word and the hard blow for me this very day; and, surely, that is what He would have done—has done already for us all."

"No, I do not," said the girl, sadly; "He prayed for His persecutors; and, God help me! I little love the man who made me an orphan."

She kissed Agnese, and pressed Lady Oranmore's hand once more to her heart.

"May God keep you and guard you; and surely He Who would not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax, will give a blessing if even for your kindness this day to a nameless creature."

"Stay with me," Lady Oranmore once more whispered through her tears.

"I cannot, madam; I am wanted and waited for elsewhere. Yet pardon me if I add another word; it is about this child. Be not worse to her than Squire Netterville. He might strike the body—he could not harm the soul. You can, madam, and you will, if for her worldly interests you seek to warp her conscience. She is a Catholic; in God's name, let her remain a Catholic still."

"She shall," said Lady Oranmore.

"It is well, madam. And in His name I thank you, who said, in behalf of the little ones He loved so well—'He that shall scandalize one of these little ones that believe in Me, it were better for him that a millstone should be hanged about his neck, and that he should be drowned in the depth of the sea.'"

CHAPTER IV.

Ave Mary! night is shielding
 In its darkness earth and sea—
 Yet, ere yet to slumber yielding,
 Lift we up our souls to thee.
 Forehead bent and wrinkled brow,
 Voice of age, and infancy,
 All are turned upon thee now—
 All are whispering prayer to thee!
 All, if not in careless gladness,
 Still 'mid thoughts that make it be
 Sweeter, far to share thy sadness,
 Than to smile apart from thee.
 Ave Mary! night is shielding
 In this darkness earth and sea—
 Yet, ere yet to slumber yielding,
 Lift we all our souls to thee.

“Sing to me again, dear Grace. Never have I heard music that I loved so well since the night poor Rosalie went up to heaven.”

Agnese was seated, as usual, on her summer seat; but this time she was not alone. Her unknown defendress was at her side; for though she obstinately refused to return to Oranmore Castle, she often met the blind child upon the cliffs near to St. Bride's churchyard, and there she would sit or walk with her for hours, and sing her hymns, tell her tales of martyrs and of saints, and speak to her in tones so full of love and sweetness that, in her own despite, the latter was forced to confess the nameless Grace had become dearer to her than any one on earth besides—dearer than Lady Oranmore—than Francesco—or even, she hardly dared (it seemed so like ingratitude) to say it, than poor old Benita, the voluntary protectress of her forsaken infancy.

GRACE'S SONG.

O Erin, my country, beloved of the sea,
 Which clasps not an island more beautiful than thee!
 Shall I tell of thy glories, or weep for the day
 When, like snow in the sunshine they melted away?
 Or say, shall I sing of thy joy, when that sea
 Bore a saviour, a saint, and avenger to thee;
 And, sole amid nations, thou beautiful isle!
 The cross that he preached was received with a smile?
 Yes! hallowed forever—thrice hallowed the spot—
 Where the blood of the martyr besprinkled it not;
 And religion was seen, for the first time below,
 Not a stain on her garments or shade on her brow.

“No; I cannot sing that; and it is not true now,” said Grace, suddenly breaking off her song. “Woe is me! the cross has been well drenched in blood since the day when St. Patrick bore it in peaceful triumph through the land. Well, well! it is not we who have shed it; and it is better to be the children of persecution than its parent.”

“Dearest Grace, how strange you are! One while so gentle and so sad—and then so—so—”

“So fiery and so passionate—is it so, my little sister?”

For by this affectionate appellation the Irish girl had, early in their acquaintance, learned to address Agnese.

“No! no! not quite that. But still you are a mystery; even Lady Oranmore says she cannot understand you.”

“Lady Oranmore! what does she know of me?”

“Nothing; but she would give a good deal to know something. She says you have interested her strangely.”

“And what says our little sister?” said Grace, playfully, and yet with a shade of anxiety in her manner.

“What can she say but that she loves you dearly, for your own sake and for the sake of the sweet hymns you sing; but most of all for the sake of Him whom you know and worship as she does herself.”

“No; not quite as you do, dear Agnese; for you worship Him in His own spirit of meekness, while I bring Him but a proud and angry heart, which, God help me! I often find it difficult to subdue.”

“But no one has done me any wrong, and so I have nothing to subdue; and, then, they say the blind are always patient.”

And as ever happened when she alluded to her blindness, the voice of Agnese became so full of plaintive melody, you felt as if her soul was rather steeped in heavenly sweetness, than herself grown calm in the endurance of her sorrow.

“I wish, then, I was blind,” said her companion, quickly; “for then, perhaps, I should be patient also.”

“There is a blindness for you also, Grace. If you choose to take it—close your eyes to yourself; open them to Jesus. Behold His sufferings if you will, but blind yourself to your own.”

“And that is what I am trying to do; but then, see you, little sister, I am like a child playing at blind-man's-buff; I blind my eyes willingly, yet I cannot help sometimes taking a peep from under the bandage.”

“But surely it is sweet to suffer for the sake of Jesus?”

“Yes, dear Agnese, in one's own person, very sweet to suffer,” said Grace, eagerly, and there was no touch of human pride in the lofty enthusiasm of her look and tone. “Very sweet it is to say, and feel, I might be rich, and I am poor; I might move among the lofty of the land, and lo! I am a beggar, an outcast, a wanderer on its surface. My God,” she added, rising from her seat, and looking like a beautiful inspiration, as she cast her eyes upward, and proceeded: “It is sweet to suffer thus for Thee; to suffer in oneself, and by oneself; but it is hard to endure it in those we love better than ourselves—harder still to look upon the man who did it, and not feel all one's human nature up in arms against him.”

“And against yourself,” suggested, Agnese, gently.

“And that is very true, my sweet Agnese. I feel my anger does deeper injury to myself than to my human foe.”

“Forgive him, dearest Grace; perhaps of him also Jesus would have said, ‘he knows not what he does.’”

For a moment the young girl looked as if she thought her foe man knew very well indeed what he was about; but she tried to shake off the feeling and the look, and then she said, with all the truth of her generous heart:

“From my very soul I do forgive him, and morning and evening I pray for him; and not for him alone, but for all (and their name is legion) who have done us wrong.”

“You pray—ah! dearest Grace, where do you pray? How often have I asked in vain this question, and yet Lady Oranmore says there is no law now against the free exercise of religion.”

“No, Agnese, but there is one against large assemblies of people. You know rebellion is rife through the land, and our doughty militia-men are not always so discriminating as to make it certain they would not mistake for a political meeting, one solely intended for the purpose of worship.”

“But surely not, if it were held in a church.”

“Church! church!” repeated Grace, impatiently; “I tell you we have not a church left standing within twenty miles; and when we do meet to pray, it must be by the hillside, or the seashore, or in the fields, or the caverns of the islands. Church! church! Come with me, and I will show you how, in the beginning, they treated such of our churches, as they thought it not worth their while to steal; and then, little sister mine, you will no longer wonder if a church has become a kind of religious luxury, to which in this part of the island we are as yet almost strangers.”

She took Agnese's hand and led her by a rocky path up to a ruin, perched picturesquely enough on the very brow of the hill.

“See here, Agnese; but I forget, you cannot see. Well, these ruined, blackened walls around us were once a church.”

“A real church,” repeated Grace; “and you may kiss the ground, Agnese, for once it was steeped in the blood of martyrs. A hundred years ago, or more,” she continued, “and this was a stately building. Neither art nor labor had been spared in its erection. Perhaps like the Israelites of old, men gave their time and talents—women, their ornaments of gold and silver, their bracelets, their costly stuffs, purple and fine linen, for the enrichment of a temple to the living God. They built it for themselves, and by themselves; and so, good, easy folk, they thought they had a right to worship in it as they pleased. They were mistaken, however, and so they discovered to their cost. It was early on a Sunday morning, and the blue waters of the Atlantic flashed and glimmered beneath the rising sun, and the white cliffs looked whiter still, and the very flowers seemed to spring more gladly from the turf, as if rejoicing in the glories of the summer tide. It was Sunday morning, and thousands came thronging down from the mountains, and thousands came flocking up from the valleys; every cabin gave its quota of inhabitants, men and women and children, infants even in their mothers' arms, to swell the living tide which poured towards the newly-erected church upon the cliffs: and happy young hearts were among them, and happy old ones too, I dare say, for the bishop was to be there that morning, and to give, in the sacrament of Confirmation, the strength so needed for the storm of persecution which just then had begun to sweep over the land. Some few there might perhaps even be, who came to receive the rite, after having wept and done penance over former vacillations from the faith; but the holy chrism would be also poured over brows from whence sin had not yet dashed the innocent dews of their baptism, for, in those days of uncertainty and tribulation, children, almost infants by their age, were often admitted to confirmation, either that they might not die without it, or that they might derive from it the courage they were often called upon to exert, even in their tenderest years. The church was, therefore, crowded. Within it there was peace, and love, and hope, and prayer:—without it!—but I must not anticipate. Enough, that information had been given of the bishop, the Mass, and the holy rite; and suddenly, in one of the pauses of the service, a sound, the well-known tramp of soldiery, was heard. People began to listen in breathless silence—the bishop ceased to speak—the bell was rung no longer, and still the sounds without grew louder—the tramp, tramp, tramp, more distinct upon the turf. At length it seemed almost under the walls, and then it ceased, and the shrill notes of a bugle rang through the air. Some one looked forth from the window! Mother of God! the Cromwellians were upon them! They were unarmed, therefore they did not think to fight, neither did they seek to fly. They knew their doom too well. There was no hope for them beyond the church; so they barricaded the doors, and crowded round the altar, where mercy alone might be found for them. Now mark you, Agnese, if these men were rebels, the soldiers might have broken open the doors, dispersed the people, or taken them to prison; or if they were wild beasts, they might have fired in at the window, and, packed and caged as they were, ten rounds of shot would have sent them to their doom. But they were neither rebels nor wild beasts—they were simply Papists. Prison would have been too easy, and such a death too speedy. There was a better vengeance in the heads and hearts of Cromwell's band of ruffians. Higher than door or window they piled up wood and hay, and straw, and every combustible thing they could lay their hands on, and with a wild shout of triumph, set the whole of it in a blaze. The red light upon the windows soon told the fell deed to those within. At first they sat gazing upon one another, like men stupefied by terror, and then, as if moved by one simultaneous impulse, they all knelt down at the feet of their bishop; men and women imploring absolution, children, so lately full of childish joy, now screaming and struggling, and clinging to his feet. Good old man! he wept over them and blessed them; but tears might not quench that funeral pile! The windows soon melted away in the heat, and then the red fire poured rapidly in, flying like a living creature along the walls, taking the rafters of the ceiling, licking up everything it found that might give its fury food, until the soldiery without no longer seemed so terrible as the circling flames within, and half mad with heat, and smoke, and terror, the miserable victims sought escape by flight. And now a terrible scene ensued, as it has been described by one who shared in its barbarities; wretches scorched and burned, and blackened, beyond the semblance of human beings, shouting, screaming, raving in their madness, the mighty crowd swaying hither and thither in its various efforts at escape, as some rushed to the gateway (the doors had long since been burned to cinders), and others clambered up to the windows to cast themselves down, and each and all were driven back into the pitiless flames at the point of the yet more pitiless soldier's lance. At length the shout and the scream were heard no more, and silence fell on the multitude—the silence of despair; and then the bishop rose: he had hitherto remained prostrate at the foot of the altar, and over the dead and the dying the faithful shepherd looked. They knew him in the midst of their agony and fear; they knew him, and guessing his intention, bowed down their heads to receive his absolution. They were spoken—those words which gave them hopes of the peace in heaven they had never known on earth; and then the bishop once more lifted up his arms to impart his final benediction, and in this attitude, and while yet the words were quivering on his lips, he fell down dead before them. In an instant afterwards, the whole of the building gave way with a terrible crash, and all was over.

"This is the tradition of the country; it is but one tale amid a thousand others, and it has been repeated, even in these our days of enlightened civilization. Not twenty miles from these very ruins, and not three months from the hour in which you have listened to this story, three Catholic chapels have been burned to the ground, by men who write themselves worthy descendants of Cromwell's ruthless soldiers. And now, dear Agnese, see you not how our forefathers were forced to worship God in secret and in lonely places, and can you wonder if we, their children, have often neither hearts nor means left to do otherwise than they did?"

"Dear Grace," said Agnese. "I could almost fancy I was listening to a tale of the old Christian martyrs."

"The martyrs of the old Christian times were better off than we. They suffered for their faith, and their very foes denied them not their crown, Verily! Verily! ours have been wiser in their generation. They have robbed us of the glory of our martyrdom, to clothe us in its shame. True, they persecute us as Papists, but then it is as rebels that they hang us. It was so in England also. They did not put a man to torture and to death for being a Catholic, but only for refusing an oath which no Catholic could in conscience take."

"And yet, at Oranmore Castle, I have heard them talk so often as if we were the persecutors, and they the persecuted," replied Agnese.

"Yes, poor, injured lambs!" said Grace, laughing through her tears. "They preach liberty of conscience, and then show us fire and faggot when we dare to take it; yet I ought not to grumble at these laws, for they made a Catholic of my grandfather."

"I should have thought they would have kept him Protestant."

"They did not, however. He was travelling for the first time through the north, for he had been educated in England, and he came suddenly upon a vast assemblage of people hearing Mass in an open field, every man bare-headed and upon his knees, although the mud was deep beneath, and the rain descending in torrents from above. He went home and became a Catholic, for he said there could be no true religion upon earth, if the faith which produced such fruits were false."

"I do not wonder," said Agnese. "Oh, that I also might be present at such a scene!"

"Dear Agnese! I have told you why, just now, we fear to meet in public. There is yet another reason. The priest, the only one now left in this immediate district, has most unjustly become suspected as a rebel and a favorer of rebellion, and informations to this respect have been lodged against him."

"But he is not—he cannot be a rebel!" cried Agnese.

"Far from it. He holds rebellion in abhorrence, as a foul offence against the laws both of God and man; and it is mainly owing to his influence that the people about here have been kept from joining in the wild cry of vengeance, which, north and south, and east and west, is sweeping through the land. He knows this, and therefore he has rejected many an opportunity of escape which has offered itself, to foreign shores.

He will not even give up his ministry among them, though the mere fact of saying Mass to some hundreds of people must lead in the end to an unfortunate discovery. The very first day I met you, Squire Netterville was almost on his track; and if I had not kept him in play by my idle chatter, the father would have been caught long before he reached the cave where, woe is me! he is forced to find a home."

"Ah! that is the reason that you were so saucy and so brave," said Agnese, smiling.

"Yes, Agnese! but do you know I got a scolding afterwards? The father said I had no right to do evil that good might come of it, or to work up the wild passions of the man to frenzy, even to save a priest's neck from the hangman's rope; so you see I had my horsewhipping for nothing after all, Agnese."

"For nothing except the pleasure of saving him, dear Grace."

"Ah! that was a pleasure, and to see the squire tumble into the ditch, too, was an agreeable little diversion of its kind," said Grace, laughing merrily. "But it is all in vain; he is saving hundreds from the certain death which is ever the consequence of rebellion, but his own will be sacrificed in the effort. Well! well! we must not repine. The good shepherd gives his life for his flock, and if there ever was a good shepherd, Padre Francesco is the man."

"Francesco! is that his name?" said Agnese, a whole host of recollections rushing upon her mind—"but not my Francesco," she added with a sigh—"he is not a priest."

"Like myself, he is without a name, but we call him Francesco, because he was ordained in Italy, and that was the name he took in the religious order to which he belongs. And now, see you not, little sister, what a dilemma I am in? I would trust you as myself, but I fear, if I take you to our rock-cave chapel, Lady Oranmore may miss you, and her servants track you out."

"I see," said Agnese, "and I must submit." She covered her face with her hands, and tears from her sightless eyes trickled slowly through her fingers.

"My child, my child," cried her companion, "I cannot bear to see you weep; you are unhappy dear Agnese."

"How can I be otherwise, so far from my own dear land, in the very bosom of which the sweet Jesus dwells, and what is there for the blind child but Jesus? You have the flowers and the fruits, and the bright blue skies, the stormy waters, and the pleasant earth—but Jesus is all in all to me. My God and my all! my present consolation and my future joy! Oh, that the dove would descend and give Him to my prayers!"

"You shall have Him," cried Grace, suddenly; "weep no more, my own Agnese, but meet me to-morrow in St. Bride's church-yard."

"Ah! no, dear Grace, not for worlds would I endanger the safety of the father of the flock."

"It will not be endangered," said Grace. "I have thought of all; go to Lady Oranmore; tell her all I have said to you. Say to her that I know her to be honor itself; and that our secret will be safe in her keeping; and tell her furthermore, that the life of your nearest relative upon earth is involved in this confidence, for the priest is your uncle, Agnese, the brother of your father; and, Mother of God! I can keep the secret no longer—I am your sister." The words had scarcely burst from her lips before Agnese was in her arms, and for a long time the young sisters, so long separated and so strangely re-united, wept together in silence. "Yes, dear Agnese," said Grace, at last speaking through her tears, "that tall, grave-looking man, who rescued you from the crowd at Dover, and who would not speak Italian lest his own mission should be endangered by any discovery of his calling, was your father's brother. After the persecution which drove your father and my father, Agnese from his native land, this brother, who being next in age, might have claimed the property had he chosen to change his religion, resolved on the contrary, upon renouncing the little that was left him, and becoming a priest, in hopes of supplying the spiritual wants of the poor tenants of Netterville. Before, however, he went to Italy," continued Grace Netterville, yielding to the gay humor which often found her even in her tears, "this good uncle of mine resolved on committing a petty robbery—"

"Robbery!" cried Agnese, with a look of horror.

"Yes, robbery," said her companion, laughing outright. "But I believe he could not have been hanged for sheep-stealing, seeing that it was only a poor lamb that he abstracted."

"But what good could the theft of a lamb do him, Grace?"

"Not much good to him, certainly, but a great deal of good to the poor animal itself; I was the lamb, Agnese. He foresaw that my grandmother, Lady Oranmore, would bring me up in the religion of the worldly wise; so, one day, when I was playing in the shrubbery, he pounced like a great eagle upon me, and bore me in his talons to a convent in Italy, where I remained for many years; and he was bringing me from thence when he stumbled upon his other niece at Dover. He did not then know who you were; but as Lady Oranmore made no secret of your story, he found it out soon after your arrival at Oranmore; and from the hour when he gave me to understand I had a sister, I haunted your footsteps, darling. I used to follow you along the cliffs, dreading, at every turn, lest you should miss your footsteps, and tumble over, and I be deprived of my little sister. And I used to sit beside you for hours in the churchyard of lone St. Bride's longing—so longing—to take you into my arms that I felt it quite impossible to address you coldly as a stranger. I followed you even to Lady Oranmore's church."

"Into her church?"

"To it; not into it, darling. And then, indeed, when I found your religion endangered, I resolved to speak out. I was even tempted to rob Lady Oranmore's sheepfold of another lamb; but your first words convinced me there was no need. A faith so vivid I had never seen; and I felt directly you were the stuff of which a martyr might be made, but an apostate never."

"But surely you named me once?"

"Yes," said Grace, laughing. "Like a baby with a new toy, I could not resist the pleasure of seeing how it would sound to talk to you; and so I tried to say your name just in the careless, commonplace sort of way in which I should have done if I had known you all my life. But, bless my soul! you jumped up and looked as frightened as if a ghost had spoken to you out of the grave you were sitting on. I declare I caught the infection, and ran away much faster than I should have done if a ghost, or Squire Netterville himself, had been at my heels."

"Squire Netterville! Grace, Grace! do you not know—?"

"I—yes, yes! I do know Agnese. He is the third of those ill-fated brothers—the renegade to his religion—the traitor to his blood—the blot on his escutcheon—the stain on the fair name of Netterville forever?"

"Hush, hush, dear Grace! remember he is our uncle."

"It is true; and I am silent. But how did you know that—or did you only guess?"

"Lady Oranmore told me long ago. And now, dear Grace—"

"Not Grace in earnest, sweet sister mine. I was called after my mother, and my name is May; but I thought it would cause Lady Oranmore to suspect me; and then, you know, May means Mary, and she was full of grace, and the mother of grace itself. So the name was not ill-chosen; only it did not suit me very well. Don't you think I ought to have called myself Graceless?"

"Indeed I don't," said Agnese earnestly; "and I was going to have told you, my gracious, graceful May, that I loved your invisible presence, long before you said a word to me. I used to feel as if my guardian angel was seated at my side."

"Not your angel, but your guardian only, dear one. And now, adieu until to-morrow. Meet me here at six o'clock, and I will bring you to an uncle something better than Squire Netterville, and a grandmother not better but full as good as Lady Oranmore."

"A grandmother, dear Grace?"

"Yes, Agnese; the mother of the three brothers is still alive. She had a high spirit and a noble heart; and when she found the part her youngest born had played in this domestic tragedy she sent him word that she would never look upon his face again. She would neither break the bread nor drink the cup with one who was a renegade to God—a traitor to his blood. So she shook the dust from off her feet, and went forth from the halls of Netterville forever."

"And then?" said Agnese.

"And then, like her eldest son, she sought first a refuge in the cottage of a peasant, but finally followed the fortunes of Francesco, in whom she has concentrated the affections she has taken from his brother. He is, indeed, her rich consolation for the disgrace which has fallen on her name. She loves him as a saint, reveres him as a martyr; and poor, and old, and paralytic as she is, she often says she is happier with her priestly son in his cave by the seashore than ever she was amid the rank and riches of her sunnier hours."

"And you, dear Grace? It makes me sad to think that you should have so poor a home while I, who have really been used to poverty from my childhood, am set at my ease in your castle."

"Console yourself, my own Agnese; the cottage or the cave, by the wild sea waves, is the home of my choice. When I asked to be allowed to leave my convent in order to nurse my dear old grandmother, my uncle represented to me the sort of life I would have to lead, and she herself wrote to dissuade me from the project. - But I answered almost in the words of Ruth: 'The land that shall receive thee dying, in the same will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so and so to me, and add more also, if aught but death part me and thee.' And never for an instant have I repented of my words. But my task is nearly over. She is very old now—broken down, perhaps, less by age than by the heavy sorrow which has come upon her through her children. Every day may be her last; and I almost pray that the last may be soon."

"She longs to see Jesus, I suppose," said Agnese, innocently.

"It is not that! It is not that!" said Grace Netterville, clenching her hand, and speaking through her closed teeth. "But he will soon be taken in their toils; and, once taken, will be executed by martial law—that is to say, without judge or jury, justice or mercy. They have marked him for their prey; and oh! how I trust she may be dead, if it be only one day or hour, before they have succeeded in hunting him to his doom. Think, Agnese, think what a blow for the mother's heart, to know that her second Cain has shed the blood of his brother Abel."

"Good God! Is it, then, Squire Netterville who is hunting down his brother?"

"It is, indeed, he who has lodged information of a rebel priest lurking in the neighborhood. But, O Agnese! cried Grace, speaking with a kind of agony in her voice and manner, "I would not do the man injustice; I do not believe he knows the wrong he is doing; I not believe he knows him to be his brother; and sometimes I have half been moved to go to him and say, 'he for whom you are weaving the hangman's rope, is the son of your mother.' But then I dared not do it; I could not risk the life of the noble and the kind upon the chance repentance of such a man."

"O Grace, do not speak of him so proudly. His sin is terrible—but think how terrible his doom. He has cast off Jesus, and Jesus has abandoned him to the devices of his own heart—even to the unconscious seeking of his brother's blood."

"Terrible! terrible! it is indeed Agnese," said Grace; sitting down, and covering her face with both her hands.

"We will not speak proudly or harshly of him," the blind child continued, kneeling down, and taking Grace Netterville's hand in hers. "We will pity and forgive him; we will pray for him; we will even love him for the sake of the sweet Jesus who loved him once—who loves him, perhaps, even at this instant, for the future penance by which he will repay the past sins of his life."

"Dear Agnese, what a sweet little saint you are," said Grace, stooping reverently to kiss her forehead. "Would that I could feel as you do!"

"We will pray for him, most especially, to-morrow," Agnese went on to say. "We will pray for him in our wild chapel by the seashore, when Jesus descends in the midst of us, and for our sakes reposes on the hard rock, instead of the golden altars, to which in happier lands, He is invited; then we will pray to Him with all our hearts and souls for this unhappy man. We will say to Him: my God, I give Thee all, my own interests and the interests of all who are dear to me—my hopes, and fears, and joys, and sorrows; the life of this dear uncle, and the heartbreak of his mother. I abandon them to Thee; I will ask nothing for them or for myself; only grant me, in exchange, the conversion of him who has caused all our sorrow."

"Surely, dear child, He will grant you such a prayer as that."

"Sure He will," answered the Little Spouse, with a look of loving confidence. "Other things the sweet Jesus may deny us; but mercy He never refuses, whether we ask it for ourselves or for another."

"You put me to the blush, Agnese. I thought I had forgiven him long ago, but I see it was only with half a heart, while you have done it with a heart and a half. Well, you will see to-morrow how fervently I will pray for the man's conversion."

"Do not call him 'man' that way," pleaded Agnese. "Do, dear Grace, try to think of him as your uncle, and yet more as the creature of Christ Jesus crucified, who suffered for him, and died for him as well as for us all."

"Yes, it is very true," thought Grace Netterville, as she stepped into the little boat which was to convey her to her home among the rocks. "Squire Netterville is the creature of Christ crucified, and my father's brother; my own uncle, and the uncle of the only real little angel I ever met with on earth—and that is Agnese."

CHAPTER V.

THE day was dark and stormy, the boat tossed roughly on the waters, and Agnese shivered with fear and cold, as the spray dashed wildly over her face and person.

"You are cold, Agnese," said her sister, the sole other occupant of the boat, and manager of its oars.

"I am afraid," the blind child answered; "it seems so strange to be tossing up and down so wildly, and not to know the reason why."

Grace Netterville took the cloak off her own shoulders, and put it round her sister.

"There, dear child," she said, in her most cheerful voice; "with your pretty dress beneath, and my old frieze above, you look like a traveling fairy, or a princess in disguise. But would you rather I should put back to land? It is a wild morning, and almost too rough for you."

"Oh, no," cried Agnese, after a moment's hesitation, "I am going to Him, so I ought not to be afraid."

"You need not, dear one. Did not Peter walk to Him in safety over the stormy waters? and why not you?"

"Thank you, Grace, for putting me in mind of that; I will think of it, and try not to be afraid again."

Grace said no more, for the storm was rising fast, and it was all she could do to manage her little vessel; at last, however, she succeeded in nearing the little island towards which its course had been directed, and in guiding it into a creek, serving as an entrance to one of those caves everywhere so common on that part of the Irish coast, and with which this little island, in particular, was almost honeycombed throughout.

The sea penetrated a considerable way beneath the rocks, but they were now floating upon smooth waters, and a few lazy strokes of the oar sufficed to bring them to the shallows, where a strong hand laid hold of the boat, and drew it high and dry upon the sands, and Grace Netterville jumped out.

"God save you, Dan;" she said to the man, at the same time assisting her little sister to follow her example.

"The same to you kindly, mavourneen," replied the man; "you have had a rough passage of it, Miss May."

"Aye, aye," rejoined Grace, or May, as we ought now to call her; "the white horses are playing strange pranks out yonder upon the ocean."

"'Tis a spring-tide, too," said Dan, "and if the wind continue in this quarter, his reverence won't read Mass dry-shod this blessed mornin', I'm thinking."

"Well, well," said Grace, with her merriest laugh, "his reverence can change his shoes afterwards, and most of his congregation, God help them, have no shoes to change."

"Merry Asthur to me, if you ever said a truer word nor that, Miss May," said Dan, holding his own bare foot to the light of the bogwood torch, which he had kindled during the conversation, and now presented to his mistress.

May took it, and twining her other arm around her little sister's waist, and whispering to her not to be afraid, drew her forward into the cavern. It grew very dark as they proceeded; and had it not been for her blazing torch, May Netterville might have found some difficulty in steering clear of the sharp-pointed rocks everywhere scattered around, and of the pools of water, some of them looking fearfully dark and deep, which had been left there by the high tides. Presently the dark wall of rock receded upon either side, spring up into wide and lofty arches over their heads; and, instead of the stony surface which had wounded her feet sadly, Agnese felt that she was walking on smooth sands, though even these indicated by their unusual moisture, the presence of the ocean at no very distant period of time. An enormous mass of black stone, perfectly detached from the surrounding rock, stood in the midst of this cavern chamber; it resembled, in some degree, a boulder-stone of unusual size, only the back part, which rose considerably higher than the front, was fashioned into something of the likeness of a rude stone cross, while the lower portion was quite flat enough to admit of its serving for an altar—a purpose to which the lighted candles, in their tin or wooden candlesticks, and the few poor vestments laid upon it, sufficiently indicated it was now to be devoted. Behind this Druid-like altar, in a little nook, where she was completely screened from observation, May Netterville placed her sister, kneeling down at the same time beside her, and still holding her round the waist, in order to give her courage. She had previously cast away her bogwood torch, which a wide fissure in the rocks above caused to be no longer needed. Daniel, however, was apparently of a different opinion regarding its necessity, for he picked it up, while it was yet smoking on the floor, relighted it from one of the candles burning on the altar, and very gravely presented it to his young mistress.

"What is it, Daniel," said May, it must be confessed a little pettishly. "Why waste the good bogwood? I don't want it here."

"Maybe not, Miss May, but somebody is wanting you for all that. Here's little Paudeen without says the mistress is in a great hurry to see you, and won't have you wait for his reverence's Mass."

"Is, then, my grandmother ill?" said May, rising hurriedly from her knees.

"Not as I know on, Miss May, but Paudeen says she is very wake and low like, and his reverence would have stayed with her till you came, only old Norrishea is dying, and he was forced to go off to the other side of the island to see her, and so he bid you come as quick as you could."

Daniel looked as if there was more the matter than he chose to tell of, and May turned anxiously to her sister:

"My grandmother wants me, darling; will you be afraid of staying here alone? I will come or send for you directly after Mass."

"Oh, never mind me—I am not a bit afraid, dear Grace," said Agnese, earnestly.

"Agnese," whispered her sister, in a low voice, "I feel as if our grandmother were to die to-day—pray for her to Jesus, dear one."

Agnese kissed her sister's hand in token of assent, and May, taking the torch from Daniel, threaded her way rapidly among the pools of water, and soon disappeared at the entrance of the cave. She had not been long gone when the poor people began to arrive from the mainland, dropping in by twos and threes, and crowding towards the altar, before which they prayed so fervently and so loudly, that the air seemed filled with the murmur of their voices. A whisper of "hush! his reverence," soon afterwards announced the coming of the priest, and, amid many a blessing given and received, Father Netterville advanced to the foot of the altar, where, after a few minutes spent in deep recollection of spirit, he began to vest himself for the celebration of the divine Sacrifice. And now the low, fervent tones of his voice reached Agnese's ear, and she drank them in as the sweetest music, for theirs was the genuine language of the Church, and the announcement to her of the true coming of Jesus. The bells rang out the "Gloria in Excelsis," and her heart re-echoed the song of the angels, which it is intended to recall; the Gospel was said, and, to her vivid faith, it was as if she stood up to hear that voice which once spoke its wisdom throughout Israel. The "Holy, holy, holy" of the Preface found her walking in spirit beside Him on His entrance into Jerusalem; and "holy, holy, holy" she once more said in spirit, with the bright bands of the cherubim and seraphim, who well she knew were crowded into every nook of that dark cave, in the solemn hour of the consecration, when the word was spoken, though not aloud, which drew Him once more from the bosom of His heavenly Father, to receive the adoration of His earthly creatures. Upon that rude rock He was—amid the wild waves, and the moaning winds, and the prostrate people—and not in spirit only, but in the very form which He took from Mary. Joy was in Agnese's heart, for now she knew she was kneeling in very deed at His feet; and so she said the "Our Father" as she might have said it had she been present when He taught it to His disciples, waiting still to hear, and repeating all the words, as if from His very lips she took them. At the "Agnus Dei" she kissed in spirit His sacred hands, imploring the gifts of His mercy from them. At the "Domine non sum dignus" she craved a yet closer union with Him, saying over and over again, with clasped hands and streaming eyes: "Oh, that the dove would descend and give Him to my prayers!" And, if not sacramentally, spiritually, at least He did descend into that loving little heart, blessing it so entirely by His presence, that she became as one insensible to external objects, unconscious of the presence of others, and deaf even to the strange muttering sounds that now filled the cavern, giving fearful evidence of the coming storm. Long, indeed, before the conclusion of the divine Sacrifice the people had begun to look on each other with pale faces and anxious eyes—here and there those who had wives and children gathered them together and then hurriedly departed—and, just after the consecration, Daniel, approaching Father Netterville, whispered a few words in his ear.

"Tell the people to depart directly, if there is time," was the hurried answer.

"There is plenty of time if they go at once, for the tide won't be at its full for another hour. But won't your reverence lave it with them?" asked Daniel, anxiously; "it wouldn't be safe to remain much longer."

"Then see that the people do not linger," replied the father; "I must finish what I have begun;" and, satisfied of the safety of his flock, he resumed the interrupted service with as calm composure as if his life were not perilled by the delay. Daniel lost not a moment in communicating this mandate to the congregation, and a simultaneous rush instantly took place to the entrance, but the faithful fellow lingered yet a few minutes longer, looking wistfully towards the father, until, at a sign from this last, he also reluctantly withdrew: and now there only remained the priest at the altar and the blind child, and—but we must not anticipate. A few minutes more brought the service to a conclusion, and then Father Netterville likewise left the cave, in total ignorance of the presence of another human being within it, for, as I have said already, Grace had placed her sister in a nook behind the rock, where she was completely hidden from observation. The ceasing of his voice roused her at last from her dream of prayer, and then she began to wonder why it was she heard no longer any stir among the people. At first she attributed this to the thousand voices of the storm, which every moment raged louder and louder; but at last she became conscious of her solitude, and, chilled with cold and a thousand vague apprehensions, listened anxiously for the footsteps of her sister, seeking in vain to conjecture the cause of her absence. Poor child! she was little aware of the real nature of her situation—that May, at the bedside of her dying grandmother, was wholly unconscious of the danger to which she was exposed—that, when the north wind, and the spring tide came together, the cave was often many fathoms under water, and that Father Netterville had himself departed in the very last moment when escape by a boat was possible. Minute after minute of the hour noted by Daniel passed away, and every minute brought the danger nearer to its unconscious victim. Rapidly the advancing tide poured itself into the dark, deep pools, filling every empty nook and cranny with its water; then it dashed madly against the rocks, which at first bravely repelled the foe, sending it upwards to the caverned roofs in showers of spray; but wave followed wave with irresistible perseverance, and at last they also were surrounded and submerged, their sharp, black points appearing yet a moment longer above the surface of the foam, and then swept entirely out of sight beneath one triumphant billow. This obstacle overcome, the waters flowed in more calmly, and, although deafened by the storm and drenched by the spray, Agnese was not entirely aware of her danger until the tide swept her very feet, like a greedy monster crouching for its prey. Then all at once the truth flashed upon her mind, and, springing to her feet, she endeavored to clamber up the steep sides of the rock, close to which she had been kneeling. In a calmer moment, even with the full possession of her eyesight, she could not have succeeded in such an undertaking; but now, under the influence of that instinct for self-preservation which often suggests and enables us to accomplish things we should have otherwise deemed impossible, in the twinkling of an eye, low or in what manner she never afterwards could explain, Agnese found herself panting and trembling on the altar above. A loud groan soon announced to her that she was not its only tenant, and she might have fancied Father Netterville to have been the companion of her danger, had not the succession of groans and cries which followed been mingled with imprecations and blasphemies, which she felt never could have issued from the lips of a priest; and, after listening for a few minutes, unable, even in that hour of terror, to restrain her holy indignation, she cried out in Italian:

“O man! cease to blaspheme your Saviour—cease to crucify God anew.”

An icy cold hand was laid on hers.

“Say, child, is there no hope? Must we indeed perish thus?”

“I trust not,” said Agnese, speaking with some difficulty in English, which the shock had almost banished from her memory. “God is good. He may yet save us.”

“Fool! there is no hope,” roared the voice. “Do I not know this cavern well? In a few minutes more the waves will have reached this rock; and even if they do not rise much higher, their strength alone will sweep us from this surface.”

“And if it indeed be so,” said Agnese, with a calmness which, in such an hour, and from so young a creature, was, in truth, sublime, “know you not, man, that each of us must die in the very hour when God doth call us? O creature of Christ Jesus crucified,” she added suddenly changing her tones, and grasping the terrified wretch by both his hands, “why should you fear to die? Has He not died for you?”

“You talk bravely,” said the other in a scoffing tone. “Have you, then, no fear of death, that you pretend not to shudder at its approach?”

“What for should I fear death?” the child replied, in her sweet broken English. “I have often asked to go to Him, and if He say, ‘Come to me over the stormy waters,’ why should I be afraid of going?”

For a moment the man fixed his eyes in wonder upon this frail child, so fearful by nature, and yet so fearless now. There she knelt calmly, as if before some sainted shrine, her hands crossed, her head bowed, her lips moving, not in impatient murmuring, but in prayer. A huge wave almost dashing him from the rock of refuge, soon recalled him to remembrance of his own fearful situation, and uttering a terrible imprecation he cast his eyes upwards, not, alas! in supplication, but despair. Through the wide-vent chasm in the roof, he could see the bright, blue skies above, looking down upon him, calm and high, as if to rebuke his desperation; but the next moment a dark shadow passed between him and them. At first he thought he had lost his sight, then a vague hope began to creep into his soul. He strained his eyes until the balls seemed starting from their sockets. It was indeed as he had hardly dared to fancy—a human form was visible above, and a face of ashy paleness was gazing through the chasm.

It was May Netterville who spoke. She had found her grandmother apparently sinking fast but even this deep anxiety could not banish her blind sister from her thoughts.

She felt uneasy at having left her alone, and foreseeing the impossibility of going in search of her herself, sent little Paudeen down to the shore, with directions to inform her the moment he should see Daniel returning from the cave. As we have already seen, this event occurred much sooner than could have been expected; but Paudeen, who knew nothing of the high tide, and who was well aware that, under all ordinary circumstances, it would be at least half an hour before he could make his appearance, thought it would be no great injury to his employer if he spent the intervening moments in bird-nesting along the cliffs. The consequence was that he missed Daniel altogether; and the latter had been some time on shore, when May Netterville, becoming feverishly impatient at the long delay, left her grandmother, to the care of an attendant, and went in search of him herself. He was soon visible coming from the cliffs; but the instant she named the child, the alteration of his countenance filled her with horror.

“What is it man? Speak! speak!” she cried, struggling with her apprehensions.

“The spring tide!—the spring tide!” gasped the man; “the child is lost!”

For a moment May Netterville felt as if life were ebbing from her veins. One hope remained.

“Father Netterville!” suggested Daniel; “maybe his reverence brought her back with him.”

“No, no,” cried May; “he knew not she was there.”

“Yonder he is, coming over the cliff; he must have landed full a quarter of an hour ago; no boat could live in such a surf as that,” and Daniel pointed with a tremulous finger to the mighty billows that now dashed against the beetling rocks, marking the entire line of coast with their sheets of foam.

White as ashes, and shaking from head to foot, May turned her eyes in the direction of his hand, and saw indeed there was no hope among those breakers. But she was not one to sit down in despair while a chance or possibility urged her to exertion.

“A rope, Daniel! a rope! Through the chasm in the rock she may yet be saved!”

Daniel took the hint, and in an inconceivably short time, had joined her at the “Devil’s Bite,” as the opening into the cave was named among the people, bringing with him a basket and a rope, such as was used by the bird-nesters on the cliffs, to lower them to the objects of their perilous pursuit. He was accompanied by the men from whom he had borrowed the machine, and May recognized among their faces some of the most reckless and well-known smugglers on the coast—men of lives so desperate, that at other time she would have shrunk from their contact, but at this moment she cared not who or what they were, so they could give her assistance in her need.

"I see her, I think," she said to Daniel. "She must be saved, Daniel, she must be saved."

Daniel cast a despairing glance, first down into the deep chasm, then on the old and knotted rope by which the basket was to be suspended.

"It is sartin death to whoever thries it," he muttered between his teeth."

"She must be saved," repeated May. "Will they hold the rope firm and steady, Daniel?"

"The rope 'll hardly bear a man's weight, let alone a child along wid him," said one of the smugglers giving the basket a contemptuous kick with his foot. "It is worn and twisted almost out iv its strength already."

"It will bear mine, then," said May, fixing her brave eyes on the man who had spoken,

"Yours, achorra!" cried Daniel. "No; rather than that, I will try it myself; and, Miss May, darlin', I know I needn't say a word about the little ones at home, for you war always tindher and kind, and a mother like to them as had no other, and so were all yer rae afore you, for the matther of that, barrin' the ould rogue up at the hall—my heavy curse on him for the shame and sorrow he has brought on the name!" While speaking these words as rapidly as ever they could come out of his mouth, Daniel busily employed himself in arranging the rope and the basket for an immediate descent, but May Netterville touched him on the shoulder. "I thank you, Daniel; but I put no man's life in peril—mine will be sufficient."

"You will perish in the attempt, Miss May. See what a depth it is below; and if the rope should twist ever so little you will be dashed into atoms against the rocks."

"Men do these things every day for birds' nests," said May, speaking rapidly, but rather to herself than her companion, "and shall not I do it for Agnese?"

"Only look down, Miss May," continued Daniel. "Iv yer senses fail—iv the rope break; look down, alanna! look down!"

May Netterville did look down, and felt her brain grow dizzy as she looked. The descent was fearful, and the rocks beneath all the more terrible for the darkness in which they were partially enveloped, while the roar of the winds and of the waves, coming up in hollow and confused murmurs from out of the depths below, seemed to tell of the certain death awaiting her among them.

"Think of the ould lady, think of his riverence—what would they say?" pleaded Daniel in his most imploring accents.

Miss Netterville made no reply; she was battling with the mighty terror which had seized on her, and which almost threatened to deprive of her senses; but the struggle was over in a moment; down to the very bottom of her heart she sent her fear, down so deep that she herself was no longer conscious of its existence.

"What would they say, Daniel! They would say I had done my duty."

"Lower away, my men, lower away!" she cried, seating herself in the basket, her free, firm voice bolying the deadly paleness of her lip and brow.

"Stop, for the love of the great God above ye—stop," cried Daniel, laying fast hold of her by the skirt of her dress. "Let me go in your room, Miss May, and snre I will bring her back to you iv I have to go look for her at the bottom of the say—only let me go in your room, a-chorra!"

"Away, away!" cried May Netterville, struggling violently to free herself from his grasp.

"I am ould, and it's no great matther to anyone when I go," sobbed the poor fellow, falling on his knees, and putting his arms around her and the basket, so that she could not move. "But Miss May, darlin', all your yonng years are bright before you; do not cast them from you, as if you were ungrateful to their Giver."

"Stand back, man, stand back," cried May; "you peril the life of my sister in those vain delays."

The suddenness of the announcement threw Daniel off his guard; he cast up his eyes and arms to heaven in the excess of his astonishment; the smugglers seized the favorable moment, and May Netterville was half-way down the chasm before he had in any degree recovered the use of his senses. Short time had she for thought or terror, while hanging thus fearfully midway in the air. Sight and sound, the boiling surge, the beetling rocks, the howling storm, all passed confusedly through her brain; and not until she was safely landed on the altar rock, not until she had clasped her blind sister with all the wild energy of her nature to her bosom, did she fully realize the danger of her situation.

"I knew you would come—I knew you would come," sobbed the child, twining her arms round her sister's neck, and more moved, as it sometimes happens, by the prospect of rescue than she had been in the presence of danger. "I knew He would send you to me."

"Yes, yes, dearest child, but we must hasten away now, for the tide is rising fast. Ah!" cried May, recoiling from another hand laid upon her garments; "you here!" she added, when, her eyes becoming accustomed to the dim light, she recognized the terror-stricken features of Squire Netterville.

"Unhappy man! pray well to God, for death is coming fast on yonder breakers."

"Save me, save me," gasped the wretch, already almost choked in his agony.

"I came to save my sister, and I will save her, so help me God!" said May, resolutely, unbinding the girdle from her waist and fastening Agnese to her own person with it.

"May Netterville, May Netterville! by the blood that flows in both our veins, have pity on your father's brother."

"Agnese first," said May. "I will sent the rope for another turn."

"There will be no time—no time!" shrieked the squire, as a huge wave struck him on the shoulder.

"And what of my life—what of the child?" said May, almost fiercely, in her deep disgust for his selfish egotism.

"It is not my life I crave," sobbed the renegade at her feet; "it is my salvation."

May hesitated: she saw there was indeed but little time to lose. A few more such breakers as the last would clear the rock of its living occupants; and her human nature struggled hard with the holy inspiration which suggested the sacrifice of her own life, and that of the child she so dearly loved, for the sake of one who had been, not merely the destroyer of her own earthly prospects, but who could scarcely be held innocent of the lives of her parents.

"Water may drown—fire will not burn you," murmured the unhappy man. "You are innocent—you may go to God; but I have the sin of Judas on my soul!"

"Save him, save him, dearest Grace," Agnese whispered now.

May looked at her, and for a moment thought of sending her up with the squire; but she changed her mind, fearing that, in his selfish terror, he might seek to lighten the rope by casting her from him.

"Even now," thought she, "he is so mad with fear, he sees not how easy it would be for him, a strong man, to rob a poor girl like me of the rope, which is our only chance of safety."

"Save him, save him," Agnese once more pleaded, as she saw her sister's hesitation.

But it needed not the urging. The large noble portion of her nature had conquered the little inferior part. May put the rope in Squire Netterville's hand, saying:

"Place yourself in the basket, and hold fast the rope—it is your only chance."

"I cannot," said the squire; "my arm is useless. I put out the shoulder in climbing this accursed rock."

"This then is the secret of your submissiveness," thought May. But she said nothing, merely passing the rope round the waist of her enemy, and securing him as well as she could to the basket.

"Save yourself, also, dearest Grace," cried Agnese. "Indeed, I am not afraid to stay alone."

"No, dear child, we will live or die together," said May, folding her arms round her sister, and giving the preconcerted signal for the hoisting of the rope.

Up went the basket directly, and a shout of execration hailed the appearance of the squire overhead; but May Netterville heard it not. With her blind sister bound tightly to her bosom, one hand yet clasping her for greater security, while the other grasped the stone cross of the altar, all her energies of soul and body were concentrated in the effort to preserve herself and her precious charge from being swept away by the breakers. Quicker and stronger every minute they came dashing over her; one had scarcely retired, before another, yet more terrible, leaped into its place, threatening to bury her beneath its waters; and scarcely able to breathe, half drowned, half blind beneath the merciless showers of spray, her bodily power was rapidly failing, and even her high courage almost exhausted, when something dark passed through the air, and the rope and the basket lay at her feet. Too late, too late—all her strength was gone; sight and sense had nearly failed her; the hand that grasped the cross fell powerless at her side; and the next wave would have borne her far from her rock of refuge, had not a strong arm been thrown around her and a strong hand bound her and her half-dead sister to the basket; and when next May Netterville opened her eyes, she found herself lying on the rocks, from whence she had descended only half an hour before. With the exception of one old woman, busily occupied in the care of Agnese, there seemed no one near her. May felt as if she had been in a terrible dream.

"Daniel, Daniel!" she cried, sitting up, and trying to recall her scattered senses. "Surely, Daniel was with us among the waters."

"To be sure he was—to be sure he was," cried Daniel, darting from behind the rocks, which had kept him out of sight, and crying and laughing both at the same time, in the excess of his delight at once more hearing her speak. "And did you think, a-lanna, that poor Daniel was going to let you be drowned, for the sake of the precious old rogue you sent us up in the basket?"

"Hush! hush!" said May, something like a smile playing round her own pale lips, while she took her still insensible sister from the arms of old Moya. "But I thank God you are safe, Daniel. I never should have felt happy again, if you had lost your life in my service."

"Now, may heaven's blessin' be upon you for that very word, Miss May," said the poor fellow, gratefully. "And never think, a-chorra, that I risked your precious life by puttin' my clumsy self in the basket along wid ye. No, no; I knew better nor that, I hope. Manners, says I to myself; Mither Daniel, ladies first, iv you please. So with that I made the rope tight round your own purty little waist; and sneck like an oyster to the rock, whilst they were hoisting yez up."

"I am, indeed, most grateful for your generous devotion," murmured May, still speaking and feeling like one in a dream, so completely had her strength been exhausted in the struggle.

"May I never sin, Miss May, if I didn't think the good people had been at some of their tricks, when, instead of the sweet little dove that went down in the basket, I seed the ugly old squire, lookin' for the world like a carcumvinted magpie half drowned in its nest.

"The squire! the squire!" cried May, springing to her feet, as all the particulars of her adventure now flashed on her memory.

"Ah! now you look like yourself again, Miss May; so I may venture to tell you, I'm afeard there'll be wild work among the smugglers this mornin'. It seems Squire Netterville has been a huntin' some of them for croppies these six months, so they swore they would spoil his sport for the future. And troth," continued Daniel, not looking, it must be confessed, much distressed at the prospect, "it's like enough they'll be as good as their word, for Shane iv the Lift Hand is among them, and he fears neither man or devil, when he has a mind for a bit of revinge."

"Good God, Daniel! and whither have they brought him?"

"Down yonder to the Dead Man's Cave, Miss May; and a bad place it is; and many a bad deed it has seen; and not the least, either, I'm thinkin', for Shane is a terrible man for a bit iv revinge; and he says the squire swore three of his sons to the gallows for rebels; and —. But where are you startin' off to in such a hurry, Miss May?"

"To prevent murder, to be sure," cried May. "Run, Daniel, to my uncle, and bring him hither directly. Moya, stay with the child—or rather take her to my grandmother's. And you, Daniel, run for your very life."

And having rapidly given these directions, May Netterville darted off like lightning in the direction of the Dead Man's Cave. She was not a minute too soon. By the light of a torch which one of the smugglers held in his hand, she beheld her unhappy uncle, bound hand and foot to a projecting portion of the rock, and gagged so tightly to prevent him from screaming, that his face was completely distorted, and his eyes almost starting from his head by the pressure. The smugglers were crowding fiercely round him, with many a muttered threat and half-suppressed execration; and a vessel full of tar, and a great heap of feathers, too plainly proclaimed the terrible fate in store for him. As she entered the cave, the quick eye of May Netterville took in all this at a glance; and without bestowing a thought on her own safety, or the risk she was running, she passed right through the crowd, and interposed her slight form between them and their victim.

"What are you about, my men," she cried. "Would you commit murder?"

"We would give to the duoul his own," said Left-hand Shane, eyeing the squire with savage malignity.

"Then you should give your own necks to the hangman," retorted May, fearlessly. "Think you not the whole country would rise to avenge such an outrage as this?"

"The whole country would belie its own thoughts and feelings, then," muttered Shane. "From the young girl, who, they say, is still to the fore, to step into his shoes, down to the poorest craythur on the estate, not a man, woman, or child that wouldn't dance with joy over the renegade's grave."

"Now, at least, you lie, man," said May, drawing her slight form to its utmost height, and looking proudly on the wondering men. "For I am the young girl of whose will you prate so freely; and I swear to you, if you do this deed, I will pursue you to the gallows. Yes; though the broad lands of Netterville were to be sold for the money."

"You talk big, Miss Netterville," said Shane, a shade of respect unconsciously mingling with his former manner; "but you forget that you also are in our power."

"I do not forget it," said May; "you shall kill me before you touch one hair of his head; and see if the country will be as lenient upon you for the murder of the niece as for that of the uncle. Now, man, come on! You may tar and feather us both together if you will."

And in her lofty self-forgetfulness, May actually flung her arms round the neck of the man, from whose touch she would, at any other time, have recoiled with as much loathing as she would have done from that of a serpent.

"Miss Netterville," said Shane, impatiently, "I mane you no harm, but I have sworn to have the life of this man; and by the dark duoul I will have it; so staud back iv you value your own."

Miss Netterville, however, stirred not an inch.

"Work your will, if you list," she contented herself with saying, "but it must be upon us both."

The smuggler's brow grew dark, and he seized her with no gentle hand.

"Loose him," he cried; "loose him; or by all the powers above and below, I'll do ye a mischief."

But still May clung closely to her uncle, uttering scream after scream, in hopes of bringing some one to her aid.

"Hould yer tongue, will ye, or shall I make ye?" said the savage, fumbling in his pocket as if for a knife. Happily, one of the others now interfered by catching hold of his arm, and saying:

"No, no, Shane! For the ould one it's all fair enough. He's a spy and a thraytor, and desarin' his doom. But you shan't touch the young one with my good will."

"Nor with mine," "Nor mine," echoed several voices among the men, many of whom knew May by sight, although not by name, and loved her for her good and gentle deeds among the poor.

"Shan't I though?" cried Shane, dropping May's arm and turning round upon his new opponents. "Dhar-a-loursa! and who is to prevent me, I wonder?"

"He who would avenge her," said a voice at his elbow. The smuggler turned with something like fear depicted in his bold countenance, and met the eyes of Father Netterville gazing sadly upon him. "My children," continued the good man, looking slowly round, and recognizing many of his own flock in the fierce-looking group before him—"what are you about, my children? Is it to see you commit deeds like this one that I have labored among you for so many years?"

"Sure, yer riverence, he dhrew it upon himself," said one of the men, in an exculpatory tone, while others hung back, apparently fearful and ashamed at the rebuke of their priest. "What is he on the island for, at all at all, the black villian, iv it isn't as a spy and a thraytor?"

"Vengeance is mine saith the Lord, and I will repay it," shouted Father Netterville; "and who are you, my children," he continued more mildly, "that you should usurp the privileges He has reserved for Himself? or is His arm shortened, or His eye no longer upon you, that you dare to take His deed upon yourselves?"

"'Tis a sifl-definee, and not a vingeance," said Shane, speaking for the first time since the priest had entered the cavern. "For by the gonnies, if we let him off now, he's have a hempen cravat for some of our necks afore another blisshed month is over our heads."

"It is written," said the father, sternly, "thou shalt do no murder. Loose him, May," he continued, untwining his niece's arm gently from around the pale victim's form—"if he were ten times a spy, he shall go forth in safety from this cave;" and picking up Shane's own knife, which he had dropped upon the floor, Father Netterville deliberately cut the intended victim's bands, and loosed the gag which had all but choked him.

As he did so the features of the squire assumed their natural appearance; his senses, almost banished by pain and fear, gradually returned; and he looked long and steadily on the face of his deliverer. Father Netterville returned his troubled gaze, and for the first time for many years brother looked on brother, until, like a second Joseph, the memory of the Christian priest seemed to leap over years of injury and ill-deeds; his heart yearned towards the companion of his childhood, and falling on his neck, he wept over him with a loud voice.

"Brother forgive me," murmured the squire, in an articulate voice.

"My son, my brother, you are forgiven," said the father; and then he lifted up his face, still wet with his tears, towards that crowd that now pressed around him, all their fiercer passions lulled into sympathy for one whose saintly deeds had won their love, full as much as his saintly character had commanded their respect.

"My children, you must let this man go free. I will answer for him, that he will intrude upon you no more."

"We will, your riverence—for your riverence's sako he is free."

"Not for mine," said the priest, reverentially uncovering his head, "but let it be for His who died for him and for us all."

Involuntarily the men lifted their hats. Bold and lawless as they were, and wrought, by ill-usage, to many an evil deed, they were not merely susceptible of generous impulses in themselves, but deeply capable of appreciating it in others. And in their reverence for Father Netterville, as a minister of God, and yet more in their admiration of the meek forgiveness of the life-long injuries inflicted on him by his brother, there was not one among them, with the exception of Left-handed Shane himself, who would not now have risked his life in defence of the very man whom five minutes before they were intent upon torturing to the most hideous of deaths.

Father Netterville read their altered feelings at a glance; but there was something in Shane's eye which convinced him he was not to be so easily persuaded or convinced.

"In the name of Him who pardoned His enemies with His dying breath, I thank you, my children. But you have a right to demand every security in my power to offer, and therefore he shall swear."

"Swear!" echoed Shane, with a most disdainful movement of the upper lip—"his oath!—the man who swore away his brother's life and lands—poh!"

Father Netterville sighed—it was indeed vain to put trust in the renegade's oath. He thought of another and a better security.

"How did you bring him hither?"

"Blindfolded," said Shane. "We wouldn't trust the renegade even in his grave."

"Then bind his eyes again," said Father Netterville, "and I swear to you he shall not look upon the light again until he opens them in his mother's chamber. To the bedside of a dying parent you will surely believe that he would not willingly bring strife and bloodshed."

May undid the kerchief from her neck, but Shane snatched it rudely from her, and bound it so tightly round the eyes of Squire Netterville, that he uttered an involuntary expression of pain. "Curse ye!" Shane fiercely muttered below his breath, "it is better than the cravat you twisted round the necks of my brave boys." Father Netterville overheard the words, and unwilling to try the temper of such a man much longer, he took the arm of his brother, and led him from among them. "Whither do you bring me?" said the squire hoarsely.

"To the bedside of our mother. I would have her bless you, my brother, before she departs."

Squire Netterville shuddered, and suffered his brother to lead him forward in silence. The Dead Man's Cave communicated by an underground passage with one in which Father Netterville had found a temporary home for himself and his mother; and through this he now led the squire; but he paused at the further end of the gallery, and said to May, "Stay you here, my child, and watch him, while I go in and prepare my mother."

The squire seemed struggling with some terrible apprehensions. "Do not go in, brother! do not go in!" he cried vehemently.

"And wherefore not? I will be with you in a moment," said the priest, mildly; and gently disengaging himself from his brother's detaining hand, he proceeded at once into the recesses of the further cavern. A wild shout from their depths instantly succeeded his disappearance. May uttered an exclamation of horror, and darted after him like an arrow; and tearing the bandage off his eyes, the squire followed in her footsteps, just in time to behold his brother seized and handcuffed by a party of soldiery under the command of one whose name is yet held in execration by the Irish peasantry, as that of a man altogether reckless of human life, and under the specious pretext of martial law, steeped to the eyes in the blood of the guiltless as well as the guilty.

"You have done this," cried May, turning round upon Squire Netterville with a flashing eye and quivering lip.

"Brother," faltered the unhappy man, "as God sees me, I knew not that you were my brother. It was only by a conversation I overheard this morning in the cave, that I learned I had a mother and a brother yet existing. I thought you had perished long ago."

"My son, my brother, I do believe you," said Father Netterville mildly.

But May looked fiercely incredulous.

"Save him, then," she said, "if you would have us believe you innocent of his blood. You have brought these men hither—you can send them away again, I suppose, if you will."

"Your pardon, madam," said the officer coldly. Mr. Netterville certainly gave information of a croppy priest lurking in these caves, who, some months ago, had been openly seen with a party of armed rebels, but there his duty ceased. I alone am in authority here."

Father Netterville might easily have brought witnesses to prove that he had been among the rebels only to induce them to disperse quietly to their homes; but he was silent, for he knew the man he had to deal with, and felt that any one speaking in his favor was more likely to be hanged as a rebel than heard as a witness. In his fear of compromising others, he even congratulated himself upon having, previously to his visit to the Dead Man's Cave, sent his faithful Daniel on a message to the dying Norrisheen, which would insure his absence for at least an hour longer, so fearfully uncertain was life and liberty in the days when martial law held sway over the land.

"My uncle is neither a rebel nor a croppy," said May, proudly, in answer to the officer's last insinuation.

"We shall that, presently, madam," said the officer; "martial law is a great enlightener in these intricate cases. Mr. Netterville, will you kindly lead the young lady hence? Justice is a hard-hearted dame, and loves not the presence of the young and lovely at her counsels; and besides," he added, with a bitter sneer, "I would spare your feelings also the hard task of bearing witness against a brother."

May cast a troubled look upon the speaker: there was something in his face which made her tremble, and, weeping bitterly, she threw herself at the feet of Father Netterville. He also read his doom upon that darkling brow, but, faithful to the principle which had guided him through life, he prepared to meet his impending fate in the same spirit of simple firmness with which he would have accomplished any other duty arising from his mission among a suspected and much persecuted people; and when he spoke again, his voice was as calm and soothing as though he did not know that the hand of violence was about to hush its accents forever.

"Grieve not, my child, for I am innocent of all rebellion; take your uncle to my mother, but say nothing to her of all this; it would only give her causeless sorrow."

May caught hold of his hands, and deluged them with her tears.

"My uncle, my father," she whispered, "give me your blessing."

"May heaven bless you, my own—my only one!" he answered, laying his hands in solemn benediction on her head, and then stooping down, he gently kissed her brow. Well he knew it was his final blessing—his last farewell to the child of his life-long love and care. "And now," he added, placing her reluctant hand in that of her less worthy relative, "lead him to my mother. Brother, farewell! you are forgiven."

May rose from her knees; she dreamed not of the instant death awaiting the priest, but the squire knew it well! and he saw, by the emphasis laid upon the word "forgiven," that his brother knew it also.

In that terrible moment, shame, remorse and horror were all busy at his heart, so choking him and paralyzing all his powers that he could neither ask forgiveness of his victim, nor yet return the embrace in which it was imparted; cold, silent, and despairing, he turned from the brother whom, unconsciously, but surely, he had pursued to the death, and followed the footsteps of his niece, looking, feeling and moving all the while like one under the influence of a horrible nightmare. May laid her hand upon the curtain which separated her mother's chamber from the outer passage of the cave, and he would have stepped beneath it had she not stopped and laid her hand on his arm. Mechanically he paused, and looked upon her, but it was with eyes which had lost all consciousness of her presence.

"John Netterville," said May, with a kindling eye and heightened color, "you have come hither to-day as a spy on the life and liberty of the best and gentlest being upon earth—the nearest and dearest you left for me to love. Long ago you drove my father and my mother from their home and their own country—one to perish on a field of blood, the other to die in sorrow and in want; me you have beaten, as you would have beaten the very hound at your feet; and for all these things I have twice this day given you back your life. All I ask of you in return," she added, in softer, milder accents than she had used in the beginning, "is, that the last half of your life may be spent in weeping for the first."

John Netterville listened to her at first with the same lachrymose eyes and vacant stare, but, as she proceeded, his consciousness gradually returned; convulsion after convulsion shook his frame; he tried to speak, but could not; the wondering girl was about to go and fetch him some water, but he caught her by the arm, staggering, as he did so, like a wounded man. Just then a hand from within drew aside the curtain, and the tall, wasted form of a woman appeared at the opening, gazing silently upon him.

"Mother, forgive me," burst from his lips, and he fell on his knees.

The dying woman moved her bloodless lips; she was about to speak, when a confused sound of voices and footsteps was heard from without—then there was an ominous pause—then a frightfully prolonged scream,—and then old Moya rushed into the cavern, exclaiming:

"Gracious God! they have murdered his riverence."

"Oh, curse him not—curse him not," cried May, terrified at the expression of the mother's face; "bless him, mother, before you go."

The dying woman opened wide her arms: "May God forgive as I do—my son, God bless thee."

John Netterville caught her to his bosom; but the mother's heart was broken—she was dead before she had touched his shoulder.

The prayer of Agnese had been heard in heaven—the sacrifice accepted in its utmost rigor.

Father Netterville, the good and kind, was dead. The shepherd had laid down his life for his flock, and the mother had departed in sorrow to her tomb; the price was paid—the prodigal was won—and John Netterville wept over her corpse—a penitent indeed!

CHAPTER VI.

"THERE it is again," said Agnese, as out of the confusion of sounds in the street below, the Hymn of the Blessed Sacrament came faintly to her ear. "Look out from the balcony, dearest Grace, and tell me if He is coming this way."

The Little Spouse of the Blessed Sacrament was laid upon a light couch, placed sufficiently near the open window to admit the visit of the soft summer breeze on her fevered brow. A loose white dressing-gown was wrapt around her, for she had been very ill, and even now the color on her cheek was all too bright for health, and the lustre of her eyes too dazzling. May Netterville, who never left her night or day, was seated at her side, and Lady Oranmore—sorrow in her heart, and tears, which she vainly struggled to repress, often starting to her eyes—was standing in the very same balcony, from whence, just one year before, she had looked down on the illuminated street, and the holy procession, and the fair child now visibly dying beneath her eyes; passing, she could not but feel, from earth to heaven, and going gently, sweetly, almost imperceptibly to the bosom of that God whose path she had so often, and so lovingly followed upon earth.

It seemed as if she were indeed a child of especial predilection, and as if God had resolved upon granting even the smallest of her wishes, before complying with the chiefest of them all in calling her to Himself. She had prayed to revisit Italy; and they had brought her to die amongst its flowers. She had mourned for the dear familiar faces of her childhood; and now half as a mother, half as a nurse, the kind old Benita was ever at her side, while not a day passed without a visit from Francesco, and many a sweet and loving word from him concerning that sacrament of love which formed the bond of union between the heart of the old man and the poor blind child. What more was wanting for the happiness of Agnese? Yes; one thing more to fill her cup to overflowing—one thing more without which the contents of that cup would have lost their sweetness to her lips; and so that one thing more was granted. He who gave to her the creatures of her love would not deny Himself, whom she loved almost to the exclusion of His creatures; therefore, upon the feast of Corpus Christi, just one week before the period of which our present chapter opens, He Himself, in her first communion, had allowed her, by her own experience, "to taste and see that the Lord is sweet."

From that moment May Netterville fancied she could perceive more of heaven and less of earth about her dying sister. Each day she spoke less often, and every time she spoke her voice seemed to have a greater sweetness in it. Each day she grew more recollected in herself and more absorbed, or rather, I should say, more forgetful of herself, and more recollected and absorbed in Him, who seemed to have chosen not merely this young spirit, but the very form in which it was enshrined, for the especial temple of His presence. And each day something more of reverence seemed to mingle with May's love for the dying child, and she would sit for hours beside her, stilling the regrets of her own loving heart, and resolutely putting back the prayer that, in spite of herself, would sometimes rise to her lips for the averting of a fate which yet she also felt to be less a death than a passing away from one life to another—from the life of loving expectation to that of certain and intense fruition. These thoughts were in her mind just now, as, with a half-finished wreath of white roses in her hands, she sat waiting the arrival of Francesco, who had promised to come and carry Agnese to Lady Oranmore's carriage. It was the first time she had been in the open air since she made her first communion, and, indeed, it was only by reiterated entreaties she had won the unwilling consent of her grandmother to be present at the evening benediction in the Church of the Blessed Sacrament.

The doctors had been appealed to, but they only shrugged their shoulders; it was evident they thought her past hope or cure; and so at last Lady Oranmore yielded, partly because she could deny nothing to her darling, and partly because she felt a kind of necessity in her own heart for revisiting the church where, just one year before, she had discovered Agnese. Besides, she knew it to be the eve of the feast of the Sacred Heart, when we celebrate Christ's love for man; and possibly she might have indulged the vague hope that in this church God would give back to her prayers the treasure which, in this church, He had vouchsafed to her entreaties; perhaps even she felt that she had need to ask forgiveness for her faithless attempt to warp the conscience of the guileless being, whom, in mercy to her sorrow, He had then confided to her keeping.

She could not think of it now without remorse, only softened by the feeling that, from the hour in which she had given May Netterville a promise to that effect, she had never interfered with the religion of Agnese. In truth, she needed all the consolation which this thought could yield her, to enable her to look with calmness on the dying child, as she lay, day-after day, on her little couch—calm, still, and pale; her hands folded meekly on her bosom, and deprived by her blindness of the amusements and distractions of other invalids. To Lady Oranmore's fancy this state of compelled inaction added to the sufferings of Agnese, yet it was not so in reality, for her heart and soul were so constantly with Jesus in the sacrament of His love, that Magdalen, at His very feet, could hardly have felt less need of external occupation. Such was her meditation and such her attitude at the present moment; but after she had lain a little while quite still and silent, her eyes closed, and the bright color coming up into her face, as the soft strains of the hymn rose louder, she whispered to her sister:

"It is louder now, dear Grace. Look out from the balcony, and tell me if He is not coming this way."

"No," answered May. "I see not the procession, but yet it must be coming; the voices are distinct. There, now, it has turned the corner; and—but, holy Mother of God! what a sight to see!" she cried, suddenly interrupting herself, and falling on her knees in the open balcony.

It was, indeed, as she said, a sight to see. She was looking down upon a large square, full of buyers, sellers, idlers, animals, carriages, ludicrous exhibitions and spectacles of all kinds. The Neapolitans, who almost live in the open air, were all in their open stalls, pursuing their several occupations, and knocking, hammering, shaving, weaving, filing, and planing; water vendors were preparing their beverage; fishwomen selling their fish; housekeepers cooking their dinners—fish, chicken and macaroni; and all the members of this vast assembly were screaming at the very top of their voices when the procession of the Blessed Sacrament entered the square.

Then, as if by magic, every voice was mute, every hat was doffed, every craft abandoned. The fishwomen ceased to sell, the housekeeper to cook, the showman to display his wares, the jester even to crack his jokes; and every creature of those busy thousands was on his knees, awed into silence and the hush of prayer. Grace Netterville well might pronounce it "a sight to see." She did not look round again until some few minutes after the procession had passed from beneath the balcony, and when she did so, the square had resumed its usual appearance—business and folly being once more mingled together as the order of the day.

"In truth it is wonderful," she said, half aloud; "the faith of this people, and their devotion."

"And which of them will be the better for it?" replied Lady Oranmore coldly, for she sometimes sought a false peace of mind in contending, against her conscience, with the religion of her grandchildren. "Which of them will cheat the less, or gamble the less, for all this display of devotion which seems so admirable to you?"

"Many, I should hope," said May, "But if it were only one, how often has Jesus preached to the crowd in Judea, and been contented by the conversion of one single individual! Zaccheus, for instance, the sole penitent in the crowd which left Jericho to meet Him; Matthew, called to His especial service from amid the multitude that yet were employed in glorifying God; and Magdalen, for we read of none but her converted at the supper of Simeon."

"It is true," retorted Lady Oranmore, "only one convert is particularly mentioned in each of these instances, yet it does not follow that many may not have been secretly drawn towards their Saviour, and converted at the same time, though in a less ostensible and singular manner."

"Well," said May, "admitting it were, indeed, but one in that vast multitude below, He who died for each individual surely would not think the conversion of even one a useless labor. And though it were even not an entire conversion—but only a crime the less—one bargain fairly made—one oath unuttered—one irreverent jest unsaid; surely He who died for every separate sin would not deem that He had been borne through the crowd in vain; and though even (which seems impossible) no single crime had been prevented—no sinner checked in his evil ways, were it but for the comfort of one afflicted heart—for the giving of hope to one despairing soul—for the reminding of one in bodily suffering of all that He had suffered in the body for them, sure He who passed His life in the consolation of His creatures, would not reckon that He had come in vain: and though none of all these things were done, and that it was but a single spark of divine love falling upon a spirit innocent before, but inactive for the want of the high inspiration of His charity, surely, surely, He who came to cast fire upon earth, would not grudge His presence, by which it had been enkindled."

May Netterville paused in her passionate address, and mutually, as if by a single impulse, she and Lady Oranmore cast their eyes upon Agnese. The child was kneeling on the bed, and with her soft eyes closed, her long hair parted smoothly on her forehead, and her white robes flowing round her, she seemed like an answer to the thoughts of each—"Would He grudge it?"

May could not forbear adding, in a whisper:

"Though it were only to visit such a soul as that."

Then, without waiting for an answer, she passed to the bed, and drew her sister gently towards the pillow, saying:

"Lie down, dearest; it is yet a long time to Francesco's hour. Lie down, or you will be weary."

Agnese laid down as she was desired, whispering at the same time, with a heavenly smile upon her countenance:

"Is it not lovely, Grace? And did I not tell you that here the very air was full of Jesus?"

"Yes, indeed!" May answered, in the same subdued voice. "And it is sweet to live in such an atmosphere of love and faith."

"He is everywhere in Italy," returned Agnese; "in the people's hearts, and on their lips, and in the churches; and even in the very streets we meet Him."

"And He is in the hearts of our own home people too, Agnese, if you would but think it," answered May, in a tone as nearly of reproach as she could use towards the gentle creature she so tenderly cherished. "His faith and love are with us also; only we are forced to lock up in our hearts the thoughts which these may prate to every idle air. But you won't believe it."

"Indeed, indeed, I do believe it May; it would be strange if I could doubt it, after all that passed on that terrible day," and Agnese shuddered as she always did whenever she recurred to the day of Father Netterville's murder. Poor child! she had good reason to remember it with horror, for she had been with old Moya at the moment that the latter, entering the cavern unperceived, became an eye-witness of the priest's violent death, which her cries soon revealed to her sightless companion, and the shock had gone far to destroy the little strength yet left Agnese, to contend with the various influences that were drawing her toward the grave.

May Netterville walked to the window—she also could never speak of that fearful event without a shudder, and something more than a shudder of grief and horror; for indignation, in spite of all her efforts to prevent it, would mingle with her feelings; and it cost her many a battle with her proud and passionate nature to still the loathing ever rising within her at the bare recollection of the guilty, yet, as she could not but acknowledge to herself, most repentant brother; and she was yet struggling with the storm which her sister's observation had awakened in her bosom, when a servant entered to tell her of a person asking an interview with her. May was so completely pre-occupied that she could scarcely be said to hear him, although she mechanically followed him to a room, which he indicated by throwing wide the door, and into this she entered without having formed one conjecture as to who or what the person was who desired to see her. He was sitting near the window, his back towards her, and his face buried in both his hands. May was started; something in his attitude was so familiar, that she could not help fancying that she had seen him before; but, as he did not look up, or give any other indication of being aware of her presence, she advanced a few steps towards him in hopes of arousing his attention. Far from having this effect, however, the sound of her footsteps seemed to shrink him yet more completely into himself, and he bowed himself down until his brow rested upon the table, as if thus he hoped more entirely to conceal his identity from her. May began to feel exceedingly awkward.

"You sent for me, sir?" she said, at last, in English, a secret instinct seeming to tell her that the man before her was not Italian. Something very like a shudder passed over the stranger's frame; but he made no answer.

"Pardon me, sir," continued May, with a little impatience in her voice and manner: "I would not hurry you if I could help it, but I have left the bedside of a dying sister to attend your summons."

"Believe me, I would not idly have intruded upon your sorrow."

"John Netterville!" cried May, recoiling a step in amazement, as the stranger, in saying these few words, stood up and removed his hands from his face.

"I knew you must loathe me; I knew you must detest and hold me in abhorrence; but I almost hoped you would forgive me," said that unhappy man, in a tone of despair; and sitting down again, he passed his hands once more over his eyes, as if to shut out his niece's involuntary look of disgust.

For one moment May was tempted to leave the room in contemptuous silence; and then she had to struggle hard against the proud and angry spirit which prompted her to pour out a torrent of stinging reproaches on the fratricide. But she thought upon Him who but a few minutes before had passed beneath her eyes, preaching peace and mercy and pardon unto men, and she checked the movement. She remembered how He from the very cross had pardoned all His enemies. His "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," seemed to ring in her ears, and she resolved that she also would pardon, and not coldly or by halves, but fully, generously, and without conditions, even as He had done when He said to the repentant thief: "This day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise;" and, promptly answering to the inspiration, she flung her arms around her uncle's neck, exclaiming:

"I will forgive you—I do forgive you; and I pray you to pardon me, for I have been very guilty in my thoughts of you."

John Netterville made no reply. This very unexpected answer to his appeal roused all of good and human feeling that yet lived within him, and, completely thrown off his guard by the suddenness of his niece's movement, he burst into tears.

"Oh, hush, hush," cried May, kneeling down beside him, and unconsciously kissing his hand, so moved was she to behold that strong man sobbing like a child. "Do not weep so sadly: I pray you not to weep so sadly. He is happy; they are happy—they are praying for us even now; and the love which on earth they felt for us both, they are at this very moment communicating to us for each other. Is it not so, dear uncle? for do I not begin to feel that you are my father's brother? and do you not likewise feel that I am your brother's child?"

"I feel that you are an angel of pity and of peace to me—I who have sinned so deeply against you. Yes, even more against you than against any other, although you are too generous to reproach me with the ill-treatment."

Unconsciously May put her hand to her forehead. There was still a slight scar upon her brow. The squire had made good his threat—she felt she should carry his mark to her dying day.

"To lift my hands against a woman! and my own niece, too! But I did not know then who you were, and, without doubt, God permitted my ignorance, in order to make me more fully the instrument of my own chastisement. Not until long afterwards, when I heard you to speak to Daniel in the cavern, did I know that you, or he, or my mother," he added, almost convulsively, "were yet in existence. From the hour when my own wickedness drove them from their home, I had no communication with them, or with any other member of my family."

"But why were you there at all?" asked May, suddenly yielding to a curiosity she had often felt upon the subject of the squire's presence in the chapel cave "Why were you there? for you sent the soldiers to the other cave."

"Both were to have been occupied; but the sea ran so high they were afraid of entering the one into which I, more prompt in wickedness, had run my boat an hour or two before; they managed, however, to make good their entrance into the other, and, in exploring it, they came upon the secret passage, by which it communicated with the Dead Man's Cave, of which I myself was not aware."

"But when you discovered who he was, of whom you were in pursuit, why did you not warn him of his danger?"

"I knew it was too late. The whole island was surrounded, and the affair had been put into the hands of a man who, as you saw yourself, knew not what it was to pardon or to pity. Still I shuddered to appear as the murderer of my brother, and so I thought I would linger in the Mass cavern until all was over. In my horror and agitation, I quite forgot the spring-tide, and when I did remember, it was too late—my boat had disappeared, taken, probably, by some of the people in the hurry of departure, and as a last hope of safety I climbed the altar; but I put out my shoulder in doing so."

May Netterville groaned; the whole scene of that woful day passed so vividly before her imagination that all her old feelings revived, and she withdrew her hand; but remembering Him whose example she was trying to imitate, she repressed the impulse, and once more replaced it in that of her uncle. Slight as had been the movement, he felt it, guessed its meaning, and sighed as he said:

"You forgive me, May, because it is your duty, but you do not, you cannot love me; no one will ever love me any more."

"Do not say so—indeed, indeed, I will love you," May answered earnestly; "and there are others who will love you better: you have a wife, a child."

"No," said the squire, groaning "she is dead, and the child has learned to shudder at the sight of his guilty father."

"Dead! Good God!" cried May, "I never saw her; but they told me she was so young and so fair."

"And she was both young and very fair. And God is my witness that I loved her truly, and she loved me also until that fatal day. Oh, my God! May Netterville, how I have been punished; and how He has made my crime to be my chastisement! The brother whom I murdered, not because I hated him, but because I hated the religion of which he was a minister. And I hated it, May, now I must confess it, only because of its just denunciations against those who deserted from its holiness and truth. And the mother whose heart I have broken. And now, at last, my wife, the mother of my only child—oh, that was the worst of all! To know that I was loathed by one who had so loved me—that she now shrank from my caresses, who used to smile so brightly at the very hearing of my footsteps—to see her grow pale, and languid, and lifeless in the untold horrors of her soul—to feel she was withering away in the poisonous atmosphere of my guilt; and, at last, to watch her dying, and not in my arms—for even in the death agony I saw her struggle with the terror which the very touch of the fratricide imparted, and I would not add to the anguish of that hour; so she died in peace, believing herself alone; little dreaming of the guilty wretch who lay gasping on the floor of her chamber, and who would gladly—how gladly!—have exchanged places with any one of the victims of his crimes."

"And the child, the poor child!" cried May, wringing her uncle's hands in her strong sympathy with his woe.

"It was all the same—he had marked his mother's brow grow pale as I looked upon her, and her voice to quiver as she answered my inquiries, and so he learned to do the like! And unused as he is to tears, and almost too old for them (for the boy is nearly ten years of age) he almost screamed himself into fits when I took leave of him over the grave of his mother." May thought the agitation of the father, and the place which he had chosen for their parting scene, might have had something to say to his terror, and she ventured to suggest it to her uncle; but he only shook his head.

"The mother's mantle has fallen upon the child—my son fears and hates me. But it is no matter, for I shall never see him more. To-morrow I enter a convent of the Camaldolesi, and the rest of my days will be spent in complying with your request, May. The last half of my life will be spent in weeping over the first."

"Then you have abandoned your child."

"No, May Netterville. I have not abandoned, I have but left him in better hands—I have confided him to you."

"To me?" said the wondering May.

"See here," said the squire, "is a document signed by me, in which, under age as you are yourself, I have given to you the entire guardianship of my child. No one but myself has a right to interfere with your authority, and that right I resign entirely to you; and here is another deed, securing to you the whole Netterville estates, to which I have no real claim. I have assigned you a guardian, because such was needful in the eye of the law; but he has promised to interfere in nothing, and to leave you as much mistress of your property as if he were not in existence."

"I am young for such a charge," said May, unconsciously speaking her thoughts aloud.

"You are young in years, but if I have read your soul aright you will do your duty nobly. Take this paper, which will make you but mistress of your own. I have reserved nothing for my son—he is a beggar on the face of the earth, as the child of a bloodstained renegade should be."

"I cannot accept of it—it is impossible," said May, resolutely; "however much I may admire such repentance, I cannot consent to be a gainer by it."

"You cannot help yourself," said her uncle. "This is but a copy—the original deed is in the hands of the lawyers who drew it up."

"But surely," remonstrated May, "you have no right to will away from your son, however the property was obtained. He is now your heir."

"I have every right—the property is not entailed; and this is but an act of simple justice. Think you such ill-gotten wealth would prosper my child? Believe me, it is only by removing it from him that I hope to free him from that terrible judgment which avenges the crime of the parents on the children, even to the third and fourth generations. And now, daughter and niece of my murdered brethren, let me hear you say once more that you forgive me!"

This time May murmured her pardon through tears of real tenderness and pity—it may be even of admiration for the heroism of soul which thus proportioned its penitence to the greatness of its crimes. Earnestly, also, she promised love and protection to her little cousin; and the unhappy man, having once more wrung her hand, abruptly quitted the apartment.

For a few seconds after his departure May stood like a statue, revolving the past and future in her soul. In these few seconds her prompt and energetic mind had seized upon all the bearings of her position, and laid down the whole plan of her future life—the education of her cousin in the religion of his forefathers—the resignation of the property into his hands as soon as he had arrived at years of discretion, and her own subsequent entire renunciation of, and retirement from, the world. How well and religiously she adhered to that plan it is easy to conceive; for hers was peculiarly one of those happy characters with whom to will and to do is almost one and the same thing. While still rapt in deep thought, she left the room, walked to that occupied by Agnese, placed the packet received from the squire in Lady Oranmore's hands, and said, like one awakening from a dream:

"Grandmamma, you asked me but a minute ago what good He did, when borne in the Blessed Sacrament through the streets below? and now I can answer your question, for my enemy has been here, and I have forgiven him."

"Your enemy, dear May?"

"John Netterville, the murderer of my father and my mother, and of one who was even more than father or than mother unto me."

"John Netterville! and here!"

"He has but this moment left the house."

Lady Oranmore, who knew her grandchild's strong feelings and unyielding will, looked upon her, astonishment mingling with admiration. "Then you have forgiven him! My child, you have acted nobly. Well, I know it was a difficult, almost I had called it an impossible deed."

"It would have been either or both, had I not lately been kneeling before Him in the sacrament of His love. But the recollection of Him and of His abundant forgiveness of His enemies, so softened my heart that the task was easy."

"Now, indeed, dear May," said Lady Oranmore, affectionately embracing her grandchild, "I am willing to confess that He did not walk through the streets in vain."

Agnese started from the sofa, and threw herself at her grandmother's feet. So quick was the movement, there was no time either to foresee or prevent it.

"Oh, grandmamma, you believe in His eucharistic reality—you say Him! Then you will belong to the Church where only He is to be found in the sacrament of His love?"

"I do—I will, my precious one," whispered Lady Oranmore, clasping Agnese to her bosom and weeping like a child.

May saw that the effort had been too much for Agnese; so she gently untwined Lady Oranmore's arms from around her, and laid her on the couch.

"Go you with her to the church," whispered Lady Oranmore; "I will follow soon; at present I would be alone."

She left the room, and there was a long pause, during which May hung anxiously over her pale sister.

"May," whispered the latter, as soon as she had breath to speak, "you have made her a Catholic."

But May shook her head.

"I think, dear Agnese, you have done more with your quiet love, than I with my vehement and impetuous nature. I would I knew how you did learn to love Him so!"

"I think I can tell you" said Agnese, hesitating; "at least in part."

"Do, dearest, if it will not weary you; for you are quite as much a mystery to me, with your deep and holy thoughts, as I fear my fiery ones sometimes make me be to you."

"I should like to tell," said Agnese: "it would be a kind of a relief to me, for I have been thinking very much about it this morning, and it almost seems as if my thoughts went back of themselves to things I had nearly forgotten, and to the very beginning of my love for Jesus. I remember the first time I ever thought about it; I was a very little child, and I asked what was my name. Benita said it was Agnese, and that Agnese meant lamb, and that Jesus also was called a lamb; and so, as my name was the name of Jesus, I ought always to try and be resembling to Him. And I asked how that might be; and she said that lambs were gentle creatures, and very meek, and so, therefore, I ought to be meek likewise; and from that time I did try very hard to be meek, and never to make the least movement like impatience; but still I could not help feeling very sad, because people used to call me poor Agnese, and poor blind child, and I knew, therefore, it was a misfortune to be blind; and this made me weep sadly, that I could not see. The children would also talk to me of seeing this or seeing that, and I could not see at all; but I could hear them play, and laugh, and run, around me, and to feel so lonely in the midst of their merry romps, and so sad, that the tears were often in my eyes whether I would or no. Sometimes, also, the little ones who did not know me, came to ask me to join in the games, but the others would check them, and say: 'Hush! that is blind Agnese; she cannot play about as we do; do not remind her of her misfortune.' They did not mean me to hear them; but I could not help doing so. At other times it has happened that ill-natured children have mocked me for the blindness which the others pitied. I could not cry then; it would have been a relief if I could; but I felt too desolate to cry. Still I did not answer them unkindly. I tried rather to be kinder to them than before, for I had not forgotten that Jesus was meek, and that, to be like Him, I must be meek likewise. One day my grandmamma, Benita, said to me: "Agnese, my little one, come with me; I am going to see some nuns, who love the Lamb very much indeed, and who pray night and day before Him." "Do they see Him, grandmamma?" I asked; for I did not then know whether He were visible or invisible to those who had eyes for other things. "They see Him in the Blessed Sacrament, in which He dwells upon our altars, my child," replied Benita. I was very glad to think I should see those who lived with the Lamb, and could tell me what the Lamb was like; and so I went with Benita to the convent where Lady Oranmore took me just before we left Naples. Though I was such a very little child, I remember that first visit just as if it took place yesterday. Benita talked for a long time with the superioress; but I was thinking so much of the Lamb, and so longing to go visit the altar where they always prayed before Him, that I did not much attend to what they were saying. At last one of the nuns asked me if I would come to the church. "Is the Lamb there?" I asked, quite innocently; "because if He is, I should like to go." "Yes, my child, the Lamb is ever on our altar," replied the nun. Directly I heard that, I gave her my hand, and very joyfully accompanied her to the church. When we approached the altar, the air felt very warm; she told it was the immense number of lights burning upon it that made it so; and leading me to the side of one of the adorers of the hour, whispered, 'kneel down, my child, the Lamb is before you, on His altar-throne.' I knelt down—all was so calm, so solemn, and so still, I felt as if I had entered heaven. It was, indeed, as though Jesus Himself was at my side, speaking a new language to my heart, and stealing all His sweetness over it. I did not say anything to Him, or ask anything of Him; I only felt that He was near, and that was joy enough for me. By degrees the quiet happiness grew more quiet, and the calm feeling calmer still; and I suppose, continued Agnese, making evidently a great effort to overcome her reluctance to speak upon the subject, 'I suppose I fell asleep—for all that followed must surely have been a dream. I thought I was still kneeling between His two adorers at the altar—'

"Agnese," interrupted May, "did you think you saw them then?"

"At the moment I thought I did. But it is all now like a vision, the memory of which has passed away, as is so often the case with dreams, and I cannot tell you in the least what they were like. I only remember feeling that I might have thought those figures cut in stone; they were so unbreathing and so still, had not something about them seemed to say that though the bodies were so motionless, the living souls within were wide awake, and full of life bowed down before the 'Holy of holies,' and only silent from intensity of love!"

"Agnese, you must have seen them," cried May; "you describe them to the very life, just as I saw them yesterday at the convent."

Agnese's pale face flushed a little—"I do not know, May, how that could be, as I have said it was all a dream and mystery to me. After I had watched these mute adorers for a few minutes in silence, a lady seemed to stand beside me; I do not know how or from whence she came, but there she was, a lamb in her arms, and her eyes fixed upon me, until I felt their soft, sweet glances penetrate my soul."

"Did you see her, too, Agnese?"

"I cannot tell you, May," replied Agnese, with a little unconsciousness in her voice and manner. "I can only tell you that I felt as if a vision of beauty were at my side; and while I yet knelt in awful admiration, her voice fell on my ear. May! only to hear one tone of a voice like hers would make a paradise of the most desolate heart upon earth."

"And what said the Mother of the Lamb? for surely it was she who showed herself to your sleeping fancies."

"'Namesake of Jesus, what would you have?' It was thus she spoke—and then, as if she had read the instant thought of my heart, she added: 'that you may see? Oh! ask it not. Rather pray that the light may be given to your soul, which has been withheld by infinite wisdom from your body; for though with your corporal vision you might behold His sacramental presence, still it is by the eye of faith, never refused even to the poor blind child, that man is taught to see Him there, as the angels do in heaven, in His divinity and His glorified humanity. Child of sorrow, I am your mother!—the mother of all the children of sorrow, as I am of Him who took their afflictions on Himself all their afflictions. Not a pain of body or of mind that His creatures are given to endure, which He Himself did not first make sacred and consecrate in His own person. For in the spirit He was made desolate and full of anguish—and in the body, from the crown of His head to the sole of His foot, the words of the prophecy were accomplished to the full, and there was not a sound spot left about Him—no, not one single spot without its separate and distinct allotment of woe.

"I have told you, May," continued Agnese, "that the voice of the lady was very sweet—so sweet, it was like being in paradise only to sit and hear it. And sweeter and sweeter it seemed to grow as she proceeded—sweeter and sweeter yet. But oh! so sad. And when she spoke about His woe, it moved my very soul to tears, filling and steeping it, as it were, in her own sorrow; and then, for the first time, I came to comprehend how she, like the Blessed One of whom she spoke, kept all the unmingled bitterness of her chalice to herself, giving only of its more soft and soothing sadness to her children. Yet, would you believe it, May?—even at that moment the thought crossed my mind—and a wicked one it was for such a moment—that if He had endured all other woes, He had not taken mine upon Himself! It was but a passing thought, repented of almost as soon as I was conscious of it. But, as before, the lady answered to that thought.

"Yes, Agnese, of Him it may be truly said that He saw and that He saw not. For you and with you He was blind, indeed; and yet, because of you, and even for your very sake, He refused not Himself the faculty of seeing. Blind He was to your sins; blind to all consolations of heaven or earth—closing His eyes even to His divinity—one glance at which would have robbed His cross of its ignominy—His passion of its woe. But blind He was not to those who passed beneath His cross, wagging their heads in cold derision; and He opened them wide and fixed them unshrinkingly on the mangled humanity in which He was atoning for the crimes of the scoffers; nor did He refuse them to look upon His mother. He was, indeed, a very prodigal of His woe—not merely content to drink up the chalice which His Father gave Him, but rather sipping it, as it were, drop by drop, that He might more fully taste and savor all its bitterness; and therefore it was, Agnese, that He would not lose His sight, since by that very sight He could draw suffering to His soul. And now, my child, you need not speak, for I know your thoughts. You will gladly suffer with Jesus and as Jesus wills. Bow down, then, your heart, and bow down your very soul, and receive Him into your arms, and learn of Him, who was not alone a victim—but a willing victim—offered solely because He willed it."

"Dearest May," added Agnese, after a little pause of thoughtful recollection, "she had read my thoughts aright. So I bowed myself down body and soul, and held out my arms and received the Lamb-child, Jesus in them. He did not seem to stay there, but rather to sink into my very heart of hearts, and penetrate it so in sweetness that I felt quite dissolving in love and joy. Tears rushed into my eyes; and though I could not speak, it seemed as if my spirit said to Mary; 'O sweetest lady, leave Him with me thus, and never again will I ask to do aught but suffer.' And Mary answered, with a heavenly gladness in her voice: 'He is yours, Agnese; only try and will as He wills, and believe, never, in joy or in sorrow, will He cease to make His dwelling in your heart.' I awoke, dear May,—quite awoke, when she said these words: for the nun touched me on the shoulder, and we left the chapel. But always since that day He is ever in my heart; and though I do not see Him, I feel Him there. And now, if I could see, I would not see; and if by a miracle my eyes were to be opened to the light, I would close them again, and never open them, if I could help it until

I was in heaven. For I would not willingly look upon thing or creature, however beautiful or however blest, before I had rejoiced in the vision of my God. And I shall see Him soon, dear May—soon, although not quite yet. But soon—very soon—it will be now, as I think and hope."

"Why, Agnese, you surely do not mean to go to heaven and leave us all just yet," said May, trying to laugh through the tears that were choking her.

"I am sure I shall not live long, May. I know well I have been dying ever since I left Naples; only, at first I was dying slow, and now I am dying fast. Do not cry, dearest May—do not cry so sadly."

"How can I help it, when I hear you say such terrible things? So short a time to have had a little sister, and now to lose her. No, no, Agnese, I cannot spare you yet."

Tears came into Agnese's eyes, as she answered: "To leave you, May, is almost my only sorrow: I love so much to feel that you are near me. But, though I leave, I do not lose you, nor you lose me, dear May; for then I shall love you with a double love—the love of the sister who on earth so relied upon your care, and the love of the guardian spirit, who will watch over you from heaven. And, oh! my sister, when I see Him—if I see Him—surely my first thought will be of you—my first petition for you. Never, believe me, never shall I weary of kneeling at His feet, and praying for your welfare."

Agnese looked so beautiful, as she made this promise, that May felt inspired with something of the same heavenly longing so visible on her features. She kissed her brow, and whispered in a tone which had more of exultation than of sadness in it:

"You shall go to Him when He wills it, dear one; only remember to bequeath to me your sweet and loving thoughts of Him, that I may also, for the sake of Jesus, close my eyes to all that is not Jesus, and be to Him, as you have been, a very spouse in the sacrament of His love."

"Ah!" said Agnese, "long ago the children used to call me His spousina; but I never really was so, and I never really felt so until the other day."

"The other day! What do you mean, Agnese?" replied May, struck by the peculiar expression of her sister's countenance.

"I was His spouse," whispered Agnese, "on the day when He came to me in the sacrament of His love, for then I promised to be His and His alone. And I don't mean half His, but wholly and entirely His own; as in life, so to be faithful even unto death. Yes, May," continued the blind child, making a great and evident effort to speak her secret, "I promised Him faithfully—oh! so faithfully—to be His; not only His, a child, but His, a woman. I asked Him, indeed, to take me away directly; but if He chose to leave me here, I said I would live but for His love. So you see that was really my spousal day; and soon He will come and take me to Himself, and then I shall be with Him as His spouse indeed."

"Agnese, but you should not have done this without asking."

"I did not intend it, May; but that instant it seemed as if I were so entirely His own, that it was the most natural thing in the world to do; and then," Agnese added, "it is no great matter, for I shall not live to the trial. He is coming to take me away soon."

"I know not that—I know that!" said May, clinging, as human nature often does, to the expression of a hope which yet it does not feel. "The doctors say there is no disease, and where there is no disease, surely it is impossible not to hope."

"Do not hope, my sister; the doctors do not know how entirely I have offered my life to Him."

"But He may not accept the offering," answered May; "or He may receive it in another sense, giving you now to live, in order that, at a later period, you may consecrate to Him, in very deed, what now you have only given in desire."

"No, May, do not deceive yourself; I feel that He has accepted the offering in the sense and spirit in which I made it; the hand of death is upon me, dearest. It is true I have no disease, but—"

And May long remembered afterwards how the child had unconsciously laid her hand on her heart, in concluding the sentence :

"It is as if He Himself were stealing away my life."

May made no answer ; she was weeping bitterly.

"May," said Agnese, after a silence of some minutes, "what are you doing?"

"Making a wreath of white roses for the novice whose clothing takes place next week at the Convent of the Perpetual Adoration."

"May, could you not make another for her, and give me that one?"

"You shall have it, dearest."

"And May," continued Agnese, feebly, "I wish you would change my dress, and put on me the one I wore when He came to me for the first time." May put aside the roses, which were all besprinkled with her tears ; and she had soon wrapt her sister in the spotless folds of a white muslin wrapping-dress, and parted her soft, shining hair upon her brow, and smoothed the long curls upon either side ; but when was about to crown them with her white roses, Agnese put aside the wreath and said :

"Not just yet, dearest May, wait until He comes to take me away, for then I would be dressed as a bride, indeed, and brides always wears a wreath of flowers, Benita says. Ah ! here is Francesco," she added, with a happy smile, as her ear caught the sound of the old man's footsteps on the corridor without.

* * * *

The poor children lingering near the church of the Blessed Sacrament crowded around Agnese, as Francesco lifted her from the carriage. Many of them had known, and loved, and revered her, even as a poor blind child ; and now, in her better fortunes it was one of Agnese's sweetest pleasures to repay their former kindness by a thousand little generosities, as well as by the tenderest interest in all that concerned them. No wonder, therefore, they now crowded round her, saying to each other, in their great delight at her reappearance among them—"It is Blind Agnese ; how glad I am she is not too weak to come ; and now that she is once in the open air again, our spolina will grow as strong as she was before the foreign lady took her to that cold land, where the sun, she says, never shines so brightly as it shines on us."

"You must pray for me very much to-night, dear little ones," said Agnese, pausing ere she ascended the steps of the church, in order to distribute her presents among them. "These are the last gifts I shall ever bring you."

Francesco took her in his arms, and carried her into the church, for she was too weak to walk so far.

"Where Columba died, there let me pray for the last time," she whispered ; and, in compliance with the wish, the kind old man carried her as nearly as he could to the altar upon which the Blessed Sacrament reposed.

There she knelt down—she would kneel down, she said, as it was for the last time. So May knelt down beside her, and put her arm round her waist. She had grown so feeble, that without this assistance she could not have knelt upright. The service began, and May felt Agnese lean every moment more heavily upon her, as if every moment she lost more and more the power of self-support. Once or twice she whispered—"You are weary, darling ;" but the child did not seem to hear her, and May desisted, for she did not like to disturb her more than was useful. "It is for the last time," thought she, "and so it is no matter." Something, indeed, seemed to say to her that there was no hope, and that the child was dying fast. Suddenly she felt her sinking from her grasp ; it was at the very instant when the Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament was given, and with a calm courage that afterwards seemed strange to her, she put both her arms round the dying child and clasped her tightly to her bosom, until that sweet and solemn blessing had been given. For worlds she would not have deprived Agnese of His benediction at such a moment. When it was over, she made a sign to Francesco, who soon saw how the matter stood, and carried Agnese into the open air.

"Is she dead?" whispered May, turning in her anguish to the old man for comfort.

"No," he replied in the same tone, "but I greatly fear me she is dying."

"What shall I do? The movement of the carriage will kill her outright. Look up, my own darling—for God's sake, look up," said May, sitting down upon the church steps, and receiving her dying sister from Francesco's arms.

"If the signora does not mind," said Francesco, "there is a cottage close at hand, where I live ; it is but a poor place, but I could easily carry her so far."

"Oh, never mind about that," said May, impatiently ; "let us carry her there at once, and then I will go and fetch my grandmother."

Agnese had by this time opened her eyes, and a bright smile passed over her face as she listened to this little conversation.

"Yes, yes," she whispered, "the poorer the better. For He was poor, and had no place whereon to lay His head." She looked yet more pleased when they carried her into the little room, and she heard Francesco saying to her sister :

"The signora must excuse my poverty ; yonder heap of Indian straw is all the bed I have to offer to her sister."

May, however, could not resist a sigh, while she smoothed down the poor couch, and covered it over as well as she could with a velvet mantle which Francesco brought up from the carriage. Upon this they laid Agnese ; but the child looked distressed, and tears rushed into her eyes.

"What is it, my own darling?" asked May, her quick eye detecting in an instant the emotion of her sister.

"He died upon a cross ; and would you have me go to Him on velvet?" whispered the child ; for she had detected in an instant the soft nature of the material upon which she was lying.

To many this might have seemed childlike and of little meaning, but happily May could comprehend the feeling which made this child, who in her life had been so devoted to her divine Lord, anxious to resemble Him even in His death. She made a sign, therefore, to Francesco, and while he once more raised Agnese, she gently removed the velvet mantle, so little in union with the poor bed it covered. The child looked pleased at this new arrangement ; but just as he laid her down again, some other thought appeared to strike her, and she asked in what direction stood the church.

"It is just behind," Francesco answered, wondering a little at the question.

"Dearest May," she said imploringly, "could you not put me the other way, with my face towards the church?"

"For what purpose, dear one? It will only fatigue you, and God knows you are ill and weak enough already."

"To what purpose ! O May, how can you ask ? That I may turn my sightless eyes towards Him, and feel that His are bent lovingly upon me. Thank you, thank you, my own May," she added, as her sister silently re-arranged her pillow in the direction in which she wished it to be placed. "Now, indeed, I feel that I am dying at His feet."

"Will you stay and watch her?" said May, with difficulty suppressing her heavy sobs. "I must go and break this news to her grandmother. I dare not trust it to the servants to acquaint her with such sorrow."

Francesco willingly undertook the office, and May drove back rapidly to Naples. Lady Oranmore listened to her sad story, but she could not bring herself to believe that all would indeed be soon over as was apprehended by May, and the latter had not the heart to argue the matter with her. "She will know it soon enough," thought she ; and while waiting the arrival of the physicians who had been summoned to attend, she left her grandmother, and went and sat down sorrowfully in that room which Agnese had so lately quitted, and which she felt the child would never again enter, except as a corpse. Here the half-finished wreath of roses caught her eye, and remembering the request of Agnese, she took it up, and though her tears fell fast all the while among its flowers, resolutely set to work, and succeeded in completing it before summoned to attend Lady Oranmore and the physicians to the cottage of Francesco. They found the child evidently sinking fast, and one glance at her was sufficient for the medical men, who unaniously declared that she had not an hour to live. This opinion was given to Lady Oranmore in so loud a whisper, that May was certain the child must have heard it, and fearing the effects of so sudden announcement upon her, she turned towards her sister. Agnese was smiling brightly, and May felt she had both heard the fiat, and that the consequences were somewhat different from any which might have been expected in a similar case. She knelt down and kissed her forehead saying, although it seemed so needless to ask the question:

"You are happy, dear one?"

"Yes, dear May," she whispered in return; "but it was not for that I smiled."

"For what was it then, Agnese?"

"I was but smiling to think how they are mistaken, May."

"Do you, then, think you are not dying?" cried May, eagerly; so willing was she to take hope, even from the thoughts of the poor child about herself.

"I am dying, May, but not so fast as they imagine. Tomorrow will be the Feast of the Sacred Heart, and I shall die then, and not before."

May was silent; she felt disappointed, though quite conscious how idle it would have been to have founded any expectations upon the fancies of a dying child. But she checked her rising sobs, for Agnese was speaking once again.

"May, do you remember what you once read for me about Elizabeth?"

"What, dearest?" replied May, vaguely, unable at the moment to think of anything but Agnese herself.

"Why, about all the little singing-birds, that sang so sweetly, so sweetly round her pillow, when she was dying."

"I remember now," said May.

"I do not want them," replied Agnese, with a peculiar expression in her voice. "The Dove is the only bird I would care to have."

"You will soon have your wish," said May, as she now comprehended what Agnese wanted; "Padre Giovanni is at the door; Francesco went for him as soon as I returned."

It needed no long time to arrange the conscientious affairs of the pure-hearted child; and when the assistants were once more admitted into the chamber, the Padre told May to prepare, as well as she could, a temporary altar for the reception of the Blessed Sacrament, which he was about to bring from the church, and administer as a viaticum to her sister. Aided by Francesco, May had soon accomplished this task, lighted a couple of wax candles, and made what other preparations shortness of time and the poverty of the place would admit of. Afterwards she arranged the folds of Agnese's spotless dress, smoothed once more, and for the last time, the shining curls that she loved so well, laid (and this time the child did not withdraw it) the wreath of white roses upon them, and then took her usual place at the pillow of the invalid. Benita also knelt down by her nursing; but Lady Oranmore could not trust herself so near, so she went and sat at the open window. Agnese was now lying as one in a deep sleep, her eyes closed, and her hand folded on her bosom, but May knew well that this stillness, which seemed like slumber, was in truth but the very depth and quiet of her prayer; so she also prayed beside her. For some time the room was wrapped in silence, only broken by the heavy sobs of Lady Oranmore, and even these became fewer and fainter by degrees; for the calmness of those around Agnese seemed to rebuke her less uncomplaining sorrow—something, too, there was in the look and temperature of the evening which carried back her recollections to that of the preceding twelvemonth, soothing even while it deepened her sadness.

Just such a night as the one on which she had first made the acquaintance of Agnese, was this on which she was now to take leave of her forever; and the same Jesus, whom then the child had followed so devoutly, was now coming Himself to visit her in turn. Lady Oranmore dwelt upon this memory until it almost seemed to her as if the visit of her Divine Lord, which, to any other, would have been an act of incomprehensible charity, was more like a deed of justice to this poor child, who so often in her short lifetime had followed in His footsteps. Just as this thought crossed her mind, the hymn of the Blessed Sacrament rose up through the open window, falling, in the midst of the solemn stillness of the hour, upon the hearts of all who heard it like a strain from heaven; an instant afterwards a sweet, low voice had joined itself to the melody. It was not in the streets below, and May instinctively turned down Agnese—it was as she had suspected, the child was singing in an undertone probably quite unconsciously to herself. May was about to check her, fearing the exertion might hasten death; but she thought of the singing birds of St. Elizabeth, and refrained. Francesco now opened the door, and Agnese ceased to sing. "Hush!" she whispered, "He is coming." May thought she looked as if she were already with Him in heaven. The Blessed Sacrament was placed on the temporary altar prepared by May; Lady Oranmore fell on her knees, and her agitation became too great to admit of her attending very closely to the ceremonies which followed. But all was at length concluded, and for a long time after Agnese had received her Divine Lord in the Blessed Sacrament unbroken silence reigned in the apartment. At last the clock struck eleven; May started; she remembered her sister's words, and she felt Agnese press the hand she held in hers. The half-hour struck, and then the quarter. "It is time now," Agnese murmured; "I am going, May. Let me bid my grandmother good-bye." In obedience to this wish, May led her grandmother to the bed. Agnese first embraced the sobbing Benita, then, as Lady Oranmore folded her to her heart, she seemed to collect all her remaining strength to say, as earnestly as she could: "Grandmother, if you would die happy, you must die in the Church which alone can give you Jesus for the comfort of that hour." Lady Oranmore turned away in speechless sorrow, and May bent in her turn over the dying child. "I love you best of all," Agnese whispered, "and so I say to you: Love Him, and Him alone, and never creatures excepting for His sake."

"Never!" answered May firmly, after a moment's thought; and she kept her word.

"May," continued the child, in an almost inarticulate whisper, "had I lived, I should have hoped to serve Him in the Perpetual Adoration.*"

"Pray, dear one, that I may be an adorer in your place."

A bright smile passed over the features of Agnese, and for some time she lay quite still; but again some disquieting thought cast its shadow over the serene beauty of her brow, and she tried to lift her hand towards her head.

"What is it, dearest?" May whispered through her tears.

"His head was crowned with thorns, and shall I die wreathed in flowers!" she said, in a voice barely audible.

"Content you, dear one. There are thorns even among roses."

Agnese thanked her by a smile—such a smile as a seraph might have brought from heaven, and then she unfolded her arms from her bosom, and stretched them out until she lay like one extended on a cross. Her sister thought at first it was only a convulsive movement, and tried to re-fold the arms; but for once the gentle child resisted, and May then knew why she had altered her position; for Agnese whispered—"It was so He died;" and in that attitude, which love alone could have dictated to her heart, she waited for His Hour. How May dreaded the next tolling of the clock! something in her own heart seeming to say it would indeed be the signal for the coming of the Bridegroom. It knelt at last upon her reluctant ear. The feast of the Sacred Heart was come indeed; but for yet a moment longer Agnese lay quite still, her pale face growing brighter and brighter in her celestial joy, until it almost seemed as if a visible light were shedding radiance on her brow. Suddenly she started up—"Francesco!" she cried, in a clear low voice, "The Dove!" Even as she spoke, she extended wide her arms, and opened her eyes; and, oh! the light, the intelligence, the love that filled those once sightless orbs, as she fixed them (so it seemed to the beholders) on some object directly above her. But whether she saw, or what she saw, is a secret only known to herself and to her God, for while yet in that attitude of rapt devotion, without a word, without a sigh, she gave back her pure spirit to Him who had been the object of its ceaseless desires, and her lifeless form sank down upon the pillow, with arms still outstretched to the semblance of that cross upon which He had died for the love of her. The soul of Agnese was with her God, and she was dead!

* The Convent of the Perpetual Adoration. This devotion was intended for the express purpose of repairing the neglect, incredulity, and insult continually offered our Divine Saviour in His Eucharistic presence; and in those convents where it is established, the nuns kneel in rotation, two and two, hour after hour, before the altar, thus realizing (as much as creatures may) our dream of heaven, and emulating in their ceaseless prayer these mysterious creatures, who "rest not night or day," saying, "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty, who was, and who is, and who is to come."

CHAPTER I.

The sun shone brightly through the leaves of the forest; it spread a gleam of light across solitary glens, danced gaily over the little brooks that murmured through the valleys, and lit up many a pleasant nook in beautiful Devon, on the 1st of May 1593. One of its rays, like an angel of charity, penetrated the casement of a cottage situated in the outskirts of the ancient city of Exeter. The stream of light passed across the face of a girl of about fourteen, and rested on the pale, worn countenance of a woman lying on a bed, from which it was evident she was destined never to rise. The eyes of the child had been fixed, with sorrowful earnestness, on the face of her dying mother; but now she rose and drew a curtain across the antique bow-window, to exclude the sunbeam which she feared would fatigue those eyes which were soon to be closed in death.

At that moment the latch of the door was gently raised, and a respectable, kind-looking woman entered.

'How is your mother, Catherine?' said the new-comer.

The poor child raised her tearful eyes to the woman, and with difficulty answered her, saying she feared her dear mother was dying.

Both approached the bedside. The kind neighbor, leaning over the dying woman, said, in a soft tone:

'Can I do anything for you, my good Martha?'

'My daughter! my poor little daughter!' murmured the sufferer. 'Will you, as you promised me last week, see that, when I am dead, she is taken to her father's relations, and that what little I possess shall not be taken from her? It is a long way to Penzance, and you will not let her go alone?'

'Make your mind easy, my good friend. She shall remain with me until I find some trustworthy person to take her to her aunt.'

A smile of content passed over the features of the departing mother. 'May God reward you!' she said. Then, after a moment's silence, she added: 'Now, if I could see the priest.'

In those days it was not easy to find a priest, and Catholics were often deprived in their last hour of the consoling presence of the minister of God; but on the present occasion Catherine knew there was one near.

'I will go for Father Ralph,' she said; 'he is still at Master Andrews', the clothier, where he said Mass last Sunday.' And she hastily left the cottage. In about half an hour she returned, accompanied by a most benevolent-looking person. As he entered the sick woman's room, her whole countenance lighted up with a look of content, almost of happiness. 'Thank God! thank God!' she exclaimed.

All the rites of the Catholic Church were administered to her. Consoling were the words of the charitable priest as he prepared the departing soul to appear before its Creator; and it was touching to see the poor child, so soon to be an orphan, repressing the violence of her sorrow that the last moments of her mother might be calm and undisturbed.

Here we must pause in our narrative to give a brief sketch of the early history of Martha Tresize. She was the daughter of a respectable Irish farmer, residing in the county Cork. Near his farm stood the mansion of a Catholic gentleman, to whose only daughter, Agnes, Martha was foster-sister. The two children were constantly together, and at last it was settled that Martha should live entirely with Agnes, who had no other companion. They received together a plain education; for in those days young ladies devoted less time to accomplishments, and more to the practical duties of housekeeping.

When the girls were about eighteen years old, Agnes' maternal grandfather, a Devonshire nobleman, died, and, leaving no male heir, all his estates devolved on his daughter. The family therefore left Ireland to reside on their English property, which was in the vicinity of Exeter. Martha accompanied them, bidding farewell forever to her family and her country. Two years after her arrival in England she married a small but substantial farmer, named John Tresize, a native of Penzance; and shortly afterwards her foster-sister Agnes fell into so bad a state of health that her parents determined to take her back to Ireland.

With her departure began all poor Martha's troubles. When her little boy was about three years old, and Catherine an infant of ten months, her husband was accidentally killed; and as neither he nor his wife had a single relation in the county, her position was consequently desolate. Some friends now advised her to sell the farm. She did so, but at a great loss, for few have generosity enough not to take advantage of the inexperience of the person with whom they are making a bargain. Martha Tresize removed to a cottage near Exeter, and contrived to live there respectably, though in a very different position from that which she had hitherto occupied. The many comforts of her early life had ill fitted her to struggle with poverty; but she added something to her limited means by instructing the children of some well-to-do tradesmen of Exeter in needlework, embroidery, and reading.

She did not neglect her own children, but imparted to them all the solid part of the learning she had acquired; with Christian fortitude embracing all the obligations imposed upon her by her straitened circumstances, not vainly regretting the loss of that worldly prosperity which was no longer hers. Indeed, although she always retained a strong feeling of love and gratitude for her foster-sister's family, it often occurred to her that her life would have been far happier had she never been removed from her father's house and the station of life in which she was born. She tried, therefore, to form in her children habits of frugality, and to give them homely tastes and a love of order, so that it would have been difficult to have met anywhere a more industrious little housekeeper than her daughter Catherine. Michael, her son, she had placed at Andrews', the rich clothier, who, being a Catholic himself, was glad to have a Catholic apprentice. But, like many another foolish boy, Michael had a passion for a seafaring life; and permission to become a sailor being refused, he ran away, and was supposed to have engaged himself on board an East Indiaman which sailed about that time from Exmouth. No tidings came of the runaway, and the poor sorrowing mother gave up all hope of ever seeing him again. Kind neighbors tried to console her by predicting that he would return some day a rich man, but Martha would not believe them; and as year after year passed without any news of her son, she resigned herself, with the help of prayer at the foot of the Cross, to this most afflicting bereavement.

Catherine, for the first few weeks, wept bitterly when the merry playmate and companion of her childhood returned no more as he was wont on the long looked for Saturday evenings, and the Sundays especially seemed sad without him; but in childhood sorrows are not lasting, and Catherine's tears were easily dried by the tenderness of a fond mother. From that time she became the sole object of Martha's affections. As she advanced in years she fully repaid her mother's fond care, if indeed it is possible that a child can repay the devotedness of an anxious parent; but Catherine was a good, dutiful, and loving child. Her education, and the peaceful life she led, had made her in many respects very different from most girls of her own age and position of life. Habits of self-restraint had given firmness to her character, and to her whole demeanor an air of quiet seriousness, which, however, did not prevent her from being of a most truly cheerful and happy disposition. Her mother's example taught her to have recourse to her Heavenly Father in all difficulties, and thus she was well prepared to meet trials; and her confidence in God's ever-loving Providence gave her a strength and decision of character that served her well all through her eventful life.

On Martha's death the kind neighbor who had assisted her in her last moments, took Catherine to her home, until she should find an opportunity of sending her in safety to her relations in Cornwall. Andrews, the clothier, undertook to settle all her money-matters, and to be her banker for any sum she should not wish to take with her to Cornwall.

'And I will do the best I can with it, my child,' said the worthy man. 'You must come to me for advice or assistance if you need either, for I had a great esteem for your excellent mother, and so, dear child, you must look to me as to a friend; and if you do not find your father's family kind, come back to us; my dame will be a good friend to you. We are of the same religion, you know, and must help each other, as Father Ralph says.'

All this was soothing to the feelings of the poor orphan. Many times each day she knelt before her Crucifix and, amidst tears and sobs, she exclaimed, 'Thy will be done.' At first it was with difficulty she could utter these words; but Father Ralph encouraged her to persevere; telling her that by so doing, the virtue of entire resignation to God's will would be given to her. Nor was he wrong; for soon a profound calm pervaded her soul, and made itself visible in words and actions.

At last an opportunity presented itself of sending Catherine to her relations. A respectable woman, well known to Master Andrews, was about to undertake what was then considered the perilous voyage to Penzance. This person readily agreed to take Catherine with her, and see her safely conducted to her aunt.

Poor Catherine's sad feelings can better be imagined than described, as she bade farewell to the home of her childhood, her dear mother's grave, her kind friends, and all those objects which were so familiar to her. The boat in which they were to sail was a small trading vessel that plied between Exeter and Penzance, occasionally conveying passengers. This, indeed, was the only way in which the poorer classes could go to and fro between those towns; for as the roads that traversed Devon and Cornwall were mere bridle-paths, there were then no coaches, nor even a carrier's cart. The rich traveled on horseback, accompanied by armed attendants, and even so, by reason of highwaymen, the journey was often dangerous.

At five o'clock one bright morning in the beginning of June our travelers went on board. Their luggage was piled up on the deck, and Catherine and her new friend, Dame Penrith, seated themselves close to it. As the little craft glided slowly down the Exe, the sad young orphan kept her eyes fixed on the old city. House after house vanished from her sight; she could only see the towers of the Cathedral and the old castle of Rougemont; when these also were no longer visible, an inexpressible feeling of loneliness crept over her. She thought of her dear mother now lying in the churchyard, and her heart-seemed inundated with such intense grief that, as she sobbed and wept, her whole frame trembled and seemed convulsed; but she had promised Father Ralph never to give way to these terrible bursts of sorrow, so raising her eyes to heaven-she murmured, 'Thy will be done.'

She thought of all her Divine Saviour had suffered, then of God's mercy to her dear mother, and of the almost certain hope that she was now in the enjoyment of eternal happiness. Making a resolution so to live on earth as to deserve to be with that much loved mother one day in heaven, she recovered her former peace of mind.

'I say, little girl, and you, good dame, here we are at Exmouth. Why don't you look out on the sea? That is something worth looking at, much better than any of your towns.'

So spoke the captain, a rough but good-natured Cornish man. The travelers followed his advice. There stretched the ocean before them in calm grandeur, sparkling under the morning sun.

'How beautiful!' exclaimed Catherine; and for an instant her sad little face lit up with joy. She said no more, but stood motionless, leaning against the side of the boat, now gazing as far as her sight could reach, across the open sea; now watching the rippling waves as they played about the vessel. Her thoughts were of the majesty of that God who created such beautiful and magnificent works; of the mystery of eternity, of which indeed the ocean is a faint emblem; of the beauty of heaven, where she confidently hoped her mother now was; these and other thoughts arose in her mind, not in that crowding confusion which only serves to harass us, but welling gently up, then sinking deeply into her heart and filling her with a pious awe that was also very soothing.

The boat seldom kept at any great distance from the shore; Catherine could therefore see the rocks, and at times even the white cottages of some fishing-hamlet shining in the sun; and they passed many of the haunts of the smuggler and the wrecker.

Poor Dame Penrith was far from enjoying the voyage; she complained of the tossing and rocking of the vessel; every now and then she would exclaim that the ship was sinking, and at such moments would bitterly bewail her folly in having undertaken such a perilous voyage. But all her troubles ended on the afternoon of the second day of their journey, and great was her joy as the vessel entered the harbor of Penzance. Catherine also was glad to leave the ship.

The dame turned to her little charge, and inquired where her aunt lived.

'At some distance from the town, I believe,' replied Catherine. 'Then,' said her friend, 'you had better come with me to my cousin's. She will tell us the way.'

Accordingly they both proceeded to the shop of Dame Penrith's cousin. Great was the pleasure of the two old women at meeting. When the first emotion had subsided, inquiries were made about Dame Barnby's dwelling-place.

'I know her cottage well,' said Dame Penrith's cousin. 'It is betwixt this and the village of Gulval. But the child must sup with us ere she goes to her aunt.'

After supper, at which meal were served various strange Cornish pies and pastries, Catherine, thanking her friends for their kindness, departed with an old servant, who undertook to lead her to her aunt's cottage.

It was a beautiful, warm night; the moon shone brightly on our two travelers as they wended their way through the narrow and tortuous streets. Penzance was a queer little town in those days, its old timber-fronted houses with diamond-paned bow-windows projecting far into the streets.

Catherine and her companion soon found themselves in the open country. Before them lay extensive moors, bounded by the sea; and across those moors and fens one might have ranged for miles scarcely meeting a human dwelling.

The ocean was calm; the moonbeams traced on it a silvery path, across which now and then some little fishing-boat passed, appearing like a dark spectre on the glistening waves, and soon lost sight of again in the surrounding gloom. Catherine, although weary, stood a moment to gaze on the lovely scene, and she would have remained longer, had not her companion hurried her, saying:

'We must get 'on quickly; they will be abed; and I have to go back to town. If you want to look at the sea, why that, child, may be seen any day.'

On they went, nor did they stop again until the old servant announced that they had reached their destination. So, bidding her young companion good night, she left her standing before a forlorn-looking cottage. Catherine, not without some feelings of anxiety, knocked at the door of her future home. The knock was answered by the loud barking of a dog, and after some delay the door was opened by a woman, the expression of whose countenance was one of mingled sorrow and discontent.

'I am Catherine Tresize, Dame Barnby's niece,' said the little visitor.

'Yes I know all about it; you have lost your mother poor child. I am your aunt, and you have come to seek a home with me. Well, I fear you will scarce find this a very comfortable one.'

They entered the cottage, which certainly looked cheerless.

'I should have come earlier and not disturbed you at this late hour,' said Catherine, 'but the kind dame who brought me from Exeter took me to her relation's house and made me sup first.'

'You did well,' replied her aunt. 'You will now like to go to bed; you must needs be tired, child.'

Catherine said she was indeed very tired. Her aunt held a light while she ascended a kind of ladder-stairs.

'You need no candle up there, the moon gives goodly light. So I wish you a quiet night.'

When Catherine opened the door opposite the ladder, she found it was indeed bright moonlight.

Having said her prayers, she was soon in bed, and a few moments after all cares and troubles were forgotten in the calm, deep sleep of youth.

Dame Barnby was in truth not very well pleased to have her niece with her; for, besides her straitened circumstances, she had important reasons for not liking to have any one except her own children living in the cottage.

Good Master Andrews, the clothier, had written to Dame Barnby. He was not, however, a skilled letter-writer; and from his epistle, which a traveling pedlar had brought her, she concluded that the young orphan was penniless and would therefore be a great burden to her.

Poor Martha Tresize would certainly never have wished her daughter to go to Penzance had she been acquainted with the altered circumstances of her sister-in-law. But her husband had frequently spoken with affection of this sister, and had remarked that, if anything happened to him and his wife, he was sure the little ones would find a home with Winifred. He had not seen her for many years, and was ignorant of the changes produced by a foolish marriage, and of the degradation and poverty into which she had fallen; for, on her part, a certain pride had prevented her from applying to him for aid, which he would have willingly given had he been aware of her misfortunes.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN it is remembered that even in the last century Cornwall, owing to its remote position and the difficulty of approach, was, in moral as well as material progress, far behind the rest of England, so that acts of wrecking and smuggling could be constantly perpetrated with impunity, the reader will be able to form some idea of the state of that county at the period of which we write.

It was thinly populated, and the lands comprised in the Duchy were little better than profitless moors. The Catholic priests had been driven out, and very frequently had not been replaced by the ministers of any other creed. The people had so fallen into a state of deplorable ignorance with respect to religion; and absurd acts of superstition had taken the place of those practices of piety which, under the enlightened guidance of their priests, the Cornish people, naturally religious, had loved to perform.

Nature had not been sparing of her gifts to Cornwall, and if, in an agricultural point of view, it was inferior to the rest of England, its mines were rich, and it abounded in wild and beautiful scenery. The situation of Penzance, on the magnificent Mount's Bay, is universally admired. This bay presents an expanse of sea such as is rarely found enclosed by headlands, in the midst of which, rising to the height of nearly two hundred feet, stands an insulated mass of rock, which bears the appellation of St. Michael's Mount. At an early period this romantic eminence was consecrated to religion; old legends assert that St. Michael appeared to some hermits upon one of its crags, and a large rock on the western side is still pointed out as the site of the vision. Edward the Confessor granted the mount to the great benedictine house of St. Michael; later on it was transferred to the monks of the new Monastery of Sion.

But the island rock

'Whose brow

Is crown'd with castles, and whose rocky sides

has echoed with sounds of war as well as those of prayer.

On the side of the bay opposite to that occupied by Marazion stands the little fishing-town of Newlyn, nestled on the gently-sloping hill. After passing this place, the road, or rather bridle-path, for such it then was, wound round the rocks close above the sea, and finally led to Mousehole. About halfway between the latter and Newlyn stood, at the time of our story, an old-looking but substantially-built house, bearing the name of Ty-an-dour, which means 'dwelling by the water.' And it was well named, for it was situated on a rock overlooking the whole bay; a flight of steps, roughly hewn in the rock, leading down to the water's edge. This house was inhabited by the brothers Stephen and Mark Casterman, their old mother, and two children of Stephen. Viewed from without, Ty-an-dour had a gloomy appearance. The few tall dark pine-trees that grew close to it; the uncultivated lands, covered with gorse, which stretched for miles in its rear; the wild waves, ever dashing against the rocks beneath, seeming like monsters endeavoring to ascend the crags, yet always repulsed by some unseen agent; all these added, no doubt, to the melancholy aspect of the building itself. But let us now enter within. The large room on the ground-floor serves for both kitchen and sitting-room; its chimney advances several feet from the wall, affording ample accommodation within for two persons on each side; and here old dame Casterman used to sit spinning during the long winter evenings. A very solid oak table, a few wooden stools, and a solitary arm-chair, constituted all the furniture of the dark low room. There were cupboards and shelves in abundance; and a strange collection of things they contained: old clothes, jewelry, fishingnets and tackle; articles of value and worthless lumber were heaped together.

How this medley of goods had been obtained will be easy imagined when we state that the Castermans were renowned wreckers and smugglers. On stormy nights the lonely house often became the resort of men as daring and as worthless as themselves. Many a storm-beaten ship, allured by the false lights of the wreckers, struck against the rocks which fringed the coast on the side of Newlyn; and, while the unfortunate crew were allowed to perish the cargo was secured by these Cornish pillagers, with whom it was a saying that:

'If ye save a stranger from the sea,
Then he will turn your enemy.'

Smuggling was also carried on extensively by the inmates of Ty-an-dour. The desired booty once obtained and stowed away in caves dug for the purpose under the house, the brother wreckers and their associates would indulge for a time in feasting and revelry. But these hours of relaxation were only of short duration; for the Castermans were not given to conviviality and therefore no great favorites with their neighbors who nevertheless rallied round them on account of their wonderful daring and their usual success in undertakings of danger.

As Stephen Casterman's wife was dead, his old mother looked after his two children; that is to say, she saw that they had enough to eat but further than this she did not trouble herself about them. And so Patience and Antony grew from year to year in ignorance and neglect. From their earliest childhood they were accustomed to wander about alone, and to play in the boat anchored in the cove. It is a wonder no harm befell them; but there is an allseeing Providence that watches over those whom none protect or care for; and these poor children were certainly of the number.

At the same time as Catherine, after her arrival at her aunt's house, was pouring forth her soul in earnest prayer ere she retired to rest, the minds of old Dame Casterman and her sons were very differently occupied. There they sat in their disorderly kitchen; a small lamp, placed on the table round which they had gathered, threw a wavering light on their sinister countenances, while the rest of the room was enveloped in almost complete darkness. The three were holding a family council. How astonished and shocked would poor Catherine have been could she have overheard their conversation! for from it she would have learnt that her aunt was an accomplice of the Castermans. She transported the more valuable of their ill-gotten goods secretly to the shop of a Jew in the town, and helped them in various ways; in return for which they gave her a small share in their profits.

On the present occasion her name was frequently mentioned with reference to certain articles of considerable worth which they wished to be taken privately to the Jew's.

'Mind, the other men of the town must know nothing of it,' urged the dame; 'or else they will want a share in the profits, because, forsooth, they were at the wreck; though, as you all know, 'twas myself who found the jewels on the dead body by the shore in the morning after they had all gone.'

A loud knock at the door interrupted the conversation. Stephen cast a hasty glance round the room. He was too much accustomed to deal with men of wild unruly passions to think it a needless precaution, before introducing his nightly visitors, to remove from sight any object which might tempt their cupidity. He pointed, therefore, to a couple of rings and a bracelet which lay on the table. His meaning was quickly understood, and his old mother hastened to hide them.

Mark then opened the door to give admittance to four or five strong rough-looking men. After wishing good-evening to the inmates they drew the wooden stools round the table, and seated themselves.

'Master Casterman,' said one of them, 'you must let us have a taste of that last shipload of brandy we smuggled in.'

The old dame on hearing the demand rose, and produced a stone bottle which she placed on the table, providing each of the men with horn drinking-cups. The dangers and adventures which had accompanied the capture of the shipload were for some time the subject of conversation. Then one of the party started a new subject by saying:

'What are we to think about this Higgins and his crew? What is his purpose in coming here? What's a commissioner got to do with looking after the coasts?'

The subject was evidently one of interest to the wreckers. They leant over the table and looked towards Stephen Casterman, anxious to know what solution he, whom they regarded as their leader, would give to these questions. But his gloomy countenance offered no clue to his feelings; and as he remained silent, one of the men proceeded to explain what he believed to be the state of the case. The Sheriff of Cornwall, he told them, found it impossible to put a stop to smuggling and wrecking on the coast, so he had obtained leave to appoint commissioners for that purpose, and Mr. Higgins was one of them.

'He comes,' continued the speaker with increasing wrath, 'to ruin, if he can, our trade; to rob us of our lawful prizes; for time out of mind the cargo of wrecked vessels has been ours.'

Casterman now broke silence, and said, in the fierce determined tone of one who fully intends what he threatens:

'It this Higgins, or any one else, dares to meddle with me or mine, a bullet will soon settle him.'

This sentiment was loudly applauded by the rest of the party, who were now growing very excited, and, as the hour was late, Dame Casterman quietly withdrew. The children had already crept away fearful of the stray blows which often fell to their lot when the noisy wreckers met at their father's house.

CHAPTER III.

A BRIGHT sunny morning succeeded the day of Catherine's arrival at Penzance. At an early hour all was astir in the little town, for it was market-day. The farmers' wives and daughters came riding in with all the varied produce of the country. The fish-women, wearing red cloaks and flat beaver-hats called 'Mount Bays,' hurried along, carrying their fish in 'cowels,' a kind of basket supported on the back and by a band passed round the forehead. The intending purchasers went from stall to stall, talking and bargaining, and laying in a store for the rest of the week. Among the latter class might be seen the rich ladies of the neighborhood, who were far from disdaining such homely duties, and who greatly enjoyed the early ride into town.

The sun, which had risen in all its glory over the sea, was peeping into the narrow streets, and made them look bright and cheerful; but it was in the open country that the beauty of the hour was fully visible. A soft sea-breeze blew over the moors, gathering in its passage the sweet scent of the heather and other wild flowers. From hedge and bush, from glen and forest, came the melodious song of the birds, rising like a morning hymn of thanksgiving to their Creator; but no church-bell chimed in to call the faithful to prayer, as in former days; no convent or monastery rung out the Angelus at early morn. It would seem that while all nature celebrated the praises of God, man had forgotten Him, to think only of material gain. No longer did the laborer halt before the wayside cross to beg a blessing on his toil.

It was already broad daylight when Catherine awoke. Perhaps she had been dreaming that she was once again seated by her mother in their little cottage at Exeter; but now she started up in her bed and gazed around with that astonishment which one feels on awaking in a strange place. But morning brought with it brighter prospects. Besides, although Catherine's mother had left her poor in worldly goods, she bestowed on her a rich legacy of virtues; for she had instilled into the mind of her child Faith, which would guide her, like a brilliant star, through the intricate paths of life; she had taught her to cherish Hope, which, when the horizon was obscured, when all around was dark and gloomy, would bid her raise her eyes to that heavenly city where the sorrows of this life shall end, and suffering virtue be crowned with glory; she had inspired her with Charity, that virtue with the twofold mission, which would inflame her heart with love towards her Creator, and teach her likewise to pour the balm of consolation on all the poor afflicted souls she might meet on her path. It was accompanied by and under the guidance of these three sister virtues that pious young girl had started on the pilgrimage of life.

Catherine perceived that it was long past the hour at which she usually rose. She therefore jumped out of bed, and having, on her knees, thanked God for his protection during the night, and begged His blessing on the day, she was not long in dressing.

She looked round her room. It was small and low. Where it sloped down to the little cross-barred window it would not admit of a person standing upright. The large rafters and beams which formed the roof looked old and dusty. The furniture was no more than a wooden stool and a deal table. When Catherine had completed her observations, she descended the step-ladder into the kitchen; dirty and comfortless, like the up-stairs room, and in addition filled with smoke.

On the table were some pieces of bread, and several empty wooden bowls, indications that the family had breakfasted. A little girl was standing looking out of the open door. When she heard Catherine coming down, she turned round and stared at her with astonishment. Catherine wished her good-morning, and then said:

'Are you not my cousin? By what name am I to call you? My name is Catherine.'

'Mine is Ruth,' replied the child shyly.

Ruth Barnby was a pretty little girl of about nine or ten years old, very fair, with large blue eyes and a profusion of light hair. She wore, as was then usual, a home-spun woolen dress of a gray color, and a little corsage laced in front; but these from long use had become dirty and untidy.

'Mother is gone to market,' she said. 'She bade me tell you, you would find breakfast there;' and she pointed to the table.

Catherine sat down, and ate some bread and milk. Ruth meanwhile amused herself by playing with a thin shaggy dog.

'Have you any brothers or sisters?' inquired her cousin.

'One brother and one sister,' was the brief reply.

At that moment the brother and sister made themselves at once visible and audible, for they came running in, laughing and calling to each other; but seeing their cousin they looked astonished, and made a hasty retreat.

'I am going to get some dry firewood. Will you come?' said Ruth, when she saw Catherine had finished her breakfast.

The two accordingly proceeded to the sea-shore, where they commenced gathering pieces of wood which the tide had cast up. They were soon joined by Susan and Maw.

When they had collected a sufficient quantity, they returned to the cottage, which looked darker and dirtier than before; contrasting as it did, so strongly with the brightness of all without. The two youngest children were evidently of opinion that it was far better to be out in the summer sunshine and breezes, and therefore, as soon as they had laid down their packages of wood, they left Ruth and Catherine to light the fire. This done, and having made the beds, Ruth considered that the day's work was over; but her cousin proposed that they should put the cottage in order before the return of Dame Barnby. The little girl opened wide her large blue eyes and seemed bewildered at such an idea. When, however, she saw Catherine first actively sweeping, then at work cleaning the windows, to the great annoyance of certain old spiders who had resided there time out of mind, encouraged by the example, she began to lend her aid; and soon the kitchen looked cleaner and more comfortable than it had done for a long time.

The two children then seated themselves on the door-step. They had remained there in silence some minutes, when Ruth suddenly jumped up, exclaiming, 'There is Patience.'

Catherine was at first puzzled, but on seeing her run to meet a little hump-backed girl, she conjectured, and rightly, that this was the 'Patience' to whom the word applied.

Patience Casterman stopped when she saw a stranger on the door-step, and fixed her eyes on her with an inquiring look. Then addressing Ruth, she said:

'Grandame sent me to know if you could come to-morrow. She has a bundle for us to bring to your mother, it is too heavy for me alone. Can you come?'

'I suppose so, but mother is at market. Do stop and play awhile.'

But the other refused, and in a few minutes was on her road back to Ty-an-dour.

'I often go to where that little girl lives,' said Ruth to her cousin when they were again alone. 'Dame Casterman gives us such large bundles to bring here, and mother never shows us what is inside, but puts them down at the bottom of her fish-basket. The Castermans always go out on stormy nights, and father used to go with them; and when the wind blew very strong, and we sat shivering by the fire, he would say it was a good night to go to Ty-an-dour; but one night, two years ago, there was such a fearful storm, and father went out as usual, and he never came back again, for the next day we heard he had been drowned. Poor mother cried, but she did not look so miserable as when father used to beat her.'

'Beat her?' said Catherine with astonishment.

'O, yes; and I used to be so frightened when he was in his bad humors.'

From this conversation, and many things that Ruth related when speaking of her past life, Catherine understood that her aunt had been far from happy since the time of her marriage, and that probably the harshness of her manner was greatly owing to the trials and ill-treatment she had experienced.

Any further conversation at that moment was, however, interrupted by the arrival of Dame Barnby, who, placing down her empty fish-basket and addressing her niece, said:

'Well, you took a fine sleep this morning, to be sure. When I started there was not a sign of you. But,' exclaimed the good woman, as she entered the kitchen, 'you have not been idle since you have been up. Ah! well-a-day, it is a long while since the place has looked so clean and tidy.'

And the sight seemed to bring back to Dame Barnby some recollection of happier times.

'Ruth helped me,' said Catherine, 'and we tried to make it look nice by the time you returned from market.'

'Did Ruth indeed help you?' said the Dame half laughing, well knowing that her daughter was not much inclined to industry, and very much doubting the possibility of her being of much service.

For Ruth, though of a gentle affectionate nature, was in truth very indolent; her training had not been such as to form habits of order and industry. Less impetuous than Catherine, whose sweetness of temper was only the result of ardent prayer and constant efforts, she had neither her energy nor firmness of purpose.

Before the end of the first week spent at Penzance, Catherine found an opportunity, when the children were absent, to express to her aunt her desire to contribute something towards her own support, begging her acceptance of a small monthly sum for that purpose.

'Why, child,' replied Dame Barnby, 'I don't want to take away your money; but the truth is, I find it very hard to support myself and my children, and then, of course, another person coming makes matters worse. I should never have asked you for a penny; for, though I am poor, I have never begged from any one. Since, however, you are kind enough to offer it yourself, I tell you honestly that it would be of much service to me.'

The young girl felt happy that she could be of use to her aunt, and henceforth she paid regularly the sum agreed on.'

The week passed by without any event worth recording. The following Sunday, Catherine was seated at the little window of the cottage, gazing carelessly at the waves as they came foaming up the beach, then rapidly receding; her thoughts wandering far away to the distant scenes of her childhood. She recalled to mind the Sundays of the past; first, though only a vague recollection, sitting with her brother at their mother's feet, listening with wondering admiration to the history of some saint, and then, later on, that solemn Sunday when, for the first time she accompanied her mother to one of those Masses said in secret, and offered up by a priest destined perhaps, ere long, to make the sacrifice of his life in the holy cause of religion.

She was aroused from these thoughts by a remark from her aunt: 'I'm going to Gulval church, Kate; you can come, if you like; and Ruth will mind the cottage and look after the children.'

'I would rather stay here with them,' replied Catherine.

Her aunt did not object, and soon after started for church, the children continuing to play near the cottage.

For some time Catherine amused herself with them. Then she entered the cottage, and having taken from her trunk a well-used but handsome old prayer-book, a gift to her mother from her rich foster-sister, she again stole out unobserved. She paused for a moment, and then directed her course rapidly towards Gulval Cairn. The site that now bears this name is but a confined spot, covered with stones, ferns, and gorse in the midst of cultivated fields, and in fact but a remnant of the extensive moors which, at the time of which we write, stretched almost to the sea. The young girl wandered across the Cairn, stopping at length at a spot where some large pieces of rock surrounded by tall ferns offered a sheltered and secluded retreat, such as she was seeking for. Before retiring into this nook she stood for a moment contemplating the view beneath her. The rugged moors sloped somewhat abruptly towards the sea, which lay calmly cradled in the bay, circling with its arms the Mount, as a sleeping child might some favorite plaything. On the left rose, from among a clump of trees, the quaint old tower of Gulval church, forming a picturesque object in the landscape. Catherine could distinguish her aunt's cottage and the children playing near it, and was glad to see that they had not followed her. She now knelt down behind the rock, her figure concealed by the ferns which reared their graceful forms on all sides. Opening her prayer-book, she read the devotions for Mass, uniting herself in spirit with those happier members of the Church who at that moment were assisting at the Holy Sacrifice. The pious child had just completed her devotions, when a sound, like a heavy sigh, uttered quite close to her, made her look round. She was not a little startled at seeing, standing behind her, an elderly woman. There was something very pleasing and benevolent in her countenance; and her eyes were filled with tears as she gazed with intense earnestness on the innocent girl. Catherine rose from her knees. The woman who had quickly noticed her look of surprise, at once addressed her.

'Sweet child,' she said, 'ye think it strange that I should be here watching you; but it did my heart good to see a Catholic child praying here among the ferns, in a place where least I thought to find the like.' The stranger spoke with the accent of one from the south of Ireland, and it sounded sweet to Catherine, for it reminded her of her own mother's voice. 'I know you are a Catholic,' added the woman 'for here is a rosary, which must be yours; it's a handsome one too. I found it on the moss sparkling in the sun. It was lying near the heath-clump, just there. Ah, sure I said, some Catholic has been by here; and then my heart beat for joy on seeing you.'

As she finished speaking she held out to Catherine the rosary, which had been her constant companion since she was quite a little child.

'Thank you, good friend, whoever you are,' said Catherine, 'for the sympathy you show a poor child whom you have never before seen. I need not ask you what is your religion, for you must be a Catholic; but I should like to know your name and where you live.'

'My name? It is Bridget O'Reilly. I keep a shop in the town; perhaps you have noticed the sign-board with Widow O'Reilly on it. Many is the long year I have spent here since I came over the sea from my own dear Ireland.'

'From Ireland!' exclaimed Catherine. O, that was dear mother's country; I love the Irish. She has often told me about them.'

'God's blessing be upon you! She was Irish! Ah! and it is she who taught ye the true faith. Is it here she lives?' asked Widow O'Reilly. Catherine could not answer, but the tears fell quickly down her cheeks, which her kind friend perceiving, said softly:

'Lana-ma-chrena! (i. e. child of my heart), ye have lost her, perhaps? But weep not so. The angels have taken her soul, and the heavens are her bed. Let us sit down upon this rock, and I will just tell ye something that will please ye to hear.'

So saying they both seated themselves, and the good woman continued:

'There are some Catholics here, and we often have the holy Mass. For there is a Catholic gentleman nigh here who many a time harbors a priest, God bless him! and sends for all the people round to come to the chapel. Other times I get the neighbors to come to me, and we say our prayers together. Whenever ye like to come, ye are welcome.'

'Thank you,' said Catherine; 'I shall be glad to have some one of my own religion to talk to and pray with.'

'Where at all is it that ye live? for I ne'er saw ye before.'

'I only came last week. I live now with my aunt, Dame Barney.'

'I know her well. My house is not very far from her's, for mine is the last in the town, and her's is the first out of it.'

Catherine heard Ruth calling her; so, bidding good-morning to her aged friend, she ran towards the cottage.

'Where have you been?' inquired her cousin.

Catherine told her of her new acquaintance, although she did not repeat the conversation they had had.

'Widow O'Reilly is very good,' said Ruth; 'every one knows her and loves her; when any person in the village are ill, she will go and see them, and she helps those that are poor. I remember I was ill once, and she came and sat by my bedside and made me drinks from goodly herbs.'

The two cousins now entered the cottage.

CHAPTER IV.

It was midsummer's eve. The fiery sun of June was on its decline, a refreshing breeze blew from the ocean, the waves rippled lazily over the yellow sands; St. Michael's Mount, on the western side, was bathed in a flood of light, the broken outline of its ivy-clad sides standing sharply defined against the unclouded sky of that beautiful evening.

The shadows lengthened as the sun gradually sunk on the horizon, and at length was lost, leaving only a faint reflection of its glory in the golden clouds. Then the scene became enveloped in the soft and pleasant glimmer of twilight; this again yielding in turn to the more dark shades of night, till the outline of rocks, hills, and trees grew more and more indistinct.

Suddenly, and as if by magic, the whole town and neighborhood became illuminated. From the Mount, from Marazion, from Newlyn and Mousehole shone forth fires, whose reflection in the still ocean enhanced the splendor of the vision. In a few minutes the whole bay glowed with a girdle of flame.

The inhabitants hurried through the streets, some bearing torches, some singing quaint old ballads, others laughing and talking. The children especially seemed overjoyed, and joining hands they commenced the game of thread-the-needle, running through the streets vociferating, 'An eye, an eye!'

Catherine had come with her cousins to see the festivities which at Penzance always celebrated the summer solstice.

While the latter joined in the sports, the young girl, whom a more serious disposition and recent sorrows rendered less inclined to take part in those riotous games, stood watching with a quiet enjoyment the novel and striking scene; the beautiful effect of the bright blazing fires, and the strange appearance of the groups as they moved about amidst the glare of the torches. At length the children by their noisy mirth attracted her attention. Suddenly, the joyous band would stop, the two last in the string elevating their clasped hands and forming a large eye, through which all the rest must pass. As she stood watching them, she happened to look across the street, and noticed a man standing half concealed in a small archway, who seemed desirous of avoiding observation, for he leant close up against the wall. His guise was that of a traveler. A person with a torch just then passing threw a strong light on his features; and no sooner had they become visible than Catherine recognized with astonishment the priest who had attended her dying mother, and had so often visited in disguise the city of Exeter. Yes, it was Father Ralph. She could not mistake those features, on which a long life of virtue and suffering had imprinted a majesty, while they still retained the energy of youth. This zealous priest had been educated and received Holy Orders in France, but he had afterwards returned to England to carry consolation to his Catholic countrymen, and endeavor to win back those who had strayed from the true faith. For nearly thirty years he had been engaged in such labors, and had encountered numerous difficulties and dangers; yet, with the help of God, he had succeeded in eluding the vigilance of his enemies, although a reward had been offered for his capture, and the magistrates were ever on the alert to discover priests.

The last of the merry party had passed on, and Catherine, finding herself alone, advanced towards Father Ralph.

'O father! do you not remember me?' she said; 'I am Catherine Tresize, whose mother you attended when she was dying. After that, you know, I came here. I am so happy to see you.'

'Indeed, I have not forgotten you, my child. Often have I thought of you since we parted at Exeter. You are, I believe, with Protestant relations. There, are perhaps, no Catholics near you, and it is a dangerous position for one so young; but keep firm to your faith, and thus you may become the instrument of their conversion. I have received a letter from a friend,' he went on to say, 'to a Catholic gentleman who resides in this neighborhood; but night has overtaken me, and I do not know the road to his house; perhaps you can tell me where Sir Reginald de Courcy lives. The name of the Manor-house is Bron-Welli.'

'I have been here so short a time,' replied Catherine, 'that I know very little of the country; and I have not heard of any one of that name.'

'Then, my child, I must seek shelter elsewhere for the night. But ere I bid you farewell, I must conjure you not to forget the good instructions which your poor mother gave you. She taught you your religion, I know; and if you now have difficulties, and have no friend to whom you can confide then, remember that there is One Who will never abandon you. Pray often, dear child.'

'O, indeed, I will do all you tell me. I hope the place you are going to is near; then I shall be able to hear Mass, and to have your good counsels to direct me.'

A slight noise made Catherine turn her head, and she was surprised to see Maw standing close behind her. He laughed when he noticed her astonishment.

'Maw,' she asked, 'how long have you been here?'

'All the while you've been talking,' replied her little cousin; 'I heard all that you said.'

Catherine drew aside the child who was still laughing with mischievous delight at the thought of having startled her.

'Maw,' she said gravely, 'you would not wish to have any one put to death, would you?'

'No,' said he; 'why do you ask me that?'

'Because you must then promise me not to repeat a word of what you just now heard. If you did, you might cause this gentleman to be put to death, and I should be put in prison. Maw, will you promise? I know, if you do, I can trust you.'

Catherine spoke so seriously that the child believed her words, and promised not to mention any part of the dialogue he had overheard. Just as Father Ralph was about to depart, Maw turned to his cousin. 'I know the road to Sir Reginald's,' he said.

'Well then, I pray thee, my lad, guide me thither,' said the priest.

'No, no; I should be afraid to come back all alone in the dark,' said the child, after a moment's reflection.

'You shall not come back alone,' remarked Catherine, 'for I will go with you. And if,' she added gaily, 'it be true, as people tell us, that light keeps off evil spirits, you have nothing to dread to-night; for, see, there is a bonfire on every hill. Come, Maw, do not be frightened.'

Maw, like many older than himself, was without fear where there really was danger. He would climb the steepest rocks; he would run carelessly along the narrow ledges, where one false step would have precipitated him into the foaming abyss beneath; he would, for the sake of a bird's nest, risk his life on the slender branch of the highest tree; but the idea of going out in the dark quite terrified him. All the stories he had heard of giants, fairies, and the various spirits supposed to haunt the moors and woods of Cornwall (and in those days such belief was common), now came before his mind; and it was only with much pressing that his cousin could persuade him to guide Father Ralph to his destination.

The three started: Maw leading the way. Across the moors they went, their path lit up by the bright beams of the moon. As the distance between them and the village increased, the voices of the children, the shouting and singing, all died away, and the stillness of a summer's night reigned around.

They had proceeded some way along a winding path, which on leaving the moor ran through a wood, when they reached the embattled walls which bounded the more immediate precincts of the extensive domain of Sir Reginald. Fronting them stood an ancient archway, partly clothed with ivy; its heavy doors thickly studded with nails, and well strengthened by large iron bars. Through this entrance they now passed into an avenue. The lofty trees, in full summer foliage, met over their heads, and in spite of the brightness of the moon they were almost in darkness; a white line, worn in the grass by the feet of men and horses,—for nothing else ever passed, carriages and carts being then alike unknown at Penzance,—was the only indication of road they must follow.

As they walked on through the park occasionally a deer, startled by the sound of footsteps, would rush across the path, then disappear in the nearest thicket. The avenue ran straight for about a quarter of a mile before reaching the manor-house. It was a quaint and venerable-looking old structure, part of it dating from a very early period, the tower from the days of the first Norman kings. Other buildings had been subsequently added, and it now formed a large and somewhat straggling edifice, with a courtyard in the centre. Thus there was alike the charm of antiquity and a picturesque irregularity, totally different from the straight formal mansions of modern times.

Beneath the fairy touch of moonlight the scene was peculiarly enchanting. There was a mysterious gloom where the dark shadows fell from projecting buttresses or from the more advanced parts of the building; while to parts more in view, the soft rays gave additional beauty, the top of the tower, especially, shining as though roofed with silver; here a mullion or a cornice standing out in bold relief, there the diamond panes of the long narrow windows receiving a brilliant lustre. The large white owl that issued with doleful hooting from the thick ivy-mantled part of the edifice, seemed, as its snowy wings glistened for an instant in the moonlight ere it vanished again in the shade, like a forlorn spirit doomed to haunt at night the place of its former abode. Maw regarded the bird with superstitious dread, and shrank close to his cousin, as in its uncertain flight it passed near him.

On reaching the house Father Ralph, having thanked his young guides, knocked at the massive door. After some delay the face of an old man appeared at a little grating. 'Who is it that comes at this late hour?' he asked.

'One who desires to speak to Sir Reginald de Courcy.'

At the name of his master the aged porter opened the door and admitted the traveler; while the two children, seeing the priest safe inside, hurriedly retraced their steps homeward.

'Kate,' said Maw to his cousin, after they had walked some way in silence, 'do tell me who that gentleman is, and how you came to know him.'

'I will tell you, but only on condition that you do not repeat it.' Maw gave his promise, and Catherine continued 'that good gentleman is a priest. He goes about among the Catholics, counselling them, and encouraging them to keep to the true faith; and this at the risk of his life, for should he be discovered he would be put to death. I have known him a long time. When dear mother was alive, and we lived near Exeter, he used often to come to the house of a Catholic in the town. We used to go to Mass there, and he would give me beautiful instructions. Those were very happy days.'

'Then are you, Kate, what they call a Papist?' inquired the boy. 'They are bad people. I heard the blacksmith, who is a very clever man, say so.'

'I have the happiness of being a Catholic,' replied Catherine warmly. 'It is a holy religion, and it teaches us to be good. Those who speak against it do not understand it.'

'I don't know what you mean,' said Maw. 'What does it teach you? and what is the good of it?'

'It teaches us first, to know God, to love Him, and serve Him in this world; and if we do this, we shall be happy with Him for ever in the next.'

'To know God, to love Him, and serve Him!' repeated Maw, thoughtfully. 'I have heard that there is a God. But I don't know anything about Him, so I cannot love Him; and I am sure I could not serve Him, for I never see Him. Who is God? and why should I love Him?'

'Poor Maw!' said Catherine compassionately; 'did no one ever speak to you of the great God who created all things? has no one ever taught you to pray? Well, then, listen to me, and I will tell you. God is a pure Spirit, that is to say, He has no body; we cannot see Him while we are in this world, but He sees us at every moment, and knows even our most secret thoughts. He is all-powerful, all-just, all-merciful.'

The two children had, at this moment, reached the border of the moors. Catherine laid her hand on her companion's shoulder, and asked him to stop for a moment.

'Look, Maw,' she said, pointing to the glorious heavens; 'look at the beautiful stars; see, how fair the moon is; then, down below, look at the ocean, how mighty and wonderful it is. On the other side of us are the trees, with the soft breeze rustling through their leaves. Even the grass we tread under foot, and the yellow clumps of gorse which cover the moor, are full of beauty. Well, Maw, it was God who created all these things for our use and happiness. Just now you asked me why we should love Him. Do you not see how much He has done for us? And God has done far more, and greater things for us, as I shall tell you another time.'

'O, Kate,' exclaimed the boy, 'I never knew all that before.'

The two then proceeded on their road in silence.

We usually hear the great truths of religion at so tender an age that they sink gently into our hearts without producing in us any vivid impression; we learn the existence of God, and our love for Him awakens in our young souls before the mind can fully comprehend the object of its affections. And thus are happily implanted in us the seeds of religion, which gradually expand as our reason develops. But this had not been the case with Maw. He had reached the age of nine without having received any religious instruction; so that now, when for the first time, he heard of the Great Being who created the universe, and learnt that it was his duty to love Him, and that God was ever present, and witnessed all his actions, he was filled with wonder and awe. The stars, the ocean, the trees and plants, were not new sights to him; yet they seemed to wear a different aspect since Catherine had pointed them out as the works of God, and specially made for the use and happiness of man.

It is true the uncultivated intellect of the child could not form a just idea as to what a pure spirit was; nor could he understand how God could be present without his seeing Him. The boy, therefore, purposed to question his cousin concerning all this another time; but in the meanwhile he believed, with the simple and earnest faith of childhood, what one older and evidently better instructed than himself had told him.

They soon regained the village, where the festivities had not yet terminated. Dame Barnby had been so busy gossiping with her friends and acquaintances, that she had taken little notice of the absence of Catherine and Maw.

Ere Catherine fell asleep that night she thought over the occurrences of that evening; her fortunate meeting with Father Ralph, the prospect she now had of being able, sometimes at least, to attend to her religious duties; and, again, her conversation with little Maw, awakening the joyful hope that she might, as the good priest had told her, be the means of converting her aunt and cousins.

With the natural impetuosity of her disposition, the ardent girl longed for the morrow, that she might begin their instruction. She could see no obstacles; all seemed easy to her zeal. Age and experience teach us to moderate the ardor of even good desires; but who can flatter themselves, at the age of fourteen, with the idea that they have attained perfection? Certainly Catherine did not; more mature reflection would doubtless have convinced her that the task she was about to undertake was one more arduous than she had at first supposed; though she would not have abandoned it on that account, even if her hopes had been less sanguine. Still, it is certain that too great a zeal for good is far preferable to a total want of it; the former, age may soften, the latter nothing can remedy.

On the following day the festivities assumed a different character; idling, with music on the water, called by the inhabitants 'having a pen'orth of sea,' succeeded to the rejoicings of the previous evening. An old fisherman took the children of Dame Barnby out in his boat; Catherine, unaccustomed to the sea, preferred to stay at home.

So she sat near the cottage gazing on the lively scene, as the boats plied to and fro, while she listened to the strains of music, which, although the only instrument used was the bagpipe, did not sound harsh when borne across the waters, and heard in open air; the fresh voices of the children chiming in with the murmurs of the waves, and having altogether a wild and pleasing effect.

As she watched the gay scene, she nevertheless felt sad, for she could not free herself from a feeling of disappointment, because her plans had been disturbed; and she had not, as she had counted, been able to speak to Maw. But now there was no chance that day, and the next would be market-day, and she would be wanted to go with her aunt and help to carry the fish. As she mused on these things it suddenly occurred to her that, while forming plans for the conversion of her relatives, she had forgotten the most important part, namely, to ask God's assistance, without which all her endeavors would be fruitless. Catherine now saw her fault, and raised her heart for a few minutes in humble and fervent prayer.

She then tripped gaily into the cottage and found that her aunt had gone to Ty-an-dour, leaving to her special care the pot which was boiling on the fire, and which was indeed a thing deserving attention, as it contained the family supper. Having seen that all was right, she again went out, this time proceeding along a little path that skirted the moors, and not stopping till she stood before a miserable-looking cabin, which rose to view near a dark pool of water—a forlorn-looking place, the dwelling of an aged and infirm woman, who subsisted chiefly on the little supplies brought to her by charitable persons. Widow O'Reilly often sent her provisions, frequently employing Catherine to take them, well knowing the pleasure it afforded the kind-hearted girl. The instructions of her mother, often repeated, never to turn away her face from the poor, or to speak a harsh word to them, had sunk deeply into her heart; and in earlier days even, when with others she was occasionally quick tempered, towards the poor her manner was always soft and kind, recognizing in them the suffering members of Jesus Christ.

As Catherine passed the threshold of the cottage, an expression of joy appeared on the countenance of its bed-ridden inhabitant. Affectionately did the youthful visitor inquire after her health, and tender were the words she addressed to her. Nor did she leave until all around had been made as comfortable and as clean as circumstances would permit; and what perhaps pleased and touched the old woman more than anything was a large nosegay of wild flowers placed by her side; that so, if deprived of the enjoyment of nature during that sweet season of summer, she might at least see some of its beauties. No wonder that Catherine felt happy as she returned to her own occupations in her aunt's cottage, for she had given gladness to a sorrowful heart.

CHAPTER V.

SOME days after St John's eve, Bridget O'Reilly received word from Lady Margaret de Courcy that there would be Mass at the Manor-house on the following Sunday, and that she and the other Catholics in the town were invited to attend. This message was quickly spread among the little congregation.

The good widow kept one of the largest and most respectable shops in Penzance, and had by her upright dealing, her charity to her neighbors, and her exemplary life, gained the esteem and affection of all the townsfolks. She never went to their church, it is true, nor mentioned the subject of religion; but this they either attributed to a total indifference concerning it, or, if they suspected her adherence to the ancient faith, the time was not so far removed when all England had been Catholic that they should entertain any great dislike to so excellent a woman on that account.

Penzance had, indeed, suffered less from religious persecution than most other parts of the country. The hatred of the government was directed with far greater bitterness against the missionary priests who had been educated abroad than against those ordained before the Reformation; and many of the latter were suffered to exercise their functions unmolested, especially in Cornwall; but as these became extinct, which was the case towards the middle of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, the people in that part of England were left without any spiritual teachers; and thus, about the time of our story, the inhabitants of Penzance were extremely ignorant, and for the most part indifferent about religion; for though they had fallen away from the Catholic faith, they had not yet embraced Protestant opinions. There were a few persons, indeed, of whom the smith, John Tregarthen, was the head, who were possessed with a fanatical zeal, and of this, declamations against Catholics were a chief sign.

After having been thus left to itself for many years, Penzance was at length supplied with a Protestant minister and a commissioner, who both took up their abode in the town a few weeks before Catherine's arrival.

The minister of the gospel-occupied himself very little about his flock, spending most of his time in hawking and other field-sports.

His friend, the commissioner, had been sent to Penzance with the view of putting down the smuggling and wrecking that prevailed on the coast in that direction.

But this he found less easy than he had expected; for he soon saw that he was surrounded by an uncivilized and lawless set of men, who had long engaged in their odious trade with impunity, and who would doubtless have scrupled very little to put an end to his life, had he interfered with them.

He was far removed from military aid, and had with him only a small body of attendants on whom he could rely.

He decided, therefore, though with some reluctance, that it would be more prudent not to meddle with their concerns till he should have established his influence more thoroughly over the inhabitants, who might, in time, be induced to act with him against the wreckers. But Mr. Higgins was not a man to acquire influence; he was one of those dry harsh natures who are served and obeyed through fear, but never conciliate the affections of any one; and he was not therefore likely to succeed with people who felt that he had not power to enforce his commands.

His pride was deeply wounded on finding that his authority was set at defiance. To compensate himself for this humiliation, and to throw some glory on his stay in Penzance, he determined to institute a rigorous search after priests. Having heard that a Catholic gentleman resided at the Manor-house, he gave orders to his attendants to be constantly on the watch to detect if missionary priests were ever harbored there.

From the peace which Sir Reginald and his family had hitherto enjoyed, they had little apprehension of danger. On Sunday, therefore, as had been arranged, while the commissioner was attending service in the parish church of Madron, a considerable number, including the family and servants, and many tenants and laborers on the estate, with a few townspeople, among whom of course were Bridget and Catherine, assembled in the beautiful chapel of the Manor and heard Mass.

The adorable Sacrifice had been offered, most of the worshippers had left, Bridget and her young friend still remained in prayer before the altar, when a waiting-woman came, and told Catherine that her ladyship desired to speak to her. She accordingly followed the maid to what was called the 'Ladies' Bower.'

In an old-fashioned arm-chair at the further end of the apartment sat the lady, dressed in that peculiar style with which the portraits of that period have made us familiar. There was in her manner a great dignity, but no haughtiness; so that while she inspired respect, she also won the affection of all who approached her. Catherine felt rather shy on first entering, but Lady Margaret's kind words gave her courage.

'My child,' said the lady, 'Father Ralph has spoken to me concerning you. He says that for many years he has known you; that you have been well brought up, and fully instructed in our holy religion; but that those with whom you now reside have fallen away from the true faith. Full well do I know, dear child, how sad a thing it is that at so tender an age, you should have none to counsel you in difficulties, or console and comfort you in trouble. Widow O'Reilly told me that Dame Barnby was your aunt, and that with her you live, who, though she is doubtless a worthy woman, can give you no spiritual assistance; nay, perhaps she would rather hinder you in that respect. Wherefore, seeing to how many and great dangers you are exposed, I feel much interest in you, and I desire that you should come here occasionally to assist at the prayers, and receive religious instruction. Your mother doubtless taught you to use your needle; if so, I can give you plenty of employment; and my waiting-woman shall teach you any skillful work of which you are ignorant. And thus, dear child, will you find friends here, and assistance in the way of salvation.'

Catherine, who had listened with joy to these propositions, now expressed her warmest gratitude to lady Margaret, who, charmed with the respectful bearing and sweet simplicity of the young girl, was astonished to find in one of her station of life so much refinement of manner.

Catherine then returned home with Bridget, to whom she imparted the glad tidings. The good woman was already acquainted with Lady Margaret's intentions, and had been commissioned by her to ask Dame Barnby's consent. Catherine was glad of this, as she did not know whether her aunt would be pleased or not with these arrangements.

When they reached the cottage, Bridget entered, Catherine going down to the beach with her cousins. Eager were the inquiries of the children as to what she had done at the Manor-house, and whether she had seen the priest.

Catherine's answers were prudent; for she feared that by an over-hasty confidence in her little friends she might bring trouble on the De Courcys, and therefore she avoided saying anything concerning Mass, or how many or who the persons were who had assisted at it; she satisfied Maw by telling him that she had seen Father Ralph, and that, moreover, the good priest had inquired after him; which greatly pleased the boy.

'O,' said Maw, 'that makes me think I wish you would tell Ruth and me about God, as you did that evening when we led the gentleman to the manor. I tried to repeat it to her, but I could not make her understand, for I did not know it well myself.'

Catherine willingly assented; and the children having seated themselves on the rocks, she explained to them the first part of the Catechism—that wonderful book, which contains such high mysteries, and is yet adapted to the understanding of a child. Her cousins listened with eager attention, and so rapidly did the time seem to pass that they were all quite astonished when Dame Barnby called them for the midday meal.

'Now, Kate,' she said to her niece when they came in, 'Widow O'Reilly has just been telling me that the Lady Margaret wants you to go up to the Manor-house yonder of an afternoon to work with her waiting-women, and she will give you work to bring home if you are quick at it, and so you will gain a little money. It's very kind of her ladyship, and I am very willing you should go; but they are all Papists there, and perchance they might want to make you one, which would not have mattered much a year ago, to be sure, but now this commissioner has come, the less one has to do with Popery the better. So take care, Kate.'

Without waiting for an answer, Dame Barnby turned away, leaving Catherine very glad that she had not raised any objection to Lady Margaret's kind offers.

CHAPTER VI.

A BEAUTIFUL sight indeed is a truly Christian home, in which each member of the household, master and servant, parent and child, unite in serving God; where the heads of the family encourage and influence their dependents by their virtuous lives, and where a spirit of union and peace pervades the atmosphere. Surely on such a home the eye of the Almighty must rest with pleasure; and to the angels, who gaze with sad wonderment on the wickedness of man, it is doubtless a refreshing sight, like that of an oasis to the weary traveler in the sandy desert.

It was a family such as this that inhabited the ancient Manor-house to which Catherine and Maw had guided Father Ralph, and to which the former was henceforward to resort for religious instruction and aid.

The gentry of Cornwall at that period were not distinguished either by a love of literary pursuits or by refinement of manner; and if Sir Reginald de Courcy differed from them in these respects, it was principally owing to the superior education he had received from a priest of great learning and piety, who had been chaplain to his father. In the library were to be found many rare old books, illuminated manuscripts, quaint legends of the middle ages, and lives of holy men—works the perusal of which cheered the long winter evenings, and formed the delight of Sir Reginald and his family.

Master and servants would all gather round the spacious hall-chimney; Lady Margaret ever busily engaged with some needle-work; the children listening with fixed attention, while their father read aloud some portion of English history, or the feats of the valiant crusaders, or the relations of devout pilgrims who had visited renowned sanctuaries, or stories of the chivalrous knights of King Arthur. Sometimes one of the party would recount, for the amusement of the rest, one of the old Cornish tales, or 'drolls' as they were called, consisting of marvelous accounts of giants, fairies, and ghosts—stories in which the people greatly delighted.

In the more holy seasons, as in Lent or Advent, the lives of saints and other religious works would take the place of less serious books. There were times, as Sir Reginald looked towards his two sons who sat on the bench which he had occupied when a boy, that he thought with sorrow of the brother who had once sat there by his side, and of whom his own mischievous laughing Hubert forcibly reminded him. It was not that death had robbed him of the companion of his early years; no, a separation far more painful now existed between them, for Cuthbert de Courcy had abandoned the faith of his fathers.

Sir Reginald had vainly written to him, imploring him to consider the peril to which he exposed his soul, the loss of which none of the earthly honors he hoped to obtain by this change of religion could ever compensate. His remonstrances had been received at first with coldness, and then with anger. Years had since passed by, but the dispositions of Cuthbert were unchanged; and though his brother had lost sight of him, the memory of him never faded from his mind.

Lady Margaret was the light and soul of the house. Firm as well as gentle, she was well fitted to preside. Her day was divided between prayer, the duties of her household, which in those days occupied a large share of the attention of even ladies of rank, and the care of her children and of the poor.

To her the needy came for relief, the unhappy for consolation, the sick for remedies, and those in trouble for advice. In the midst of her numerous occupations she was ever to be seen cheerful and happy, promoting the comfort of all around her. Her husband found in her a devoted wife and prudent counsellor, who encouraged and supported him in all good works; and to her children she was an affectionate and watchful mother, not foolishly indulgent; for both she and Sir Reginald considered it as the first duty of Christian parents to bring up their children in the fear and love of God, and to make them useful members of society.

Lady Margaret had received a solid education, which enabled her to instruct her children herself and to guide them in their various studies; she was also very skillful in all kinds of needle-work. But there was one especial art with which she was acquainted, which is little known to ladies of the present day. In a sunny spot behind the dwelling was a piece of ground watered by a running stream, and here it was that Lady Margaret cultivated wholesome herbs with the medicinal properties of which she was well acquainted. She collected and dried their leaves or flowers, and stored them away, carefully labelled, in a room devoted to that purpose. If any one in the house were ill, or if poor persons in the neighborhood were suffering from colds or fevers, she knew of some simple remedy among her herbs to cure them, or at least to alleviate their pain.

The days succeeded each other in peaceful rotation, bringing with them the same duties and occupations; and thus, removed from the hopes and fears, ambitious projects and contentions of the rest of the world, the inhabitants of Bron-Welli passed their lives in happy retirement. There were no newspapers to convey to the good people of Penzance the events of the day. Occasionally a wandering pedlar, or a benighted traveler, who sought hospitality at the Manor, recounted the tales he had heard of what had happened in the other places or the events he himself had witnessed; and thus news from the busy world without came to them like echoes from a distant land.

The year before Catherine's arrival at Penzance had been a sad one to the De Courcys; two of the children, the merry Hubert and a younger sister, had fallen victims to that very fatal, and then prevalent disease, small-pox. Only two children now remained; the eldest son Austin, who was about thirteen, and Barbara, a little girl scarcely two years of age.

One thing had been a source of deep regret to Sir Reginald and his pious wife, and this was the difficulty which Catholics experienced from not having priests to minister to their spiritual wants; one particularly felt by themselves at the death of their children when no priest was present to repeat the prayers for the dying, and to give the last blessing.

Father Ralph was therefore received into this devout household with great joy, especially as, unlike the other priests who had visited them and only remained a short time, he had directions from his superior to establish a mission in Cornwall, and had consented to make the Manor his head-quarters.

Such was the house and family to which Catherine now frequently resorted, and where she soon became a great favorite with Lady Margaret, her waiting-women, and especially little Barbara, on whom she frequently attended.

Those were pleasant afternoons for the young girl when she was able to go to Bron-Welli. Lady Margaret and her maids would assemble in a large room to work together, as was then the homely custom. The lady during that time gave them religious instruction, and allowed each one to question her freely; or she recounted some edifying tale, and to these Catherine listened with great pleasure, repeating, on her return home, to her little cousins what she had just learnt.

All were surprised to see how beautifully she could embroider; and as Lady Margaret paid her well for her work, Dame Barnby was the last person to be dissatisfied.

Two months had elapsed since Catherine's first interview with Lady Margaret, when one day she arrived at Bron-Welli hot and breathless.

'Why have you come with such great speed, my Kate?' inquired her kind benefactress.

'I have made haste to come and warn you; for on my way hither I met the commissioner, and with him persons from the town, coming to search the house for priests. I overheard them say so.'

Consternation was visible in the faces of the waiting-women, and they whispered their mutual fears as they stood expecting the orders of their mistress, who, despatching some in search of Father Ralph and Austin, herself went to Sir Reginald, taking with her Catherine to give all necessary details. Sir Reginald deemed it prudent to conceal the priest, fearing the commissioner might discover him to be such.

Not far from the chapel was a hiding-place, which was entered by taking up the floor near the fire-place. Father Ralph descended by this means into a small dark closet, and those without carefully closed up the entrance. The altar furniture was stowed away, and all ornaments taken from the chapel.

Scarcely had these arrangements been completed, when the commissioner and his party drew up in the court-yard, and having dismounted, entered, announcing to the dismayed servant who gave admittance to the unwelcome visitors, that they intended 'forthwith to search the house with much diligence for Popish priests and the like.'

They were met in the hall by Sir Reginald. 'Sir,' said the commissioner, in a solemn and pompous tone, 'I presume that you are Sir Reginald de Courcy, to whom belongeth this mansion.' The latter having assented he then continued: 'Having been appointed by the Sheriff of Cornwall to see that the laws of the realm are not violated with impunity in these remote parts, I intend by my zeal in performing my various duties, nay also by needful severity, if the same becometh necessary, to render myself worthy of the confidence of the high official whom I represent. Now it hath come to my hearing that a Popish priest hath entered this town unawares, and doth lie concealed in some place unknown to us; and moreover, seeing that you and your household refrain from attending the church, I thought you, sir, might be so rash as, despite the commands of our gracious lady the Queen, to give harbor to an enemy of the state; and therefore it is that I have come hither to search your house.'

Mr. Higgins considered that he had a great talent for speaking, and never lost an opportunity of displaying his oratorical powers. He now fixed his penetrating gaze on Sir Reginald, anxious to discover what effect his discourse had produced. But he was disappointed, as no fear was portrayed in the calm, almost stern, look that met his own; nor were there any signs of agitation in the manly voice that addressed him thus:

'Sir, in this house there is no such a one as you describe; no enemy of the state has ever found shelter beneath my roof. But if it please you to search the place, do so; you are welcome.'

'I do not require your permission to do that to which I have a right, and which it is my duty to do,' replied the commissioner sharply. 'Here, men,' he cried, to those who accompanied him, 'we must begin. But this gentleman must be locked up, or he may be gone ere we return from our search.'

'Be satisfied on that point,' replied Sir Reginald, who felt not a little indignant at the imputation of cowardice which the remark involved; 'you will find me here when your search is ended.'

'Very well,' replied the other, reluctantly; 'let us to work.'

The party then spread themselves through the house; but the commissioner soon perceived that it would be almost impossible to find any one without some clue to their hiding-place; for the Manor was a rambling building, with an endless number of passages, deep recesses, queer-shaped rooms, large granaries, and vaulted cellars. Vainly they felt along the tapestried walls to discover if any person were concealed behind; with no better results they measured the rooms with long poles, so that if any part were not accounted for, they might pierce into that portion of the wall.

At length the commissioner found his way to the chapel. A Catholic place of worship it had certainly been, but there were no signs of its being now used as such; and as those who had raised the beautiful little Gothic structure were long since gone to their repose, Mr. Higgins could censure no one for its existence. Leaving the spot, he mounted a small spiral staircase, which led to the room where Father Ralph lay concealed.

'Geoffry,' said the commissioner to one of his men, 'do you see those bricks near the fire-place? They look to me as if they had been newly put down.'

'Certainly, sir, they have that appearance. Is it your pleasure that we should remove them?'

'Might there not be a place for a man to get down into the wall of the chimney below, by lifting up this hearth?' remarked another of the pursuivants several of whom had collected round the spot.

'It is only the rats, yer honor,' said a voice from behind; and the commissioner, on looking round, saw a tall, vigorous man standing at the top of the stairs.

'O, here is Larry O'Toole!' said one of the party, who recognized in the new-comer an Irish servant who had been many years at the Manor.

'I gave orders for all the serving-folks to be locked up; why have I not been obeyed?' demanded Mr. Higgins in an angry tone. Before his attendants had time to answer, Larry responded:

'Sure 'tis out of the house I was until I came in, and then one of yer own men told me what ye were looking for. It's not much they will find, says I. But when I saw ye searching where we took up the bricks to get at them rats, why, sure, I did not like to see a gentleman like your honor troubling himself about so small a matter. It's no concern of mine, of course; so I'll just say no more about it, if yer honor does not wish.'

The commissioner seemed puzzled; he looked sternly at Larry, who was now leaning against the chimney with well-feigned indifference, although in truth, he felt anything but indifferent as to the result of the search.

'You are a Papist, as your master is, I suppose?'

'Faix, yer honor, I am,' replied the servant.

'Then you are not to be relied on. Here, men, take up these bricks, and let us see what rats are under them,' exclaimed Mr. Higgins impatiently.

'I'll defend his reverence to my dying breath, if they do get him out,' thought Larry to himself, as he saw them removing the first brick. At that moment a wild shout of joy resounded through the corridor. All stopped to listen.

'They have found something,' said one of the pursuivants. 'Shall we go and see ere we try what seems a very unlikely place for a man to hide in?'

The commissioner, not wishing that any other than himself should have the honor of a discovery, agreed to this; and they all left the room to join the rest of the party, who had found a hollow place in the wall behind a large piece of tapestry, which they had partly torn down. Considerable time and trouble were expended in piercing the wall, when what evidently had been intended as a place of concealment was exposed to view. Lights were procured, the mysterious spot carefully examined, and, to the great disappointment of the searchers, nothing was found.

The day was now fast declining; the last rays of the sun had faded from the western side of the old Manor. Discouraged by their ill success, the pursuivants resolved to depart at once, not considering it necessary to make any further search in the room near the chapel.

The commissioner and his party passed through the hall where Sir Reginald was still seated. The sharp features of Mr. Higgins wore an expression of baffled spite; and although he said little, he appeared much mortified.

'I have found nothing this time,' were the only words he uttered; and without waiting for an answer he left the house.

Of the party of townspeople who, at the instigation of the ever-busy blacksmith, had volunteered to accompany him, some laughed at his failure, others grumbled at the useless trouble they had given themselves; one and all agreed that they would not again put such ready faith in mere reports; and none were more convinced of the folly of doing so than the commissioner himself.

'Geoffrey' he said turning abruptly to the unfortunate attendant who had brought him the tidings, 'where heardest thou about the priest?'

Master, 'twas as I told you that two men said that a person whom they had seen told them he had traveled here with a man who looked much like a Popish priest.'

'Then if you wish to remain in my service,' retorted Mr. Higgins, 'take heed that you never bring the like uncertain reports again to disquiet me.'

CHAPTER VII.

The last days of October had been chilly; the first of November dawned cheerless and foggy, and as the day wore on, its aspect did not improve. At four o'clock that afternoon the narrow streets of Penzance were dark and dismal, and for some reason there was not the usual stir or business. An individual, well wrapt up in a ponderous cloak, was the only person to be seen; he walked with hurried step, appearing absorbed in thought. The road was one with which he was evidently well acquainted, for he mechanically turned up and down, from street to street, scarcely ever raising his eyes from the ground until he entered the main thoroughfare, and then he did look up, and stopped short for the din of voices struck his ear, contrasting strangely with the previous silence. Stephen Casterman, for he it was, gazed with some surprise on the motley group that had collected at the blacksmith's door, and completely obstructed the pathway. The old hump-backed cobbler was there, with a boot in process of mending; the carpenter, with his rule peeping out of his pocket; and sturdy little lads, the sons of fishermen, were standing with their hands behind their backs, staring up in bewilderment at the smith, a tall man of gigantic strength, and a person of great importance in the town.

Thomas Tregarthen, besides being well acquainted with his trade, knew a little of everything, and was a great talker on all subjects. On the present occasion he seemed to be haranguing the people. Casterman determined to ascertain what the matter was, and pushed his way through the crowd.

'O, Master Casterman,' exclaimed the little cobbler, 'here you are!'

'Well,' returned Stephen, 'what is Thomas Tregarthen talking to you all about to-day?'

'He was just giving us his ideas on religion. You know awhile ago the constable searched Sir Reginald's house for a Papist priest, whom folks said was there: methought it was a grievous thing to molest so good a gentleman. However, the constable has offered a reward to any one who shall find the hiding-place of the said priest; so the carpenter has been on the look-out.

'Well, what has he found?' interrupted Casterman, who was growing impatient.

'In truth, he found nothing, but he thought he had, and came to Master Tregarthen's to talk it over in a neighborly way, as we always do; I and a couple of others were in the forge at the time; and the passers stopping to see what the matter was, there gathered the crowd you see, and Master Tregarthen got very warm about religion; he is a marvelously good speaker. I could listen to him the live-long day.

'Well,' said Casterman, 'as I have no time to lose in talking or in hearing others talk, I'll wish you all good-afternoon;' and with these words he left his gossiping companion, while the blacksmith continued preaching in a loud tone against the horrors and dangers of Popery.

Stephen hurried on his road. At length he stopped before a wretched house in a dirty narrow lane which ran from the harbor towards the old market place. The nets which hung on the sides of the dwellings, the strong smell of fish which pervaded the atmosphere, and the hardy-looking men in blue home-spun jackets who sauntered about the doors, showed that the quarter was one principally inhabited by fishermen and their families. To many of the former Casterman was known as a daring wrecker and smuggler.

'Too much mist at sea to-day for a boat to venture out? What think you, Casterman?' said one of the men. Stephen answered by a kind of grunt, and gave a vigorous push to the door, whose old hinges creaked and shivered as it flew open.

The room into which the wrecker entered was small and miserable, and so dark that the numerous objects that filled it were scarcely distinguishable. Its sole occupant was an old man, whose long white beard and straggling locks gave him a somewhat wild appearance, his hooked nose and piercing black eyes betokening a Jewish origin; the expression of his face was far from agreeable, there being a look of cunning and deceit impressed upon it, which had increased with age. This individual was, when his visitor entered seated in an old chair, his thin bony hands grasping a leather purse, of which he had been counting one by one the glittering contents; but the moment the door was pushed open, money and purse had disappeared in the Jew's pocket.

'Good-afternoon to you Isaac,' said Casterman. 'The Dame Barnby's child and my own little girl brought you the bundle of clothes and other small things from the last wreck, did they not?'

'Yes,' replied the Jew; 'and a worthless lot they are. There, he added, dragging some old clothes from under his chair; 'who do you think would buy that? Why, half the braid is off the coat, and one of the sleeves is nearly torn to pieces. The fellow who wore it must have struggled violently, trying to get up the rocks near Ty-an-donr, may be.'

'Perhaps so; but that's no matter. What will you give for the whole lot?'

An animated discussion ensued between the wrecker and the Jew, and at length the articles were reluctantly paid for by the latter.

Casterman then produced with an air of triumph a beautiful diamond ring which he had brought in his pocket.

'What think you of that?' he inquired.

The old man took it eagerly in his hand, rubbed the precious stones, and murmured half to himself.

'Real diamonds, set in gold,—eight of them I do declare! But,' he added in a louder tone, 'what use is so costly an article to me: who in this poor town would purchase it? I can't give much for it or I should lose by it.'

Why do you speak thus? rejoined Stephen angrily. 'You know well that an such things as are too costly to find a purchaser here, you sell to your nephew, who comes from London town.'

'True,' replied Isaac 'but he cometh only once in the year, the journey being long and much beset with dangers; now he was here not fully two months ago, so I must needs keep this ring over ten months.'

'Well,' said Casterman, 'you won't make me believe that the keep thereof costs anything.'

He put the ring in his pocket, and advanced towards the door; Isaac called him back.

'Come, don't let us quarrel, and don't be off in such a hurry, Casterman. I was just going to propose a plan for you to gain a right good sum of money, therefore ought you to be glad to give me this ring cheap. Of course you will likewise share with me half what you will gain by following my plan. Do you understand?'

'No,' said Casterman. 'Say what you mean at once, and don't keep me waiting here.'

'I will,' replied the Jew hesitatingly. 'I will; but you promise to give me half?'

'Half what?' demanded the wrecker impatiently.

'Why, half the money that I shall make you gain.'

'And why do you want my help? not surely for the pleasure of sharing some money with me,' said Casterman sarcastically.

'Ah, I wax old, and can't do all I want, so you must needs help me. You promised to let me have half?'

'Yes, yea; go on, and be quick.'

'Listen,' replied the Jew. 'I heard say that a Popish priest was in the town.'

'Is that all you have to tell me?' interrupted the other. 'I heard it long ago; it is no matter to me, and ought to be none to you, I am sure, who are but a Jew.'

'All Christians are the same to me; I hate them all,' said Isaac scornfully; 'but there is a reward offered to any one who can find out the priests and such as harbor them. A hundred pounds is the price.'

'I can't be looking for priests and the like; where should I find them? they keep themselves hidden up, for good reason too; they have a bad chance of their life when they are caught.'

'Hark ye,' said the Jew. 'I have not dwelt all my life in this miserable old house, that is falling about mine ears, like the building that one of my fore-fathers, Samson, pulled down on the heads of the Philistines; nay, I was rich and prosperous once, the partner of a wealthy merchant; but the tide of fortune went against me. My partner was a Christian of one sort, and then he changed his religion and became another sort of a Christian, a Catholic, or Papist as they be more commonly named; he worshiped in secret and used much caution; but he liked and trusted me, and many things did he let me see that he and his friends did. I then noticed that on their Sabbathday they try to have a priest; and if you were to watch, you would find that all these Papists have at some time of the year a priest in their houses. Now, Sir Reginald is one of them; watch him, and you are sure to discover that he harbors priests.'

'Very good; but how am I to watch? I never go near the Manor.'

'Ah,' said Isaac musingly, 'that is true; do you know any of the serving folk?'

'No; how should I?'

'Well, I will tell you what you must do; make friends with the servants of the Manor; in every house there is a traitor, believe me.'

'I'll try,' replied Casterman, who seemed puzzled as to how he was to attain the desired object. 'Good-afternoon Isaac.'

'You don't forget that you are to give me half the money?' cried the Jew anxiously.

'Yes, when I have it. I promise,' said the other with a sneer.

So saying the wrecker took his departure. Enveloped in his dark cloak, he hastily retraced his steps homeward. That evening, Stephen intimated to his brother what the Jew had told him; Mark concurred in old Isaac's opinion, that the surest way of knowing Sir Reginald's movements was to become acquainted with his servants.

Any one who has read the description of a Cornish gentleman's residence in former days will readily understand that Stephen Casterman found no difficulty in gaining admittance to the kitchen of the Manor. Sir Reginald lived on friendly terms with all his poorer neighbors, and the hungry or the tired laborer or fisherman, who passed the open door of the spacious room which served the double office of kitchen and servants' hall, was sure to find a welcome from those within, and a slice of cheese and home-baked bread if he needed it; and there too he might sit by the roaring fire of a winter's evening, chatting with the attendants. One afternoon, therefore, Stephen, after an unsuccessful day's fishing not far from the Manor, left his companions to row back in the boats, and directed his steps towards the house. The wrecker, as we have before remarked, was not a favorite in the neighborhood, being by nature silent and gloomy; and as his ancestors were Danes, who had come, as was usual in those days, on a smuggling expedition, and had subsequently settled in Cornwall, the people were wont to remark among themselves 'that it was easy to see that the Castermans had no true Cornish blood in them, for they never made a friend of any man.' When, therefore, Stephen entered the kitchen on the afternoon referred to—the idea of a friendly visit from such a morose individual never presenting itself to the minds of the inmates—their sudden appearance caused quite a sensation.

'Hey, Master Casterman, what's befallen you?' exclaimed one.

'Any of your comrades drowned?' asked another.

'Nothing of the sort,' he replied: 'but the fishing is bad, and I am weary, not having eaten a morsel since morn. They say Sir Reginald never grudges a bit to a hungry man, so, being nigh the house, I stepped in.'

'You are welcome,' said one of the servants, as he handed him a large piece of bread and cheese, which Casterman, who really was hungry, eagerly grasped. Between mouthfuls he looked inquiringly at the inmates of the kitchen, wondering how he could obtain from them the information he desired. His eye at length rested on a young man who was standing talking with a fellow-servant. To a casual observer, Andrew Harkwright would have appeared a thoughtless merry fellow; but any one gifted with a quick perception of character might have discerned an uneasiness in his look and restlessness in his manner which denoted that all within was not right.

These peculiarities would probably have escaped the notice of Casterman, had not the expression of alarm which suddenly appeared on the young man's face, when he found that the eyes of the wrecker were fixed upon him, been too marked not to arouse his attention.

'That man has done something he is afraid should be known,' thought Stephen; and in his mind he marked him as his prey. But although Casterman paid more than one visit to the Manor, he could not find an opportunity of speaking alone to Harkwright.

CHAPTER VIII.

CATHERINE had now grown used to her new home; there were numerous trials in it, but there was also much good to be done; and that to an energetic and zealous character was a source of happiness.

At first Dame Barnby felt no great liking for her niece; but when she saw how industrious she was and that, far from being a burden to the family, she gained money by her work, she became more favorable to her.

Still the cold and at times harsh manner of her aunt was peculiarly painful to the poor child, accustomed to a fond mother's love, and possessed of a warm and affectionate heart. Sometimes she was tempted to yield to discouragement; or, when Dame Barnby only evinced displeasures at what she had done for the good of her and the children, her naturally quick temper would for a moment rise. But Catherine's was not a weak or cowardly disposition, and if the road she trod was more arduous than hitherto, she did not on that account abandon the narrow path which leads to eternal life; and when nature whispered that her endeavours to make her aunt happy and contented, and to turn her thoughts to religion, would be all in vain, and that she herself never could find peace and joy in that cottage, where all was so different to the home of her childhood;—when thoughts such as these presented themselves, she would reject them as unworthy of a follower of the crucified Saviour; and so she advanced bravely on her road. Lady Margaret's good counsels were of great assistance to her; but of late her visits to the Manor-house had become less frequent, owing to the shortness of the winter afternoons. She had also found a kind friend in Bridget O'Reilly, to whom Maw would sometimes say reproachfully, 'You love Kate better than us, whom you have known so much longer.' But she would laugh, and answer that her heart was large enough to cherish them all; and so it was, but it must be owned the young orphan had a very large share of her affections.

The attachment between Catherine and her consins grew stronger each day. She had taught Ruth how to spin and sew; and as Lady Margaret generally gave her little protegee some needlework to do for her at home, they would sit and work together, when Catherine would explain to Ruth and Susan the principal mysteries of religion, and repeat to them the good instructions she received at the Manor.

The monotony of every-day life in Dame Barnby's cottage was disturbed by an event which cast a gloom over the little family.

Catherine's aunt had gone one afternoon, towards the end of December, to Ty-an-dour, telling the children that she would return soon; but the hours passed by, supper-time came, and still there was no sign of Dame Barnby; they waited in vain, until the two youngest of the party growing sleepy, after eating their share of the repast, went to bed.

The darkness of a winter's night had now set in; and when Ruth and her cousin opened the door to ascertain if any one were coming, they felt that a cold wind was blowing.

'Mother would never cross the moors in the dark,' said Ruth; 'she must have stopped at Ty-an-dour. She did so once before, I remember; so we had better wait no longer, but go to bed.'

They both retired to rest. But early next morning all was astir in the cottage, and as Dame Barnby did not appear, it was agreed that Ruth and Maw should start in search of her; and if they did not meet her on the road, proceed to Ty-an-dour, and see what had happened.

Time seemed to pass slowly indeed to Catherine, who anxiously awaited their return. At last little Susan, who had run out to look if they were coming, rushed back into the cottage, crying:

'Two men carrying mother; come and see, Kate!'

There, indeed, was poor Dame Barnby lying on a kind of stretcher, borne along by the two Castermans; Ruth and her brother following, weeping.

When she approached nearer, Catherine saw that her aunt was insensible.

'O, Ruth,' she exclaimed, 'what has happened?'

'Mother's arm is broken,' sobbed the child; 'when we first found her we thought she was dead.'

The poor woman was laid on her bed; Bridget came in to nurse her; and Maw was despatched for a bone-setter of great repute in the neighborhood.

When Ruth was a little composed, she related to her cousin all that had occurred. On her reaching Ty-an-dour with her brother, Dame Casterman told them that their mother had left the house late on the previous night; she then called to her sons, and asked them to go with the children, and look if the poor woman had fallen over the rocks near the sea, which they did; and after some search discovered her lying at the foot of the cliffs. They at first fancied she was dead; but on lifting her up a faint moan reassured them that life was not extinct.

Besides having her arm broken, Dame Barnby had received severe internal injuries; and in spite of the care bestowed on her by Catherine and Ruth, and the kindness of Lady Margaret in visiting her, and sending provisions and remedies to her, she seemed each day to grow worse.

Nothing could equal the devotedness of Catherine to her sick relative; she was also assisted by Widow O'Reilly, who being more experienced, knew what was best to do for the relief of the sufferer.

One evening Bridget came into the cottage, and said she would sit down with Dame Barnby, while the children might go and take a walk.

'Ah, Bridget,' said the sick woman, 'I fear much that I am dying.'

'Dying is it, my own poor Winifred? O, surely no, it cannot be; and yet you do look very ill,' she said, as she gazed on her pale face.

'Yes,' replied Winifred, 'I know I am very bad, and nothing can save me.'

'God can,' said Widow O'Reilly softly.

'God? O, I never thought of God during life, and He will not remember me in death. It is fearful to think of dying; not indeed that life has been easy for me; but then there are one's poor children to leave, and all that one knows and loves in this world; and worst of all is the thought of another world, of which one forgets the very existence when one is well and strong.'

'May the God of heaven forgive me, that I never spoke to you before, said Bridget, as she wiped the tears from her eyes. 'I loved ye dearly, my Winny; but I had not the heart to speak to you of religion, for I thought you would never listen to me; now you will, won't you?'

'Say anything you like,' murmured the sick woman. 'You have been a good friend to me, and did not abandon me after my foolish marriage, like the rest did. But,' she added sorrowfully, 'you can do me no more good now; I must needs bid farewell to all.'

'Ah, weep not at the thought, Winny dear; it is home you are going to. Now, when I saw you were so ill, sure, said I to myself, that poor soul is going to leave its house and start on a long journey, longer much than to my own sweet Ireland, and if I do not tell her the right road to take to heaven, it will rest as a dark shadow on my heart to my dying day. So I have come to speak to you of the other world.'

'I heard there was a heaven and a hell, and grandame used to tell me when I was a girl, that if I was good, I would go to the one, and if bad, to the other, but that is no comfort to me, for what have I done to go to heaven?'

'And if you have never done a good action in all your days, it is not too late to repent, Winny. When our Blessed Lord was on earth, He told the people a beautiful story, which it always does my poor heart good to think on. He said there was a shepherd once who had a hundred sheep, and one of them strayed away and lost itself: well, what do you think the Good Shepherd did? why, sure, he left the ninety-nine others, and went in search of the lost one, and looked everywhere until he found it; and then he caressed it, and carried it home on his shoulders to the fold. Now, our Blessed Lord says that He is that Good Shepherd, and that is how He brings back the souls of poor sinners who have wandered away from Him. Now, if you will only turn to Him, and tell Him that you are sorry for having offended Him, why, sure, then He will send the holy angels down to bear your soul up to heaven; they rejoice, 'tis said, more over one sinner doing penance than over ninety-nine just.'

'All that is very beautiful,' said Dame Barnby; 'but how am I to turn to God? I would willingly do anything I could to escape hell.'

'We can obtain nothing, except through the merits of Jesus Christ, Who died on the Cross to save us all. Let us have recourse to Him, Winny. Will ye say these prayers with me?'

Bridget knelt down by the bedside of her poor friend, and with uplifted hands prayed fervently. When she arose there was an earnest expression in the deep-blue eyes of the old Irishwoman, as though she were about to say something of much importance.

'Winifred,' she at length said, 'I am a Catholic and have been one all the days of my life, glory be to God! I cannot let you die, my poor friend, without telling you that that is the true religion. I could bring a holy priest to you, if you would see him; and he it is who would speak words to you which would gladden your heart. What can a poor woman like myself, who am no better than another, do for you? But to the priest God has given power to forgive the sins of such as confess to him. O, Winny, if you would tell him yours, he would, in the name of the great God, promise you pardon for them all; you would die in peace; and the angels would make your bed in the heavens. Think of it, Winny dear.'

'I will,' murmured the woman faintly.

'Here are the children,' said Widow O'Reilly; 'so I shall wish you good-evening, and go; my little Kate will take good care of you, and Ruth will too. God bless them both.'

Catherine and her cousin made every thing as comfortable as they could round the sick woman; the former now slept in her aunt's room, that she might be near to administer to her wants during the night.

The following morning Dame Barnby related to her niece and daughter what Bridget had told her the previous evening, and asked them if they knew that their old friend was a Papist.

'In truth, I did,' replied Catherine smiling, 'and moreover I am a Catholic myself.'

The aunt was too weak to say much, so she bade the young girl not speak to her about religion; adding that she was a Protestant, and would die in that creed.

Although Dame Barnby spoke thus, she felt far from easy as to the future. She was not really attached to any faith; but now that her last hour seemed to be approaching, she found that religion was the only thing that could give her consolation. The old Irishwoman often came and sat by the bedside of her sick neighbor, and she and Catherine would talk to her of the world beyond the grave, of repentance for past sins, of the passion and death of our Saviour, and explain to her the Catholic doctrine. Several times they pressed her to see the priest; but to this she always gave a determined refusal.

Many wise dames, who knew Winifred Barnby, prophesied that she had not long to live. But she possessed a strong constitution, and after weeks of suffering there was a gradual improvement in her state; the fever subsided, she was able to rest at night, and towards the end of January, although still very weak, she could once more move about her cottage, or sit in the old wooden arm-chair by the fire, or, when the day was very fine, by the open window.

It was during her long and painful illness that Dame Barnby noticed and admired more than she had hitherto done the good qualities of her young niece. Besides being attentive to her sick relative, Catherine did the principal work in the cottage, and looked after her younger cousins. Her aunt was surprised to see one so young and joyous displaying a steadiness and devotedness rarely found even in those much older; and it occurred to her that this was perhaps owing to the religion of which Catherine spoke with such love and reverence.

Dame Barnby had approached the threshold of death, and at that fearful moment her immortal soul awoke as it were from a deep slumber; vague terrors seized the poor woman, and as it was only when Catherine knelt by her and prayed, or spoke to her of the mercies of God, of Jesus Christ having died to redeem the world, or of the intercession of His holy Mother on behalf of sinners, that she experienced some peace and for a short interval fear would yield to confidence in her Maker.

But she was now restored to health, and although the thought of serving God faithfully for the future did not quite abandon her, it must be owned that it grew much weaker. The fact was, that when Winifred lay on what she supposed would be her deathbed, only one thing seemed to her necessary, namely, to save her soul; but now that in all probability she had many years to live, worldly interests opposed her good intentions. The Catholic religion she believed to be the true one; but to embrace it exposed her to many dangers.

Another consideration acted powerfully on Dame Barnby's mind, and deterred her from doing what she well knew to be her duty. Her husband had belonged to that band of wreckers of which the Castermans had long been the leaders. After his death she still carried on business with them; she conveyed their ill-gotten goods to the Jews; she brought tidings to the inhabitants of Ty-an-dour of any ship she perceived laboring in a storm; or else she gave warning to the rest of the band that the Castermans would require their services on the coast near their own house; in return for which they allowed her a small share in their gain, and moreover promised to take Maw out with them as soon as he was ten years old. To abandon these connections would have been a loss to her; and yet, from the conversations she had had with Bridget and Catherine, she plainly saw that if she became a Catholic she must do so. It is true that she also gained money by more honorable means, by spinning, helping during harvest-time to bind the corn, and selling fish in the market; but in her straitened circumstances the loss of the Castermans' support and aid was a thing of no small consequence.

While Dame Barnby was thus hesitating between the interests of this world and those of the next: while Widow O'Reilly and Catherine redoubled their prayers for her conversion; Stephen Casterman was very differently, though not less completely, occupied with endeavoring to discover whether Sir Reginald harbored priests. Three months since his interview with the Jew had passed, and he had not obtained any information.

'I shall never succeed,' he said to his brother one morning, as they were both engaged in arranging their nets on the shore. 'I wish I could; fifty pounds would pay the debt to that old Jew.'

'Well, why don't you try what he told you; that, is to make friends with some of the servants?' replied Mark. 'They like to talk about their master's affairs. There is one tall fellow passes here pretty often, just ask him some questions next time.'

'Why, I've been in the kitchen of the Manor several times; but I could not ask them about priests and the like; I don't suppose they would tell me. I never said a word to the fellow you mean, though I have often seen him; however, I will try my best. But look now to the nets. Here, spread out this one;' and the brothers continued their work in silence.

Some days after, as Stephen was leaving the house, intending to proceed to town, he saw Larry coming from the Manor, and walking in the same direction, 'Good-afternoon to you,' said the wrecker, approaching him. The servant returned the salutation.

'Of course I am; and there is not a gentleman in all England or Ireland that I would sooner be serving than his honor.'

'What thought you all of the sheriff's visit? You were much frightened, I suppose?'

'Frightened! sure and what should we be frightened for?' replied Larry.

'Well, I know not,' said the other; 'but I suppose you had priests in the house?'

'Suppose we had, if ye likes.'

'But is it not true that your master does harbor them sometimes? The Jew told me that all Papists do.'

'Sure, man, what would you have a Jew know about the ways of Christian folk? But is it thinking of entering his honor's service ye are?'

'It' replied Casterman indignantly. 'I would not be a servant for the world.'

'Well, then don't be wearing the life out of me with yer questions, sure. I thought, of course, that it was seeing if the house would suit you, you were; but if that is not it, I will just wish you good-morning.' So saying Larry turned down a side street, for they had now reached the town and Casterman continued his road to the house of the Jew, reporting to him his ill-success.

All went on peacefully in the Manor-house and in Dame Barnby's cottage during the next three months; the inhabitants of the former were disturbed by no visits from the commissioner, nor by attempts on the part of Casterman to gain information from their servants. Father Ralph, who now passed as being preceptor to Austin, made frequent missionary journeys through Cornwall, and always returned in safety to Sir Reginald's.

One soft warm afternoon in May, Catherine entered the cottage with her apron full of wild flowers which she had gathered on her way from the Manor. Her aunt was alone in the kitchen, her spinning-wheel revolving rapidly as she drew out the long white tread from her distaff; she stopped working when her niece came in.

'How you love those wild flowers, child!' said the dame.

'Indeed I do,' replied Catherine smiling; 'they are so beautiful! O, what must heaven be, if the things of earth are so fair!'

'It is a happy thing to see the world that way, Kate,' said her aunt. Then after she had paused for a few minutes, as though reflecting on the young girl's exclamation, she continued: 'But there are many sorrows in this world that make one think little of its beauty: and as for the next, not many folks trouble themselves about it: and yet I ought,' she added in a more serious tone; 'for I have been brought back, as it were from death by

God's goodness; and it is in truth very ungrateful of me, now I am well, to forget all the good resolutions I made when I thought I was dying. I believe in the Catholic religion; but then there is the danger that people will find out I am a Catholic; and the commissioner has levied fines on all those above the age of sixteen who do not attend the Protestant church; now that would fall heavy on a poor woman like me.

Catherine spoke long and earnestly with her aunt: she unfolded, with the natural eloquence of one speaking from the heart of what it loves and feels, the immense bounties of God towards us, and the ingratitude of our not serving Him; then she pictured the misery of a soul in the next world that has not loved its Creator in this; and lastly she showed how short and trifling the pains and afflictions of this life are in comparison with the everlasting joy of heaven.

Words dictated by so ardent a love of God and zeal for the salvation of souls could not fail to make an impression on the mind of Dame Barnby: she promised Catherine that if Lady Margaret would allow it, she would go to the Manor and speak to her ladyship and the priest; for there were many things about which she wished to take advice from some one older and more experienced than her niece.

It was with a light and happy heart that the young girl retired to rest that night; Ruth and Maw were also delighted to hear of their mother's intention; all three thanked God for His mercy towards them, and prayed that He would further the good work which was begun.

On the following feast of Pentecost, which fell that year in June, there was great rejoicing in the old Manor-house, and doubtless in heaven also there was joy among the angels, for that day the waters of baptism had regenerated four souls hitherto plunged in ignorance, but now become children of the Catholic Church.

The chapel on that day wore a festive air. The faithful crowded its narrow precincts in greater numbers than usual. All felt an intense interest in the converts; the brotherly charity that reigned among the congregation, the secrecy and caution with which the sacred rites were administered, reminded one of the first days of Christianity.

Before Mass began Dame Barnby and her three children advanced towards the altar. Father Ralph with the assistants said the 'Veni Creator' and some other prayers, and the converts having pronounced the profession of faith, received the sacrament of baptism.

Catherine had another cause for happiness besides the conversion of her aunt and cousins, although that was in itself sufficient to pour gladness into her heart; she had long been preparing to make her First Communion, and in a few minutes her wishes were to be fulfilled.

As she went to the altar the congregation noticed the expression of angelic peace on her features; they saw her devout and recollected manner as she returned to her place; but what passed in her young soul at that supreme moment none but Jesus and the little communicant knew. There are feelings too deep to find utterance in human words; and emotions which it would be vain to attempt to describe.

The happy party returned again in the afternoon to the Manor to assist at prayers. As they approached the house, Lady Margaret met and congratulated them, which, with true delicacy of feeling, she had refrained from doing in the morning, well knowing that souls impressed by the presence of their Creator, and still absorbed in heavenly and solemn thoughts, are ever desirous to be left in silence. What need have they of the words of creatures, when God Himself speaks to their hearts?

Some days later Winifred Barnby had an interview with Dame Casterman, in which she announced that she could no longer perform any of her accustomed services for them. She then, with the hope of changing the heart of the old woman, ventured to remark that the way in which her sons gained their livelihood was far from justifiable; that they were, in truth, answerable for all deaths in vessels of which they caused the wreck; but she only drew on herself such a torrent of abuse, that she retired, though resolving to pray for the conversion of those of whom she had formerly been the accomplice.

Another year passed over; one of peace and happiness to Dame Barnby and her family. By her own industry, and that of Catherine and Ruth, they were enabled to live with more comfort than they had hitherto done.

Winifred entertained great fears that her son, when he grew up, would renew friendship with the Castermans, and become a wrecker like his father, if he remained at Penzance. She confided her anxiety to lady Margaret, and some time after, Sir Reginald arranged with the captain of a Waterford ship, with whom he was acquainted, to take the lad into his service. The captain was a Catholic, and as he was frequently the means of conveying priests to Ireland, he was desirous that all his crew should be Catholics likewise, for the treachery of one might ruin all, and he therefore willingly consented to take Maw, who started on his new career, half sorrowful at leaving his mother and sisters, the friends and scenes of his childhood, yet rejoicing at the prospect before him of a life on the sea full of adventure and danger. Beneath all, there was a lingering hope that some fortunate event would bring back the ship to Penzance before long; but that was not its usual destination, and he feared that many a year would elapse ere his mother once more clasped him in her arms.

Long did the inmates of Dame Barnby's cottage stand on the beach watching the vessel as it glided from the shore; and from their sad hearts rose a fervent prayer for the safety of the sailor-boy. Often during that day of Maw's departure their eyes wandered towards that dark speck on the ocean, each time more distant, which carried on it one so dear to them.

CHAPTER IX.

For two years Father Ralph had exercised his religious functions with comparative security to himself and those with whom he lived, though from time to time disturbed by sudden visits from the commissioner, which, however, to his great disappointment, always proved fruitless.

Stephen Casterman was no less discouraged than the commissioner, for, with all his efforts, he altogether failed in discovering whether priests were harbored at the Manor.

One day, on arriving at the Jew's, he was not a little surprised at seeing a man, whom he at once recognized as Andrew Harkwright, standing and conversing with Isaae.

'Very glad to see you, Master Casterman,' said the latter.

'O, you have some one with you,' muttered Stephen, who stood at the door, half inclined to turn back.

'No, no; come in,' cried the Jew, 'and shut the door after you; the wind doth blow the fire out.'

There was certainly not much fire in the hearth to be extinguished; but Casterman did as he was desired.

'Now,' said Isaae, pointing towards Harkwright, 'that man is a servant at the Manor-house. He wants to borrow a little money from me; but I never lend without security, and he has none who will be security for him. Will you?'

Casterman was about to answer 'No,' when the Jew, in a low voice, said to him:

'Pause a bit, friend; it may be of use to you; all Papists in that house.'

'O, well, I would not mind being security for you,' said the wrecker, turning to Harkwright. 'But are you a Papist?'

The servant, too, had recognized Casterman. For a moment he hesitated and stammered, and then ended by avowing his religion.

'Tell me, now,' continued Casterman; 'does not your master harbor priests?'

'I cannot say; indeed, I cannot speak about that.'

'You must,' said Stephen firmly, as he placed himself against the door.

Harkwright for a time remained silent, a violent war seeming to rage within his breast. 'Shall I betray my master?' at length he exclaimed 'It must be,' he added in an undertone; and then, turning to Casterman, he went on in a trembling voice:

'Naught can I tell you now, nor in this place; I am too much afraid. But meet me to-night, at ten o'clock, on the moors, near the dead oak; you know the spot?'

'Very well,' replied Casterman. 'To-morrow I will be security for you, if you tell me all I want to-night.'

'Ah!' said Isaac with great satisfaction, 'we have been two years working for nothing; but now we have the secret.'

'I have worked two years, but truly I know not what you have done, save sit quietly at home,' replied his gloomy companion.

'Never mind, Master Casterman; you will reap the fruits thereof.'

After some bargaining over their goods the two parted. Anxiously did Casterman await the appointed hour, when he was to meet his new acquaintance on the moors—those same moors before pictured in bright sunshine, but now dreary and desolate; such they would appear on a stormy November night. It was about ten o'clock when, amidst the darkness, a figure might have been noticed advancing slowly and cautiously across the plain, towards a spot where an ancient oak, that had long since ceased to put forth leaves, stretched its blanched arms to the heavens, seeming in the surrounding gloom like some gaunt spectre, guardian of the moors.

Certainly it was not pleasure that at such a time, had brought that lone individual to a place like this; nor, as was apparent from his manner, had any good purpose called him out; for there is in one who is doing a duty, however disagreeable it may be, a certain steadiness of bearing, and a firmness of step, which were wanting in him of whom we speak. At times he crept rather than walked along; then again he would hurry forward, as if desirous of flying from his own thoughts; more than once he looked anxiously behind him, as if he feared that he was pursued; several times he stopped altogether, and gazed around. At last he reached the old oak. The moon, piercing through the broken clouds, now lent her light to the scene; and the timid visitor drew back with terror, as the form of a tall man, who had been leaning against the ivy which mantled the trunk of the tree, so that he seemed to form part of it, now stood erect before him.

'What is the matter? What is it thou fearest?' said the figure, whom Harkwright now recognized as the man whom he had promised to meet.

'I did not think you were there,' he murmured.

'I have been waiting this last quarter of an hour. But let us begin,' said Casterman. 'What is your name, and what information can you give me?'

'My name is Andrew Harkwright,' was the reply. 'But,' and he spoke with hesitation, and with some tremor in his voice, 'are you a priest-hunter?'

'Heed not what I am. At the Jew's to-day you promised to tell me all that I wished to know. Now answer: does your master harbor priests?'

'He is a Catholic, and he has a priest in his house. If you will wait about a month, you may be able to have them both arrested.'

The unhappy man had finished speaking, and had crouched back, shuddering against the thick ivy, as a sudden gust shrieked ominously through the branches of the old tree. Casterman, accustomed to the uproar of the elements, scarcely noticed the wild sounds; his mind was wholly occupied in trying to discover what Harkwright's real object was; and it occurred to the wrecker, that it might be only a clever device on the part of his new acquaintance, who, under the pretence of betraying Sir Reginald, was seeking information in order to frustrate the plans for his ruin.

'It is strange indeed,' he said, after a long pause, 'that a man should give up his friends so willingly; doubtless some strong reason pushed you thereunto. How comes it, that one in so goodly a position as you are should want to borrow money from a Jew, and should be in such urgent need that you will even betray your master to obtain it? I must know all. Speak?'

'I cannot,' cried the wretched Andrew. 'But don't murder me! I will do anything you like!' And he tried to release himself from the iron grasp of Stephen.

Casterman quickly perceived that he had to deal with one of those cowardly natures that will do anything through fear. He said therefore:

'You are entirely in my power; you must do whatsoever I command. Tell me therefore your story; until I know all concerning you, you shall not leave this spot.'

Harkwright dared no longer to resist, and in a trembling voice he thus began:

'I have been twelve years in Sir Reginald's family—ever since my father's death; I was then ten years old. My father was a Catholic, and on this deathbed he feared that I, his only child, would be brought up a Protestant by his relations, who were all of that religion. My master promised him that he would take me as a servant into his own house, and see that I was properly instructed in my faith; and he said that, unless by my bad conduct I forced him to part with me, I should always have a home in his house; and he has kept his promise well—a good kind master has he been to me.'

'And is that your reason for betraying him?' inquired Casterman scornfully. 'But never mind, go on.'

Andrew could not continue. The remark of his acquaintance struck him with remorse. Was this, indeed, the return he ought to make to his master for all his bounties? Scenes of the past rose before his mind, and the howling of the wind seemed to his troubled imagination like the voice of his departed father reproaching him. He fell back against the tree and covered his face with his hands. 'O, that I had never come here!' he exclaimed; 'that I had not betrayed my poor master! What will become of me! What strange sounds do I here! this is a fearful place!'

Casterman stood looking at the false coward with a mingled expression of astonishment, pity, and contempt. He thoroughly despised the weak timorous character of his victim.

'Come, he said, 'I wish you would go on with what you were saying.'

'Well, the truth is, I am in sore distress. A year ago, some cousins of mine came to dwell in Penzance. We became great friends, we spent much money, and they persuaded me to lend them various sums. At length, finding that I had no more money of my own, I took some of my master's. My cousins then induced me to take more; and the end of it is, I have robbed to so large an amount that Sir Reginald cannot fail to discover it soon. One day, after the commissioner had searched the Manor, my cousins said that the best thing that could happen for me would be that my master should be taken for harboring priests, because then no one would ever know anything about the money, and they hinted that I might also get a great many valuables out of the house during the confusion which would naturally follow his arrest. I thought I might borrow from the Jew money enough to replace what had been taken. Then it was that I met you. I suppose you are a priest-hunter. It was thus I came to the resolution of betraying my master, that I might so save myself; and I have done it.'

'A few minutes' silence ensued, when Andrew with a sudden start inquired:

'Will my master be put to death for harboring a priest?'

'I know not,' replied Casterman coldly. 'But have you anything more to tell me? How am I to make sure of the priest being there when the commissioner comes? If you have no more to say I shall go home, for it is late.'

'O, do not go yet! I wish I had not spoken to you, and that I had not betrayed my master. What shall I do? If I told Sir Reginald, perhaps he might forgive me.'

'Hark ye to my words,' said Casterman sternly. 'If I had lived under your master's roof, and had eaten his bread for twelve years, I will say frankly that I would not then have turned upon him like a viper. But you have acted otherwise,

God's goodness; and it is in truth very ungrateful of me, now I am well, to forget all the good resolutions I made when I thought I was dying. I believe in the Catholic religion; but then there is the danger that people will find out I am a Catholic; and the commissioner has levied fines on all those above the age of sixteen who do not attend the Protestant church; now that would fall heavy on a poor woman like me.

'I understand all too well that I have done a wicked and a foolish act, and that there is no remedy for it. But do not, I beg of you, say a word of these matters, and I too will be silent.'

'You are safe as long as you keep your part of the bargain,' replied Stephen.

It was finally agreed between the two to wait for the execution of their plans until Christmas-eve, when there would be, Andrew said, a Mass in the middle of the night. Casterman was, on the previous day, to inform the commissioner; and a little after midnight to lead him and his men to a back-door of the Manor, where, on knocking three times, the traitor would give them admittance.

The men then parted; Casterman returning to Ty-an-dour, inwardly rejoicing at his good fortune in meeting with one who was so serviceable to him; Harkwright retracing his steps homewards, his conscience bitterly reproaching him, and haunted by the anguish, terror, and despair which accompany an evil deed.

CHAPTER X.

CHRISTMAS has ever been looked upon as a season of great rejoicing, especially in the days of Catholicity. It was a time when people wished not only to be happy themselves, but to make the poor and the afflicted so likewise; a time when, by that Mass offered in the silence of night, the Christian honored the ever-memorable hour when the Redeemer of the world was born.

Stephen Casterman cared very little for Christmas rejoicings. Very different thoughts occupied his mind. It was then he intended to disclose to the commissioner what he had learnt from Harkwright, and hoped to obtain the promised reward for his pains. And on that night the treacherous Harkwright was to admit him and the commissioner into the Manor-house.

Mr. Higgins spent Christmas-eve much as he spent every other day of the year; he had no family, no one for whom he cared, and none who cared for him, if we except old Peter, a servant who had been with him twenty years, and had grown gray in his service.

At four o'clock on that afternoon the commissioner might have been seen seated by the blazing fire in his little parlor, his eyes fixed on the capriciously curling flames, while his thoughts wandered back into the past; and now and then a faint smile would play on the thin compressed lips of the old man, as pleasant recollections crossed his mind. A loud knock at the hall-door disturbed his musings, and in a moment all the bright visions of bygone days had vanished—Mr. Higgins' features had resumed their usual stern expression. He listened eagerly to the sounds outside, wondering who it was that required his services, or what could be the matter. He heard Peter give admittance to some one, when ensued an animated conversation; at length the parlor-door opened and the old servant appeared.

'Please, sir,' he said in a low voice, 'there is a man in the hall.'

'Well, what is he doing there?' replied Mr. Higgins sharply.

'He says he wants to speak to you, sir.'

'Is he one, think you, that comes to ask us for charity? If so, tell him I have naught to give him.'

'No, sir; 'tis business that brings him here.'

'Then let him come in.'

'To say the truth, I like not the man's look,' replied Peter. 'He's a tall powerful man; his trade, he said, was fishing; and those folk never have any good in them; and how could they, living in the sea, more like fish than Christians? Shall I bid him depart, sir?'

'Tell him to come in at once.'

Peter knew by the determined manner in which his master pronounced these words that opposition would be useless; he left the room therefore, mumbling to himself that 'if the master would be murdered, it was not his fault.' Having introduced the visitor, he remained himself, as if to arrange the fire, until told to leave the room, which he did; though a few minutes after he again put in his head under some pretext, but only to receive a more peremptory dismissal.

'Well, what is your business?' asked the commissioner, drawing himself up very straight in his chair, and addressing Stephen Casterman, who stood before him. 'Do you come here to bring a complaint against some one, and to claim the powerful aid of the law to vindicate your rights?'

'I come here,' replied Casterman, 'to claim the hundred pounds' reward offered by you to any one who should discover a priest and those that harbored him.'

'Have you, then, found one?'

'I know where there is one. Sir Reginald de Courey has long had a priest in his house. A servant at the Manor let out the secret. And, farther, to-night you may seize them all, for there will be Mass (whatever that is), and they will be all together in one room, and the priest with them. If you will come with your men, this servant will let us in by a back-door.'

'It is all excellently well planned; I knew there was a priest in that house!' exclaimed the delighted commissioner. 'Come here to-night, my good man, and lead us into the Manor, and to-morrow the hundred pounds shall be yours.'

'Tis all right,' replied Stephen, and he retired.

Ignorant of the projects formed against them, and of the dangers by which they were threatened, the inmates of Bron-Welli were spending Christmas-eve in peace and happiness.

That day the poor of the neighborhood flocked to the spacious kitchen of the mansion, where plentiful provisions were distributed to them for themselves and their families. Nor would Lady Margaret trust this charitable office to the care of her servants alone; but radiant with holy joy, she herself superintended all, accompanied by little Barbara, for she liked her children even when so young to share in her good deeds.

As she moved about she had a kind word for each—a question about their children, or about their more particular needs; and such as she knew were Catholics she invited to stop at the house that they might be able to go to confession, and assist at the midnight Mass; for it was Sir Reginald's wish, she knew, that all such should lodge at the Manor till the following afternoon. Sir Reginald himself, with Austin, was engaged in similar benevolence, riding round to visit his tenants. And all alike were repaid for their kind actions by the glow of happiness that continually rises in the hearts of those who engage themselves in doing good.

Dame Barnby had been invited to attend the midnight Mass, but Ruth was ill, and she did not like to leave her. She therefore gave Catherine leave to go with Bridget O'Reilly, saying that she herself would go to the morning mass, when her niece would return to take care of the invalid.

Towards evening, accordingly, Mother Bridget and her young friend, well wrapped up in their cloaks, started off for the Manor. On their way they talked of that first Christmas night, when the shepherds heard the angels' voices, and hastened to adore the Infant King. On their arrival they found many of the congregation already assembled.

The chapel was tastefully adorned with evergreens. There was a door which opened into the grounds, but this was kept locked, and people coming to Mass entered through the house to avoid suspicion; but in case of a surprise they could make their escape by the outer door.

Sir Reginald was not without some fear of a nightly visit from the commissioner, and the more because two Catholics had reported that as they passed Mr. Higgins' dwelling they had observed an unusual stir; he had, in consequence, placed two men as sentinels, the one outside the before-mentioned door, the other in front of the house. Alas, he little thought the enemy most to be feared was within! A small arched entrance at the end of the corridor, leading to the chapel, had thus been overlooked; it had a strong bolt, and Sir Reginald had no fear that any would approach on that side of the house, and no precaution had been taken and it was by this door that Harkwright had agreed to let in Casterman.

The unhappy Andrew took no part that day in the general rejoicings: his fellow servants wondered what had made him so dull and uneasy; he wandered about the house in a disconsolate manner, his sadness and terror increasing as night approached. He went to the fatal door and examined the bolt, to see if it would make much noise on opening; as he was returning he met Sir Reginald.

'Are all the casements firmly closed?' inquired his master.

'I think they are all fast, sir. Yes, I am sure they are,' answered Andrew in a voice so trembling and low that it attracted his master's notice, who on looking more attentively at him, then remarked his extreme paleness.

'Are you ill, Harkwright?' he asked.

'In truth, sir, I do not feel well,' replied the servant, glad of the excuse; 'and if you would permit me, I should like to go to my bed now; my head is so bad, that I do not think I could sit up during Mass.'

'You may go at once, Andrew; had you told me before, you might have gone sooner. I hope you will be all right to-morrow.'

Harkwright had not the courage to answer. He fled rapidly to his room at the top of the house, and threw himself on his bed, wishing the fatal hour was over, and yet dreading its approach.

It was midnight, and he heard the footsteps of the people going to the chapel; and then a death-like silence reigned through the mansion.

Taking his lantern, he cautiously descended the stairs. His heart beat violently as he reached the door, against which he leant himself; the minutes seemed to him as hours while he stood trembling with cold and fear, and listened to the mournful howling of the wind. At length he thought he heard footsteps outside: the next moment three gentle knocks warned him of the commissioner's arrival.

Harkwright, as has been seen, was anything but courageous, and the crime he was about to perpetrate would not certainly inspire him with heroic sentiments. Up to the present with trembling steps he had been advancing in the path of wickedness; but now that the decisive moment had come, he felt a strange calmness. It arose, in part, from despair, but also from the conviction that he must now complete his evil action; and besides, his conscience was silenced by present excitement and interest in the success of the plot. With a steady hand he drew back the bolt and opened the door, giving admittance to Stephen Casterman, the commissioner his officers, and several others.

'You men,' said Mr. Higgins in an undertone, 'remain here until you are called; the fewer people, the less noise. Now, show the way,' he added, turning to Andrew, who mechanically preceded them in the direction of the chapel. Their footsteps were scarcely audible, as the stone floor was thickly strewn with rushes.

On reaching the door Harkwright stopped, pointing towards it; Casterman pushed it gently open, and gazed in with silent awe and wonderment. It would be difficult to say what the wrecker expected to witness; but certainly he was not prepared for the sight he now beheld. At the farther end of the chapel was the altar, decorated with evergreens; four large lights burnt on it, shedding a soft glow on that part of the chapel. Mass was now nearly over. The congregation were on their knees praying fervently, and the priest in his vestments stood on the right-hand side of the altar. Casterman had never before been within any place of worship, and now, as he looked into this chapel, a strange and solemn feeling came over him; he knew not what it was that touched his rough and gloomy nature; he only knew that there was something beautiful in what he saw. But what has taken many words to describe lasted only for a moment. Quickly the scene of peace and devotion, which had struck even Casterman, was succeeded by one of confusion and terror. A sweep of cold night air blew along the corridor from the open door; it passed into the chapel, like the breath of an evil spirit disturbing the serenity of the holy place; several heads turned to see whence it proceeded, and then they beheld Stephen standing at the entrance. A murmur was heard through the congregation, and all rose from their knees, the words of prayer still lingering on their lips, the book or the rosary clasped to their hearts. The wrecker threw the door wide open, calling to his companions to come on. But now the scene was plunged in darkness. Austin, hoping to afford the priest time to escape, had extinguished the lights on the altar.

The commissioner shouted to his men to advance; in the hurry Harkwright's lantern was upset. Some of those inside tried to force their way through the ranks of the party who were entering; others passed up towards the altar; the side door communicating with the grounds was quite forgotten, until Sir Reginald was heard to call out:

'All you who can, make for the entrance on the right!'

There was immediately a rush in that direction; but, as often happens in such moments, the door was so well fastened that none could open it; the commissioner and his party were, however, under the impression that their intended victims would escape.

'Set fire to the house!' cried a voice from the crowd.

At these words Lady Margaret, remembering her little daughter who was asleep up-stairs, exclaimed in accents of deep distress:

'O, my child, my Barbara, she will be burnt!' and the poor mother darted forward.

Catherine was by her side, and whispered to her, 'My lady fear not; I will run swiftly and fetch her.'

Probably in her anguish of mind the lady had not heeded the words of her young companion, for she continued to push on; but Catherine, more agile, had already glided past the men at the door. She groped along the passages, traversed the hall, and reached the foot of the staircase, where through a long narrow window the moon shed her tranquil light. She had proceeded up two or three steps when she heard a scream. It came from the direction of the chapel. She stopped and listened. There was a confused sound of voices. What could that shriek have been? thought she. Was the Manor already in flames? She trembled and scarcely dared to advance.

'I will save the little lady at any risk,' said the courageous girl to herself. 'O, my God, O Holy Mary, protect me!' she added as she ran rapidly up the flight of stone steps.

She soon reached Barbara's room; a bright wood fire blazed and crackled in the large chimney, and cast a ruddy light on the old-fashioned furniture and on the bed of the little sleeper. Catherine awoke her from her peaceful slumber, and the child looked round quite bewildered.

'Where is mother?' she asked.

'You shall go to her presently, Barbara dear,' replied Catherine, while she dressed her hurriedly; and taking her in her arms, she left the room.

She knew her way well about the house, and guided by the moonlight, which streamed in at every window, she descended a back staircase, which led on to an outer door, which once passed she felt her little protegee would be safe. With mingled feelings of hope and fear she proceeded to unbar it, experiencing a sensation of deep relief when she had crossed the threshold.

Catherine directed her course towards one of the numerous outhouses at the rear of the Manor. She had at first intended taking Barbara to her own home, but she soon understood that this would be impossible; the walk was too long for the poor little child, and she herself had not the strength to carry her that distance. She therefore seated herself on an old bench, and placing her cold and terrified companion on her knees, endeavored to console her. Taking off her own large cloak and wrapping it round the child, she rocked her in her arms till she had fallen asleep and then laid her gently on the ground.

Kneeling down, she then returned thanks to God for her es.

cape, and that of Lady Margaret's daughter, praying also for those of the family who were still in danger. Then she went a little way outside, to ascertain if the Manor-house was on fire; there was a light in one or two of the windows, but as she was glad to see, no sign of fire.

Returning to the child, she laid down by her side. Her rest was disturbed; she heard over again in her sleep that scream that had so alarmed her, and then again would suddenly awake, imagining that men were breaking in, or that the house was crumbling into ruins.

Thus passed the dark hours of the night, and Christmas morning dawned, pale and cheerless. Catherine arose, feeling stiff and cold; but Barbara, who was well covered, seemed sleeping comfortably as if in her own little bed. Without disturbing her, Catherine proceeded cautiously towards the mansion, with the view of learning, if she could, what had become of the congregation of the previous night. She looked through the archway into the courtyard, and as nothing was stirring there, she continued her round outside.

'Catherine!' said a voice near her.

She turned quickly, with a feeling half of joy, half of fear, but was quite reassured on seeing one of Lady Margaret's maids. She was so full of anxiety to know the fate of those whom she left in the chapel, and so glad to see one of them, that she could hardly speak.

'O Mistress Jane, what has happened?' were her only words.

'Her ladyship's dying, methinks,' replied the waiting-woman, who appeared much agitated. 'Heaven help us! We are in sore distress. Where is the Lady Barbara?'

Catherine conducted her to the outhouse; and the maid taking the little child, who was still asleep, in her arms, returned to the house, accompanied by Catherine. On their way thither the maid told her that Lady Margaret, having hastened out of the chapel to rescue her little daughter, had fallen while mounting a small flight of steps at the end of the corridor, and received a severe blow on her back, which had caused her to scream loudly; that lights being brought, she was found insensible, and in that state carried to her room; and that her first question on reviving had been about Barbara, who was missing.

It was in search of the child, or rather of Catherine, the maid had herself come out, in the full hope that they would be found together; for she knew that, on the cry of fire, Catherine had run off to Barbara's room with the intention of saving her.

By this time they had reached the hall-door.

'The men have possession of the place,' whispered the waiting-woman to her companion. 'They have been ransacking the house all night; we durst not stir from the room where her ladyship was; but they have all fallen asleep now; There,' she continued, pointing to a man, who was lying on a bench near the spacious chimney—'there is one of them.'

They proceeded softly up the stairs, fearing at every moment that the slumberers would awake, and prevent their entering the house; for the commissioner had given strict orders to allow no one to enter. They passed on, however, unmolested, and arrived at Lady Margaret's apartment. When the door was opened Catherine saw her kind patropess lying on her bed: she was deadly pale, her face wore an expression of deep sorrow, and she appeared to be in great pain, but yet there was a look of heavenly resignation on her beautiful countenance.

Barbara was placed beside her mother, who drew her darling fondly towards her.

'Was she with thee, my Kate?' she said, turning to the faithful girl.

In few simple words Catherine related what she had done, when Lady Margaret took her hand in her own and pressed it gently. She felt too weak to speak, and the silent gratitude of the mother was as well understood as if she had spoken. Catherine's eyes filled with tears, for she feared that her kind friend, whom she truly loved and venerated, was near her end.

Widow O'Reilly and several waiting-women, were in the room, and were conversing in a low voice.

'If we could but procure something for her ladyship!' said one.

'Stay ye all here,' replied Bridget, 'and I will go to the town and seek provisions; and may be Kate will come to help me.'

'I will indeed,' answered Catherine; and the two accordingly started.

The sun had now risen; his gracious rays warmed the benumbed earth, and cheered the landscape; high on a leafless bush a robin poured forth its joyous lay; it was Christmas morning, and nature looked bright and festive; but there was sorrow in many a heart that day.

On the preceding night Sir Reginald, Austin, and Father Ralph had been conducted, for greater security, to the commissioner's house. Mr. Higgins had used much caution and secrecy in doing so, for he knew that the De Coureys were beloved by the people; he therefore feared that an attempt might be made to rescue the prisoners; he also had all the servants he could find in the Manor locked up until morning, lest they should spread the news of what had happened ere he had provided for the safe keeping of the priest and his harborer.

When Catherine and Bridget entered the town, they found every one in a state of much excitement; some of those who had assisted at Mass had spread the strange tidings, which filled the townspeople with astonishment. Most agreed that a Catholic priest deserved to be arrested, but that Sir Reginald and his family were too charitable and good to be interfered with. Great indignation was expressed against the commissioner, who determined to convey his prisoners early the following morning to Launceston, and hand them over to the Sheriff of Cornwall. Harkwright was to accompany them, to bear witness against his master and Father Ralph.

Having procured the necessary provisions at her own dwelling, Widow O'Reilly went to Dame Barnby's cottage, where Catherine had stopped to speak with her aunt, and to ask permission to remain with Lady Margaret until evening.

'Yes, Kate,' replied the poor woman, wiping her eyes; 'tis but right that we should do all we can for her dear ladyship; she was kind and compassionate to all poor folks; to you, Kate, and to myself, she has been very good. Go and stay with her as long as she wills it; the little Lady Barbara is fond of you, so you may be of use.'

Catherine bade farewell to her aunt and cousins, and taking a basket on her arm, while Bridget carried another, they followed the road to the Manorhouse. They had not gone more than half way, when they met one of the waiting-women coming quickly towards them, who told them that her ladyship had expressed a strong wish to leave BronWelli. 'Because,' said the maid, 'she remembers what harsh treatment poor Mrs. Tregain received fifteen years ago, when her husband was cast into prison, where he still remains, and she herself was driven from the house at night, with her helpless children. So we gathered together what jewelry, plate, and other things we could, and carried Lady Margaret, as she directed, to the farmstead of John Trehern. They are kind people, and good Catholics too.'

They had now arrived at the farmhouse, which was prettily situated on a gently rising slope, with woods between it and the sea, and surrounded by meadows and tilled fields, two patriarchal oaks shading its doorway. It was better built than most houses of its class, having been erected on the foundation of one of those Saxon castles so frequently met with in Cornwall.

Here had resided, for upwards of two centuries the Treherns, an honest hard-working race, whose representative, John, the present possessor, was, like his forefathers, a good and upright man, and for whom Sir Reginald had always entertained a just esteem.

On Christmas morning he had heard, from one of those present at midnight Mass, what had occurred at the Manor. After having discussed the matter with his wife, he resolved to go to the town and learn what he could respecting the fate of his landlord. He had not been gone many minutes when he was seen running back to the house again.

'Dame! dame!' he cried to his astonished wife, 'prepare quickly the best room; they are going to bring Lady Margaret here! Just think! to have her ladyship under our roof! Now make ye haste, while I run and tell the messenger from Bron-Welli that all will be ready for her.'

The good dame hurried off at once, and with the help of her eldest daughter arranged the best room.

When Catherine and Bridget arrived, the poor lady asked eagerly if they had heard any news of Sir Reginald and Austin, and her face saddened when they answered that they had not; but she soon uttered those words which were ever on her lips and deeply impressed on her heart, 'God's will be done!'

Lady Margaret dismissed all her maids except one, who remained to wait on her, for she knew that they had homes in the neighborhood, most of them being daughters of her husband's tenants.

A week had passed, during which Lady Margaret's health rapidly declined. Her spine had been seriously injured, and this, added to the anxiety of her mind, was fast bringing her to the grave. Numbers of persons, among whom was Dame Barnby, visited her, and expressed their sympathy for her misfortunes. Catherine and Widow O'Reilly were with her nearly all day; all hope of her recovery had vanished, but they wished to serve her to the last, and, if possible, to ease her sufferings.

New Year's-eve came, and as Lady Margaret saw the sun sinking behind the western hills, she felt that she would never again see it rise. Her mind was peaceful, and though she knew her end was approaching, it was without experiencing any sensation of terror. On the previous day, while Bridget and Catherine were seated by her bed, she had explained to them her last wishes with regard to little Barbara. She told them how much she desired that the child should be restored to her father or brother, if either of them escaped.

'I fear my poor husband has little chance, but Anstin will surely be released; and I know he will be a loving protector to his little sister, and will take her to my relations in Yorkshire. So, when you have an opportunity, I pray you let Sir Reginald and my son know where Barbara is. But,' added the mother anxiously, 'it may be long ere they can send for her.'

'And if it is so, my lady,' replied Bridget, 'the child shall not want a home as long as I have a roof over my head; and Catherine too will care for her, I know.'

'Indeed, I will do all I can,' said the young girl eagerly.

'May God bless and reward you both!' said Lady Margaret. 'She has Protestant relations, but give her not to them, I pray you,' added the mother anxiously.

'We promise we will not,' answered Bridget and Catherine at the same moment.

From the time that Lady Margaret felt assured that her little daughter would not be abandoned, or brought up in a faith contrary to her own, she remained calm and recollected; her lips often moved as though in prayer. She spoke no more, but she evidently knew those around her, and she fervently kissed the crucifix which Catherine presented to her.

At eleven o'clock that night, all the household knelt by her death-bed, while Catherine read the Prayers for the Dying; and most of those present were in tears at the thought of losing her whom in life they had so loved and revered.

The dying lady suddenly raised her head slightly from the pillow; her whole face beamed with heavenly joy; she gazed forward as though she witnessed some vision from the other world.

'Into Thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit,' she said then her voice failed, and her head fell again on the pillow.

'Lord Jesus,' continued the assistants, 'receive her soul,' and ere they had finished the words the happy spirit had fled.

The rest of the night was passed in prayers for the deceased, mingled with tears and sobs.

Next morning Catherine took Barbara to her future home at Widow O'Reilly's, and sought in various ways to amuse her; but in the midst of her play the child would often stop and ask where her mother was.

After Lady Margaret had been laid in her last resting-place,

Bridget returned to the shop, from which she had been absent some days. As is often the case with energetic natures, she had, during the late troubles which befell the De Courcys, and throughout the lady's illness, displayed a calm presence of mind without yielding to the grief which she inwardly felt; but now that all was over, and she found herself once more in her own home, with the vivid recollection of all that had happened since Christmas-eve, she sat down in her old wooden chair and wept, fondly caressing the while Lady Margaret's little daughter.

CHAPTER XI.

THE scene of our story must now change to London. In an apartment in one of those large mansions that stood in what is now the Strand, Adelina, the wife of Cuthbert de Courcy, with whose brother the reader is already acquainted, was seated close by the fire one cold day in January.

The room was richly furnished; among other things was a round table supported by a single leg, a novelty then, only to be found in the houses of the wealthy; a small Turkey carpet covered it, an article too costly at that period to be spread as now on the floor. One of the large French looking-glasses which were just then beginning to supersede the polished steel mirrors hitherto used in England hung against the wall. The stiff-backed chairs ranged round the room were covered with crimson velvet; the splendor of the whole apartment bespeaking the wealth and worldly greatness of its owners.

Adelina, who was for the moment its sole occupant, was young and extremely pretty, but her face wanted that intelligence and expression which often makes even a plain countenance more pleasing. She seemed to be expecting some one, for her eyes frequently turned towards the door, and she listened attentively to every sound; at length she heard quick footsteps in the passage, and the next moment the heavy arras-hanging was raised and her husband entered.

Adelina, remarking that it was late, inquired what had delayed him so long, but Cuthbert was absorbed in other thoughts, and made no reply.

'No evil tidings, I hope, my lord?' she asked.

'No, no, 'tis of small consequence to me' said Cuthbert, rather following his own train of thought than answering his wife's question.

Adelina's curiosity was excited. Something unusual had occurred she felt certain; she pressed her husband to tell her what it was; he related that he had that day heard of his brother Reginald's arrest, and that he was now imprisoned in the Tower.

'Is there aught which you can do to save him?' asked Adelina; 'for I have heard say that it is a grievous offence against the law thus to harbor priests—therefore I fear that he will fare ill.'

To this Cuthbert, who had no intention of trying to help his brother, only remarked hastily, that all efforts to save him would be fruitless, and that, moreover, it was Sir Reginald's own fault if he were now in difficulties, since he was fully aware of the dangers he incurred by remaining a Catholic.

Cuthbert then spoke of the object which he really had at heart, namely, the acquisition of his brother's large estate in Cornwall. Adelina expressed a dislike to property thus obtained; but with specious arguments he overcame her objections. It was far better, he declared, that the property should become his than fall into the hands of strangers, and then, if he had no children, he might leave it, after his death, to his nephew.

'Tis a fair spot; the old Manor-house is strong and spacious, surrounded by noble trees,' added Cuthbert, who was desirous of giving his wife a pleasing idea of what he intended to make their future residence.

It is far more difficult to deceive ourselves as to what is right and wrong than to deceive others. There is the secret tribunal of the conscience before which the guilty vainly plead innocence.

Cuthbert's words had dispelled his wife's scruples and convinced her that he was in the right, but they did not soothe his own troubled breast. Besides, he knew what Adelina did not know; he was well aware that the Catholic religion was the true one, and the courageous conduct of his brother seemed a reproach to his own cowardice. Fear, and the desire of obtaining the honors and riches from which his religion excluded him, had made him renounce the creed of his fathers; but in his heart he believed. He would have given anything to extinguish that spark of faith, to stifle the voice of conscience which cried out to him that he was an apostate. In vain did he protest that conviction alone had changed his belief; others might give credit to his assertions, he knew them to be false.

'When my brother's fair domains are mine,' he said to himself, 'there I will settle, and at last be happy.'

Poor man! An evil deed may bring riches and confer worldly honors, but it cannot bestow happiness.

The time of Sir Reginald's trial was drawing nigh. Cuthbert therefore addressed a letter to an influential friend at the court of Elizabeth expressing his loyal sentiments towards her Majesty, and his zeal for the extension of the reformed religion, concluding with the hope that his friend would obtain for him the estates in Cornwall to be forfeited by Sir Reginald de Courcy, who was in the Tower under a charge of high treason.

The person to whom he applied was a relative of Adelina, and had already frequently received petitions from her husband for various situations and favors; he therefore thought, on perusing the present letter, that he could not do a better thing than procure for his troublesome friend a comfortable residence at the Land's End, and thus free himself for ever from his importunities; so Cuthbert received the desired answer that his demand would be attended to.

Both brothers now awaited the trial, which would in all probability bring death to the one, and confer a title and estates on the other; yet Cuthbert was far from being the calmer or happier of the two; the thought constantly harassing him that, had he used the same energy in his brother's cause as he had to obtain his property, he might possibly have saved him. But ambition, when it has once taken possession of a person, stifles all better feelings; and so De Courcy chose rather to leave his Catholic brother to his fate than to run the risk, by an attempt to save him, of losing the estates on the obtaining of which he had set his heart.

It must not, however, be supposed that Sir Reginald was free from anxiety; besides his own danger, which was that which least troubled his mind, he knew that his friend Father Ralph had no chance of escape. Then he was uncertain as to Lady Margaret, whether she were living or dead; and if anything had happened to her, there was the thought of his little Barbara—what would become of her, or who would take care of her—and the dread that the commissioner might insist on keeping her and sending her to live with Protestants, so that she would lose her faith. Even the companionship of his son was a source of sorrow, for he grieved to see the boy in captivity, although Austin himself declared he did not regret the loss of liberty, and was happy to be with his father.

About a month after their arrival at the Tower, Sir Reginald and Father Ralph underwent their examination; and Sir Reginald's property being confiscated, and bestowed with the title on Cuthbert, the latter started soon after with a numerous train of servants and armed men for Cornwall. A few days before their departure, Harkwright, who had spent all his money, and begun to fear that he might starve amidst the riches of London, came to him and begged to be admitted into his service; to which Cuthbert agreed, thinking he might be servicable from his knowledge of the place and country. The journey, being on horseback, was slow and fatiguing, and it was spring ere they reached Penzance.

The day of their arrival the sky was overcast, dark clouds had rolled up from the sea, and hovered in fantastic forms over their heads, giving vent at times to their pent-up anger in heavy showers of rain, when again a bright, though transient gleam of sunshine would occasionally enliven the scene. Just as the party turned into the avenue a ray of light shot from the lurid heavens, like a smile of irony on a countenance darkened by the brooding storm of passion: the trees, the house, the distant hills, all stood out in strange relief against the leaden sky, until the sunbeam faded, and in heavy drops the rain began to fall; and so, amid the tears and smiles of a spring day, Cuthbert returned to the home he had quitted fifteen years before.

There is always a certain feeling of sadness in revisiting places from which we have been long absent, but this is especially the case when great changes have been wrought in ourselves and in those we left behind. It was natural, then, that Cuthbert, who returned under such peculiar circumstances to Brou-Well, should experience sorrow rather than joy at the sight of those familiar objects, each of which was linked with some reminiscences of his boyhood. There were the steps on which his father stood when last he parted from him; his mother, brother and sister-in-law beside him, watching his departure. How well he remembered that day! His father's blessing, his mother's anxious face, the affectionate farewell of Reginald and his young wife, all were present to his mind as though they were occurrences of the previous day, yet fifteen years had passed, and all the actors in that scene were dead except himself and his brother; and between them the separation was as great as if death had severed the ties which bound them.

Adelina addressed a few words to her husband, but he heeded her not and the party rode into the courtyard and dismounted in silence.

The sheriff's men had been warned, by a messenger, sent on from London a week before the departure of Cuthbert, to give up the house to him when he arrived, and had in consequence left the premises.

The place was in great disorder, and Cuthbert, having had a fire lit in one of the rooms, for the evening was damp and chilly, advised Adelina to remain by it until he returned from giving his directions.

She had sent away her maids, but soon regretted that she had not retained some one with her; all seemed so lonely and silent. As the fire blazed up, the figures in the tapestry became so distinct that they looked as if they were about to step down from the walls. Tired and weary she leant her head upon her hand and closed her eyes; presently, half asleep, she fancied the room became peopled with strange personages, who walked to and fro gazing on her with astonishment; she felt she was an intruder, and trying to arise she awoke. All had vanished, save one figure—Cuthbert was standing near her; there were lights in the room.

'I found you asleep,' he remarked. 'What think you of our new residence?'

'Truly I scarce can say, for I have seen little of it, and am much tired after the journey. All will doubtless look brighter on the morrow,' replied Adelina.

When she rose the next morning she felt more cheerful, and all did look brighter except her husband.

He showed her over the house. When they reached the chapel, he stood silently gazing for a few minutes, as he probably thought of the days when he knelt beside his brother at the foot of the altar both happy to be allowed to serve at Mass; of the many times he had there approached the sacred tribunal of penance, and received forgiveness of the faults of childhood and youth. O that same hand, he thought with anguish, would at that instant be raised to bless him, and some voice pronounce those words he had so often heard from the priest: 'Thy sins are forgiven thee. Go in peace.' But he felt that, without repentance, there could be no peace for him, and he tried to stifle his remorse by talking and laughing.

On Adelina the chapel had a different effect from that produced on her husband; she had been baptized and educated a Protestant; her conscience did not therefore reproach her with having known the true religion and abandoned it. The chapel was a pretty building, and its beauty struck her; there was a something peaceful and holy in its appearance; she knew not why, but it soon became her favorite place of resort.

Riding and hawking were now the principal amusements of Cuthbert, his wife sometimes accompanying him, but more often remaining at home. Having no serious occupations to engage her attention she found the days rather long and wearisome; for the poor now never came to the Manor-house for relief as in Lady Margaret's time.

From an early age up to the time of her marriage, Adelina had been at the court of Queen Elizabeth, to whom her mother was maid-of-honor; and so from her childhood, surrounded by worldliness, she had not that love of home duties and household employments, or that interest in the poor and sick, which was frequent among even the Protestant ladies of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Like all idle people, this want of occupation disposed her to listen more eagerly to any news her maids could give her, and especially such as concerned the former inhabitants of Bron-Welli. They had picked up some from Harkwright; and so she learnt the history of the seizure of Sir Reginald on Christmas-eve, the death of Lady Margaret at a neighboring farm-house, and farther, that her sister-in-law had left a daughter, but of the fate of the child she could for some time find no clue; but she often wished that she could have the little girl with her, remarking that 'a child would make the house more gay, and besides,' she added, 'it would be a charity to bring her back to her home.'

But little Barbara de Courcy was safe with Widow O'Reilly and Catherine; for though sleeping at the house of Bridget, it was with the latter that she spent the most part of the day.

At three years old sorrows are not lasting; then indeed most frequently the child is scarcely aware of its own misfortunes; so it was with Barbara. For the first few days she often asked where her mother was; but by the end of a fortnight she had grown quite accustomed to her new home, and all her affections had centered on Bridget and Catherine.

None of the townspeople suspected that the little girl dressed in the plain costume of a tradesman's child was Lady Margaret's daughter. In fact, except those who resided close to the Manor-house, few were aware that the De Courcys had a daughter alive; for one having died of smallpox at the same time as their second son, most persons imagined that Austin was the only surviving child. Bridget thought it more prudent not to deceive them; she therefore called Barbara her granddaughter, and changed her name to Mary, for still greater security. One thing, however, troubled the good woman, which was, that being obliged to attend all day to the shop, she was not able as she wished to look after the child; nor indeed was it a remedy that she spent the greater part of the day with Catherine, for the young girl too was frequently busy at some work, or had to go out on a message to the town; and so Barbara would at times wander away from the cottage, alone or in company with Dame Barnby's youngest child, Susan, who, accustomed herself to climb about the rocks, would lead her little friend into dangerous places, from which Catherine had to rescue her.

Widow O'Reilly thought over how this might be prevented; and a month after Lady Margaret's death, Bridget, Dame Barnby, and Catherine sat in consultation in the little panelled room behind the shop. Barbara's supposed grandmother then suggested that, as Ruth was now old enough to be of great assistance in the cottage, and her cousin's services were not therefore really required, Catherine should come and live with her and take charge of the little orphan.

Dame Barnby and Catherine asked for a day to consider before they returned an answer, though the former was very anxious that, her niece should accept the situation.

'There is no better house in the town, Kate,' she said. 'You will be very comfortable there; she is a kind woman too, and says you shall be to her as her own daughter. Though we shall miss you much, 'tis well you should be so comfortably settled; you deserve it, dear child; you have brought great happiness into my cottage, and we all are in a fair way of doing well.'

Catherine thanked her aunt for the kind interest she showed in her welfare, but the reasons which the latter urged to induce her to go to Widow O'Reilly's were not those which with herself were strongest.

To a mind like Catherine's the securing to herself a comfortable home was but of secondary importance, nor did it please her, except as it served to forward God's designs towards her, and enabled her to do more good. She was naturally careless about her own interests, with such strong attachments to her friends, that these generous feelings might have led to disappointment and trouble had not her good mother, who understood her character, turned them to their right end, teaching her in all things to seek God's interest and that of His creatures, for the love of Him.

In this instance, then, as was her wont, it was by prayer she sought to learn the will of God. And soon she decided to accept Bridget's proposal; for her mission in her aunt's home was completed. Dame Barnby and her children were Catholics. Ruth had grown up an industrious girl, and was of great use to her mother, and the whole condition of the family was vastly improved; so that she might leave them with the happy feeling that she had been the means of promoting their spiritual and temporal welfare, and might without scruple devote herself to the care of Lady Margaret's daughter.

So she removed to Widow O'Reilly's house, and little Barbara was intrusted to her care.

'Teach her, above all,' said Bridget, urging the sacredness of the duty, 'to love God and her faith. I found I had not time enough to give the sweet little one the care I ought; therefore do I call ye to help me, for I promised her dying mother (God give rest to her soul!) that her child should want for nothing. I know her dear ladyship loved you, and she would be well pleased to see that you were with her little daughter.'

Catherine understood the important task which had been allotted to her, and she devoted herself to it with all the intense love and earnestness of her ardent and generous nature.

When little Mary, as she was now always called, awoke in the morning, the first face that smiled upon her was that of her young guardian; and of an evening, until the child sank to sleep; she saw the form of Catherine sitting by her bedside working, and often her sweet clear voice sang some holy hymn to lull the little one to rest. It was by her side Mary knelt morning and night to say the prayers her mother had taught her.

Time passed on, and, happy with her kind friends, Lady Margaret's daughter seemed to have quite forgotten her early home; but a slight incident soon proved that all recollection of the past was not obliterated from her memory.

Not long after their arrival, Sir Cuthbert and his lady were one day riding out, accompanied by their attendants, and chanced to pass Widow O'Reilly's shop when little Mary was standing at the door. The child's attention was attracted, and no sooner had she seen Lady Adelina, whose figure and dress resembled that of her deceased mother, than she rushed forward, exclaiming, 'Mother, dear Mother! But her foot slipped, and she fell, and in a moment she would have been under the horse's feet, but a light figure darted from the house, and snatched her up in time.

'Is she hurt?' inquired Lady Adelina, addressing herself to Catherine, who, having just saved the little Mary, was holding her tightly clasped in her arms.

'No, my lady, I trust not,' replied the girl.

'O, what a beautiful child!' said the lady, as the little thing turned her head round and looked timidly at her. 'What is her name? Is she your sister?'

'We call her Mary; she is not my sister.'

'Her parents—who are they?' continued Adelina, 'and where does she live?'

'O, they are dead, and she lives with her granddame in this house.'

'Come,' said Sir Cuthbert, 'we have tarried here long enough; if you want to see the child we can send for her to come to the Manor some day.'

With these words the party rode on, to the great joy of Catherine, for the presence of the aunt and uncle of her little charge made her feel uncomfortable; and when they were gone she fondly embraced her, scarcely knowing why, except that the sight of Sir Cuthbert brought to her mind the wrongs which the family of his brother had suffered.

Bridget had been absent during this occurrence, and when she returned Catherine recounted what had happened.

'I am sorry the lady saw her at all,' said Widow O'Reilly; 'but the child shall not go to the Manor; it is sorry enough I would be to trust any one in the house of so unnatural a brother, let alone Lady Margaret's child.'

Bridget's sentiments towards Sir Cuthbert were similar to those of most of the townspeople, who regarded with suspicion and dislike one who had been so ready to take the property and title of his brother, and who had evinced no sympathy for the misfortunes of his relatives.

For some time after Sir Reginald's arrest, nothing was spoken of in the town but the calamities which had befallen him and his family. It was rumored that he had been conveyed from Launceston to London, to be there tried before the King's Bench. The arrival of Sir Reginald's brother at Bron-Welli led to the conviction that the former owner of the Manor had been found guilty of the charges laid against him. Harkwright kept an ominous silence on the subject. People at last grew tired of conjecturing; other thoughts, and the daily occupations of life, absorbed their attention, and the little town, for a while excited by the events we have related, sank into its usual quiet routine.

CHAPTER XII.

SOME days after little Mary's adventure, Widow O'Reilly was seated in her shop, her busy fingers engaged knitting, while her mind was occupied considering how she should prevent her young charge from going to her aunt. Only the day before Lady Adeline had sent a servant to bring her to the Manor, and Bridget had managed by some means to avoid the application; but she feared that a constant refusal would at last excite suspicion.

The opening of the street-door attracted the good woman's attention.

'Why, Larry!' she exclaimed, on raising her eyes, 'is it you? Many a long day it is since I have seen ye!'

'Well-nigh six months, methinks; and sure 'tis sad troubles that have fallen on his honor and the whole family since then. I was not at the Mass; for it is laid up with the fever I have been, and his honor sent me to one of his farmhouses for change of air. Ah, sure, when I went it is little I thought that I would never see them again in the old Manor; and her dear kind ladyship dead, and the poor children turned adrift like birds out of their nest. I cried like a child myself when I heard of all the misfortunes that had withered their happiness in one night, and scattered them like the dead leaves in the autumn wind.'

'Larry,' said Bridget, after a few minutes' pause, 'what are you going to do? I know that you would not be a servant at the Manor now, even if the gentleman would have you, which I doubt much; for they say it is not fond of Catholics he is, although brought up in the Faith.'

'Is it I pass the threshold of his house, which is not his house at all? No, that I would not,' replied Larry, indignant at the very idea. 'No; I came here to tell you that I am going to London.'

'To London!' exclaimed Widow O'Reilly; 'and sure how will you get there? The roads are infested with highwaymen; the party lately coming to the Manor were attacked, though armed and numerous as they were. O Larry, they would murder you at once!'

'Sure it is little enough they gain by it; and, with the help of God, I hope to reach the great town safe before winter. I have a brother there; maybe he would find me a place. But what I have most at heart is, perchance I might see my master and help him. The other day I met that traitor, Harkwright. 'Well, says I to myself, 'I will make him tell me where Sir Reginald, Father Ralph and Master Austin are.' So I stopped him, nor let him go until he told me all about them, he trembling all the while, for he don't like speaking about them. Good need he has to fear the vengeance of Heaven on him after so foul a deed.'

'So you really think you will see them?' exclaimed Bridget.

'I hope it though it is sad news I hear him. He will be more afflicted when he hears of good Lady Margaret's death,' said Larry sorrowfully. 'And where is the little Lady Barbara? I have not heard speak of her.'

'She is here, Larry; and her dear mother bade me let Sir Reginald know it. You, then, must tell him.'

'Glory be to God! I will tell the poor father she is safe, that I will.'

'You shall see her too, that you may say to his honor that you saw her with your own eyes,' said Bridget; and she opened the back door and called to Mary, who ran joyously in.

'Poor little creature!' said Larry; 'she don't know the misfortunes of her family, and she is happy, like them little birds that sing when the storm is brooding all around; sure it is as well she does not know. She is happy and comfortable with you. I wish his honor could see her.'

'Are you going to London on foot?' inquired Widow O'Reilly.

'No; the good farmer I am stopping with, who is a kind man entirely, says he will give me a horse. And now farewell, Mother Bridget.'

'God speed you, Larry, and His blessing be upon you all the days of your life!'

The man left the shop, and a few days later he might have been seen riding slowly along the road which leads to London; but as it is not our intention to follow him on his long and tedious journey, we shall for the present return to Lady Adeline.

From the day she had seen little Mary she had constantly wished to have her. Not that she had any definite idea what she would do with the child, her only thought being that she was very beautiful, and would be an amusement and help to enliven the dull old Manor-house. Adeline had been accustomed to think that those in an inferior position to herself ought always to yield to her fancies; she was therefore not a little astonished and mortified when Widow O'Reilly, under various pretexts, refused to let the child go to Bron-Welli; and still more when, on her proposing to adopt Mary, her supposed grandmother declared she never would consent.

This was a cause of great vexation to the lady, and she asked her husband to interfere, but he refused; yet still clinging to the hope of one day having the object of her desires, she spoke about it to a favorite waiting-woman.

'Truly, my lady must be much angered at the obstinacy of that woman, than whom none can be more foolish and perverse, the more so as that little girl is not her grandchild.'

'How know you that?' inquired Adeline.

'Why, my lady,' said the maid hesitatingly, 'I meant to say that she is some one else's child; and therefore the old woman need not be so loth to part with her.'

'Whose child is she, then? Some neighbor's daughter, I suppose, whose parents are dead.'

'Not exactly, my lady; but Harkwright, from whom I heard it, bade me not repeat it.'

'But I command you to tell me,' said her mistress imperiously.

'Perchance your ladyship would not be pleased were I to say what I heard.'

'Tell me at once; I will know what it is.'

'Then, my lady, she is,' said the servant hesitatingly—'she is—your niece.'

'My niece!' exclaimed Lady Adeline; 'impossible; that little peasant girl can be no relation of mine.'

'But my lady, she is in truth no peasant's child, but the daughter of Sir Reginald and Lady Margaret de Courcy,' remarked the maid, who perceived, by the flush of indignation on her mistress' check, that she was not best pleased at the idea of having a poor child for her relation.

'O, is that it?' said Adelina in a calmer tone. 'She is Lady Margaret's daughter. Then why will not that woman give her up? But never mind, I shall have her now. How did you hear this, Lucy?'

The waiting-woman informed her mistress that Harkwright had seen the child, and declared that, in spite of the complete change in her dress, there was no mistaking her—that she was Barbara de Courcy.

Delighted with what she had heard, Adelina sought Cuthbert, and communicated to him her discovery, and after much persuasion she prevailed upon him to demand his niece. This once determined, nothing could have deterred him from carrying out his will, although he cared very little about the child.

Bridget had timely warning of the danger now threatening the child.

The intelligence alarmed and saddened her, for from that moment she felt that there was indeed no security for Mary.

'I would never give her to them, dear Mother Bridget,' said Catherine, to whom she expressed her fears, 'her dying parent had us not do so.'

'But, my child, how can we prevent it? Sir Cuthbert has many servants and waiting people whom he can send to take the poor little one, as the hawk does the young bird from its mother's wing.'

'That is true,' said Catherine sadly; 'but,' she added, as a sudden thought flashed through her mind, 'could we not leave this place, and take little Mary where her aunt and uncle will never mind us?'

'Sure that we could; and, glory be to God! the little one shall not go to her aunt's, where she would lose the bright jewel of her faith. It was well thought of, Kate. But,' continued the old woman, 'what am I to do with my shop? and where are we to go to? Young heads don't think of all that.'

The two sat musing for some time.

'I have it!' cried Bridget. 'You know Frank Pendle? Well, he told me he wanted to set up a shop, now he has come in for that little fortune, after his old aunt dying of the fever, or old age, or something of the kind; he hinted that my establishment would just suit him. Loth would I have been to have parted with it then, but now it is different, and he shall have it if he still be willing to purchase it.'

The good woman could not suppress a sigh as she looked around her comfortable little room.

But it was resolved that they should leave Penzance. Widow O'Reilly offered her shop for sale to the wealthy neighbor who expressed a wish to possess it, and the business was settled.

The next difficulty was to determine where to go. Catherine said she thought Exeter would be the best place, as she had kind friends there, who would doubtless help them, and being easy of access by water, that town was accordingly fixed on. To no one, except Dame Barnby, did they say where they were going; and to very few indeed did they make known even their intention of leaving the town. Everything had been quietly settled for the journey, though the day had not been fixed on which to start, when the news was brought that Sir Cuthbert had resolved to claim his niece on the following day; so it was determined to start next morning early by a small vessel which was going to Exeter, the captain of which had agreed to convey them thither. That evening they bade farewell with many tears to Dame Barnby and her daughters; and the next morning at the hour of sunrise, when nothing was astir, Bridget O'Reilly and Catherine wended their way to the sea-shore, where the little vessel was moored. Lady Margaret's daughter walked between them, holding tightly Catherine's hand, and probably wondering where they were going at an hour so early, without a thought that she was the cause of their flight, and that it was to save her faith, and to keep their promise to her deceased mother, that her generous friends were leaving their home.

When the sun at length rose, and the busy inhabitants of Penzance were beginning the occupations of the day, it was noticed that no one was stirring in Widow O'Reilly's house, which was the more strange as she was generally an early riser. By nine o'clock a small knot of people had gathered outside, each giving his opinion as to what was the cause of an event so unusual.

'The good dame is sleeping late to-day,' said one.

'Maybe she is dead,' said another.

'I heard,' remarked a third that she had sold her shop; but she kept it marvelously secret, so I scarce conceived the news.'

There was a magpie perched upon her roof yesterday in the forenoon; 'tis an ill omen,' said an old woman, as she shook her head mysteriously.

At that moment the new owner of the shop appeared; he made his way to the door, and having given two or three vigorous knocks, which remained unanswered, he raised the latch and entered; all was in perfect order, but the inmates were gone.

'Well, my good friends, said the sturdy proprietor, coming out again, 'Widow O'Reilly is gone. Some while ago she told me she desired to leave the town, but she bade me tell no one until after she had left. She has done it rather suddenly, I must say.'

'The Lady Adelina was much offended, I heard folks say, because Widow O'Reilly would not let her have that little grandchild; but, poor woman, she did not like to part with the child; maybe that is the reason why she left.'

'Well, from first to last, Widow O'Reilly was an upright kind-hearted woman; there is no denying that.'

All concurred in this statement made by the new owner of the shop, after which the good people dispersed each to his own business.

It was not until late that afternoon that Sir Cuthbert and his lady heard the news of Bridget's departure. Two servants had been sent from the Manor to her house with directions to claim Barbara de Courcy in the name of her uncle; one of the messengers being Harkwright, who was able, his master knew, to give evidence, that the little girl was Lady Margaret's daughter. The rage and indignation of Sir Cuthbert were great when the servants returned from their fruitless errand. He sent men to gather what information they could in the town; others he dispatched in search of the fugitives, persuaded that they could not have gone far, and that they would soon be overtaken by men on horse-back.

But Sir Cuthbert had little chance of finding the object of his researches, for she was many miles out at sea while his messengers were traversing the country in quest of her.

CHAPTER XIII.

To the traveler of the sixteenth century who approached London from the west, by the way called Oldbourn a splendid prospect presented itself when, after he had toiled up the steep brow of the hill, he gazed down on the great city—which was not then, as now, enveloped in a dense atmosphere of smoke and fog.

To the right the parish church of St. Andrews rose picturesquely from the steep declivity; its massive tower and decorated nave surrounded by ancient elms; on the left were the extensive buildings of Ely-house, seated in the midst of pleasant gardens. Farther, in the same direction, might be perceived the gilded spire of the church of St. John of Jerusalem, and the Norman towers of St. Bartholomew's Priory. Immediately below was the river, with its numerous bridges, and a forest of masts belonging to the various ships moored along its quays.

It was to view more at leisure this beautiful, and to him novel, scene that Larry O'Toole drew up his tired horse on the top of the before-mentioned hill, and remained for a few minutes looking with great satisfaction on the city. Many a long and wearisome day's journey had he made since he left the Land's End, and he was not sorry to have at length reached his destination.

The last rays of a summer sunset added a fairy beauty to all the buildings, to which Larry was by no means insensible, as his eye wandered from one picturesque edifice to another. The sunlight gave to the gilded spires a lustre no human hand could have bestowed; that of the noble Cathedral of St. Paul, which rose majestically from the centre of a cruciform church, stood glowing with light in grand relief against the cloudless sky, while the line of high roofs and pinnacled buttresses, which dominated over the groups of gable houses, shone as though silver, instead of lead, formed their covering.

Having sufficiently admired this his first view of London, Larry began to consider where he should find a night's lodging.

He now, therefore, descended the hill, and soon after, for the refreshment of himself and his horse, put up at a quaint little inn in the outskirts of the city. On the following morning he proceeded in search of his brother, who resided, he knew, with a Mr. Norton. The streets at that period had no names, and the houses no number, so that it was by no means easy for one unaccustomed to London to find his way about. Some years before his visit to the city, Larry had received news of his brother from a traveling pedlar who had been hospitably entertained at the Manor; the man having related that he had been to 'great London town,' and that there under some sore distress he had received much aid from a charitable gentleman named Norton, 'who,' added the pedlar, 'had in his service one Patrick O'Toole, who marvelously resembles one of the servants here.' Larry, guessing this to be his brother, of whom he had not heard for many years, had asked a number of questions, and from the replies was fully convinced that his supposition was correct.

One thing had fortunately remained well fixed in his memory, which was that Mr. Norton resided near St. Paul's Cathedral, of which the traveler had given a glowing description. So, having found his way thither, and learnt which was Mr. Norton's, he knocked at the door; but here an unexpected difficulty arose, for the servant of whom he demanded if Patrick O'Toole was within, replied that no such person had ever lived with his master since he had been with him, and that was three years. While they were still talking, the owner of the house, an elderly gentleman, came past.

'Wherefore is there so much noise and talking, James?' he inquired.

'Please your honor,' said Larry, before the other man had time to answer, 'it is my brother I am asking for.'

'Who is your brother?' said the gentleman, 'and why think you that he is here?'

Larry explaining what led him to suppose that his brother was in Mr. Norton's house, the gentleman informed him that Patrick O'Toole had, indeed, been in his service, but that about four years since he had accompanied a nephew on a long journey, and that they had not yet returned.

'And now, my good man,' he added, 'what brought you hither? from whence came you?'

Larry then related the circumstances which had made him leave Cornwall.

Mr. Norton was himself a Catholic, and had suffered many losses on account of his religion. For the last fifteen years he had lived in great retirement. His house was often the resort of priests, and he felt much interest in the case of fellow-sufferers for the Faith. He told Larry that he would willingly do anything in his power for Sir Reginald and Father Ralph; and having given him the necessary directions for finding his way to the Tower, and instructed him how he might gain permission to visit the prisoners, he dismissed him, with the charge to return on the following day.

To Larry's great disappointment he was not allowed to see either his master or the priest, although it was a relief to him to know that they were still alive. As he was about to withdraw a man called him back, and asked if he would like to see Austin de Courcy, who was under his charge, and won his favor and esteem by his patient and dignified bearing.

The proposition was joyfully accepted, and Larry was at once conducted to the cell of his young master. On seeing the well-known face of the faithful servant, Austin's countenance lit with pleasure, though surprise for a moment rendered him speechless.

'How is my mother?' were almost his first words.

During his long journey from Penzance Larry had frequently considered and planned how he should break the news of Lady Margaret's death; but now that he saw the anxious look and heard the inquiry of the son, he felt that he could not deceive him even for a minute. His voice faltered as he replied:

'Alas! your honor, she is dead! God rest her blessed soul!'

A mournful stillness followed this announcement. The servant well knew that no words of his could at that moment bring consolation to Austin; he therefore stood silent, inwardly sympathizing with the grief of his young master, whose tears fell abundantly.

The goaler now returned, and told Larry that it was time to leave, when at once he commenced fumbling in his coat-pocket, from which shortly he produced a small parcel, which he opened and presented to Austin. It contained pieces of moss and flowers, the dry and withered appearance of which showed that they had long been safely lodged in the place from which he now took them.

'I gathered them for you on her grave; sure it is very withered they are entirely, but you will like them sure all the same.'

'The boy pressed them to his lips, and before he could thank Larry the door had closed, and he was alone.

O'Toole returned the following day to Mr. Norton, who, being in want of a servant, took him into his employ, Larry making the condition that, should his former master escape from the Tower and want him as a servant, he should be at liberty to go back to him. Subsequently he was allowed to see Sir Reginald and Father Ralph. The former had heard from his son the sad news of Lady Margaret's death, and learnt from Larry all particulars concerning her end. It was a great comfort to him to know that his little daughter was with good people, who would bring her up in the Catholic faith. Sir Reginald told his faithful servant that both himself and the priest had received sentence of death, though for some reason unknown to them it had not been carried into execution, but it might be at any time.

'Larry, I have a brother,' he added, 'and before I die I should like to see him. He has abandoned his religion, but maybe the words I should now address to him would have more effect than those I spoke in the days of my prosperity. He lives on the Strand. Were he made aware that I was here, surely he would come to visit me.'

'It is not in London he lives at all, your honor,' replied Larry, who with difficulty restrained his feelings when mention was made of Sir Reginald's brother. Being questioned he disclosed the advantage Cuthbert de Courcy had derived from his brother's misfortunes, Sir Reginald listening attentively to the recital.

'Poor Cuthbert!' he said, when the other had finished speaking. 'He has wandered far from the right path. God forgive him, as I do with all my heart!'

Shortly after this visit all intercourse with the prisoners was stopped. Mr. Norton, notwithstanding, through the influence of some friends, obtained the release of Austin, on condition that he should be security for him, and farther, that the youth should visit the Lieutenant of the Tower at the end of three months, to show that he had not left the kingdom.

Mr. Norton resolved to take Austin into his own house, as the boy had no home to which he could go. To do this was not without some sacrifice of his own comfort; for having no children, and having always lived alone, and being now advanced in years, he disliked all interference with his habits and ways. He did not therefore relish the idea of having a boy of fifteen in the house; but it was an act of kindness, and he determined to do it, no matter what it cost.

Larry was sent to the Tower to conduct Austin de Courcy to his new home. He was likewise the bearer of a letter to sir Reginald, in which Mr. Norton promised to take care of his son until the father should make known his wishes with respect to him.

Mr. Norton was agreeably surprised with his young visitor, who seemed most grateful for the kindness shown him, and warmly thanked his benefactor. His presence was not in any way inconvenient; for being naturally of a grave and thoughtful disposition, the late misfortunes of his family had rendered him still more so. Occasionally he spoke with warmth and interest concerning his father, his little sister, or his home, but at other times he was silent and reserved, which suited Mr. Norton very well, for he was a man of few words.

One thought troubled and afflicted Austin. It was the remembrance that, while he enjoyed liberty and the comforts of a home, his father and the good priest whom he loved so well were deprived of both, and in momentary danger of death. Nothing but the express command of his parent could have induced him to leave them; in doing so he had been cheered by the hope that he might be able to devise some means for their escape from the Tower, and comforted himself with the thought that he would be allowed to visit them. At the end of three months he had not seen them, and had been disappointed in his hope of their deliverance.

The silent grief of the boy daily increased and drew the notice of Mr. Norton.

'Austin,' said the old gentleman one evening, after they had both sat a long time without speaking, 'you seem unhappy. Treat me as a friend, and tell me what saddens you. Perchance you are longing after your Cornish home, and miss the freedom you once enjoyed. I am waxing old, and maybe you find this but a dull existence.'

'No, no, sir: it is nothing like what you have mentioned, that grieves me,' said Austin earnestly. 'You are to me a kind friend, you have given me a home, when otherwise I should have been houseless. I am not so ungrateful to Providence as to forget these benefits, nor do I desire those things which I can no longer obtain. No, sir, that which makes me unhappy is the remembrance of my father and of the priest who are in the Tower, whom I can neither see nor relieve. O,' he added with still greater earnestness, 'could they not, with our help, escape from thence?'

Mr. Norton, while he fully sympathized with Austin's sorrow, could not here enter into his views. He was extremely prudent, and feared the ill-consequence of a failure. His young companion said no more; but he did not abandon his project. To him the accomplishment of his favorite design seemed easy, and he hoped in time to convince Mr. Norton of its feasibility.

At length, though not without reluctance, he obtained the consent of his kind host that he might make the attempt, with the promise that he would help him as far as he was able, though he was strictly warned to be very prudent in his dangerous undertaking.

Austin remembered that the little tower in which his father was imprisoned had a side door which led to the roof; and though the door was usually locked, he thought that Sir Reginald might yet succeed in forcing it, and once out on the leads, by means of a rope which their friends would bring, Father Ralph and he might make their descent.

This plan was communicated to his father, it was agreed that without delay they would attempt the execution.

The day for carrying out the project came. It seemed a long one to Austin. Midnight was the time fixed. Everything was prepared. He had earnestly recommended the enterprise to God. The shadows of night at length drew on, and Mr. Norton and the youth were sitting in silent expectation. The old Dutch clock in the hall struck eleven, when Larry, with another servant who was to accompany them, entered the room. Austin rose.

'May God bless you, and favor your endeavors!' said his aged friend. 'Were I young and vigorous I would go with you; but as it is, I fear I should be of little use. So I must needs wait here for your return, hoping you will bring with you the two prisoners. Farewell, my son!'

It was a clear October night, the wind was somewhat cold, as though by its keenness it wished to warn the unwary that autumn's days were almost sped. With rapid steps Austin and his two companions proceeded towards the Tower. Now and then they passed an armed watchman, whose flaming torch lit the way: in some streets a few horn-lamps might hang outside the houses, for the lighting of the city was, even till the reign of Queen Anne, left optional with the citizens, who suspended at their pleasure many or few lamps, as generosity or parsimony might prevail with them.

It wanted a few minutes to twelve when the party reached the outer bank of the moat, where a boat was waiting for them, which they quickly entered and rowed towards the Tower.

'There they are,' said Austin in a low whisper as he pointed to the leads. Two dark figures had at that moment appeared on the roof, and Austin waved a white handkerchief to attract their attention. A few minutes more and a splash in the sullen waters announced that they had, according to agreement, thrown down a string with a weight attached to it. Speedily a rope was tied on to this string, and Father Ralph and Sir Reginald were at work drawing it towards them. The rope was heavy, and they were frequently obliged to rest, their friends in the boat anxiously watching their movements, and glancing inquiringly around to ascertain that none were nigh.

At length the rope was fixed at the top of the Tower, and Sir Reginald was about to commence the arduous descent when persons were seen on the opposite side of the moat. The two then lay down on the leads that they might not be seen, and the party in the boat pushed close to the Tower, where the dark shadow it threw on the water completely hid them from view. The persons were observed to stop and look towards the Tower, one of them pointing towards the top. Austin and his companions watched them with intense emotion, dreading every moment to hear the sound of the alarm. But they were soon relieved; for whatever may have been the object which arrested the attention of the strangers they appeared satisfied, and were soon out of view.

The party in the boat then emerged from their hiding-place. Sir Reginald and Father Ralph, having first looked cautiously around, next leant over the parapet, as if measuring with a rapid glance the height from the leads to the water. They then seemed to hesitate.

'My father is coming first,' whispered Austin, who, with head bent back and eyes strained upwards, observed every movement of the two figures in whose fate he was so deeply interested.

Larry and young de Courcy held the end of the rope firmly, while Jones, the other servant, and the boatman kept the bark steady.

After a few anxious moments Sir Reginald alighted in the boat, when he silently pressed the hand of his son. Soon, again, all eyes were directed towards the leads, watching eagerly the descent of the priest; and not until he also was seated in the boat did the thankful words, 'We are saved!' escape from the lips of Sir Reginald.

The fresh night air seemed pleasant to the prisoners, so long accustomed to the close atmosphere of a cell. And the thought that they were once more free, although not unmixed with the dread of being again apprehended, was exhilarating indeed.

Having rowed a considerable way down the river, on landing they recommended the strictest silence to the owner of the boat on the proceedings of that night, and then directed their steps towards Mr. Norton's house, where they arrived at about two o'clock.

The old gentleman had not retired to rest, anxiously awaiting the result of the expedition. Rejoiced at its success he received with courtesy his two guests, who expressed their gratitude for his generous hospitality and for the interest he had shown in them during their captivity. Mr. Norton replied that he had only done what any Catholic in his position would be glad to do, adding that it was but right that those who suffered in the same cause should assist each other.

It was agreed that Father Ralph and Sir Reginald should remain hid in their present abode for a few days, until the first excitement occasioned by the news of their escape had subsided.

At the expiration of that time, and when the keen search in London and the vicinity was over, Sir Reginald declared his intention of leaving England. He selected France as his future home. There was, he said, nothing to retain him in his native land; he could no longer live there in safety; while in a foreign country he might practice his religion without restraint, and procure a solid Catholic education for his son. At first he entertained the idea of returning to Cornwall to fetch his little daughter, proceeding from thence to Barnstaple and sailing in one of the ships which then traded between that port and France.

Both Father Ralph and Mr. Norton strongly advised him against so hazardous an expedition, alleging that it would be impossible for him thus to traverse England without being detected and arrested. So with much reluctance he yielded to their remonstrances, and it was settled that Sir Reginald and Austin should go on board a French ship then anchored in the Thames, soon to set sail for Calais.

'I wish much that you also were to accompany us across the seas,' observed Sir Reginald to Father Ralph on the evening which preceded the departure, the last they ever spent together.

'You, dear Sir, have now no duty to perform in this country,' replied the priest, 'neither have you the same opportunity of doing good as when you were a landlord. Therefore I deem it right that you, who have only your own and your son's eternal interests to consult, should go where you and he can best receive the succors of religion. But with me it is otherwise; the vineyard is large and the laborers few. I must needs remain and work so long as the Heavenly Father spares me.'

Mr. Norton was truly grieved to part with Austin. If at first he had some dread of his arrival, he now no less regretted the separation which he knew he should much feel, from that young and thoughtful companion, to whose presence he had become so accustomed during the time they had passed together.

A few days later Sir Reginald and Austin were far away from the shores of England. Father Ralph too had left his place of concealment with the view of recommencing his missionary labors.

CHAPTER XIV.

WHILE the events narrated in the foregoing chapters occupied the attention of Sir Reginald and his friends, Cuthbert passed his time apparently in ease and enjoyment, but in truth harassed by remorse, and deriving little pleasure from the rude grandeur of county life in the sixteenth century.

Among the diversions with which he endeavored to cheer his days and drown the voice of conscience, the chase took a prominent part. He had become popular with the thinly-scattered gentry of the county, whom he invited to his feasts and stag-hunts, and gratified by multiplied amusements.

One afternoon Cuthbert had returned from hunting the deer which abounded in the park. He had been accompanied by none but his own attendants. The last echoes of the hunting-horn had died away in the surrounding woods and groves; the courtyard, which had for a few minutes been the scene of commotion and noise, had now sunk into its usual silence. Still Sir Cuthbert stood on the doorstep gazing through the archway up the long avenue.

'Why will you not enter, my Lord Cuthbert?' said the Lady Adelina, who had just descended to the hall.

He was about to do as he was asked when his attention was arrested by a man whom he saw running at full speed down the avenue. He waited, therefore, until the breathless and panting messenger had reached him.

'What news bring you in so great haste?' he inquired.

'O, noble sir, terrible news!' said the young man, as soon as he was able to speak. 'Strangers from Spain, they say, have landed at Mousehole: they have burnt it, and now they are advancing towards our town. Those whom they have driven from their homes have brought us the tidings.'

'And what want you with me?' asked Sir Cuthbert coldly.

'The townspeople sent me,' replied the messenger, 'to beg of you to come with your men, and to aid us to repel these marauders.'

Cuthbert consented, for his pride was flattered by an application made to him in this moment of danger by the people of Penzance, who had hitherto regarded him with but little friendship.

'Go not thither, I pray thee,' exclaimed Adelina, endeavoring to hold him back: 'thou mightest be killed!'

But Sir Cuthbert was by no means deficient in courage, and laughing at her fears, he tore himself from her grasp.

He gave orders that all his servants capable of bearing arms should accompany him, and at the head of this small and strangely-equipped regiment, he started for the town.

On leaving the courtyard, he perceived Harkwright in the ranks of his followers, but having only a poor opinion of that attendant's courage, he remarked to him scornfully that he might as well remain at home and protect the Manor. Delighted with this permission, Andrew quickly retired to the kitchen, where an aged fellow-servant was seated, and having carefully loaded the musket he had brought with him, he then placed it in a corner of the room. His companion, who had watched him, attentively, inquired the motive of this precaution, and why he had not given the weapon to those who were going to fight, instead of keeping it for himself.

'No, no,' replied Andrew; 'those Spaniards may perchance come hither; and I will not be without aught to defend myself.'

Meanwhile Sir Cuthbert and his party had reached the town. But instead of finding, as he had expected, men willing to defend themselves and their homes, and desirous of following any leader who should present himself, he saw in all around him nothing but an anxiety to save themselves, and what goods they could collect, by instant flight, while they left the town to the mercy of the invaders.

The place presented a scene of indescribable confusion; the fugitives who had brought tidings of the spaniards' arrival having spread terror among the inhabitants by the accounts they gave of their ruthless barbarity. Men and women were busy carrying off articles of value or of use from their homes; groups of frightened children clung round their no-less-terrified mothers—there was calling and shouting and weeping to be heard on all sides. The flames which rose from Newlyn increased the alarm of the panic-stricken inhabitants, by warning them of the fast approach of the danger.

Sir Cuthbert, who was on horseback, found it impossible to proceed up the narrow and crowded street; he therefore remained at the entrance, viewing with astonishment the strange scene before him.

It was Thomas Tregarthen, and not the towns-people, as the messenger had expressed it, who had sent for Sir Cuthbert, and on seeing him he pushed his way through the crowd, and approaching the rider, said.

'I salute you, good sir. You have come hither to aid us in this our sore distress. Pray tell me what you think of this matter.'

'What do I think?' replied Sir Cuthbert contemptuously. 'Why, that never did I see folk more resigned than these to their fate; truly they seem determined that the town shall be empty when their visitors come. I suppose they deem it more prudent to retire and allow their homes to be destroyed than to remain like brave men and defend them.'

'Your words are too true; and it is because I could not rally them that I sent to crave your powerful assistance. But this exceeding fear which has seized upon them, Sir Cuthbert, is not the effect of cowardice, but takes its rise from a strange prophecy written, in ages gone by, in the cornish tongue, and which says that a time will come when "Strangers landing on the rocks of Merlin will burn Paul's Church, Penzance and Newlyn." Now the people think that these are the strangers mentioned, and that if they are to burn the town, why then naught can prevent the prophecy from coming true.'

'Then, my good friend,' replied Sir Cuthbert, smiling ironically, 'there is nothing to be done, but we must needs wait patiently for the accomplishment of this prophecy. I see well that I can be of no service to you.'

The conversation was here interrupted by a cry that re-echoed through the town. 'They come, they come!' exclaimed voices on every side.

A precipitous flight ensued. Sir Cuthbert, however, could not bring himself to imitate the example of the fugitives, and turning his horse in the opposite direction, and facing the enemy, he cried in a loud voice, 'Let all brave men follow me!'

Without looking to see if his appeal had been responded to, he rushed forward. He had not proceeded far when a bullet from the invaders struck his horse; the animal and its rider fell over. His followers at once fled, and the Spaniards, without opposition, entered the deserted town, and finding little to plunder, they at once set fire to it.

Sir Cuthbert was not hurt; he had rolled into a bush of furze, and remained hidden till the enemy had passed, when rising cautiously he proceeded by a circuitous road to join the people who had assembled on a neighboring hill, and were from thence watching the conflagration.

The flames rose high, and leaped from roof to roof like fiery monsters; the red glare being reflected in the ocean's billows, shedding a glow on the sky which made the setting sun look pallid.

At sunrise a cheerful little town stood there with many a happy home in it, and joyous hearts and bright faces welcomed the dawn of another day, little thinking that that day was to be one of fearful destruction; and now sunset witnessed naught but smouldering ruins and disconsolate families.

The Spaniards perhaps had intended to advance farther inland in search of booty; but the inhabitants of Penzance, now that the prophecy concerning their town was accomplished, regained courage, and rushed with violence down the hill, when the astonished invaders took to flight, and having reached their ships, quickly spread their white sails to the evening breeze, and departed, to the infinite joy of the pursuers, who, nevertheless, now increased to large numbers on the beach, intimated that any farther attempt to land would meet with resistance.

We must now return to the Manor, where Harkwright and his companion sat enjoying themselves in the kitchen. The former was congratulating himself on his good luck in remaining at home, where he fancied he was in safety; but it is in vain that the wicked search to elude the vengeance of God. Penance alone can disarm Him. And oftentimes while they endeavor by human prudence to avoid His threatened judgements, they rush blindly to the very spot where God's wrath awaits them.

'Well, Thomas,' said Andrew, 'I doubt not but we are safe; they will never think of coming here.'

'Don't know that,' replied his companion, shaking his head.

'What sound is that?'

Both listened anxiously.

'I will go and bar the hall-door,' said the old man, 'and do you, Andrew, run and make fast the one at the end of the corridor, the one leading from the old chapel you know.'

Harkwright turned pale—he knew the door but too well—and hesitated.

'Come, be ye quick,' said his companion. 'While you loiter here they may enter.'

Andrew seized his gun resolutely, and left the kitchen. But as he approached the fatal spot he trembled with fear at the recollection of the treacherous deed he had there perpetrated.

At that moment a figure appeared at the open door: and Andrew, losing all presence of mind, raised his gun and fired, he knew not where or at what. The discharge was returned from without almost immediately, when there followed a loud scream; the report of the gun-shots resounded through the vaulted halls of the old Manor. A thick white smoke clouded the scene, which, clearing by degrees, rolling off in fantastic forms, the lifeless but still bleeding form of Andrew Harkwright was discovered lying prostrate on the stone floor. The soul of the unhappy man was already before its Judge.

Thomas had heard the shots. Having waited anxiously for a few minutes, when all was silent he hastened to the spot, and knelt down by the side of the dead body. The bullet had pierced the heart, and he soon perceived that life was extinct—so leaving the inanimate remains of his fellow-servant, the old man proceeded at once to his mistress' apartment to warn her and her maids of the danger.

He saw from the window a party of Spaniards, who were evidently seeking for some entrance less guarded than that where they had shot Andrew. They were in number about twenty, who, having seen the Manor-house in the distance, had separated from their comrades, hoping to find a more plentiful booty. Thomas was well aware that resistance was impossible, as he was the only man in the house.

Lady Adelina was seated surrounded by her waiting-women, who were employed in various kinds of works, when the old servant entered.

'My gracious lady,' he said, 'I bear you ill-tidings.'

She turned pale at these words.

'Sir Cuthbert!' she exclaimed, 'is he dead or wounded?'

'No, my lady, no harm that I have heard has befallen your noble lord; but the Spaniards are here. Harkwright is shot, we had better fly. I will go to the town and call Sir Cuthbert and the men to drive away these plunderers.'

Lady Adelina was too terrified and bewildered to make any remark, so her maids hastily collecting all the things they could belonging to her, Thomas conducted them safely down the back stairs; the noise now heard in the house sufficiently proving that the marauders had found an entrance.

In a sheltered and secluded part of the park the servant left Lady Adelina and her maids, while he went to inform Sir Cuthbert of what was happening.

More than an hour had elapsed when the owner of Bron-Welli and his attendants arrived in sight of the mansion. They had come too late, for it was already in flames. The grief and anger of Sir Cuthbert were so violent that no one durst even offer him consolation.

With great exertion a part of the building was saved, but all the more ancient portions and the wood-work were consumed; much also of the more valuable property, plate, jewel-caskets, etc., was saved. Before nightfall all was extinguished, and Lady Adelina, her husband and the servants found lodgings for themselves in the remaining part of the Manor.

At the first dawn of morning Sir Cuthbert rose, after having passed a restless night. He hurried out, and gazing with feeling of morose grief, not hallowed by resignation, nor softened by the thought that he was an innocent sufferer, on that which the previous day had formed his pride and his pleasure; but the old Manor-house now presented the appearance of a ruin. The front archway, the Tower, and the part where Sir Cuthbert had spent the night remained standing indeed, but of the main building little had escaped; roof and floors had fallen in, leaving nothing but the charred outer walls, and here and there might be seen the scattered wrecks of furniture.

'Twas ill-gotten property, and has brought me no good,' murmured Sir Cuthbert to himself; but quickly he drove the thought away, for there is nothing which wrong-doers dread so much as to own that the misfortunes which befall them are warnings which God, as a merciful Father, sends them, or that they are the punishment of their own sins. No, they do not like to feel an all-powerful hand so close to them; they would sooner attribute their disasters to natural causes, and avoid the consideration that all things spring from the One Eternal Spirit.

Disinclined to repair the Manor, Sir Cuthbert and his lady returned soon after to London, where the former endeavored, by a life of reckless dissipation and extravagant grandeur, to drown the remorse and sadness which constantly haunted him. Before he left Penzance the inhabitants, hearing of his intention of going to the capitol, begged of him to present a petition in their name to the queen imploring her to grant them money wherewith to rebuild their town. To this he agreed; and fully convinced that the request would be complied with on the part of his sovereign, he advanced a large sum of money to the townspeople, who were in urgent need, imagining that the queen would certainly repay him.

As it is not our intention to follow Sir Cuthbert at present to the gay capitol, which was henceforward the scene of his restless life, we shall return to Catherine and her friends, and trace their more humble course.

CHAPTER XV.

It was with feelings of deep emotion that Catherine revisited the ancient city where her happy childhood had been spent; and with great joy did she hasten, accompanied by Bridget and little Mary, to Andrew's house, where she knew she would be well received.

Nor was she disappointed in her expectation. The old couple were delighted to see her, although astonished at her unexpected arrival, and much puzzled to know who her two companions were. When they had rested themselves,

'Now, Catherine, my child,' said the old man kindly, 'you must tell us all that hath befallen you since last we saw you, and what you now intend doing; and fear not to ask of us all you need—my good dame and I will help you as much as in us lies.'

Catherine related in a few simple words the principal events of her life at Penzance, explaining at the same time who Bridget and the little child were; and when the former, noticing that Catherine avoided saying anything that was to her own praise, interposed, and described her earnest labors for the conversion of her aunt, her courage in saving Lady Margaret's daughter, and her devoted care of the little orphan, the faces of Andrew and his wife gleamed with honest pride on hearing that she, whom they loved as though she had been their own child, had lost none of those sterling qualities which they had long since remarked in her.

Then they said that they would take a little time to consider what she had now best do, asking her not to forget to pray fervently that they might all be guided to do what was right.

Catherine and her two companions spent some days in peaceful happiness with the good clothier, who would not hear of their lodging elsewhere but in his house.

One morning Andrew and his wife asked their young friend to come with them into their little back parlor, as they wished to speak to her.

The old man told her that he had come to the conclusion that it would be safe for her to fix her abode at Exeter, as there was no likelihood that Sir Cuthbert would ever gain tidings that his niece was there; so he advised them to take a little cottage which he knew of in the neighborhood.

'You remember, my dear child,' he added, 'that ere you left us you placed in my hands a part of your money, which I forthwith put out to the best advantage for you; and now, as you will require some of it to establish your new home, I remit to you the sum of ten pounds. I feel sure you will make a good and wise use of it, Kate.'

Catherine was delighted and astonished on learning that her little fortune had so much increased in the hands of her kind friends, and thanked them warmly.

Widow O'Reilly and Catherine settled themselves therefore at Exeter, and the latter was able to add to their means by doing embroidery and various kinds of needlework, for which Dame Andrew found her numerous customers among the ladies of the neighborhood; and when it was discovered that she excelled in this employment, she was also asked to come to different houses to give instructions to those who wished to learn her art. In this way she was never in want of occupation. Bridget, too, could gain money by her spinning, in which she was very skillful.

Theirs was a happy and peaceful little home. Their wants being few and their industry great, they were able, not only to support themselves comfortably, but also to assist those who stood in need of it. Catherine had also learnt from Lady Margaret the property of different medical herbs, and how to make divers ointments and remedies for the sick, which knowledge she now turned to good use, and her poorer neighbors soon found that she was of great assistance by the bedside of the sick or dying, not only by reason of this knowledge, but also from her kind and cheerful disposition.

There was another good work towards which Catherine had always felt much attracted, and for which she seemed specially suited—it was the instruction of children, for blended with her steady rectitude of purpose and strong intelligence, there was a childlike simplicity and gaiety that easily won the hearts of children. Finding, therefore, that there were among the poorer inhabitants many little Catholics to whom no one gave instruction, she obtained the parents' consent that she should teach them, who at once gladly acceded. Accordingly, when the day's work was over, the young girl might be seen surrounded by a troop of little ones explaining to them, with wonderful patience, the great truths of religion. It was a difficult task, but she succeeded, and, moreover, she made the instruction pleasing to her little pupils by the edifying stories she recounted to them, which interested them and served to fix in their memory what she taught.

But it must not be imagined that these occupations made her neglect that which she justly regarded as one of her first duties, namely, the education of Lady Margaret's daughter: this, it may be truly said, was the great object of her life. While Bridget, with motherly care, looked after the little child's bodily comfort, Catherine instilled into her heart the love of God and of her neighbor, and imparted to her all the instruction which she herself possessed. The task was likely to be one of long duration, for no tidings had been received of Sir Reginald, and neither Bridget nor Catherine knew whether the child had any relations except her Protestant uncle and aunt; so that it was probable that many years must elapse before the scattered remnants of that once-happy home could be reunited.

The young girl was not unequal to the great mission before her; for not only had she, as had been already mentioned, received an education superior to that of most persons in her position, but her religious instruction, first from her mother and subsequently at the Manor-house, had been such as to impress deeply on her mind the great truths of the Catholic faith. Little did Lady Margaret think, when she admitted the little stranger into her household, that she might be instructed and be present at the prayers, that she was forming the mind of one who was to be the friend and guide of her own daughter. Often should we be surprised, when we do good, were we to see the effect which our slight and apparently worthless efforts will, after a time, produce; and especially when the return comes, as in this case, upon those who are dearest to us, like the moisture which the earth has given up on a summer's morn returns at night in beneficial dewdrops to refresh the parched soil.

It may not be uninteresting to the reader to have a description of Catherine's new home. When you had reached the end of the principal street, and found yourself on the road which led to London, there stood, at the period to which this tale relates, a house, detached and a little back from the road, having in front a small garden; behind was a meadow traversed by a murmuring brooklet, whose clear waters gliding into a neighboring wood, after meandering among the trees for a short distance, were precipitated over a steep bank, forming a mimic waterfall.

The house itself was an old-fashioned structure, as were all those around it; its roof was high and pointed, with two lattice-windows in it; the upper story projected, and was supported by clumsy-looking wooden posts, so as to form a little arcade underneath, where there was a bench on which one might, if so inclined, sit and watch the passers-by.

Those who have visited Exeter, and seen the old houses still left standing in High-street and other parts of the city, will better understand the kind of dwelling here described.

Its situation was most convenient, as in a few minutes its inmates could either reach the heart of the old city or find themselves among the beautiful combs and lanes of Devonshire. This, then, was Catherine's and her friends' home; old Andrew had found it for them, and it was not far from the good merchant's house. To his dwelling they and all the Catholics in the town resorted on Sundays and holidays; for he frequently harbored priests, and on such occasions Mass was celebrated, and the faithful were able to approach the Sacraments; and when this happiness was denied them and no priest was there, they supplied for the want as best they could by praying together.

Catherine had gone late one afternoon to purchase some articles in the city, and as she passed the principal inn she was surprised to see an unusual stir in the courtyard; there were horses and servants and armed attendants; evidently some great personage had arrived. She inquired of the woman from whom she made her purchases 'wherefore was there such a crowd at the Golden Lions?'

The woman replied that a gentleman and his lady had come there from Penzance, and that the news had spread that that town had been burnt down by some invaders; more than this the shop-woman was not able to tell, and therefore could not satisfy Catherine, who wanted much to know whether the inhabitants had escaped, and whether any others besides the lady and gentleman mentioned had come from Penzance.

In a state of great uneasiness she hastened home, her mind painfully preoccupied with the thought that perhaps her aunt and cousins had perished in the flames; but the following morning she was relieved by positive information that all the inhabitants had escaped. Another cause of perplexity now presented itself. The persons stopping at the inn were no other than Sir Cuthbert and Lady Adelina, and the lady having been taken ill, they would so be delayed some days in the city, and there was the chance that some one of the company might recognize little Barbara or one of her two friends. Strict seclusion therefore was observed by them all; and great was their satisfaction when, on the fourth morning after the occurrence, they witnessed the departure of Sir Cuthbert and his party.

Bridget and Catherine now turned their thoughts towards Dame Barnby, and though they were assured of her safety, as all, or nearly all, the houses had been burnt, they feared that she might have suffered great losses. Catherine consulted her friend Andrew as to what she had better do. 'For,' she said, with much feeling, 'it would be most wrong and ungrateful of me to leave my poor aunt in distress—she who so long gave me a home. But how judge you that I can be of most service to her? Counsel me, I pray thee.'

'Very right it is, Kate, to be grateful,' replied the old man thoughtfully; 'and it is our duty to help our relatives when they are in trouble. Do you think your aunt would like to come here?'

'I think she would like it much; for she told me, after her conversion, that for divers reasons she would be pleased to quit Penzance; but then there were things which made her content to remain: such as having the opportunity of attending to her religious duties at the Manor, and being able to consult the good Lady Margaret; hut, alas, all that has ceased to exist!'

It was accordingly settled that the young girl should write to her aunt inviting her to come to Exeter, where Andrew said he would find employment for her. As Catherine had money of her own, she was able to send a present to her aunt and cousins; it consisted of a strong homespun woollen dress and cloak for each, which she chose with Dame Andrew's assistance. This package, together with the letter, were remitted to a trusty messenger; by whom Dame Barnby returned a verbal answer to the effect that she was very thankful to her niece and friends for their kindness, and that she would come by the next boat.

At the expected time they arrived, and both parties experienced great joy at meeting once more. By Andrew's advice, Dame Barnby took a small shop, and soon she had a flourishing business.

One Sunday, when Widow O'Reilly and Catherine went to the good clothier's to hear Mass, among the congregation there assembled was a stranger. He was past middle age; he had a long flowing gray beard, and there was in his countenance an expression of frankness and benignity.

After Mass, Dame Andrew called Catherine to her. 'Come, my child,' she said, 'you must stay and see the good merchant, a great friend of ours who last night arrived from London, after many tedious days' journey; he much wants to see you.'

So saying Dame Andrew led her young friend to the parlor, where the stranger from London was busily engaged in conversation with his Exeter friend; both ceased speaking as the two entered. The guest looked towards Catherine, and turning to his host, inquired:

'Is that the young girl of whom you spoke to me?'

Having received an answer in the affirmative, he approached her, and addressing her kindly, said that his friend Andrew had related to him her history, and that he felt much interested in her welfare. He then asked her several questions about her little charge, Barbara. 'I think,' he added, 'that I can give you good tidings of her father; for some time since a priest, and with him a Cornish gentleman, who was a Catholic, escaped from the Tower, and great search was made after them; and now that my friend told me of Sir Reginald de Courey, whose child you are bringing up, methinks it must be the same who escaped from prison; but whither he has gone, I know not.'

Catherine rejoiced to think that her little friend was not fatherless, and that perhaps some day she might have the happiness of restoring the child to him.

The London merchant had come to Devon and Cornwall to purchase cloth and woollen goods; Andrew was one of his principal suppliers, and he had long been connected with him. He intended remaining only a few days at Exeter, but he desired to see Catherine again before continuing his journey, and begged that she would bring little Barbara.

Accordingly, with Widow O'Reilly's permission, they both went the following day to Andrew's house; when the young girl was not a little astonished on the merchant's making known to her his desire that she should accompany him to London.

'We have no children,' he said, 'and my dame would much like to have one so good and steady as you to help her in household duties, for she waxes old, and you would live with us as if you had been our own daughter. Say, Catherine, will you come?'

'Leave Widow O'Reilly and little Mary? O no, good sir, never! I thank you much for your kind offer, but 'tis vain to ask me,' replied the young girl.

'I told you she would not go,' remarked Dame Andrew.

The London merchant sighed and seemed disappointed, but after a moment's silence he said:

'I am sorry I cannot take you to my good dame, for she would be greatly pleased; but I shall not press you; your attachment to Mistress O'Reilly and your devotedness to Lady Margaret's little daughter only make me think the better of you. But I come to this part of the world every three years; if when I return any change has taken place in your circumstances, and you are willing to accompany me, I shall be happy to take you.'

Catherine smiled, as though she thought it were not very probable that any such change would occur; she thanked the good merchant nevertheless, and bidding him farewell, departed.

Widow O'Reilly was delighted when she heard what had happened, and that Catherine had refused to go to great London.

A few days after the merchant departed, and the young girl soon forgot all about him and his promised visit at the end of three years.

CHAPTER XVI.

HAPPY and peaceful was the life which Barbara de Courey led with Widow O'Reilly and Catherine. Quite as happy as it could have been had she remained in her paternal home.

She was a thoughtful and silent child, yet had within her a deep calm joy. The birds, the trees, the flowers, the murmuring brooks, were companions to her, and spoke to her little heart of the love of God their Creator. She was affectionate towards her kind friends, and had in them that entire confidence which makes childhood so beautiful and so free from care. What they said she implicitly believed; that they would provide her with all she stood in need of she felt sure, or rather, it would be more correct to say that the thought that it could be otherwise never crossed her mind; and so she lived on happy and content, flitting in Bridget and Catherine all she desired.

When spring came she loved to gather the sweet-scented violets which grew in the shady lanes, and to fill her little apron with primroses and cowslips, which she brought home to adorn their cottage. The meadow at the back of the house belonged to a good-natured neighbor, who allowed the little trespasser to wander there in search of flowers. By the stream she plucked the large pale-blue forget-me-not; or, in the summer months, would return home in triumph with a bunch of yellow water-iris.

The little garden in front of the cottage was one of her chief delights; it was situated on the sunny slope which intervened between the dwelling and the road, and although very small, was well stocked with common hardy plants, such as then adorned gardens, when flowers reigned supreme, and foliage plants were unthought of. It was a spot such as Shakespeare describes when he says:

'I know a bank where the wild thyme blows,
Where oxlips and the nodding violets grow;
Quite over-canopied with luscious woodbine,
With sweet musk-roses, and with eglantine.'

The care of this fragrant garden had been intrusted to Barbara, and in it she would labor with childish gravity; now trying to keep the trailing woodbine within bounds, then pulling up a weed which had intruded itself among the flowers; or she would carefully tie up the 'sweet musk-roses,' and draw back the wayward shoots that would push through the hedge and peep on to the road, which view of the world did not improve their appearance; for when their little mistress had drawn them in again she generally found that their green glossy leaves were covered with dust, or had trailed in the mud, or a goat passing that way had made a meal off the tender shoots.

'I think, Barbara,' Catherine used to say to her, 'that the branches of your rose-trees are like foolish children that wander from their parents' home, and meet with many mishaps which would not have befallen them had they remained and done their duties as becomes good children.'

'I will never wander from you, sister Kate, and granddame,' the child would reply.

Catherine took pleasure in making her young pupil see in the flowers emblems of higher things, thus, one morning Barbara called her to see a beautiful white convolvulus which had just unfolded its snowy blossom. After having duly admired it,

'Knowest thou, little sister, what that flower is like?' she said. 'I will tell thee. It is like the pure soul of a child, quite spotless, and open, so that all can see into it; and it looks towards the sun as the innocent soul does towards God, from whom it receives all.'

That afternoon there was a heavy shower; when it had ceased Barbara ran out to look at her convolvulus. Alas, the rain had beaten it to the ground, where it lay much torn and soiled. Picking it up she took it to Catherine, who was working in the kitchen.

'Ah, see, the lovely flower has touched the earth, and is all dirtied,' said the child sorrowfully. 'Sister Kate, it is no more like a beautiful soul, is it?'

'No; but like one that has fallen into sin. O Barbara, a soul that has committed sin is far more disfigured than this flower.'

These conversations, and the good instructions she received from Catherine, made a deep impression on that naturally thoughtful child.

Thinking that she would like to have companions to play with her, her kind friends asked Susan Barnby and some other little girls, who they knew would teach no evil, to come occasionally to the cottage; but when Barbara had amused herself with them for a short space of time she would steal away and either wander alone into the neighboring wood or return to Mother Bridget and Catherine, and reply, when urged to rejoin her young companions, that she liked much better to be with sister Kate and granddame.

The truth was, that her little friends could not understand the quiet happiness she enjoyed in searching for her favorite flowers, listening to the songs of the birds, and watching the rippling waters of the little brook, the child therefore preferred the company of those who did sympathize with her.

She considered it a great treat to be allowed to accompany Catherine when the latter took work to the houses of those by whom she had been employed. There was one walk which was especially delightful to them both; it led to the domain of one of the numerous gentry who resided in the environs of the city. Part of the road lay through a forest; and beautiful it was, on a summer's day, to watch the flitting lights and shades dancing among the green leaves and across the narrow path; and sweet was the sound of birds singing, and of the breeze rustling in the tree-tops; and now and then, perhaps, a gay little squirrel might be seen bounding along the ground, or leaping from branch to branch. All these things were causes of innocent enjoyment to Catherine and Barbara. Then, in autumn, they loved to hear the withered leaves crackling under their feet; and they used to gather on their way the nuts which hung in rich clusters on the boughs, or the juicy blackberries which grew in the tangled underwood. In this forest, too, numerous flowers flourished. The wood anemone put forth, in early spring, its starlike blossom, and in the sheltered spots there was the blue periwinkle, and also that mysterious-looking plant called the cuckoo-pint, with its hooded flower rising among the spotted leaves. Many plants there are whose names recall the simple piety of former ages, which loved to link these fair products of nature with the honor paid to the Blessed Virgin and to the Saints; Such are 'Our Lady's Mantle,' the 'Virgin's Bower,' 'Our Lady's Cushion,' the 'St. John's Wort,' dedicated, as its name implies, to St John; and in old times the harebell was appropriated to St George's-day, and the guilderose to Whitsuntide. All which, as they walked along, would furnish Catherine with a topic, who would talk of them to her little companion, and of their meaning, and repeat also to her the quaint but beautiful legends connected with them. Sometimes, too, she would say something to her of their uses in domestic surgery; and in this respect the St. John's Wort was in especial reputation, and no less as an antidote against witchcraft.

There stood, in the midst of this forest, a solitary dwelling, inhabited by a woodman and his wife. The merry song of the woodman was ever to be heard accompanying the sound of his busy axe as he felled the lofty trees; the woman all the while sitting at the door of the cottage intent on spinning, and, like her husband, to all appearance cheerful and content. To reach their destination Catherine and Barbara had to pass this cottage. At first the industrious dame used to look with astonishment at the two wayfarers; then, when she grew accustomed to see them, she would smile and wish them 'Good day;' and when, once or twice, little Barbara had ventured to approach where the woodman was working, to pick up some of the white chips that flew around, he had stopped and kindly bade her 'take them and not fear.'

Then on market-days the woodman's wife used to pass by her young friends' home; and once, when a violent storm had overtaken her, Mother Bridget had invited her in; and so an intimacy sprang up between the inmates of the two cottages.

It happened, however, that for some time Catherine had had no occasion to pass that way, and when business again brought her thither, a change very noticeable had come over the woodman and his dame; for although the axe was still heard working destruction among the trees, the song was now hushed. The good woman also had lost her air of cheerfulness, seeming sad and downcast. 'They have some sorrow,' thought Catherine, and she remarked the same to Bridget.

'Poor creatures! Thou shouldst ask if there is aught that we could do for them,' said the goodhearted widow.

The next time that Catherine passed the cottage in the forest she stopped, and addressing herself to the woman, with that genuine kindness and perfect simplicity which were prominent features in her character, she said:

'Mother Bridget and I are very uneasy, fearing ye have received ill-tidings; for passing by of late I never hear the woodman's song, and I am grieved to see thee so sorrowful. Is there any service we could render thee?'

'Truly it eases mine heart to hear thy kind words; we are indeed, in sore affliction, but thou canst not assist us.' The poor woman then proceeded to relate that they had a son, who, with his wife and a large family, resided at a neighboring farm; he had unfortunately contracted a debt which he was unable to pay, and he had come to his parents to see if they could help him; for the term allowed for repayment would expire in another month, when, if he were unable to answer the demands of the money-lenders, he would be arrested and his goods would be sold, and his wife and children would with him lose their only support.

It was hard indeed for the poor people to be obliged to tell their son that it was not in their power to assist him; but they could not say otherwise, for although their labor sufficed to support themselves, they were totally unable to supply the large sum he required; he had therefore departed with a heavy heart, leaving the good couple no less afflicted.

Catherine listened with interest to the sorrowful tale, and expressed her sympathy with them. On returning home she communicated the tidings to Bridget.

'Good Master Andrew has much money of mine,' she said, after she had pictured to Widow O'Reilly the distress of their friends in the wood, 'and what need have I of it? I have a happy home; thou dost not let me want for anything; suppose I were to ask Master Andrew to allow me to give those poor people the sum they require?'

'Thou hast a generous heart, my child,' replied the old woman, 'but thou must take counsel with Master Andrew; he will know better than I whether this be advisable or not.'

She went accordingly, on the following day, to the clothier, who was not a little surprised when she asked, in her usual simple manner, whether she might take out of the money which belonged to her a sum which amounted to well-nigh half her little capital. Andrew raised his eyes from the large account-book over which he was poring, and looked at her in bewilderment, while his worthy dame gave an exclamation of surprise.

'Kate, thou must tell me why thou wantest so large a sum; if it is necessary for thee, thou knowest I shall not refuse it; but if I judge it not to be for thy weal, I cannot, as thy guardian, agree to thy taking it,' said the old man.

Catherine named the purpose to which she desired to apply it.

'I commend thy charity, and am well-pleased with thee; but methinks this might be done without touching thy capital, which we men of business hold to be an evil practice,' replied Master Andrew gravely. 'I will not deprive thee of the merit of this good deed, especially as the man who has incurred this debt is, I know, the industrious father of a large family; but to buy a small farm he borrowed money from one of those Jews, all of whom are extortioners; and the crops of late having failed, he is indeed in great straits. I heard all this from one who lives near him. Now this is what I propose: that I lend thee the money, for which I shall not require interest, and that by degrees thou shalt pay me back half the sum; the other half I give as charity on my own account. The repaying of the amount thou borrowest will entail on thee, Kate, much industry, and the denial of many things which thou mightest otherwise have afforded thyself. Art thou willing to do this?'

'I am,' replied Catherine earnestly, 'and am most thankful for this kind offer; with God's help I will repay thee ere this day year.'

Andrew opened a drawer and counted out the money to her; and receiving which she returned joyously home, and related to Mother Bridget the arrangement of her good friend.

Early the next morning she started for the cottage in the wood. How lovely nature looked at that fresh hour, but especially to Catherine, whose heart was already so full of happiness! Every familiar object seemed invested with more than usual beauty.

Even that 'modest crimson-tipped flower' which Chaucer calls the 'day's eye,' and the sight of which was no novelty to her, attracted her passing notice as she hurried on; and raising her eyes from the starry field to the blue heavens, she softly murmured, 'How beautiful are Thy works, O Lord!'

At length, with a beating heart, she stood before the cottage door; it was opened by the dame, who was surprised to see her young friend there at such an early hour. Catherine placed in her hands the leather purse containing the money, saying with a bright smile:

'A kind friend hath sent thee this for thy son; we hope thou wilt accept it.'

The poor woman was too much overcome with joy and astonishment to speak; she tried to utter a few words of thanks, but the young girl whispered to her, 'Thank God, not me,' and then quickly disappeared, leaving the woodman's wife to enjoy at leisure this happy surprise.

In the afternoon, however, both she and her husband came to Widow O'Reilly's cottage to thank Catherine, who told them that they owed more gratitude to Master Andrew than to her, since, under God, he had been the principal instrument in saving their son. 'He has given you half the money, and lent me the rest,' she said.

'When James is better off he will pay you both, never fear,' said the old woodman; 'that is, he will pay the money; but the kindness that moves thee to interest thyself in our misfortune, that we never can fully repay.'

Catherine had too much consideration for the feelings of others to refuse to consider the money in question as a loan, which the farmer could repay in event of his prosperity returning, but she remarked that neither she nor Master Andrew were in any hurry, and that they would willingly wait until it was quite convenient to their son to pay them. 'And,' she added, 'if this be not the case for many years, let him not vex himself on that account.'

Catherine worked with redoubled diligence; every week she was able to put aside a little sum, which in time amounted to a considerable one. She asked the woodman, who also did a little carpenter's work, to make for her a small box out of his pieces of old planks. The lid of it was nailed down, and there was only a little split through which a coin could be dropped, in this she placed her savings, much to the amusement of Barbara, who liked to hear the money falling in. Ruth Barnby, who frequently came to see her cousin, also took great interest in the box, because, as Catherine soon lost the calculation of how much she had placed there, and as there was no means of ascertaining, it afforded great scope for speculation.

By the end of a year the prudent girl was able to pay her debt to Andrew, who commended her for her exactitude and industry—qualities which the old merchant, being himself a very methodical man, highly valued.

Although the farmer was not in a condition to pay his debt for some time, as, having six children to provide for, he could not afford to put much by, he nevertheless found various means of showing his gratitude to his benefactors.

Bridget and Catherine often received little presents of honey, eggs, or butter from him; these his wife, when she came to market, would bring to the cottage, and beg its inmates to accept. Once she brought for Barbara a snow-white pigeon, for which the woodman made a little dovecot; the bird was very young and quite tame, and soon learnt to come of a morning and tap at the window of the room in which Catherine and the child slept.

Happily did the days pass on. Catherine watched with joy the expanding intellect of her young charge; with tender solicitude she guarded her from every evil. She felt a holy reverence towards that pure soul intrusted to her care, and a love that was intense, like everything in her ardent nature. In the soul of that child she saw the image of God. Her first care, therefore, was to direct her young thoughts to her Creator, to instruct her thoroughly in her religion; all other learning, however estimable and useful, was, she knew, only of secondary importance.

There was indeed in Barbara's character something more than ordinarily beautiful; an unalterable serenity was perhaps its most remarkable feature. The expression of her angelic countenance was never marred by those fits of sullenness, ill-temper, or passion to which most children are subject. She was very intelligent, readily understood and well remembered whatever was told her. Nevertheless she found the task of learning to read and write wearisome, and her progress was for some time slow. It was not that she did not try to lend her utmost attention to Catherine's teaching; but the fact was that her mind, on which the greatness of God and the beauty of nature made keen and quick impressions had not the same power of fixing itself on the dry, and apparently unmeaning, signs of the alphabet. When, however, this first difficulty had been mastered, and she was able to form words and find a meaning in what she saw printed, she advanced more rapidly.

A prayer book and one or two more works of piety, which belonged to her mother, formed all Catherine's library. It was in these little Barbara learnt to read, and likewise to say the Psalms in Latin, a language which it was then very usual for ladies to acquire, and which Catherine's mother, who had studied it in her youth, though she wisely judged that any great proficiency would be useless to her daughter, nevertheless desired that she should know enough to be able to say her prayers in the language of the Church as well as in her own. These accomplishments, and the doing of various kinds of needlework, constituted the principal part of Barbara's instruction; but here her education did not cease. That inward training of her heart and will, that checking of evil passions as they spring up, that arming of the young soul for the lifelong combat against vice, which is the very essence of a Christian existence, and on the issue of which depends his eternal welfare, that part of education, which is so often neglected by those who have the charge of children, was the portion to which Catherine devoted her utmost care.

Doubtless the beautiful scenes and healthful air of the country, with the charms of forests and glens and rushing streams at hand, ever varying in their aspect as the seasons succeed each other, in the first tender hues of spring, in the full glow of gorgeous summer, in the solemn grandeur of autumn, or again beneath the stormy skies of winter—doubtless these scenes make a deep and lasting impression on the mind, particularly of the young; and it must be far easier to raise to high and noble objects the thoughts of a child accustomed to dwell amidst rural beauty than those of one whose eyes have rested on no more elevating objects than endless rows of brick and mortar. Catherine unconsciously experienced this both in herself and in the education of Barbara. The peaceful woodland landscape in the environs of Exeter (far from having then reached its present magnitude), and the wild sea views about Penzance had no doubt, served to elevate the naturally fine mind of the former, and to preserve in her that purity and child-like simplicity of heart which shone forth in her whole person.

But to produce this effect the beauties of nature must be regarded in a right spirit, that is, as the manifestations of God's power and goodness, and as the gifts of a benignant Father to His children. This is exemplified in a beautiful passage which occurs in the life of Saint Elizabeth of Hungary. After this holy queen had been driven from her throne and reduced to great straits, our Blessed Lady frequently appeared to her, and revealed to her many things concerning her youth in the Temple; and she told her that during that period she was often rapt in ecstacy, and beheld in spirit the three Adorable Persons of the Blessed Trinity, which vision made her heart so overflow with holy joy, that returning again to the visible things of this world, the very trees and stones were dear to her and she oftentimes embraced them with holy love, as being the works of her gracious Creator, just as a child kisses the articles which have but belonged to a much-loved parent.

The starry heavens were among the sights on which Catherine and Barbara particularly liked to gaze, they knew nothing either of the names or of the marvelous evolutions of the celestial bodies. That God had made, on the fourth day, the sun, the moon, and the stars, ordaining that the former should rule the day, the latter preside during the night—that was all they knew concerning the planets, yet they watched them with awe and admiration;

When Christmas came the day was always spent at old Andrew's, when the good merchant would also invite Dame Barbary and her children; and if among his acquaintances there were any unable to make rejoicings at home, he was sure to ask them to his cheerful dwelling, where the yule-log burnt in the spacious chimney, and the mistletoe, the holly, and the ivy decorated the walls. This latter custom is, by the way, very ancient, for it is said in old books that the early Christians did at Christ-tide decke their houses withal.

Fresh little voices sang old Christmas carols, and the evening was passed in innocent mirth. But the yearly gathering at Andrew's house had a deeper purpose than mere amusement; it was a time when, under cover of a festive meeting, the Catholics of the neighborhood could, without exciting suspicion, join in the exercises of their religion. A priest, whose missionary labors extended over the whole of Devonshire, usually contrived to spend Christmas at the good merchant's. In Catherine's childhood it had been Father Ralph's habit to do so, and he never failed to be the welcome guest of Master Andrew, until the benighted state of Cornwall had induced his superiors to send him to Penzance.

Amid the festivities of Christmas there always floated back to Catherine's mind the memory of that first and last midnight Mass at which she had ever assisted. That sad scene, and the death of Lady Margaret, which had so closely followed it, painted themselves vividly to her imagination at that season, and it was, perhaps, on account of the recollections attached to that day, that when Barbara was seven years old she prepared her to make her first confession on Christmas-eve.

The little child learnt her own history by hearing it often repeated by Bridget and Catherine, but she listened to it as to some strange and wonderful story, in which she could not imagine that she had had a part; it seemed to her so impossible to realize having at any time, lived with others than her good 'granddame and sister Kate.'

The fact that during the first year she had passed with them her kind friends had avoided speaking of her life at the Manor, fearing to renew the grief which the death of her mother had at first caused her, and the complete change of scene which had occurred soon after that event, had no doubt contributed to obliterate from her memory all recollection of the first three years of her life.

No farther tidings had been heard of Sir Reginald, and by degrees Widow O'Reilly and Catherine looked on little Barbara as quite their own, although the latter always cherished the hope that one day she might be able to restore the child she loved so dearly to her father, or, if he were dead, to her brother, and thus fulfill the promise she had made to Lady Margaret.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE third winter after Catherine and her friends left Penzance was an unusually mild one, even for Devonshire; instead of the slight frosts and sprinkling of snow which generally whiten the earth at that season, there had been almost incessant rain, accompanied by an unnatural heat. Spring had come, and with it fearful inundations; at the end of April the weather became intensely warm.

The old people of the place shook their heads, and said it was an unwholesome season, and that 'dire misfortunes would befall man and beast.' Nor were they mistaken in their apprehensions; there was much sickness in the town, and many died ere the trees came into leaf. Then the rumor spread that the disease was infectious; the houses in which the sick lay were shunned; there were hurried burials, and a general gloom pervaded the city.

Exeter, as indeed most towns in England at that period, had been frequently visited by the plague; the narrowness of the streets, the want of cleanliness and proper ventilation, rendering infections more common than in our times.

Andrew bade Catherine not come into the town except when absolutely obliged. 'Do not come hither even to see us, my child,' he said, 'for thou mightest take the foul malady.'

There was an unusual sadness in the old man's tone as he spoke, and he and his dame affectionately wished their young friend good-bye.

'It may be a long while ere we meet again,' he said, as they parted; for mind, Kate, that thou dost not come to the town more than thou canst help until the visitation of Providence is past. Farewell, and God speed thee!

With a feeling of sorrow Catherine left the house; more than once she stopped and looked back,—Andrew and his wife were still standing under the wooden arcade in front of their shop,—then turning down another street she lost sight of them; but, still the thought of her good friends pursued her, she knew not why; she fancied it might be because she was not too see them for some time. She did her best, however, to dismiss the sad impression which the merchant's words had left, and continued her usual routine of home duties.

During the three following weeks the number of deaths increased to a fearful extent. Bridget and Catherine lived in hourly fear lest any of their friends should fall victims to the fatal disease. They were seated in the kitchen one evening, silent as people are wont to be when some great calamity afflicts those around them or threatens themselves; it was growing dark, and Catherine, unable to see any longer, had just laid down her work, when a knock was heard at the door; she looked at Widow O'Reilly, but neither dared say a word, so sure did they feel that evil tidings awaited them. She opened the door. There stood outside a man whom she had often seen at Andrew's, where he came to do a day's work when there was a press of business.

'Master Andrew, the clothier, lieth sick of this direful plague. As I passed this way, I thought I would just stop and tell you so.'

'Good Master Andrew ill!' exclaimed Catherine in deep anguish.

'Yes, and like to die methinks,' replied the man; 'but it waxes late, and I must make haste home. Good-evening to you both.'

'O Mother Bridget,' said Catherine, with tears in her eyes, 'I must go and see poor Master Andrew ere he dies.'

'Nay, my child, 'tis I that shall go this very minute. Stop ye and take care of Barbara; I will return in an hour. Perchance 'tis not so bad with him as that man said.'

Putting on her cloak, the old woman left the cottage. Catherine awaited her return in a state of indescribable anxiety. Two hours passed and no one came. She took Barbara to bed at her usual hour, and then remained in the kitchen listening to every sound on the road. Now she walked to and fro, then she sat down and tried to resume her work; but other thoughts occupied her mind, and tears filled her eyes as the recollection of all Andrew's kindness towards her since her earliest childhood occurred forcibly to her. Was she now to lose that sincere friend? Alas, she feared so! Throwing aside her work she knelt down and prayed earnestly. What must those feel who, in affliction, have not prayer as a resource?

Catherine felt calmer, and had just seated herself again when footsteps were distinctly audible outside. She rushed to the door and drew back the bolt; there was a flash of light from a lantern, and by it she recognized the face of a woman who kept a shop in the town.

'The dame who lives here,' she said, 'has been seized with the plague, they found her nigh my house and carried her in; but we durst not keep her long lest we, too, be stricken; so I pray thee lend me a blanket wherein to wrap her, then we shall have her brought here.'

'Yes, yes, bring her quickly; I will fetch the blanket,' exclaimed Catherine. 'Stop!' she added, as the thought of Barbara flashed across her mind. 'Wilt thou remain by her while I take the child who is here to some safe place?'

The woman shook her head, and Catherine understood that in times of universal panic and extreme danger there are few who are willing to run risk, even when charity to their neighbor demands it of them.

'Then, I pray thee, have her laid on her bed in that room, and tell her that I shall soon be back,' said the young girl, who had already decided what course to take.

After giving the blanket to the woman, and preparing the bed for the poor invalid, she ran up to Barbara's room and dressed her, when both descended into the kitchen, took a lantern, and quickly left the house. For some time they walked in silence. 'Sister, where go we?' at length inquired the child.

'To the woodman's home, and there thou must dwell for a little while,' replied her companion.

'And wilt thou and granddame come, too?'

'No, my little one, we cannot,' was the answer.

Catherine felt her hand, which Barbara was holding, tightly pressed, and then hot tears fell upon it.

'O; do not weep, my little sister!' she exclaimed; 'thou wilt not be away from us for long. And listen, Barbara: each morning and evening thou wilt say thy prayers, as I have taught thee to do, and thou wilt pray for us, wilt thou not?'

'O, indeed I will,' answered the child.

After this they hurried silently on, Catherine's mind painfully preoccupied with the thought that perhaps before she returned good Mother Bridget might be dead. Yet what could she do? To have let Barbara remain in the cottage would have been to expose her to catch the disease, and she knew of no place of safety for her nearer than the woodman's house. On she pressed, therefore, with quick and anxious steps, along that forest path which she and her little companion had so often joyously trod. The lantern threw a lurid light on the objects immediately around; now and then the young girl cast a hasty glance from side to side when any unusual sound proceeded from the thickets. She lived in an age when lawless men frequented woods and lonely places, and although she was by no means a coward, she could not but feel some alarm at being out at such an hour; but this did not prevent her continuing her road—indeed, she never did hesitate a moment to go anywhere, by night or by day, when charity or necessity demanded it.

On reaching the cottage she knocked loudly; no answer was at first returned, but she heard some one stirring within. She knocked again; heavy footsteps were audible approaching the door.

'Who comes here?', cried a rough voice.

'It is Catherine; open, I pray thee,' was the reply.

Uttering an exclamation of surprise, the woodman opened the door.

'Lor's me, what has happened?' he inquired. 'Why hast thou come through the forest at this late hour? I thought it were robbers.'

Catherine explained the cause of her nocturnal visit, begging of the woodman and his wife to keep the child until the plague should have diminished in violence. 'I knew not to whom else but you to take her,' she said.

'And why shouldst thou take her elsewhere?' replied the good couple. 'Knowest thou not how joyful we are to do anything we can for thee, who hast done so much for us?'

Catherine thanked them, and, having tenderly embraced her dear Barbara, retraced her steps homewards even more rapidly than she had come.

Softly did she enter Widow O'Reilly's room and approach the bed, trembling lest the spirit should have already flown. A slight moan reassured her.

'Is it thou, my child?' murmured the poor woman.

Catherine took her hand; it felt burning. 'Good Mother Bridget, what can I do for thee?' she said.

'Nothing; but pray, O, pray for me!'

The girl saw at once that the fearful fever was rapidly consuming the strength of the poor sufferer. It is dreadful at such moments to feel powerless, as Catherine did; to know that the life of a loved one is ebbing fast, and yet to be ignorant of the means to ward off death. She had heard it said, a few days before, that all whom the fever had attacked had died, and that nothing could be done to save them. This thought now filled her heart with grief.

Complying with Bridget's request, she knelt by her bed and prayed. She prayed that, were it the will of God, her good friend might recover; and if not, that He would assist her soul in its passage to eternity. She prayed for herself also, that she might have strength to bear this new trial.

Suddenly the dying woman said anxiously, 'My child thou too wilt catch the fever; stay not with me.'

'God will protect me, I trust,' replied the other. 'I have placed Barbara in safety.'

'I would like to see a priest, but none is nigh. O sweet Jesus, have mercy on my soul!' murmured Bridget. 'Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for me! She is coming, and angels too! Weep not, my Kate.'

The poor woman gasped for breath, her aching head rested on the arm of her companion, who whispered to her words of comfort and resignation; the blessed name of Jesus was frequently on her lips. At length all was silent; and when Catherine bent closer still to her dear friend she found that breathing had entirely ceased—Bridget O'Reilly was dead.

Regardless, or unconscious, of the danger to which she was exposed, Catherine remained long in the room with the dead body, weeping and praying; when at length she roused herself and left the chamber of death, she was astonished to find that it was broad daylight. She opened the cottage door, for the pestilential atmosphere of fever filled the house. She felt giddy and her head ached, but the fresh air somewhat revived her: while she yet stood at the door she saw two men pass carrying a corpse.

We shall not dwell on the sad scene of the hurried burial; after which Catherine returned to her lonely home, fatigued and ill, her heart full of desolation.

Until then wholly occupied with grief and anxiety for Mother Bridget, she had not bestowed a thought on her own danger; but now she remembered with dread how infectious the disease was. Something seemed to whisper to her, 'Perchance thou too wilt die.'

Die—alone in that house, unattended, unaided! What a prospect! There is in every creature endowed with life a natural horror of dissolution. Catherine felt it, and for a moment her heart sank within her, while a strange sensation of coldness benumbed her limbs. But her fortitude, which the thought of death seemed to have shaken, soon returned; that Christian fortitude which gives strength to the weak and so ennobles those who possess it bade her look with courage on that which all must one day encounter. Was she not as well prepared to leave this world at that very moment as she would be in ten or twenty years? Her conscience told her that, in spite of many imperfections and shortcomings incident to human frailty, her life had been free from malicious and deliberate sins. With heartfelt sorrow she implored pardon for all her faults, and with filial confidence recommended herself to the Divine mercy.

She now felt resigned either to live or die; but one thought still troubled her—what would become of little Barbara if left without friend or home. The woodman and his wife would, no doubt, keep her with them and treat her kindly; but they were not Catholics, and they would either bring her up in a wrong religion or suffer her to have none; and what chance would there be of her being restored to her father or brother?

'O Lord,' exclaimed the young girl, to whom these reflections presented themselves with overpowering force.—'O Lord, I pray Thee to spare my life until Barbara no longer needs my care; but if Thou hast ordained otherwise, Thy holy will be done; and as not a sparrow falleth to the ground without Thy knowledge, so do I trust that Thou wilt guard that little one that no evil may befall her in soul or body.'

Scarcely had she finished her prayer, when the door opened and Dame Barnby entered.

'I am so glad thou hast come, good aunt!' she cried; and weeping she threw herself into her arms.

Winifred was soon made acquainted with the sad news. She had indeed, early that morning, heard a rumor that Widow O'Reilly had been taken ill with the fever, and it was to ascertain the truth of this that she had now come to the cottage. She had hoped at least to be able to succor her old friend. Alas, it was too late!

Catherine learnt with grief that Master Andrew was dead.

'My child,' said her aunt, 'thou canst not remain alone in this house; come with me. Thou lookest pale,' she added, gazing attentively at her niece; 'perchance thou hast eaten nothing this morning?'

'Such is the case; but my heart was too sad for me to feel inclined to take anything—moreover, I feel giddy when I try to walk.'

Dame Barnby was alarmed; she bade Catherine sit still, and stirring up the remnant of fire, she made for her an infusion of herbs, which she gave her to drink. Her aunt then proposed to take her to her own home; which offer was willingly accepted.

Carrying with them some few articles, they left the cottage, locking the door after them.

The town seemed abandoned. The grass had grown in many of the streets; one or two forlorn individuals were wandering about seemingly without any fixed purpose; most of the shops were closed. Catherine, who had not visited the place for some time past, was struck with astonishment and horror on viewing the change which a few weeks had wrought in the once-cheerful city.

'Is every one dead?' she inquired of her companion in a subdued voice, for the surrounding gloom and silence filled her with a solemn awe.

'Nay, not, all,' replied her aunt; 'though many a one they have carried past my house, to lay them in the earth, during these three weeks. And numbers have left the town in great fright, yea, and abandoned their dying relatives.'

'O, can it be so?' exclaimed Catherine.

'It is quite true, my child. In distress like this many lack courage to do their duty.'

Here the conversation ceased; but the young girl's active mind was already at work trying to devise some means for the relief of the misery around her.

They passed down one of the back streets, which was so narrow that the inmates of the houses might shake hands from the windows of the upper story with their neighbors of the opposite side. A group of dirty children were playing near one of the doors; among them Catherine recognized some of her former pupils, and stopping, inquired of one where his mother was; when she was told that she had been taken to the churchyard, and that father was there too.

'And with whom dost thou live?'

'With John's father,' replied the child, pointing to a boy a little older than himself.

'Dost thou remember the Catechism I used to teach thee?' asked Catherine.

The little fellow looked round to ascertain that his companions were not within hearing, and then said in an undertone.

'They say they will not let me be a Catholic any longer, and beat me when I say my prayers.'

'Who?' inquired Catherine.

'The man and his dame who have taken me to their house.'

'Keep up thy courage, my poor little friend; if I can, I will see thee to-morrow and try and do something for thee.'

Leaving the child she hastened on with her aunt, whose shop they soon reached.

Dame Barnby advised her niece not to go to the woodman's cottage until the plague had ceased in the city, for fear that she might carry the infection with her.

It was evident then, that Catherine would be forced to spend some days, perhaps weeks, in the plague-stricken town. She determined during her stay to do what was in her power to alleviate the misery of the wretched inhabitants.

She greatly pitied the unhappy position of numbers of poor children whose parents had died without being able to provide for their support; and as there are always wicked persons to be found ready to take advantage of private difficulties or public calamities and turn them to their own profit, so in these instances there were not wanting those who, under pretence of being relations of the orphans took possession of them and what goods they had, neglecting and often ill treating the former whilst they kept the latter for their use. Catherine discovered that this was the case with the little boy whom she had accosted in the street. She questioned him more particularly on his situation which proved to be far from happy indeed the poor child was in imminent danger of losing his faith and being brought up in ignorance and vice. Having inquired if he had any relations living and having heard that some of his mother's family resided in the small town of Honiton, she obtained her aunt's consent, and addressed to them a letter.

'Tis marvelous,' Dame Barnby remarked, when her niece had read the epistle to her, 'how thou canst say all that by making little marks upon paper.'

The letter was intrusted to a man who passed that way about once a fortnight with a pack-horse. And in due time one of the child's relations came to fetch him. Catherine never heard of him afterwards; but as those to whom he had gone were good Catholics, she was satisfied as to his safety.

By many a death-bed did the young girl appear as an angel of charity, soothing the last moments of the dying with words of hope and spiritual comfort.

Her aunt at first entertained fears that in discharging these charitable offices she would herself fall a prey to the fever. But Catherine assured her that living, as they were obliged to do, in the midst of the infection, there was as much danger for them each time they walked in the streets as if they entered the houses of the sick.

Good Andrew's widow also devoted herself to deeds of charity. Catherine who was frequently with her observed that the grief of her recent loss had sunk deep into the poor woman's heart: a look of melancholy had settled on her once-cheerful face and tears filled her eyes when she and the young girl spoke together of the many good qualities of the honest merchant whose death both felt so keenly.

One day, as Catherine was passing near an old and dilapidated house, her attention was arrested by the low moans which issued from it. She stopped to listen, and seeing a woman standing at the door of a neighboring house, inquired of her who lived there.

'An old man whom we call father Jacob,' she replied.

'Does he live alone?' asked Catherine.

'He does. He is an old miser, and has no kinsfolk with him. I did not see him leave his house to-day; perchance he too hath the plague.'

'And hast thou not been to inquire if he be ill?' said Catherine.

'I durst not,' was the reply.

Catherine hastened to her aunt's dwelling, which was close by, and related what she had heard.

'O, think,' she added with her characteristic earnestness,— 'O think how dreadful it must be to die all alone! Shall we not go and succor him?'

Dame Barnby consented, and both proceeded to the old man's house. After knocking two or three times and receiving no answer, they pushed open the door and entered.

At the farther end of the poverty-stricken chamber lay old Jacob on his wretched couch.

'Who comes there?' he asked in a low hoarse voice.

'We come to bring thee help,' said the dame.

'Water—water!' he ejaculated. A violent thirst being one of the symptoms of the then-prevailing fever, Catherine understood the meaning, and at once fetched some water, which he drank with avidity.

'Good friend,' said the young girl softly, 'art thou easier now?'

'Neither thou nor any one else can bring ease to mine afflicted soul,' he murmured.

'But our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for you, can,' she replied.

A strange and wild expression appeared on the dying man's face while Catherine spoke, but he said nothing, and she continued to speak to him of the death of our Saviour and the mercies of God.

Presently his mind began to wander. Gazing about with an anxious searching eye, he seemed as one who beheld visions from the other world; sometimes after looking steadfastly at one corner of the room, he would move his head slowly round as if watching some object endowed with action: then he would start back in terror muttering 'Avaunt! avaunt!'

Catherine snuddered 'O, how fearful' thought she, 'is the deathbed of those who have no religion!' Dame Barnby would have beaten a hasty retreat, had not her niece desired earnestly to remain and to instil thoughts of repentance and hope into the poor man's heart.

As the fever heightened, he became wilder and more restless.

'Be calm, and may God have mercy on thee!' said Catherine, in a grave resolute tone, which seemed to overawe him for he sank quietly back on to his bed, and remained silent during a few seconds.

'A priest! O, bring me a priest!' he suddenly cried 'Nay, nay, he added almost immediately; 'they will denounce me, they will take my money!'

'Didst thou ever know or practice the holy Catholic religion?' asked Catherine; and again her calm voice subdued the old man.

'Alas, I did!' he replied.

'Then, if I can find a priest I will bring him to thee. Beg, through the merits of the Passion and Death of Jesus Christ, pardon for thine evil deeds, and hope in His clemency.' Then, turning to her aunt, Catherine prayed her to remain with the dying man until she returned.

Leaving the house, she hastened to Dame Andrew's, and inquired of her if she knew where the priest was who often officiated at their house. But he avoided remaining long in any one place, and observed much secrecy concerning his movements, and so Dame Andrew could not give her young friend the desired information. The latter sighed; she was perplexed what to do. It then occurred to her that, as it was Saturday, it was not unlikely that Father Francis might come to Exeter to say Mass the next day; and so she asked the dame to be so good as to tell the priest, if he chanced to come, that a poor dying man wished much to see him, describing the house where he lay.

Returning to Jacob, she found him in the same state as when she had left; his agony was a long one indeed.

At times the poor man showed signs of repentance; but then again the fear of God's judgements overpowered him, and excluded from his terror-stricken soul that filial confidence in the mercies of his Creator so necessary to the penitent.

'I have abandoned my faith; there is no hope for me,' he would reply, when urged by Catherine to place his trust in the merits of Jesus Christ.

At length he sank back exhausted by the fever, which was making rapid progress; his eyes closed, and he breathed with difficulty. 'Death is surely coming now,' thought the young girl, and she knelt down and prayed. At that moment the door opened; she looked round—there stood Father Francis.

'Father,' she said, pointing to the bed, 'there lieth one who much needeth thy help; he told me he was a Catholic, and wished to see a priest.'

'Then leave me alone with him, my child.'

Catherine obeyed, and returned to her aunt's house. The evening passed on, and both sat wondering what had been the end of old Jacob.

'I hear some one at the door,' exclaimed the niece as she hurried to open it, and gave admittance to Father Francis.

'The old man is dead,' he said in a grave tone; 'and alas, leaveth much doubt on my mind as to his eternal salvation! He spoke not. Yet, when I bid him make interiorly an act of contrition for his sins, he seemed to understand me, and perchance at that moment the merciful God of heaven forgave his manifold transgressions. But how fearful a thing it is thus to leave the care of our soul's eternal happiness or misery to the last moment!

All three remained silent for a few minutes; then the priest said to Dame Barnby:

'Good dame, I must ask thee to harbor me to-night, for I know not where else to go at this late hour.'

Winifred joyfully consented to lodge the honored guest; and the following morning both she and Catherine went to confession, for it was long since they had the opportunity of doing so; and at a time when death was making such fearful havoc, they felt the necessity of being well prepared to quit this world.

Both needed strength indeed—the one for the long voyage of eternity, the other for life's chequered pilgrimage, always replete with danger, which is the greater when we are left friendless in the world.

Poor Catherine! Ere the plague had ceased, Dame Barnby and good Andrew's widow had fallen victims to it. To describe the desolation of the young girl after these fresh bereavements would be impossible.

It was the end of July, when, quitting the city which had been to her the scene of so much suffering during the past months, she sought the woodman's dwelling.

The day was calm and warm, but not sunny; scarce a leaf moved on the trees, the song of the birds was hushed, and a marvelous sense of repose pervaded all nature. There is something melancholy in the rare moments of complete stillness which occur in a large town, they resembled the hours of quietude in the career of a wicked person who in intervals of apparent rest is brooding evil. But how different is silence in the country! How soothing it is to the sorrow-stricken! How it calms man's feverish desires! To Catherine's afflicted soul it seemed a soft balm. She stopped at the entrance to the forest, which recalled so many happy days, and gazing round on the familiar objects her tears flowed fast, yet they were less heartrending than those she had shed during the previous days which she spent alone in her deceased aunt's house; the thought too that in a few minutes she should see the little Barbara cheered her, and made her again hurry on. Another turn of the winding path and the cottage came in view; before it stood Barbara.

A moment later she was clasped in Catherine's arms; still pressing the child to her with passionate love, the young girl seated herself on the door-step and wept.

The woodman and his wife looked at her with compassion; and when her emotion was a little subsided, the latter inquired kindly the cause of her distress. The tale of sorrow was soon told.

'Poor child, thou hast heavy griefs indeed! said the woman. 'And what has befallen thy house and goods?'

'My poor aunt made me bring all mine effects to her dwelling, and we gave up the house which Widow O'Reilly and I inhabited, for she said that Barbara and myself should henceforth live with her; but now that she, good Master Andrew, and his dame are dead, I know not where to go, or how to find employment by which to support myself and the child.'

The woodman exchanged some words in a whisper with his wife, and then said aloud to Catherine,

'If thou, Mistress Catherine wilt accept our simple lodging, and partake of our frugal board, thou and thy little sister are welcome; yea, and dame and I are only too happy to be able to do all we can for thee.'

Catherine thanked them warmly; and it was agreed that she should stay with them until such time as she could find some one to arrange her affairs and help her to seek an employment; but she insisted on paying a small sum for her lodging.

Catherine's life in the forest was quiet and peaceful. She was sad, as might be expected after all she had suffered; but her strong nature, aided by religion, bore bravely the trials allotted to her by Providence. And then she had Barbara to watch over, and the thought that the poor child had no one to look to but herself redoubled her energy.

She thought of resuming her former employment of embroidery work; but many of the rich families had removed for a while, on account of the plague, and those who remained felt little inclined, at a time when all the neighborhood was plunged in distress by the late visitation to expend much money on articles of luxury.

Several times did Catherine think of taking a situation; but if she were to do so, what would become of Lady Margaret's daughter? She could not consent to be separated from the poor child whom she had promised to watch over; neither could she take her with her. And so they both remained at the woodman's; the young girl praying daily that God would make known His will towards her for, in spite of the woodman's kindness, she felt that she must be a burden to him; and besides, a life of idleness was most distasteful to one of her character.

The summer flowers faded, and autumnal tints crept over the woods; first among the forest trees the feathery ash grew golden and shed its plumes; the beech had turned to a rich bronze, which at eventide glowed like molten metal; the mountain ash was red with berries; the leaves from the limetrees came gently floating to the ground; the hardy oak alone still wore the green livery of summer.

One day late in October Catherine was standing pensive at the cottage door, gazing into the wood, where Barbara was playing among the fallen leaves, when the sound of footsteps coming along the path made her look in that direction. She perceived an elderly man, with whose appearance it seemed to her she was already familiar; as he approached she recognized the benevolent countenance of Master Andrew's London friend.

'In three years,' the merchant had said to her, 'I shall return again, and perchance then thou wilt accept my proposition.'

Catherine had smiled when he spoke those words, but now tears gushed from her eyes as she recalled them, and thought of the change which three years had wrought in her position.

'I have sought thee these two days,' said the merchant, who was now close to Catherine. 'Ah, thou hast had severe losses since last I saw thee,' he added, remarking her sorrowful countenance. 'And so have I. Poor Master Andrew, he was a good man and a kind friend! God rest his soul!'

There was a moment of silence while the newcomer mused on his departed friend, and Catherine felt too much emotion to speak; at length, turning to her, he said:

'How goes it with thee and with thy little Barbara?'

The young girl told him of her many trials, and how she had lived since her aunt's death. The good merchant condoled with her, and spoke of his own grief when, on coming to Exeter as usual to purchase woolen goods, he had learnt the death of his valued friends.

'Master Andrew's nephew has taken the clothier's business,' he added, 'for he was his heir, being the next-of-kin. When I came he told me that his deceased uncle's books were marvelously well kept, but that he found marked therein that he held money for one "Catherine Tresize," who, however, had not come forward to claim anything. Why didst thou not go and inquire about thy money?'

Catherine replied that, not being in immediate want, she had not thought of doing so; and she supposed that Master Andrew's nephew would take good care of it.

The old man shook his head, and said that was a bad way of managing her affairs; 'but fortunately thou hast to deal with honest people,' he added. 'so thou hast lost nothing.'

The woodman's wife now came out, and begged the visitor to enter, which he did; and having seated himself, he asked the young girl if she remembered the offer he had made her three years previous of taking her to London, and whether she was now disposed to accept it for herself and Barbara.

Catherine remained silent for a few moments.

'Well said the good merchant, 'I will give thee until to-morrow to consider. And now I must wish you all farewell; I shall come here early to-morrow.'

The young girl slept little that night, her mind was too preoccupied to allow of rest; she felt that her own future and that of Barbara depended on the choice she was about to make. She prayed long and earnestly; by morning the agitation which attends the presence of conflicting thoughts and ideas had given place to the calm which follows a decision taken from right and disinterested motives.

When the merchant returned, she thanked him for his kindness, and said that she and Barbara would be ready to accompany him whenever he wished.

CHAPTER XVIII.

DURING their residence at Exeter Catherine and her little sister, as Barbara was called, had become very generally known; and even to those who had never spoken to them, the young girl's happy face, and that of the beautiful child who so frequently accompanied her, had become familiar.

It was not without surprise that it was now learnt that the two were about to leave Exeter for London. And there was no little sorrow in the heart of many a poor person that, in some way or other, had experienced the kindness either of the good widow who was dead or of Catherine herself. During the last days spent at the woodman's cottage these grateful friends came flocking in to bid farewell to one who had won their hearts, and amongst them was to be seen the son of the woodman, with his wife, who were not easy because they had not been able to repay the whole of the money that had been lent to them. Catherine, on her part, begged them not to trouble themselves, assuring them that what would please her most would be that they should consider the money their own.

'I know that you will make a good use of it,' she said gracefully; 'and so, though I shall be here no longer, there will be something of mine doing a little good. You see, then, that by accepting it you would be rendering me a service.'

A journey such as she was about to take could not be thought of without awakening some apprehension, being not only long and arduous, but really beset with difficulties, and even dangers. And a tinge of sorrow would come over her when the idea presented itself that she was to leave, perhaps for ever, places associated with so much that was dear to her. But, amidst regrets and fears, she remained calm, for she knew that what she wished, and what she had prayed for, was, that she might do God's will; and it was for the sake of Barbara, and not for her own happiness, that she had made her present choice.

The day of departure came. The travelers, and several of their friends who had collected to bid them farewell, met at the house formerly inhabited by Master Andrew. The London merchant, whose business had been to purchase woolen goods, had with him several pack-horses, well laden, led and attended by four servants, all well armed.

Behind one of these servants Catherine was seated on a pillion, the usual mode of traveling for females at that period; and the merchant himself took upon him the particular charge of little Barbara.

At a slow pace they proceeded down the street, Catherine taking a last eager look at the old houses as she passed along; here and there, attracted by the horses' hoofs, some one with whose face she was familiar would look out and gaze at her with surprise. They passed the cottage where she had lived with Widow O'Reilly. It was now uninhabited; the flowers in the little garden, which Barbara had tended with such care, were growing in wild neglect; the autumn leaves were strewn on the paths; the dead flower-stalks, which the little gardener had been wont to cut down each season, now reared, unmolested, their withered and ghastly forms; for death had touched those 'transient stars of the earth,' and death, thought Catherine as she saw them, had likewise struck one in that house whose friendship and maternal care had rendered her presence as dear as her loss was painful. And the words of the Psalmist came into her mind; 'Man's days are as grass; as the flower of the field, so shall he flourish.'

So occupied was Catherine with the remembrance of the happy days spent with Bridget, from the hour when first she met the old Irishwoman on Gulval Cairn to the sad moment when death severed those sweet ties, that for some time she gave no attention to the country through which they were passing; and when at length she looked around her, every familiar object had disappeared. Roused from her reverie, she began to watch with interest the varying landscape as they traveled slowly on; occasionally the old merchant riding by her side, and entering into conversation, and giving her the opportunity of exchanging a few words with Barbara. Towards noon they all stopped to rest.

Late that evening the party reached a wayside inn of the poorest description, where their unexpected arrival caused much commotion. All was noise and confusion in the little courtyard; the host searching accommodation for the men and horses; his wife no less busy in the kitchen, which was also the guests' room, preparing a meal for the hungry travelers.

'I trust, good dame,' said the merchant, 'that there is some what better fare in the larder than when I passed here three months ago.'

'In truth, sir, so few travelers come this way, that to lay in great provisions on small hopes would be to incur loss, and that no one likes.'

'Come, come, there must be something in the house, and we must have it; for, if all are as hungry as I am, I promise we shall do good justice to the supper.'

The good woman grumbled while she continued chopping up vegetables to make soup for the guests.

'Why, after all,' she remarked, 'we don't hang out a sign to attract folks in; so those who come must put up with what they get.'

'There is a goose in the larder, wife; why don't you give that to the party?' said the master of the inn, who had just entered the kitchen.

'Goose!' exclaimed the merchant; 'why, that is my favorite dish. Let us have it, by all means.'

'Well, you are provoking, James,' said the woman to her husband. 'That goose was kept for Master Pymly, who sent word he would pass this way in a couple of days.'

The husband insisted that the present guests should be fed, even at the expense of those who were to follow; and the dame, rather unwillingly, consented to roast the goose. The travelers rested well that night, and early the following morning continued their road. Slowly but prosperously they journeyed on; occasionally a wayfarer, glad to avail himself of the protection afforded by the merchant's party, joining the little band, and accompanying it as far as his business or pleasure brought him. Each day new scenery presented itself to their view, and in spite of the fatigue attendant on so long a journey over bad roads though these improved as they approached nearer London, Catherine found much enjoyment in a mode of life which was quite novel to her.

After several days' journey they reached the county of Hampshire, when their road lay through the New Forest. In silent admiration, Catherine gazed on those giant oaks, monarchs of the forest, that spread their mighty arms across the path, as her eye wandered among the endless crowd of trees, now in their full autumnal beauty. She was delighted, too, with the sight of the timid deer, that would appear, first, in the distance, browsing at their ease; then, as the travelers approached, raising their heads and throwing back their graceful necks, they would suddenly dart off. All this was very pleasant to the two young travelers. They thought it the most pleasant day they had spent since they had left Exeter, and the good merchant enjoyed their cheerful talk and the sight of their happy countenances.

So the hours passed rapidly, and evening drew on. The gloom thickened under the spreading foliage, now merged in one dark mass. Soon it was noticeable that something was amiss. Master Alwin gave plain signs of uneasiness. He was seen in earnest talk with his men. At length, riding close to Catherine, he said:

'We have lost our way, and I fear we must travel all night.'

But be not afraid, my good maiden; see, the little one is asleep.' As he said this he pointed to Barbara, round whom he had stretched a protecting arm.

'Keep close together,' he added, addressing his men, 'and see that your arms are ready for handling.'

After a few minutes' conversation the party agreed on taking a road which branched off from the one they had hitherto followed. Their progress was necessarily slow, for the way was dark and the horses tired.

Catherine begged her kind old friend not to be uneasy on her account, assuring him that she was not afraid. She trusted herself to God's protection and occupied herself in prayer. Sometimes the strange noises heard in the forest at night would draw her attention, and she listened with wonder or even awe. More than once she was startled by what seemed to her like measured footsteps treading along the path; again, there was a rattling sound as if bullets were falling among the leaves, though it was but the dropping of the acorns with which the oaks were laden. At times a branch would fall, and the birds, disturbed in their rest, would utter piercing cries. But a sound different from any that she had yet heard made Catherine suddenly turn her head. A light was seen to gleam in the thicket. The man behind whom she was sitting instinctively grasped his fire-arms.

'What is that?' he muttered, addressing one of his companions, and pointing towards the underwood; but the light had vanished, and his companion, who saw nothing, only laughed at his alarm.

'But did you see nothing, Mistress Catherine?' said the man, appealing to the young girl.

'Yes, I saw a light in yonder bush, and heard what seemed the voice of a person speaking in a whisper. It was the sound that made me turn my head.'

'There,' rejoined the first speaker, turning to his unbelieving companion; 'I knew that I was not mistaken.'

'What's all this talking about?' cried the merchant, interposing.

Before a reply could be given a man had leaped from the thicket, and firmly grasping the bridle of the foremost horse, which was mounted by Master Alwin, he bade the party stop. The tired and frightened steed halted at once.

'What wantest thou?' exclaimed the rider, fumbling for his fire-arms.

'Your goods or your life!' was the fierce answer.

A shot from one of the men, who had ridden quickly to his master's side, hit the extended arm of the robber, from whose hand a pistol dropped, and with a wild shout he fled into the woods; but in a second three more highwaymen rushed upon the travelers.

'Fire at them, my men!' shouted the old merchant.

The order was promptly obeyed, and the assailants, not expecting so warm a reception from a party of peaceful merchants who had evidently lost their way, in the forest, retired from the attack.

The travelers hurried on as fast as their tired horses would permit. On, through the seemingly never-ending woods they rode all that night. They were silent, except when from time to time good Master Alwin said a few cheering words to Catherine, or the latter whispered, 'Barbara dear, do not be afraid, I am near you,' when the terrified child looked round to ascertain where she was.

At length the dawn appeared. With what joy did Catherine hail it! With intense pleasure she watched the rosy sky towards the east; all fears vanishing with the shades of night.

The weary wayfarers halted at the first habitation they came to, and there rested themselves for the day and the following night, when the merchant, having largely remunerated his host for this hospitality, they continued their journey.

But these fatigues and dangers came to an end, and London was at last in sight. Master Alwin was highly pleased: the thought of his good dame, his old shop, his faithful dog, his accustomed haunts in the city, all crowded into his mind, and, after his long absence, he was impatient again to behold them. Catherine was thankful for the protection Providence had vouchsafed to them; and little Barbara looked about in silent wonderment.

It was four o'clock in the afternoon when the party wound their way through the narrow streets of old London. Very different was the aspect of the city in those days from that which it now bears. Even the best shops had much the appearance of booths at a country fair; the goods were exposed for sale in the open fronts, and the sturdy apprentices, who stood at the door, up and down outside, watching that nothing was stolen, cried at the pitch of their voices, to the passers by, 'What do you lack? What do you lack?' adding a list of the articles which their master sold.

'This is a larger town than Exeter, is it not, Mistress Catherine?' said the merchant.

'Yes, indeed, it seems so,' replied the young girl.

Barbara looked up into the old man's face, and asked, with her usual gravity, 'But are there fields and woods like those where sister and I used to roam near Exeter?'

'Fields and woods,' murmured Master Alwin. 'Well, no, not near enough for you to run in and out directly from the door.'

Then, noticing the shade of sadness that passed over the little face, he added, 'But in the fine weather we can on holidays take a walk, though it is a long walk from the city to the fields, and see the cows milked, and have good curds-and-whey. And then in the parlor at the rear of the shop my dame has two pots with plants in them, which a friend brought her from his garden, and the goldsmith opposite has a bird in a cage that sings all day long; so you will feel just as if you were in the country.'

Rather a poor substitute for the wild flowers, the green lanes, the woodland paths of Devonshire, thought the child, but she said no more; and on they journeyed at a very slow pace, until they finally halted before a shop whose exterior was by no means showy, but which exhibited in its narrow frontage some large rolls of woolen goods.

'Here we are!' exclaimed Master Alwin, as he banded little Barbara to the apprentice who stood at the door.

From a back parlor emerged the dame; while she was greeting her husband and making various inquiries about the journey, Catherine, who had dismounted, and now still holding Barbara by the hand, examined with no small interest the appearance of one with whom she would have henceforward to dwell.

Dame Cieely, although past middle age, was an active rosy-cheeked old lady; she was of small stature, very neat in her dress—indeed, her white cap and large frill, her short red petticoat, with its narrow silver edging, and her bright-colored apron, looked as if they never could be untidy.

Catherine's eyes had wandered from the cheerful face down to the polished shoes with silver buckles, when the dame looked round at her.

'Is this the Devonshire lassie of whom you spoke when you returned from your last journey? I am right glad she has come this time,' she said, addressing her husband: and having received an affirmative answer from him, she welcomed Catherine to her new home.

'Truly,' remarked Master Alwin, 'the pleasure of seeing thee, good dame, and my old shop, had made me for a moment forget these two young ones. That is Catherine Tresize, and this child is—well, hers is a long history, and Mistress Catherine will tell it to you better than I can; so now let us have something to eat.'

CHAPTER XIX.

LONDON was a picturesque old city at the period when Catherine went to reside there. Very different both in size and appearance from the gigantic accumulation of brick and mortar which now bears that name; as different perhaps as the Lin-din of the ancient Britons from the London of the sixteenth century.

Had the young girl been obliged to live in one of the crowded thoroughfares of modern London, to breathe its atmosphere of fog and smoke, and listen to its incessant noise and turmoil, she would have felt even more acutely than she did the change from country to town life. The gabled houses, with high pointed roofs and latticed windows, and the narrow street, had none of the dull uniform appearance of town buildings of the present day. Beautiful spires were to be seen high above the roof-tops, seeming to dart towards heaven, fit emblems of the ardent faith of the middle ages which had called them into existence. Catherine admired the city, which surpassed all she had ever imagined of its size and magnificence; nevertheless she, whose childhood and early youth had been passed amid the pleasant scenery of Devon and the wild landscapes of the Cornish coast, could not be insensible to the loss of those beauties of nature which had always delighted her young heart; nor could she but miss the joys and freedom of country life. Yet she was of too kind and grateful a disposition to allow her good friends to see, more than she could help, that anything was painful to her in her new mode of life. And soon her cheerful happy spirit found enjoyment in the busy occupation of Master Alwin's establishment.

Sometimes when alone with Barbara, she and the child would talk, with a pleasure not unmingled with regret, of the sunny meadows and shady woodland paths they had left, and of the wild flowers they loved to gather; and as their thoughts wandered back to those times, the memory of the dear friends who then smiled upon them, and whose presence had shed gladness around them, came floating back, surrounded by that mellow light with which time hallows recollections of the past.

The room in which Catherine and Barbara usually sat at work (sometimes alone, sometimes with Dame Cicely) was up-stairs, and served as a store-room; the panelled walls were dark with age, the low ceiling was crossed by large beams, and as the windows were small, and in deep recesses, the chamber had that peculiar and unpleasant gloom which characterized buildings of that period. The light penetrated cautiously, it might seem, into the room, and though a bright gleam might fall on some of the well-polished pieces of furniture that stood nearest the window, all else lay obscure in shade. There were numerous cupboards on all sides, and Dame Cicely had shown the contents of them to her young friends; one contained the house linen; in another clothes that might be of use to the poor were carefully put by; a third held the store of groceries necessary for the family; each press being arranged with the greatest neatness and order.

Catherine and Barbara thought they had seen everything in the room, when one day the latter, who was searching for a ball of wool which had rolled along the floor, discovered that one of the panels in the recess of the window had in it a small key-hole.

'Is there a cupboard there also?' inquired the child, addressing Dame Cicely.

The old lady replied in the affirmative, adding that it was quite full, but of what she did not say; and often after that day Barbara would look at the panel, wondering why a cupboard had been made in that place, for it must, she thought, be very small.

Three weeks had elapsed since the return of the merchant to his shop. It was Sunday, and a very wet day; the family and household and a few Catholic neighbors had joined together in prayer, it being, as was then mostly the case, impossible for them to assist at Mass. The devotions were terminated, and Catherine and Barbara remained alone in that room which has been already described; the former was turning over the leaves of her old Missal when Dame Cicely re-entered.

'That is a handsome book,' she said, taking it into her hand. 'Canst thou read it without difficulty?'

'Yes,' replied the young girl; 'mother taught me to read, and write also, when I was quite a child.'

'And art thou fond of reading?'

'O, very fond. Dear mother had a few books, which I have read over many times. When I used to go to see good Dame Andrew, I sometimes looked into her books; but she had not many.'

'Over-much reading is bad, Catherine,' said the old dame. 'I never read aught else but my prayer-book, and am none the worse for that; many good folks do not even know their letters. But since you seem fond of learning, methinks it is no harm to make use of the talents God has given you, and so I should not mind lending you a book just to read on holidays, or in the long winter evenings.'

As Dame Cicely said this, she took the large bunch of keys which hung from her waistband, and, separating a small one from the rest, proceeded towards the little cupboard, which she unlocked. Barbara drew near, delighted to have a view of the interior.

The panel opened from the ground to about the height of a man's head; the depth inside did not exceed six inches, and the few narrow shelves only held some old rubbish. Barbara and Catherine looked at each other with surprise; there were certainly no books there, nor anything else of value. But the dame touched a spring, and what had seemed to be the end of the cupboard opened back, displaying to view a space large enough to admit a person; there were shelves all round. 'Here,' said Dame Cicely, 'we keep the vestments, and all that is necessary for the offering of the holy sacrifice of the Mass; and there, too, the priest had to hide once when our house was searched. The pursuivants opened the front cupboard, but they did not find this out, Thank God!'

'Catherine, take this book,' she added, handing her an old volume which she had chosen from among a few others that lay on the ground in a corner.

The young girl seized it with joy, and read with some difficulty the half-effaced title, which announced that the contents was the Legend of St. Bega, Virgin and Abesse, printed from the manuscript of a monk, who wrote some centuries after the death of the holy nun. It was one of those early specimens of printing known as block-books, the impression being taken from letters cut out in a block of wood, which caused them to be of a somewhat clumsy form.

'My granduncle was a printer and engraver,' said Dame Cicely, 'and when I was a girl my mother used to take me to see him. He liked me very much, and being fond of old books himself, he one day gave me this one, which he prized; but for my part, I never cared to read, and preferred my spinning-wheel to a book any day; so it has been lying by these forty years and more.'

Catherine thanked her kind friend, and seating herself on one of the high-backed chairs near the window, she began to read.

How little do most of us think, when we hand a book to a young person, that the whole future of that soul may perhaps be influenced by what it there reads!

Catherine was just at that age when the mind and heart are most impressionable, and the feelings are stronger than the judgment. She was seventeen, and a feeling hitherto unknown to her had of late passed over that blithesome nature; it made her thoughtful, but not sad: it occupied her interiorly; but none of her daily duties were on that account neglected.

What that feeling was, from whence it proceeded, or to what it tended, she could not clearly ascertain. It was not discontent with her present situation, and yet it made her heart yearn for something more perfect; as long, however, as she had Barbara to educate, she was fully satisfied to devote all her time and energies to that object; but when the great work should be fulfilled, what course of life should she follow? Although she justly esteemed those who led really good lives in the world, she felt called to something higher. She knew not what, but she prayed each day that God's will might be made manifest to her, and she continued cheerfully to perform the duties of her station, waiting with childlike confidence until her Heavenly Father should point out the road He wished her to follow.

Such, then, was the disposition of Catherine's mind when Dame Cicely unburied from her mysterious press the long-forgotten book, and bestowed it on her young friend. The rain continued to fall in torrents, and the girl remained by the window reading. She followed with interest the life of the saintly Irish princess.

The quaint language of the Saxon monk, and the clumsy form of the old letters, prevented her from proceeding very rapidly, but this by no means abated her ardor; indeed, her attention was so fixed on the book, that, had not little Barbara reminded her of the hour, the mid-day meal would have been unheeded.

During the week Catherine found little time to devote to reading; now and then a few spare moments were spent by her in deciphering a page of the old volume; but when Sunday came round again she was able to sit down quietly and enjoy her treasure. With what delight she heard the good monk's description of the large monastery which St. Bega erected at Hartlepool, Heorthen, or Hertesie, as the peninsula was called of old. How her young soul relished the account of the fervent keeping of fasts and watching; of the chanting of hymns and psalms, and the study of holy books, to all of which its pious inmates devoted themselves! A life free from those distracting cares which must engross the attention of Christians engaged in the world; a life wholly consecrated to the service of God, and for His sake to the wants, both spiritual and temporal, of His suffering children—such was the beautiful vision which the history of St. Bega and her nuns placed before Catherine. If only that life could be one day hers, thought she; but then she feared it was temerity in one subject to numerous imperfections to aspire to so high a state. And then, where could she now find a convent in England? Those peaceful abodes, where sanctity and learning had so long flourished, were destroyed; she remembered her mother telling her how their holy inmates had been ruthlessly driven from their secluded homes, and the precious altar furniture, and even the money destined for the poor, carried off by profane hands. There seemed therefore, humanly speaking, no possibility of her ever following a conventual life; but Catherine knew that God has merciful designs on all souls, and that He will guide those that confide in Him, whatever be their lot in this world; she therefore remained in peace.

One evening, when Master Alwin returned home after a visit to a country friend, he called Catherine, who was as usual busily employed up-stairs; so, taking with her some knitting she was doing, she ran down.

Master Alwin had seated himself in his old armchair, and was entertaining his wife with an account of all he had seen and heard during his short absence.

'Ah, Catherine,' said he, when the young girl entered the room, 'I have news for thee. I have seen the priest of whom thou hast so often spoken to us; he was at my friend's house. He told me that he had escaped from the Tower some two years ago, and that he had been living afore that in Cornwall; so I thought to myself, This must be Father Ralph; and having asked him if he knew any one named Catherine Tresize, he said he remembered thee well, and he was much pleased to hear of thee, and to know that the little Lady Barbara was safe. Next time he comes to town he will stop at my house, and thou wilt see him.'

Catherine was overjoyed at this news; but old Master Alwin had more to say, and he did not feel quite sure what effect it would have on his young friend. He hesitated, sighed, and then inquired how Barbara was. A merry laugh from the child herself made him raise his eyes from the ground, on which he had kept them fixed for the last few minutes, there she sat beside Catherine. 'Ah,' thought the old merchant, 'how will they, who are so united, ever bear to be separated?' Such, indeed, was the nature of the news he was so loth to impart. Catherine loved her little sister, as she called Barbara, with an affection so deep and true, that Master Alwin, who was a kind-hearted man, did not like to tell her that Father Ralph had said that he knew a Catholic family who were going to France, and would doubtless be willing to take Lady Margaret's daughter to her father, who was living in Normandy.

After deferring the evil moment as long as he could, the merchant repeated to the young girl the words of the priest. As he spoke, she ceased working, and listened motionless with interest and surprise. Her expressive countenance betrayed the feelings of her heart, where joy and sorrow strove for the mastery. Joy, because to find Barbara's father or brother was her most earnest wish; for the welfare of her little charge was dearer to her than her own. Sorrow, deep sorrow, at the prospect of losing the child who, during three years, had been the constant object of her solicitude and love.

When Master Alwin had finished speaking there was a moment's silence, which none seemed inclined to interrupt; then a little hand clasped Catherine's firmly.

'I will not leave thee, sister,' whispered Barbara.

Tears, which she vainly tried to restrain, now flowed down the young girl's face.

'Ah, tis a sad thing, truly, for thee to part with the little one,' said Dame Cicely, who had hitherto sat spinning in silence.

'But maybe there will be no means of sending her after all.'

'O, I do not wish that!' exclaimed Catherine. 'Far from me the desire to keep Lady Margaret's daughter from her parent; that would be ill complying with her dear ladyship's dying wishes, and refusing the favor I have daily asked of God for my darling. I and good Widow O'Reilly promised to take care of the little child until we could restore her to her father or brother, if either escaped. The moment has come to fulfill this part of the promise; and, although I do weep at the idea of losing my little sister,'—as she spoke she drew Barbara closer to her—'yet I am glad that the last injunctions of her departed mother will be obeyed, and that she will be once more with her family, and in that position of life in which she was born.'

Master Alwin and his wife expressed their satisfaction at Catherine's sentiments, and said that her view of the case certainly was the right one.

All anxiously awaited the visit of Father Ralph, who was to explain his plans for Barbara's journey and to announce the time of her departure.

The poor child herself was inconsolable. Father, brother, home, and riches, nothing of all this could reconcile her to leaving her dear Catherine, and when Dame Cicely tried to comfort her by mentioning some of these inducements, she would shake her head sorrowfully, and say, 'I do not remember my father nor my brother, but I love Kate better than any one in this world. I am quite happy with her; I do not want to be rich.'

Catherine understood Barbara's grief, for she felt it herself, and could therefore console her better than Dame Cicely, in spite of the good woman's excellent intentions.

She told, her, with that effecionate manner which lent force to her simple words, that it was the will of God that she should return to her family, to make her father happy by her presence and good conduct. The child listened with docility, and often the two mingled their tears together.

CHAPTER XX.

FROM the quiet sphere in which Catherine moved we must now divert the attention of the reader to the stirring events which occupied the closing years of Elizabeth's reign; for they affected the fortunes of Barbara's relatives and, indirectly, those of the child herself, as well as of her young guardian.

Sir Cuthbert de Courcy had, after the destruction of his manor, returned to London. It will be remembered that he had promised to obtain, if possible, some succors from the Queen for the inhabitants of Penzance. On his arrival in the capital he accordingly petitioned in their favor; but received from his sovereign the answer, that if he and the men of Penzance had fought, as it became brave and loyal subjects to do, instead of abandoning the town, they would not now be destitute, and that, having acted otherwise, they need expect no aid from her. To the loss of his manor, which, as he had represented, had been caused by his anxiety to save the town, her Majesty did not even allude.

Cuthbert was much aggravated by this answer, in which; far from giving him credit for his endeavors to stimulate the townspeople, the Queen had included him among the number of those who had fled.

When, a short time after this, the Earl of Essex, abandoning the privacy in which he had lived since his trial, threw open the doors of Essex-house to every comer, and summoning his former dependents from the country gave admittance to every bold adventurer, Cuthbert was one of those who hastened thither. His friendship for one of the partisans of the Earl had first induced him to join their assemblies; but he soon became an ardent adherent to their cause. Lord Essex had determined to regain his lost favor with the Queen, for which purpose he left no resource untried. A trusty messenger had carried to the King of Scotland the assurance of the Earl's attachment, informing him at the same time that Cecil, Raleigh, the Earl of Nottingham, and Cobham, the faction that ruled at court, were leagued to place the Spanish Infanta on the throne at the death of the Queen. Late one Saturday evening Cuthbert returned from Drury-house, the residence of the Earl of Southampton, where the conspirators were now accustomed to hold their meetings. To Adelina's anxious inquiries as to the probable success of their plans, he replied that he entertained no doubt as to their favorable result. 'But,' he added, 'we need to be expeditious, and I fear much time is wasted in idle discussion.'

'Then no decision has been come to yet?' said Lady Adelina.

'Nothing final has been determined on replied her husband; 'but this day my Lord Essex devised a plan which I hold to be the best yet thought of, and which, were I in his place, I would at once carry into effect. This is it: that we should proceed in a body to the palace, and take possession of the gate and principal apartments; that then my Lord Essex, with those noblemen most devoted to his cause, should present themselves before the Queen, and throwing themselves on their knees, should refuse to rise until she had granted his petition, and had agreed to banish from court his enemies, and this demand, surrounded as she would be, she would not dare to refuse. I wish the Earl would not tarry so long in the execution of his projects. But then he waits, 'tis true, an answer from the King of Scots.' Cuthbert ceased speaking, and his head resting on his hand, he remained buried in thought. Adelina was accustomed to see him of late indulge in long fits of musing and as at such times he did not like to be disturbed, she quietly retired.

Ten o'clock. The watchman announced it in a loud voice and sung out his quaint ballad, saying:

'Good people all, hang out a light,
And see that the horn lamps are bright.'

Cuthbert rose, and paced to and fro with evident uneasiness. The various plans he had heard proposed during the last three weeks by the adherents of Essex occupied his mind, and, as he passed them in review, the expression of his countenance varied strangely; at one moment it portrayed anxiety and almost terror, as he considered the risk to the undertaking and the ill consequences of a failure; then again a smile of triumph played on his features, as thoughts of success reanimated his hopes. Involuntarily his mind reverted to the answer he had received from the Queen on his application in behalf of the inhabitants of Penzance; the vexation he had then experienced had contributed more than he was himself aware of to make him a willing partisan of any scheme which had for its object to oppose Elizabeth's tyrannical sway. Sympathy for the Earl of Essex, and friendship for some of those who had joined his cause, had doubtless influenced him in his decision to associate himself with them, but these latent reasons of which we have spoken were in reality a very strong stimulus. He had walked up and down the apartment several times, when suddenly he stopped, he heard knocking at the outer gate. Who was it that sought admittance at that late hour? Was it news from Essex's party? and if so, what tidings brought they? Or was the plot discovered and were those who wished to enter emissaries of the Queen come in search of information, and maybe also to arrest the inmate? While these conflicting ideas held him in painful suspense, the knocking was repeated. The visitor gained admittance, he crossed the court yard ascended the stairs, and then a hand pushed aside the heavy arras hanging which guarded the entrance of the room, in the centre of which Cuthbert still stood uncertain.

The visitor was accompanied by one of the servants of the house, who, approaching his master, said:

'This person, sir, comes on urgent business; so methought it right, knowing you had not retired to rest, to conduct him to you at once.'

'You did well, and may leave the room now,' replied Cuthbert, who had recognized in the man alluded to a messenger from Essex house. 'What news?' he inquired anxiously, as soon as they were alone.

'My Lord Essex earnestly demands that all his friends should assemble at his house to-morrow morning as early as possible; he has received secret intelligence of an important nature, and wishes to communicate it to them. These are my orders, and I must needs go immediately, for I have the same message to take to many other houses ere daybreak.'

'I will attend there without fail,' replied Cuthbert.

The messenger departed, and Sir Cuthbert retired to seek that rest which he felt much in need of; but sleep is seldom the companion of an uneasy mind, and he rose early, after having passed a feverish and restless night. Taking with him a small escort he hastened to the rendezvous.

It was Sunday morning; all the shops were closed, the streets deserted, the usually noisy thoroughfares were silent, and the little party hurried on unseen and unmolested.

On reaching Essex-house they found a large number of the Earl's partisans already assembled in the spacious courtyard. In a few moments the nobleman himself appeared. Standing on the steps of his magnificent residence, he looked gravely at the crowd below, and, every eye fixed on him, amid a breathless silence he addressed his faithful adherents. Having first informed them that, on the previous evening, the Secretary Herbert had brought him an order to appear before the Council, to which he had answered that he was too unwell to leave his apartment he went on to say that, a short time after, a note from an unknown writer had been put into his hands warning him to provide without delay for his own safety. 'This, my noble friends,' continued the Earl, 'this is the reason why I have called you hither; a plot is laid against my life. I well know that so foul a design cannot fail to inspire hearts like yours with horror and indignation; and it is on your courage that I depend to defeat the intrigues of those who bear me malice. Mine enemies have, I am aware, poisoned the mind of that sovereign who heretofore regarded me with so great favor. Fortune, that formerly smiled upon my every undertaking, seems of late to have abandoned me; my intentions have been misinterpreted; I have been arraigned before an unconstitutional tribunal, composed of men who were either my personal enemies or my political rivals; my petitions to the Queen have remained unnoticed; but this very day do I purpose to recover my former greatness. Accompany me, my friends; I will proceed to the Queen, I will solicit her protection against the malice of mine enemies.

'At ten in the forenoon the lord mayor, aldermen, and companies will, you know, assemble at St. Paul's cross, as is usual on Sundays; at the conclusion of the sermon we will join them, and call on them to follow us to the palace. Does my undertaking seem to you too hazardous? Remember, that a few years ago, in a country not far from England, in circumstances not dissimilar to ours, the Duke of Guise, with the aid of the people of Paris, was successful. Are those who now surround me less brave than those whom he led? Am I less popular with the people of London than he was with the inhabitants of Paris? I trust not; but you, valiant gentlemen, shall decide my fate. Answer me, are you willing to follow me? Are you ready to risk your lives in a good cause?'

Shouts of assent, and the manifest enthusiasm which his words had kindled in his adherents, assured Essex that he had not spoken in vain. It still wanted some time to ten, the hour they purposed starting for St. Paul's-cross. The interval was spent in preparations, which, however, were suddenly interrupted by an unexpected arrival. An attendant, in whose countenance alarm was visible, brought to his master the unwelcome intelligence that Egerton, the Lord Keeper, the Earl of Worcester, Knollys, the Comptroller of the Household, and the Lord Chief Justice stood at the gate and were demanding admission.

'Let them enter,' said Essex coolly; 'but see that their attendants, the purse-bearer excepted, remain outside.'

'What may be the cause of this tumult?' inquired Egerton, looking round as the crowd collected, in the court.

The Earl of Essex stepped forward, and boldly addressing the speaker, replied

'A plot is laid against my life; letters had been counterfeited in my name, and assassins have even been appointed to murder me in my bed. We have met, therefore, to defend our lives, and surely in doing so we are fully justified since mine enemies cannot be satisfied unless they suck my blood.'

'If such be really the case,' interrupted Popham, 'let it be proved; we will then relate it fairly, and the Queen will do impartial justice.'

'Impartial justice!' impatiently exclaimed the Earl of Southampton, who was standing near Essex. 'What trust can we place in the commands of her Majesty, when they are ineffectual to restrain those on whom she imposes them? Did not Lord Grey, notwithstanding that the Queen had enjoined on him to keep the peace towards me, did he not, with many of his followers, attack me on the Strand as I went on horseback, accompanied by one footboy only, who lost his hand in defending me? After that you come to talk to us of impartial justice!'

'You have nothing to complain of,' replied the first speaker. 'If her Majesty's commands have been violated it has not been with impunity; the guilty party now suffers imprisonment for the offence.'

Egerton, who had listened to this debate with evident impatience, now turned abruptly to Lord Essex and asked him if he would explain his grievances in private; but before that nobleman had time to reply, several voices exclaimed: 'They wish to entrap you; you only lose your time in thus discussing with them.'

Essex appearing undecided what course to adopt, the cries became more urgent. It was in vain that Egerton, in the Queen's name, demanded that every man should lay down his arms. The Earl then looked towards his friends, as if to assure them that what he was about to do would not compromise his cause or theirs and, without saying a word, turned and entered the house. The lords were about to follow, when the sinister cries of 'Kill them! kill them! Keep them as pledges!' which broke forth from the assembly, made them hesitate on the threshold. But there are moments when, fear being useless and danger unavoidable, men must of necessity affect indifference, even if they do not feel it. Inside or outside the mansion their lives were equally in peril; they therefore continued to follow Essex. He conducted them up-stairs, then through two rooms guarded by musketeers, and at length introduced them into a back chamber, where, having desired them to have patience for half an hour or so, he was preparing to leave them, when Egerton, seeing him move towards the door, detained him, expostulating with some eagerness.

'My lord, we came hither to obey her Majesty's commands; our time is therefore not our own, and cannot be thus wasted. I thought that you were going to explain to us your grievances, that we might lay them fairly before the Queen; but if such is not your intention, let us depart immediately.'

Essex smiled at the impotent anger of those who were now in truth his captives.

'You wish to know my grievances,' he said; 'well, in a few hours all London shall be acquainted with them, and I shall have laid them myself before the Queen.'

He departed, closing the door carefully, and those inside heard the unwelcome sound of bolts being fastened, and listened with no pleasant feelings to the order which he gave to the musketeers to guard the prisoners and to allow none to have access to them.

The Earl, on this, returned to the court, and announced to his friends what he had done, and then drawing his sword he rushed into the street, followed by the Earls of Rutland and Southampton, and the Lords Sandys and Mounteagle, with about eighty knights and gentlemen, foremost among whom was Sir Cuthbert de Courcy, who hoped at length to gain for himself the renown which his ambition had always coveted.

The guard at Ludgate, perhaps thinking them too formidable to be resisted with safety, let them pass; and now they proceeded towards St. Paul's-cross, Lord Essex shouting, 'For the Queen, my mistress!' But the streets were as deserted as when Cuthbert had passed along them at early morn. The voice of Essex resounded through them, but no friendly voice echoed the cry. The Earl of Bedford and Lord Cromwell, with about two hundred others, indeed joined the party; but not one of the citizens came to swell their ranks, and without their support success seemed but doubtful. Essex was evidently deeply mortified to see that the popularity on which he had so much counted in the city had failed to bring to his aid even a handful of fresh adherents. Still they continued to advance towards St. Paul's but on reaching it they found, to their dismay, that there was no meeting.

Consternation was visible in every countenance: those who were nearest their leader looked at him as if to inquire what was now to be done. 'Let us proceed to the residence of Smith; he is my friend, and maybe can aid us,' said Essex sadly.

Smith was one of the sheriffs, and to his house the Earl and his party now directed their course. They gained admittance, but the sheriff had prudently withdrawn, and his servant feigned to be ignorant as to his movements.

'Have all my plans failed, then?' exclaimed Essex, throwing himself exhausted into a chair. His friends pressed round him, seeking to rouse his hopes; but before he could resolve what to do he felt the need of quiet and reflection, and for that purpose retired to one of the apartments. Many of his followers, now seeing the hopelessness of the undertaking, returned to their homes; Sir Cuthbert was determined to remain to the last.

During these occurrences Adelina passed her time in a state of painful uncertainty. About two in the afternoon she heard that Lord Burghley and others had entered the city by different quarters and proclaimed Essex a traitor, offering a large reward for his arrest, still she was unwilling to believe that the plot had completely failed; hope lingered in her heart.

The hours seemed interminable, but evening came at last, and at dusk she saw the party returning who had left the house in the morning. But there was no figure among them that resembled Cuthbert; she thought, or rather hoped, that it was owing to the gathering darkness that she could not discern him. The men entered, and one of them proceeded up-stairs to acquaint his mistress with what had happened.

After relating the events already described, he added that the diminished followers of Lord Essex had returned by water to that unfortunate nobleman's house, where, after a slight resistance, the chiefs of the insurrection had yielded themselves prisoners.

'And my lord Cuthbert, where is he?' inquired Adelina, who had listened with painful interest to the account.

'My lady, he too was made prisoner; I was close to him, and he bid me tell you to destroy all papers concerning this affair, as the house might be searched.'

Lady Adelina passed a sleepless night. She ardently desired to do whatever might contribute to the safety of her husband, whose position, she was well aware, was a very precarious one; but she found herself powerless. To whom ought she to apply? Whom could she interest in the prisoner's favor? Whose support could she procure? These questions recurred every instant to her mind; she long sought in vain a solution to them.

At length she thought of two persons who might have it in their power to assist her. One was an intimate friend of Sir Cuthbert; to him she wrote acquainting him with what had happened, and asking his help and advice. The other was that same cousin through whose husband's influence the estates and title of Sir Reginald had been bestowed on his brother. Since that period a great coldness had taken place between the two families. Political differences estranged the gentlemen, and jealousy, on the part of Lady Somers, sowed division between the cousins; but at that moment Adelina thought of nothing except how to save her husband, and as Lord Somers belonged to the court party, and possessed considerable influence in the Council, she resolved to go in person and solicit his wife's support. Feeling, nevertheless, uncertain as to the result of this visit, and not wishing that the friends of Sir Cuthbert should be aware that she sought for him protection from the court party, she determined not to acquaint her household with her intentions, and to go on foot, accompanied only by a waiting-woman on whom she could rely.

Early the following morning a barge might have been seen gliding rapidly up the Thames. The sunlight flashed on the oars at each stroke of the vigorous rowers; the smooth waters rippled round the keel, and a broad wake marked the passage of the boat, in which were two females simply attired. One of these appeared sorrowful and anxious; the other, who was evidently the maid, seemed little interested in whatever errand it might be that had brought her and her mistress out at so unusually early an hour.

The party had proceeded about half a mile up the river when they reached a landing-place, where the men pushed in the boat and all went on shore. The lady looked around her, as though uncertain which way to turn; on which the old attendant who had steered them up the current said, in an earnest but respectful tone:

'My lady, I pray you allow me and all others of your servants to accompany you. The streets are not safe; even armed men are oftentimes attacked in broad daylight. You, my lady, have never been alone or on foot through them, and know not the danger.'

'I have my maid,' replied Lady Adelina; 'and we are so simply dressed that we shall pass unobserved.'

The old man shook his head doubtfully; but, seeing that his mistress was determined, he insisted no longer. As he rowed away with his companions, he remarked, 'I marvel much what my lady's motives are, if she has any, for perchance it is only a fancy.'

Adelina and her companion, leaving the river-side, entered the narrow streets, the former walking at so rapid a pace that her maid found it difficult to keep by her side.

'What do you lack, madam?' cried the apprentices, as she passed their shops. One offered boots and shoes, another praised the excellence of his master's groceries, a third called attention to his watches, clocks, and mirrors. The noise confused Lady Adelina, and the quickness with which she had walked had fatigued her; so she stopped near a clothier's shop. At that moment a party of horsemen were seen advancing down the narrow streets; one of the horses were restive, and his rider had lost all control over him. The lady and her attendant grew alarmed, and were uncertain which way to turn, when the low door which guarded the entrance to the clothier's shop opened and a young girl politely prayed them to come within and wait until the horses had passed, of which offer they were happy to avail themselves. Adelina did not remark the look of surprise expressed in the maiden's countenance when first she saw the face of her whom she had invited in.

Dame Cicely was in the parlor at the end of the shop, a dark little den from which she and her husband would command a view of the goods and of those who passed in or out. In this place she begged Lady Adelina to enter, and seeing that she was very tired, asked her to remain and rest herself a while, to which she willingly agreed.

'Who were those horsemen?' she inquired; more for the sake of saying something than from any real desire to know.

'Some of the Queen's officers parading the city, methinks, to see if all is quiet after yesterday's disturbance,' replied the dame.

The mention of yesterday brought sad recollections to Lady Adelina; and the good woman, noticing that she changed color, turned to another subject of conversation.

'I fear I am interrupting you in your occupations,' observed the visitor, after a few minutes' talk on in different topics. 'I shall go now.'

But Dame Cicely prayed her to remain until she felt quite rested, adding that Catherine would stay with her, while she herself went to the kitchen, where her presence at that moment was required.

The young girl, who since the entrance of Lady Adelina had kept at the other end of the room, now approached the party; and the lady, who had before scarcely observed her, looked at her attentively.

'What a calm happy face!' she thought.

'Are you never dull in this old shop?' she inquired.

'No, madam; we are all too busy,' replied Catherine smiling 'The days pass quickly with us.'

'Ah, you have no sorrows,' rejoined the other. 'Time goes slowly for those who have.'

'I have had sorrows,' replied the girl; and for a moment her bright face became serious. 'I have watched by the death-bed of those that were dearest to me; but,' she added, with the happy look of one who felt the truth of what she said,—'we have a Heavenly Father to whom we can always have recourse; and the thought that it is His will that we should suffer brings consolation.'

Lady Adelina made no reply; and after the lapse of a few minutes, during which she seemed absorbed in thought, she rose, and thanking Catherine left the shop, and with her maid proceeded on their way. They now entered the more fashionable part of the city, and after a short walk they stopped before a large mansion.

Adelina did not give her name to the servant who opened the door, but bade him tell Lady Somers that she came on urgent business, and must see her at once. She was conducted into a handsome apartment: where, after waiting some time, she was joined by the mistress of the house.

'You come at an early hour, fair cousin. It is indeed long since you honored me with a visit.' There was in the tone and manner of the speaker, as she addressed these words to Adelina, something haughty and ironical, which made the latter feel uncomfortable, as she replied rather hesitatingly:

'I should not have disturbed you at this hour had not urgent necessity obliged me to do so. I am in much affliction; surely, my cousin, you will not at such a moment consider the differences which have lately existed between us. Sir Cuthbert—'

'O, I understand; Sir Cuthbert wants a place, or a title, or a grant from the Queen, and it is to this I owe the honor of a visit,' interrupted the other.

The color rose in Adelina's cheek, and a tear stood in her eye; she felt that neither help nor consolation was to be expected from the unkind speaker; and she would gladly have departed at once without even disclosing the motive of her visit, had not the faint hope of interesting Lady Somers and her husband in Sir Cuthbert's favor retained her; so summoning all her courage she related the part De Courey had taken in the late rebellion.

Her cousin listened with attention; but Adelina vainly sought from her a look of sympathy, for the handsome but cold features of the listener expressed none. When Sir Cuthbert's wife had finished speaking, and had told of his danger and her own distress, appealing to the kindness and generosity of her friend, and entreating her to obtain for the prisoner the protection of Lord Somers; when, in fine, she had exhausted all her energy in behalf of the cause she had so much at heart, her cousin replied in a few words, pronounced in a tone too decided to admit of any doubt as to their meaning. Sir Cuthbert, she said, had nothing to hope from them; she and her husband, belonging to the court party, could not favor rebels. He had joined Lord Essex, let him look for help to his friends. Without returning any answer, Adelina rose and proceeded towards the door; and a few minutes later she and her maid were on their way home. On reaching the bank of the river the barge was waiting, and conducted them rapidly to their dwelling.

As Lady Adelina entered the house a letter was placed in her hands.

'Who brought it?' she inquired eagerly.

'The servant of Mr Elverton,' was the reply.

'That is good,' said the lady as she hurried upstairs.

No sooner was she alone in her chamber than she hastened to open the letter as she read the paper dropped from her hand, while a look of deep sorrow passed over her face. With a sigh she seated herself in the deep embrasure of the window.

The note which had so excited her feelings and produced this despair came from the friend of Sir Cuthbert to whom she had written on the previous evening his words, more polite perhaps than those of Lady Somers, were no less destructive of hope, and gave no promise at all of help. He declared that it would be dangerous for him even to express sympathy for any of those concerned in the late conspiracy. The Queen and her Ministers were alarmed, he said, and at such a moment they would not hesitate to arrest any person suspected of belonging to the party of Lord Essex; and consequently he felt himself obliged, though with deep regret, to beg Lady Adelina not to address herself any more to him: adding that he would notwithstanding continue to watch with interest the course of events in which the dictates of prudence forbade him to interfere.

No help from that side either! Such was the sad exclamation in which Lady Adelina added her testimony to that of so many afflicted, and declared with them that human friendships are vain in the hour of need. She had sought comfort from one united to her by the ties of kindred; in her she had found a cold indifference and a bitter irony. She had next applied to an intimate friend of him in whose favor she pleaded; but he feared for his own safety, and felt no inclination to risk it in behalf of his former companion. Yet Adelina well remembered hearing him since the commencement of the conspiracy, frequently assure Sir Cuthbert that he would always stand by him, happen what might.

The sun had set, but Adelina still remained at the open window. Her eye wandered over the garden, now in its full summer beauty, and rested on the river, where many a gaily-painted barge glided along; but the cheerful voices and merry laughter which proceeded from the parties who were thus enjoying the cool evening air seemed only sad music to the poor lady. For the soul invests with its own sentiments the sounds and objects which impress it; and so what to one speaks of joy, to another will frequently bring sorrow.

One face constantly appeared before Adelina's troubled vision, and its recollection seemed to soothe her; one voice sounded in her ear, and its tones were soft and sweet as those which fancy loves to impart to heavenly spirits. The words it repeated were grave yet consoling. 'We have a Heavenly Father,' it said, 'to whom we can always have recourse, and the thought that it is His will that we should suffer brings consolation.'

Yes, the calm happy look, the simple words, of Catherine brought more comfort to Lady Adelina than all the gay and powerful friends who, a few weeks ago pressed round her, but now prudently held aloof.

To seek consolation in God was an idea quite new to that poor afflicted soul. In days of prosperity she had seldom thought of Him; never as of a Father full of compassion for His erring children. The distance between the Almighty Creator of the universe and a weak creature seemed to her so great that she dared not implore His assistance. Could her sorrow touch His heart? Would He deign to listen to her prayers? She doubted it; but still the words of Catherine returned again and again to her mind. 'Surely,' thought she, 'that Heavenly Father of whom the young girl spoke with such confidence will not be deaf to my cries.'

In a moment of filial love inspired by Catherine's words, and her own urgent need of consolation and help, Adelina threw herself on her knees, and she prayed. What words she uttered she scarcely knew, but that they were heartfelt is certain. The gloom was fast gathering; the voices from the river had ceased; all was hushed in silence; but still she knelt motionless by the open casement, the fresh night breeze playing gently with her golden hair, on which that day less time and art had been bestowed.

Yes, suffering is a wonderful purifier of the human heart, and often possesses greater power to detach it from earthly objects than the most eloquent sermons. The gay and thoughtless Adelina now experienced its influence.

CHAPTER XXI.

SHORTLY after the unsuccessful attempt of Lord Essex, and while the trial of that unfortunate nobleman and his accomplices almost exclusively occupied the public attention, Master Alwin received secret information that Father Ralph would say Mass at his house on the following Sunday.

It was then the middle of the week: the intervening days were to Catherine and Barbara days of solemn and anxious interest, for they dreaded that those hours were to be the last they were ever to spend together. But steady to her purpose, the young girl frequently reminded her little pupil of the good instructions she had received, and earnestly conjured her never to neglect them.

'Thy position will change, my little Barbara,' she said, 'but God's law does not change, and thou wilt find in thy new station duties to perform just as much as thou dost here.'

Saturday evening came, but no priest appeared. 'He will be here to-morrow,' said Master Alwin as he retired to bed, after waiting up an hour later than usual to receive his expected guest.

Sunday morning passed, as had the previous evening, without bringing any intelligence of Father Ralph. The merchant and his household concluded that some urgent need had called him elsewhere, or that he had not deemed it safe to come; but when a whole week had elapsed without their gaining any knowledge concerning him, they began to fear that he had been apprehended.

During this time Lady Adelina was plunged in a like painful uncertainty as to what would be the fate of her husband; access to him had been refused her.

She was one day musing on the events which then occupied most people's attention, and which had, for her in particular, so keen an interest, when her favorite waiting-woman entered the room.

'Bring your work here, Jane,' said Adelina, 'and sit with me, for truly I feel most sad and lonely when by myself. Hand me that embroidery; it might perchance divert my thoughts, if only I can fix them on it. But what is that piece of paper you hold in your hand?'

'It was about that I came, my lady. A man brought it here saying it was from Sir Cuthbert, and—'

'Give it to me!' exclaimed the poor lady, interrupting the speaker; and with trembling hands she hastened to unfold the paper, inside which was another piece, but nothing appeared to be written on either.

'What can this mean?' she said, appealing to her maid. 'Who brought it, say you?'

'A strange man, Thomas told me, who went off in a great hurry.'

Adelina remained silent, turning the paper round in her hand. Fortunately for her the waiting-woman had more quickness than her mistress, and suggested that the mysterious note might be secret writing. 'If you will it, my lady, I shall put it in water or hold it by the fire, and perchance something may appear thereon.'

It being summer there was no fire at hand, so the lady pronounced in favor of the trial by water. How anxiously she watched that scrap of paper as it floated in the bowl!

'There, I see something!' she exclaimed, as a few faint characters became visible on one of the papers. They were written in lemon juice, and were, even after soaking in water, difficult to decipher; but after spending some time in the task and exercising much patience, Adelina in the end succeeded in reading the words on the smaller of the two pieces, which were as follows:

'I was arrested last week. The lady who will bring you this is the child's aunt. I pray you bid Catherine not to fear to let her take Barbara to her father in France. God's blessing be with you all!'

'RALPH.'

Lady Adelina was bewildered; what could this possibly mean? The writing and signature were not those of Sir Cuthbert.

'You have made a grievous mistake, Jane,' she said; 'this note cannot have been intended for me.'

'See the other paper, my lady,' replied the woman, handing it to her.

'Ah, that is his writing, indeed!' exclaimed Adelina; and she commenced reading the note, the perusal of which caused her no less astonishment than had the first.

Sir Cuthbert, after regretting the impossibility of seeing his wife, which forced him, he said, to commit to paper that which he would much prefer to communicate by words, told her that he had found a friend the intercourse with whom had, together with the lessons of adversity, changed many of his sentiments, and notably those which he had entertained towards his brother. 'I know,' he added, 'where his little daughter is, and I wish you to return her to her father; he is in France. Fear not to leave the city where I am, for your presence in it can avail me nothing, whereas this act of reparation will doubtless bring a blessing on my soul; neither let the length of the journey deter you, for God will be with you. Write when you have seen our niece.' To this epistle was added the address of Master Alwin, to whom Adelina was to give the paper which she had read first.

This was strange news indeed; the beautiful child which Lady Adelina had so desired to possess at Penzance was in London, and her aunt was at last to have her. How the thought of that child brought with it recollections of the past! The old Cornish Manor, the chapel with its stained windows and its carved angels, even the monotonous country life which she had found wearisome, appeared enviable when compared with the anxious and sorrowful existence she now led; she thought of Cuthbert's hunting-parties, and wished he were once more chasing the deer through the woods of Bron-Welli.

Turning from the quiet sadness of past recollection to the emergencies of her present situation, she felt puzzled how to act, and the idea of going to France quite alarmed her. She read over again Sir Cuthbert's letter. 'Ah, if he has found a friend in prison, that is more than I have found in the world. Would that I had some one whom I could consult!'

At that moment the words of Catherine sounded in her ear; 'We have a Heavenly Father to whom we can always have recourse.'

'She bade the waiting-woman leave the room, and then kneeling down she murmured half aloud a prayer to Him who abandons none that trust in His mercy. When she rose she felt comforted; she resolved to go immediately to see her niece at the address Cuthbert had given her.

When she stood before the entrance of Master Alwin's shop, she at once recognized the house where she had rested on the way to her cousin's.

'What do you lack?' cried the apprentice at the door.

Lady Adelina hesitated to enter; her courage failed her; the errand on which she came seemed such a strange one. At that moment Catherine stepped forward, and in that cheerful gracious manner which is so winning, she prayed the timid visitor to enter.

The young girl had quickly perceived, both on this and the former occasion, that the wife of Sir Cuthbert had gone through severe trials, and it was to those in affliction that her warm and generous heart felt drawn. At Penzance it had cost nature a struggle to view with charity Sir Cuthbert and Lady Adelina de Courcy occupying the place of the rightful owners of the Manor; but now, when the poor lady stood before her with sorrow impressed on her young and once-laughing face, the past was all forgotten, and Catherine longed to soothe that afflicted heart.

'Enter, I pray thee, madam,' she repeated kindly.

'I desire to speak to one Master Alwin if he lives here,' said the lady in a low but earnest tone.

'What do you lack, ma'am?' cried the apprentice at the pitch of his voice. 'Cloth or woollen goods? White or dyed? High or low priced?'

'Hush!' said Catherine; 'the lady wants to speak to your master.' And turning to the visitor, she added, 'The dame is up-stairs, and Master Alwin will be in shortly; will you please to come up?'

Adelina followed her young guide to the room where Dame Cicely was working. The good woman received her very politely, wondering all the while what purpose had brought her.

'Tis you, madam, methinks,' said she, 'that rested here one day a few weeks since.'

'You are right,' replied the other; 'although, until I came to the house, I did not know it was the same. Is this your husband?'

Master Alwin had at that moment entered the room. Lady Adelina went towards him, and handed him the note, which he read; she then explained who she was, and the motive of her visit. She gained courage, and her trembling voice became calm as she proceeded. The benign and fatherly countenance of the old merchant inspired her with confidence; he listened with the utmost attention; and when she had finished he turned to Catherine, saying: 'You have heard what the lady says; now read this, and tell us what you think, for the child was intrusted to you; therefore I would not act otherwise than as you judge right. What thinkest thou?'

'What think I?' replied Catherine, folding again the piece of paper, the contents of which she had just read. 'What other thought could I have than to obey the word of him whose counsel even would be a command to me.'

Frequently since Lady Adelina had entered the house her eyes had rested on Catherine. She could not think what rendered the young girl's countenance so attractive. Features more regular, faces more strikingly handsome she had certainly seen among her own acquaintances and the ladies of Queen Elizabeth's court; but the maiden before her possessed, besides the freshness of health and youth, an undefinable expression of innocence, a look so childlike and yet so full of intelligence.

'Is that your daughter, good dame?' she at length inquired.

'Not so,' replied the old lady; 'she is from the country parts, and came to us some time ago with Barbara, Lady Margaret de Courcy's daughter. But perchance, my lady, you would like to see your little niece? Wilt thou fetch her, Kate?'

The young girl left the room; and Lady Adelina took this opportunity to question Master Alwin and his wife concerning her. The old man related what his friend Andrew had told him, and what he himself had witnessed of her devotedness to Barbara; the dame adding the testimony of her knowledge of Catherine since her arrival at their house. The re-entrance of the girl, accompanied by Barbara, interrupted the conversation. The former whispered something to the child, who at once approached her aunt, when Adelina embraced her tenderly, and tears filled her eyes as she beheld the daughter of that sister-in-law whom she would never know on earth, and of that brother for whom her husband had entertained such bad feelings, and from whom he now so earnestly desired forgiveness.

'Poor little thing!' she said sorrowfully. 'Those laws must be cruel that drove thee from thy home; and those feelings wrong that rendered a heart insensible to a brother's woes.'

The child looked up with wondering eyes at the speaker, whose words were to her a mystery.

'You love each other tenderly?' said Adelina turning to Catherine.

The bright smile that crossed the little one's face, the earnest manner in which Catherine replied, 'Truly we do, my lady,' assured Adelina that her niece had found among strangers that affection and kindness in which her own relations had failed; and she sighed when she thought that, while a poor young girl had devoted herself to the care of Lady Margaret's daughter, Sir Cuthbert had only sought to profit by her parents' misfortune.

'Surely,' said she, 'it must cost you much to separate yourself from this child?'

'It does,' replied Catherine; 'yet, for her sake, I am glad that she should return to her family.'

'But when you were at Penzance,' answered the lady, 'you would not let the child come to me, who am her aunt. I did not at first recognize you, but now I remember how unwilling you were that she should even come to the Manor, and how you and the dame went away with her sooner than let me have her. I thought it was your great affection, and that you could not bear to part with her.'

'My lady, it was affection,' replied the young girl, smiling. 'Affection for that in her which is most precious—her faith.'

'Her faith,' repeated Adelina thoughtfully. 'You Catholics think much of that. You supposed that I should force her to be a Protestant?'

'I know not, my lady, whether you would have forced her; but I do know that you could not have taught her rightly, and a child so young would naturally have followed the religion of those around her.'

Lady Adelina was about to answer that that would have been no misfortune, since it would have secured the temporal welfare of her niece, but the remembrance that Sir Reginald had been willing to sacrifice all, even his life, sooner than relinquish his faith checked her, and she remained silent.

'I shall make all necessary inquiries,' she at length said, 'as to the journey into France; and I wish to go thither as soon as possible, since such is my husband's desire. The child must be ready to start, and let me know if she wants anything. I do not take her to my house, for I should not like to deprive you of her during the time she still remains in England.'

As Adelina spoke she looked at Catherine.

The young girl raised her eyes and tried to smile as she thanked the lady. Little Barbara, who had been standing close to Catherine, now left her side, and going towards her aunt, she said, with joined hands and a face expressive of intense earnestness—

'O, my lady, do not take me from my sister, Kate, I pray thee.'

Lady Adelina, who had nearly reached the door, stopped and turned back.

'You shall not part from her my niece,' she exclaimed, struck by the beautiful affection which existed between the child and her young guardian. 'No, 'twould be cruel to separate you; if, therefore, your friend will come to France, it will please me well to take her; and I cannot doubt but that my brother-in-law will be happy to reward one who has been so devoted to his daughter.'

'I need no reward,' replied Catherine. 'To see her good and happy; surely that is sufficient recompense.'

'Good she may be,' returned the other; 'but happy she will not be, unless you come with her, were it only to accustom her to her new home; and then, as I shall soon return to England, you can, if you wish come back with me.'

Catherine looked to those around, uncertain what answer to give. Little Barbara whispered, 'Come sister, come.' Master Alwin and his dame smiled approvingly, and remarked that she could return to them again. Adelina once more pressing her to accompany her niece, Catherine, prompted by her own heart to comply with such earnest solicitations, consented to start with Sir Cuthbert's wife whenever she wished. This being decided, the lady bade farewell to the inmates of Master Alwin's establishment, and returned home.

That evening all were more than usually serious at the old shop. The good merchant and his wife sat silent; Catherine bent over her work, while her fingers, following the quickness of her thoughts, moved with unconscious rapidity.

'Do you know,' said the dame at last, 'I don't like the idea of losing Kate.'

'Neither do I,' rejoined her husband, whose thoughts had been wandering in the same direction. 'I am vexed with myself for having encouraged her to say yes to the lady this afternoon. But methinks the little Lady Barbara would never have gone without her.'

'Indeed, I would not,' said the child.

'But thou wilt let Kate come back to us?' suggested the old man.

Barbara shook her head. 'No, I cannot let sister Kate leave me,' she replied.

'Catherine, Catherine, I fear we shall never see thee again, said Dame Cicely. 'But if thou dost return to this country, thou wilt find a welcome here.'

The young girl thanked her kind friends, and said that, although she could not promise to return, she would always remember their goodness to her, and always love them. Master Alwin then brought out one of his large account-books to explain to Catherine how her money matters stood; a subject on which the old merchant often blamed his young friend for being too indifferent; so she now lent her utmost attention, while he told her how much money he had in hand belonging to her offering, if she remained in France, to send the amount through a French house of business.

CHAPTER XXII.

Among the many pleasant and picturesque old towns of France none perhaps possesses greater attractions for the lover of art and antiquity than the ancient capital of Normandy. But if, even now, when revolutionary fury and modern improvements have detracted so much from its venerable appearance, Rouen still retains many monuments worthy of admiration, what must have been its glory in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries?

We are told that, previous to the Revolution, it possessed thirty-six churches; scarcely half that number now retain their original destiny; and often the pious and artistic visitor in Rouen is grieved by sight of one of those noble monuments of faith converted into a warehouse, or turned to some other profane use. The din of commerce and worldly affairs vibrates with a strange and unhallowed sound through the narrow aisles and along the vaulted roofs of such sacred edifices, where once echoed the holy word of God and constant solemn chants. The sculptured saints might seem to look down from their fretted niches with pitying sorrow on the busy men who hurry to and fro, bargaining and disputing where their ancestors once knelt in profoundest adoration.

But at the time of which we are writing none of these painful changes had taken place, and Rouen still gloried in its numerous churches and convents. Some eighty years previous to the date of this story the Cardinal Georges d'Amboise had completed the magnificent Cathedral. The famous bell which bore his name rang out its melodious peals from the southwestern tower. At early morn its solemn voice floated over the silent town, raising holy thoughts in the minds of the awakening inhabitants; at noon too it was heard, and at its sound men took off their hats, women made the sign of the cross, and even little children joined their hands and repeated the prayer their mothers had taught them. For a moment all was silent, each heart was withdrawn from earthly objects, and it seemed like a brief visit paid by immortal souls to their future abode; and when they again returned to the concerns of life we cannot doubt but that they brought with them some memento of their heavenly flight. And when the day was well nigh spent, the Angelus once more revived in the hearts of the faithful the memory of St. Gabriel's salutation to our Blessed Lady—sweet echo of an angel's voice!

Long did the great bell continue to mingle its tones, now grave, now joyous, with each important event in the lives of the citizens of Rouen, until a day came when it was declared to be a 'monu ment of vanity,' and as such melted into cannon-balls and sou-pieces hearing the date 'An II de l'Egallie.'

Besides its noble churches Rouen is not deficient in specimens of civic Gothic architecture. Not far from the ancient Palais de Justice, where the parliament of Normandy was wont to assemble, there stood, and still stands, an antique clock gate-house; it spans the street, joining on one side the tower of the Belfroi, from which the curfew tolls every evening. Seen through this archway the narrow street looked particularly picturesque, as the last rays of autumnal sun were darting over the high-pitched roofs and fell on the bright costumes of the inhabitants as they hurried to and fro. Now and then the passers-by turned round to look at a party whose foreign dress and appearance excited their curiosity. The strangers seemed no less astonished at the novel scenes they beheld as they gazed at the houses and people; often they raised their eyes towards the lace-like sculpture of the Cathedral towers, which rose high above all the other buildings of the town; and it was, in truth, towards this edifice that the travelers were now directing their course. After rambling through a labyrinth of torturous streets, they emerged into a small square, and found themselves at once in front of the north entrance to the Cathedral, just opposite that beautiful door called the 'Portail des Libraires.' They paused to view the magnificent structure; but scarcely had the silence of wonder given place to words of admiration, when the clear tinkling of a bell made them turn their eyes towards the open doorway, from whence the sound proceeded. Shortly a boy wearing a white surplice issued from the Cathedral; he was followed by other youths bearing lighted tapers; in the midst walked, with downcast eyes and reverent demeanour, a priest robed in handsome vestments; and a rapid glance assured Catherine that he bore in his hands the Blessed Sacrament. For a moment she forgot that she was now in a Catholic country, and looked around with instinctive terror, fearing that the priest and his precious burden would be insulted; but she was speedily reassured on seeing that all the people near were on their knees awaiting the blessing of their Saviour, as He went to be the comforter of some dying person; and when He had passed many rose and escorted Him on the way.

Catherine, Barbara, and her aunt likewise knelt; it was the first act of adoration that Lady Adelina had ever paid to Jesus present in the Blessed Sacrament. During the journey which she had just made she frequently questioned Catherine concerning the Catholic faith; and although the grace to throw aside her former errors had not yet been granted, her mind wavered, and now, as she knelt beneath the shadow of the old Cathedral, and heard amid the religious silence that reigned around the footsteps of the priest, who passed quite close to her, she felt awed at the thought that perhaps Jesus too was passing by.

As for Catherine, tears of joy filled her eyes as she witnessed the freedom of Catholicity in France; it presented such a contrast to the state of constraint and terror in which those who practiced it were obliged to live in the country she had left. And when she had penetrated into the Cathedral, and saw the lamp burning before the tabernacle, the faithful praying, and priests passing fearlessly backwards and forwards, we can well imagine her happiness. With what gratitude did she thank God for allowing her to behold the consoling spectacle of the holy faith honored and respected, and the Blessed Sacrament surrounded by all the magnificence that piety and Christian art could devise! Perhaps her thoughts might wander from the splendid Cathedral, from the sculptured altar before which she knelt, to the hidden chambers where, in secret and with fear, the scattered faithful in England were wont to assemble for the celebration of the sacred mysteries, and then she would pour forth an earnest prayer that the Catholic religion might one day flourish there again.

While she and Barbara had been engaged in prayer, Lady Adelina and visited the various parts of the edifice, and she now returned to her young friends, and reminding them of the hour, they all left the church.

'Well,' said she, addressing Catherine as soon as they were outside, 'you ought to feel happy here, for your religion is held in much honor among these people, and to one who, like you, believes in its truth, it must be a solemn and a joyful sight.'

'And I hope you too, my lady, will one day believe, and feel the same happiness that I do in seeing our Saviour thus honored,' replied Catherine, smiling.

'I know not; at times methinks the words you have spoken to me are true; but then it fades away, and I remember naught but my sorrows, which, it seems to me, are too heavy to allow my mind to rest on other things. Catherine,' she added, after a moment's pause, 'we must seek Sir Reginald: so let us return to the inn, and make inquiries as to his residence.'

Our travelers therefore retraced their steps to the homely inn where they had passed the night. There was a large fire in the guest room; for the evening was sharp, in spite of the sunniness of the day. Lady Adelina's attendants had disposed things as well as they could for the comfort of their mistress, who, nevertheless, wished herself back in her London home, as doubtless her waiting-women did also.

'My lady,' said one of them, as she drew a seat to the fire for Adelina 'there's not a person in the house who understands a word that is said to them. I do not know how your ladyship will ever live in this wretched country.'

'Well, never mind,' replied her mistress, 'it is not for long. I wish to speak to the hostess, to try and make her understand that I need her.'

The maid obeyed, and in a few minutes returned in company with the inkeeper's wife, a clean cheerful-looking woman, who, with much courtesy, hoped 'Madame found herself comfortable.' Lady Adelina, when a young girl, had acquired some knowledge of French, but having passed many years without speaking it, she now found much difficulty in making herself understood; however, owing to her own exertions, and the willingness of the landlady to try and discover her meaning, she contrived to make the latter aware that she wished to ascertain whether an English gentleman and his son resided in the neighborhood. The good woman was quite delighted to find out what the lady really wanted; and now told her with great volubility that an Englishman and his son had stopped at the inn about three years ago, and that they had taken an old chateau in the country. She had often seen them since, she said, at the church of Saint Ouen, and their servant used to visit the inn when he came to town for provisions; but the young gentleman had entered the army, and his father had left the chateau about a year ago. All this was pronounced with such rapidity that Lady Adelina comprehended but little of it; and it was not until she had asked many questions, and had heard the whole account slowly repeated, that she understood the truth of the case—Sir Reginald was no longer at Rouen. Had her journey, then been in vain—her sacrifices useless? And must her husband's desires remain unfulfilled? Must she return to England without having obtained for him the pardon which he solicited from his brother, and without restoring to the latter the child of whom he had been so long deprived? Such were the thoughts that traversed Lady Adelina's mind. Those around, although they had not understood the conversation, saw by her look of despair that she had heard some unwelcome news.

'What is it, my lady?' murmured Catherine, who had stood by, anxiously awaiting the result of the inquiries.

She was soon made acquainted with the facts we have stated; but while she fully shared the poor lady's disappointment and grief, her hopeful nature made her trust that their mission might still prove successful, and she tried to inspire Adelina with a like confidence. 'Perhaps Sir Reginald,' she urged, 'has not removed to any great distance, and some one in the town must surely know where he has gone.'

Lady Adelina confessed there was probability in this last observation, and therefore prayed the mistress of the inn to ascertain, if possible, where the English gentleman now resided; which she readily promised to do.

It was settled that our travelers should remain a few days at Rouen, both for the purpose of resting themselves and to allow time for the necessary inquiries to be made concerning Sir Reginald's place of residence. Those days were happy ones for Catherine. Each morning she and Barbara might be seen kneeling in the vast Cathedral, and assisting at the Holy Sacrifice, with the eager devotion of those who have long been deprived of so great a happiness.

Although Lady Adelina had appointed one of the two maids who traveled with them to wait on her niece, Catherine could not bear to relinquish her post, nor would Barbara have willingly exchanged the devoted care of her young guardian for the formal services of a maid; so the former continued her affectionate watchfulness over Lady Margaret's daughter. She also found scope to exercise her charity in consoling and encouraging Adelina; for the poor lady was in painful uncertainty concerning her husband, and regretted her lengthened absence from England, and more than once during the six days she spent at Rouen she had almost determined to return to London without prosecuting inquiries for Sir Reginald, which appeared fruitless; and in these moments of despair Catherine was like an angel of hope at her side.

On the seventh day after their arrival, their perseverance received an unexpected reward. The weather had become intensely cold, and the flakes of snow, which for upwards of an hour had been falling at intervals from the gray and threatening sky, betokened an early and a severe winter. Lady Adelina sat shivering by the fire; her little niece stood at the window watching the peasants who hurried by heedless of the inclement weather; their wooden shoes ringing loudly on the hard ground attracted the wondering attention of the English child.

A noise in the courtyard, the high-pitched tones of the landlady, and the louder but deeper voice of a man, made Barbara turn from the window and look towards the door. In another moment it was thrown violently open; a sweep of cold air blew into the room, the entrance of which was immediately on the court.

'O, how cold it is!' exclaimed Adelina. 'Pray shut the door.'

A man wrapt in a large cloak, from which he shook the snow-flakes as he crossed the room, advanced with rapid strides towards the fireplace, the landlady following close behind.

'Here,' she cried in an excited voice, 'here is all madame wants; he will tell you all; he is monsieur's servant.'

'Sure, Mistress Catherine, is that yourself?' exclaimed the new-comer; and then, seeing the astonishment which his sudden appearance caused Adelina, he added, in a more subdued tone, 'I beg your ladyship's pardon, but it is searching the country through for Catherine Tresize and the master's little daughter I've been these six months past, and there they are, glory be to God! This is a happy day, and I not expecting it at all, but coming home quite downcast.'

While the good man stopped to take breath after this speech, Catherine explained to Lady Adelina, who had not yet recovered from the bewilderment into which this unexpected arrival had thrown her, that the person before them was a servant of Sir Reginald, whom she had frequently seen at the Manor-house. 'And Larry O'Toole,' she added, 'will be able to tell us where his master now resides.'

'That I can,' replied Larry. 'Ah, the Lady Barbara does not remember me, nor how I used to carry her in my arms when the mistress—may peace be with her soul!—went to the farmhouse, as she was wont to do.'

No; Barbara neither remembered the faithful servant nor the days to which he alluded; indeed, all reminiscences of her life previous to her removal from the Manor seemed completely obliterated from the child's memory.

'So you are Sir Reginald's servant,' said Lady Adelina, addressing Larry. 'This is a good fortune for which I was wholly unprepared. I am his sister-in-law, and have undertaken this journey to restore to him his long-lost daughter. Pray tell us how you chance to be here. Is your master coming?'

'No, my lady, not he; but after he came to this country, he and Master Austin settled in a queer sort of a house just outside the town, and Sir Reginald, who spoke the French tongue elegantly, went to see the priest who lives at the great church yonder; and very kind his reverence was, and so was a French gentleman who lives in what them calls a "chateau." Well, my lady, Master Austin was much with the family of the "chateau," till, sure, he learnt to speak like a native; and he and Sir Reginald would have been happy enough if the death of the mistress and the loss of Lady Barbara had not oftentimes made them sad. About a year ago the son of the French gentleman was going off to the army, and Master Austin said he would like to go also; the end of it was that they both went together to serve the French King against somebody else.'

'Well, and where is Sir Reginald?' inquired Adelina.

'That's the very thing I was after telling your ladyship. The poor gentleman felt terribly lonesome entirely when the young master was gone, so he thought to move elsewhere; It's to the town of Evreux we went, and Sir Reginald is there still. One day after our arriving, "Larry," says he to me, "I am thinking of going to England; I have now been absent four years; surely I am forgotten, and could safely pass through the country, and make an effort myself to find my little daughter." "No," says I, "begging your honor's pardon, it is not safe for you to go; but, with your leave, I will go, and try to discover the child, and bring her to you." Well, my lady, the end of it was that the master let me start.

'I have been to the Land's End, and seen the old Manor all in ruins; a sad sight it was, sure! Then to Exeter I went, and learnt that good Mother Bridget—the Lord have mercy on her soul!—had died of the plague, and that you, Mistress Catherine, had gone to London town; so back went I and searched the city; but 'tis very large entirely, as yourself knows, and mighty hard for a poor creature to find any one in it, though there is a power of people in the streets. Many is the weary day I've spent since I left his honor; but, sure, what matters past storms when a man is sailing into harbor?'

CHAPTER XXIII.

Snow—snow lying deep on the roads; snow crowning every hill and house-top, and clinging to every tree, and worse than all, blinding snow-flakes drifting rapidly along; such was the cheerless scene through which our travelers were passing a few days after the unexpected arrival of Larry O'Toole at Rouen. The lumbering wagon which conveyed them had toiled through the snow for upwards of two hours, since they had left the last village where the party had stopped to change horses. Urged by the postillions the tired animals struggled slowly on; more than once the clumsy vehicle threatened to fall over, its wheels sinking in the deep ruts, over which the snow had cast a treacherous covering, and on such occasions much time was lost, while considerable efforts were needed to extricate them.

'It's buried alive in the snow we will be!' muttered Larry, as he helped to raise one of the horses which had slipped. The Irishman's fears seemed likely enough to be realized; for at that moment a desperate plunge made by the frightened horse threw the wagon on its side. The screams of the women inside, the shouts of the postillions, the struggles of the horses, added to the confusion and alarm. One of the men had received some slight injury on being thrown to the ground. The travelers were extricated with much difficulty from their perilous situation, and happily they were more frightened than hurt.

After fruitless efforts to right the carriage, one of the postillions made Larry understand that he would try to find his way to the next town, and there obtain assistance.

Unharnessing one of the horses, he mounted and rode away. Gloomy indeed was the situation of Lady Adelina and her party. The servants had succeeded in dragging out some of the cloaks and furs belonging to the travelers: wrapped in these they walked up and down, afraid to rest lest the cold should benumb their limbs and the feeling of rowsiness which oppressed them be changed into the sleep of death.

It was becoming darker every moment, and still no one came to their help. Perhaps the postillion had lost his way; perhaps there was no town or village near where he could demand aid; and so the unfortunate travelers would be obliged to spend the night where they were, should they persist in awaiting his return. Possessed by these fears, Larry proposed that they should endeavor to push their way on. Having thrown cloaks over the horses as a substitute for saddles, Lady Adelina mounted; Catherine and Barbara shared the same horse; the maids rode in turn the remaining one. Larry, leading the foremost horse, waded through the deep snow, now encouraging with his voice the tired steeds, now trying to allay the fears of his companions. 'Sure, it is not far we will have to go now: we must come to a village soon,' he would say; and when Lady Adelina, after straining her eyes in every direction, replied that she could describe nothing but snow on all sides, he would still bid her hope.

'It's so dark, that sure it's in a cottage we might be before your ladyship could see it at all.'

Suddenly Larry stopped and the horses stopped, for in front of them rose a mountain of drifted snow, which completely blocked the road, and forbade farther progress. All hope of advancing was gone, and there seemed no alternative but death from cold and want. As well as they could, they cleared a space in the snow; when Lady Adelina, despite the recommendations and entreaties of her companions, laid herself upon the ground, declaring that she was too fatigued to stand or walk any longer. Soon, indeed, her fellow-travelers, losing all hope of escape, followed her example, and yielded too to the drowsiness which cold and weakness had produced.

Barbara was beside her faithful guardian, who had wrapt her own cloak around the child. 'Let us pray,' said Catherine to her companions. At such a moment, when human aid seemed impossible, it needed no persuasion to turn the hearts of the forlorn travelers towards Him who alone could succor them, and from that dreary waste, where they were awaiting the cold embraces of death, rose the silent incense of prayer. The numbness which dulled the senses took from them the feeling of fear which their awful situation would otherwise have created. The snow-flakes continued to fall with bewildering quickness.

Catherine felt oppressed by sleep; her weary eyelids closed of themselves, and in vain she strove to rouse herself; once or twice she pressed Barbara close to her, then drew the cloak more tightly round the poor little thing, and her look still resting on the pale face of the child, 'Heavenly father, have pity on us!' she murmured, when all recollection of the past, all knowledge of the present, all thoughts of the future, vanished.

When she again opened her eyes, there was no snow wrapping her frozen limbs, and fatiguing her tired sight by its dazzling whiteness. No, she was now surrounded by dim panelled walls, and she found herself lying in a bed; but she was too weakened even to feel astonished at the change; her limbs ached and her thoughts were confused. Still one thing she did recollect, which was, that when she had fallen asleep Barbara was by her side; and she looked anxiously round for her little companion. At that moment a person advanced across the room; her dress was peculiar, such as Catherine had never seen before; as she approached the bed of the sufferer the latter remarked the beautiful expression of her countenance. When she spoke her voice was grave and sweet; but the young girl could not understand what she said; so making a great effort she faintly ejaculated the name of the cherished child—Barbara.

The stranger guessed her meaning, and smiling, pointed to a bed, where Catherine could distinguish the golden hair of Lady Margaret's daughter. The charitable person now gave her some warm drink, and making signs that she was to lie still, retired to another part of the room.

The sound of footsteps along a stone corridor were distinctly audible for a few minutes, and then a soft and solemn chant floated round the bed of the young girl and lulled her to rest. So the day passed, partly in sleep, partly in a state of quiet consciousness, during which she saw women, all wearing the same dress, moving to and fro. Occasionally she heard the same chanting, which seemed to her like the singing of angelic choirs. When night came she fell into a deep slumber, and awoke the following morning feeling quite refreshed. Barbara was standing by her bed. She embraced the child with joy.

'O, that dreadful snow!' she exclaimed; 'tis wet, my little sister, that we did not die in it! Thank God you seem quite recovered! How are the others?'

'They are all nearly well,' replied Barbara. 'And it was because you took off your cloak to give it to me that your sufferings were the greatest. But, O sister, this is such a beautiful place! I have been all over the house with one of the ladies who wear that curious dress. I went with her to the chapel, and they were singing so sweetly.'

'It must be a convent, like those I read about in the old life of St. Bega,' said Catherine thoughtfully.

The young girl was not wrong in her surmise. When, guided by the postillion, some charitable townspeople had discovered the unfortunate travelers, and brought them to Evreux, they could think of no better place to lodge them than in the Convent of St. Michael, whose door was never closed against the destitute and the homeless. There they received every attention and care which Christian charity could suggest.

On the second morning after their arrival, Larry, who, being known in the town, had been conveyed to Sir Reginald's, presented himself at the convent grill, and asked to be allowed to speak to the travelers. Lady Adelina went to see, and heard that Sir Reginald was acquainted with their arrival; that he had prepared for their reception at his chateau, and anxiously awaited their coming.

'His honor would have been here himself, but he thought it better to welcome ye at his own house. It is only a step; it is not snowing now, so perhaps ye will come.'

They all agreed to start; and having thanked the hospitable nuns, they set forth. The term of their journey was nigh. Adelina had frequently and earnestly wished to reach it, and yet now that so short a distance separated her from the much-desired goal, she would willingly have deferred approaching it. The thought of meeting her husband's brother brought to her mind many painful recollections; she had never heard him spoken of but with a bitterness which had little inclined her to form a favorable opinion of him. And although she had since blamed Sir Cuthbert's want of feeling for him in his misfortunes, she figured to herself that Sir Reginald was one of those stern individuals who rigidly accomplish what they consider to be their duty, but are devoid of the kind and amiable sentiments which render virtue pleasing and thus, she persuaded herself, was the cause of his brother's dislike to him. Thoughts of a different character occupied Catherine; thoughts which made her also serious. Her hopes and wishes were about to be realized in the return of Lady Margaret's daughter to her parent, and she could fancy that the loving mother looked down from heaven with pleasure to witness her little one restored to its father, and yet, despite her efforts to dispel the feeling, a sadness crept over her at the thought of parting with that child, whom during so long a time she had regarded as her own sister.

After about a quarter of an hour's walk through the snow, the party reached one of those picturesque old chateaux, with high-pitched roof and mansard windows, often to be met with still in the country parts of France. It was nestled amidst tall shrubs and evergreens; the place looked much neglected, and the condition of the house showed that it had long been unoccupied. The grounds were extensive; here and there rose clumps of trees and bushy underwood, while considerable space was devoted to orchards of apple-trees, from which the famed cider was made, in the distance a row of tall poplars marked the course of a river. Such was the spot where Sir Reginald had fixed his abode.

Lady Adelina need not have drawn back trembling as the hall door opened; for no sooner had the father seen his long-lost child than, without noticing the rest of the party, he took her in his arms and carried her to the drawing-room. Her aunt and Catherine followed; the latter retired into one of the deep recesses of the windows, glad to remain unnoticed while she quietly witnessed the joy of Sir Reginald. As to Barbara, her face and manner bore the impress of that sweet gravity which at all times characterized them—she readily replied to the questions of her father, but confessed that she did not recollect him, or her deceased mother, except by what Catherine and Bridget O'Reilly had told her of them.

'Pardon me,' said Sir Reginald, turning to Adelina, 'if the happiness which I experience at seeing my daughter has made me for a moment forget your presence. From what my servant told me, I believe I have the pleasure of speaking to my brother Cuthbert's wife.'

'Yes,' replied Adelina timidly; 'and I come,' she added with some hesitation, 'I come on his part, first to bring your little daughter, and then to implore your forgiveness for him—'

'O, do not speak of forgiveness,' replied Sir Reginald. 'I have always had for Cuthbert the affection of a brother; and I shall only be too happy to be able to give vent to my feelings with regard to him. Why has he not himself come, that I might embrace him at once? That would complete the joy of this happy day.'

Tears rolled down Adelina's cheeks; she no longer felt any dread of her brother-in-law, but the kindness of his manner touched her deeply. She briefly acquainted Sir Reginald with Cuthbert's position, and as she finished speaking handed him the letter which he had written from the Tower, and which had determined her coming to France with Barbara.

'Poor brother, poor brother!' repeated Sir Reginald, who appeared much affected. 'Would that I could relieve him! You had great courage,' he added, addressing Adelina, 'in undertaking so long a journey at this season of the year. May God reward your charity in risking so much to restore my little one to me!'

'He was anxious that I should express to you his sorrow for the past,' replied the lady. 'Do, I pray of you, say that you pardon him; he will be better pleased to learn, when I return, that I have exactly fulfilled his wishes.'

'Well, then, to satisfy you and him, know that I do pardon him from my heart, whatever grief he has caused me, but ill-will I have never borne him. So much for the past; now let us forget it, and look only to a bright future, when our family circle, which has been for a time divided shall, I hope be united; and if,' he added in a graver tone—'if it be not granted us in this world, I trust it may be in the next.'

Adelina was too much affected to make any reply, but her mind felt easier now that the object of her journey was accomplished. Barbara, while her father was speaking, had left the seat where he had placed her by his side, and going to the window, where Catherine was standing, took her by the hand and led her to Sir Reginald.

'Father,' she said gravely, 'this is Catherine.'

With the simplicity of childhood she judged that the name of her devoted friend needed no comment, and that others must know as she did that the word 'Catherine' expressed all that was dearest to her in the world. Her father smiled. It is more than probable that he had forgotten the child who used to come to the Manor-house to work for Lady Margaret, or, at least, he would have failed to recognize her in the young girl who now stood before him; but Larry had already told him that Widow O'Reilly and Catherine Tresize had taken charge of his daughter, and that since the death of the good dame, it was the latter on whom the sole care of the child had devolved. He therefore thanked her in words of heartfelt gratitude for her devotedness to Barbara, whom he hoped she would never leave.

'I have, indeed, done nothing to merit such thanks,' urged the young girl, who felt both surprised and confused at the praise bestowed on what she deemed but a very simple action.

Lady Adelina, her mission accomplished, was now desirous to return as speedily as possible to England; but the severity of the weather, and the danger which she had already incurred on the journey from Rouen, made her more willing than she would otherwise have been to agree to Sir Reginald's proposal, that she should remain where she was until the snows had melted. A sad trial to her patience, however, was this forced absence from London, where so many interests called her.

One afternoon Sir Reginald asked Catherine to accompany his daughter to the convent where they had received so much hospitality.

The child had been greatly delighted with the kindness of the nuns and the beauty of their chapel, and the quaintness of the house, so different from anything she had seen in England, had interested her; she had therefore begged her father to allow her to go and see them again, to which he readily consented. The establishment was large, as it possessed, besides an orphanage and a hospital, a school for the education of young ladies. With these Barbara was permitted to amuse herself, while Catherine accompanied one of the nuns to visit the sick. The good religious soon remarked the willingness of the young foreigner to aid in their works of charity and join in their devotions; and although, owing to her ignorance of the French language, they could not exchange many words, they nevertheless conceived a great regard for her, and made her and Barbara understand that they were welcome to visit them again when they pleased, a permission of which they readily availed themselves. The more Catherine saw of the holy and peaceful life of the nuns, the more she felt drawn towards it, but she knew not to whom to disclose her wishes. To speak to the religious, whose kind faces inspired her with confidence, was impossible until she should have gained further knowledge of the language. Lady Adelina could not, of course, give any advice on this important matter, and then, again, Barbara would be so lonely without her, and the inmates of 'the chateau' were so kind that she felt loth to say that she would leave them. Yet the life she was leading did not suit her. Sir Reginald, full of gratitude for the services she had rendered Barbara, wished that she should be treated in the same manner as his daughter; she had not, therefore, opportunity for most of those active employments to which she had hitherto been accustomed. There were no poor at hand whom she could relieve, no children whom she could instruct. There was Barbara, indeed, and to her education she devoted most of her time. But here again arose another difficulty. She feared lest the object of her care might not receive the varied instruction nor acquire the different accomplishments usually taught to those in her rank of life; and her straightforward conscientious nature made her anxious that Sir Reginald, who trusted his daughter so entirely to her, should not be under the mistake of imagining her possessed of a more extensive fund of information than was really the case. She expressed her fears on this subject to Lady Adelina, who, while admiring the delicacy of her feelings, reassured her by saying,

'My niece is very young, and for some time at least will need no other instruction than that which you can impart; and when she is older her father can, if he wishes, have her taught those accomplishments of which you are ignorant.'

Days passed on, the frost continued with unabated severity, and the snow still lay deep on hill and valley.

Adelina watched it at first with impatience, then with a settled sadness which those around her vainly sought to dispel. Sir Reginald shared her anxiety for his brother. One day, as he sat alone in the drawing-room, musing on the strange events which had led to the recovery of his lost child, the door was suddenly thrown open by Larry, who gave admittance to an old gentleman of diminutive stature, erect, neat in his attire, and with a face closely resembling a rosy apple on which a light sprinkling of snow had rested. The little visitor stepped in with the air of one who feels quite at his ease.

'I fear I disturb you,' he said politely. 'Now pray do not stir; with your leave I will take a seat by the fire. This is cold weather for a man of seventy-two to be traveling, eh?'

'Yes, indeed,' replied Sir Reginald, 'and nothing but important business could, I feel sure, have made one of your time of life undertake a journey at this inclement season. May I ask to whom I have the honor of addressing myself?'

'Mr. Cyril Algernon—that is my name. As to important business, you are right, as far as this journey is concerned; but I have frequently undertaken longer voyages in circumstances more trying for mere pleasure. I come now, sir, to see my daughter Adelina de Courcy who is, I believe, here.'

'Yes, my sister in law of that name is here. I will warn her of your arrival.'

As Sir Reginald said these words the door opened, and Adelina, accompanied by Catherine and Barbara, entered the apartment. She stopped, and uttered an exclamation of surprise on beholding one whom she had fancied many hundred miles away. The little old gentleman, who seemed as cool and self-possessed as his daughter was timid and sensitive, quietly begged her not to be alarmed.

'Restrain your tears, my dear Adelina, I pray of you; surely you cannot be grieved to see me?'

'Far from it, father—but I have had many sorrows since we last met; and then your arrival is so unexpected, it has quite taken me by surprise. I shall recover myself in a moment,' she said, sitting down.

'That is right, murmured Mr. Algernon half to himself; 'but it were better still not to lose oneself. However, we are not all of one nature.' And Adelina did not inherit her father's, that is certain.

'Father,' resumed the lady, when the first emotion caused by the sudden visit of her parent had a little subsided, 'father, I should have gone to you, and acquainted you with my misfortunes and my plans, ere I left London, but you were as usual, on your travels.'

'I know, I know; I have heard all concerning you and Cuthbert, and I could not have given you better advice than to do that which you have done, although I marvel how you ever found courage to undertake this long journey.'

'But, father,' said Adelina with the voice and manner of one who longs, and yet fears, to know the truth, 'may I ask the motive of your visit? Do you bring news of my husband?'

There ensued a moment of painful silence, each looking anxiously at Mr. Algernon, eager to hear his answer; but none felt the terror of that moment of suspense so keenly as did Adelina. And she, too, could better read in the countenance of her father the sentiments which agitated his mind; she caught the uneasy look of his quick eye; she marked the expression of those firmly closed lips, which seemed unwilling to reveal the secret, of which he was the bearer. Had a violent and bloody death terminated the career of Cuthbert de Courcy? The thought was too fearful for his young wife to support; her cheek grew pale and her head sought rest against the high back of the chair on which she was seated.

'My poor child,' said her father, 'you are too much excited and moved by my sudden visit for me to converse with you now. To you, sir,' he added, addressing Sir Reginald, 'I should like to speak in private.'

The two gentlemen rose, and left the room.

In about half an hour they returned; both looked grave and concerned; however, Adelina had become more composed. Catherine was standing by her, doing her best to strengthen and console her, and to prepare the fainting heart of the poor lady for the dreadful trial which both foresaw, but to which neither dared allude.

'My lady, shall I retire?' inquired Catherine, who feared that her presence might be considered intrusive.

'No, no; I like thee near me,' was the reply.

'Adelina, my dear daughter,' began the old gentleman, in a voice which, in spite of his utmost efforts to appear calm, betrayed his emotion, 'we must be prepared to support every misfortune which befalls us; this world is full of them, but we must meet them with fortitude—'

'Alas!' interrupted Adelina, 'you well know that I never could endure either pain or grief; it is useless to speak of fortitude to one who never possessed any.'

'O, my lady,' whispered Catherine with that sweet persuasiveness of manner which had first won Adelina's confidence when she had seen her at Master Alwin's shop, 'O, my lady, God can aid us to support all afflictions; He will give you strength.'

'His holy will be done!' murmured the poor lady, and again she turned her anxious looks towards her father, who continued, 'I know what your feelings and your grief must have been during the time which has elapsed since my Lord Essex's rebellion. They have been days of intense anxiety and much weariness, doubtless, to you and to Cuthbert also, and some spirits there are who can ill brook misfortune. Some there are whose heart can break, but will not bend; your husband was one of those characters.'

'Was!' exclaimed Adelina; 'was! Then he is no more!'

In spite of her father's precautions, that one word had at once revealed to her the calamity which he sought to communicate by degrees. She had indeed from the moment of his arrival feared that he was the bearer of evil tidings, she had thought that her husband was condemned; but so long as Cuthbert lived, the hope of obtaining his pardon, or at least of seeing him once again, sustained her. Now that she learnt that he existed no more, her cup of sorrow was filled, and its bitterness overwhelmed her. She fell back in her chair fainting.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE first months of her widowhood were passed by Adelina in a grief so intense, and so complete a prostration of body and mind, as to render her almost insensible to all external objects. She seldom quitted her room, and the only member of the household in whose company she took pleasure was Catherine; when her heart was saddest, and she could scarcely bear the sound of voices round her, she would, nevertheless, listen gladly to the young girl, who spoke to her of the Passion of our Lord, or of the sorrows of His holy Mother. Catherine endeavored to draw this afflicted soul towards religion, and not without success, for Adelina lent a willing ear to the truths she brought to her notice; but when her eager friend began to urge that she should embrace a Faith which, by her own confession, alone helped to console her, her timid and vacillating character made her dread coming to a decision and that not only because she thought it would displease her father, a staunch Protestant, but, in a great measure also, because she was naturally averse to anything which cost exertion, whether of mind or body.

Since the painful scene with which our last chapter closed, Adelina had learnt from her father the particulars of her husband's death; they were as follows: Mr. Algernon, on returning from one of those lengthened tours on the Continent in which he loved to indulge, and which rendered him a subject of wonderment in an age when traveling was neither so easy nor so general as it has since become, had heard of the rebellion of Lord Essex, in which Cuthbert was so deeply compromised. The unfortunate nobleman had already suffered the penalty of his daring attempt, and Mr. Algernon naturally feared for the safety of his son-in-law. With some difficulty he obtained permission to visit him, when he found him dangerously ill, and, indeed, it was plain that his recovery was beyond hope.

Cuthbert was quite resigned to die; he expressed great remorse for having abandoned the Catholic Faith, to which he had been reconciled by his fellow prisoner, Father Ralph. This good priest had occupied a cell adjoining Cuthbert's, and having learnt from his gaoler the name of his neighbor, and aware that he was Sir Reginald's brother, he had pleaded so earnestly to be allowed to see him, that the man at length granted his request. In one of the interviews that followed this permission Cuthbert de Courcy heard the history of his brother's escape to France, and became acquainted with the place of abode of his little niece, which intelligence he communicated to Adelina, with what result the reader is already aware.

The hardship and privations which he endured in the Tower, with anxiety and melancholy which oppressed him, combined to shorten his life; and a few months after his arrest Mr. Algernon and Father Ralph were permitted to assist at his death-bed. His last moments were calm; and Adelina, when she heard that he had died on the day that followed her arrival at the chateau, could not but attribute the holy peace enjoyed by the departing soul to the pardon which she had solicited, in his name, from his brother, and to the reparation she had made in restoring Barbara to her father. 'My husband said it would bring a blessing on his soul,' she remarked to Catherine; and the feeling of having contributed to make his end happy was a relief to her sorrows, and took away the pang of the thought of her not being present at his death-bed.

The soul of Sir Reginald's brother was the last that Father Ralph won for his Heavenly Master, for shortly after, this faithful servant was himself called to receive the reward of his labors. Having been found guilty of saying Mass and reconciling persons to the Catholic Faith, he was sentenced and died, and his name was added to the long list of martyrs who shed their blood for religion during the reign of Elizabeth.

Let us now return to Adelina, who on one of the brightest of spring days sat sorrowfully in her room; Catherine was with her. Both had kept silence for some time; suddenly the young girl let the work she was doing rest on her knees, and raised her head to listen. A bird had just lighted on the branch of a tree near the open window, and was pouring forth his joyous lay; Catherine watched the little songster and lent a willing ear to his sweet strains, until by an unguarded movement she put him to flight. She then approached the window to see where the bird had gone, and stopped to gaze on the landscape which the return of spring had rendered so lovely.

'O, my lady!' she exclaimed, turning towards Adelina, 'it is so beautiful out; would it not cheer you to descend to the garden? I see Barbara there, at her old employment of training her favorite periwinkles, as when we lived with poor Mother Bridget.'

'Yes, child, I will go,' answered the lady, rising slowly from her chair and following the other.

For some time they walked to and fro in the alley of lime-trees near the house, and then seated themselves in an arbor at the end, which was just coming into leaf. Here they were joined by Sir Reginald and Mr. Algernon.

'Well, Adelina, I am glad to see you out; and since we are all together, I should like to speak of our future plans. Your health is better now; the weather is all that can be desired for traveling; we have long trespassed on Sir Reginald's generous hospitality. I therefore propose that we should start next week for London; indeed, my own affairs, and the settlement of yours, make it incumbent on us to reach home as speedily as possible. You will be ready, will you not, Adelina?'

'Yes, father, I shall be ready whenever it pleases you to start. And you, Catherine,' she added, turning towards her: 'you remember that ere we left England it was agreed that if you wished you were to return with me. Not only shall I be happy to take you, as I promised to do, but shall pray you to live entirely with me. You have so consoled me in my recent afflictions, that I cannot bear the thought of losing you; but I know how attached you are to my niece, so I can scarcely hope you will consent to leave her. And yet,' added the lady sorrowfully, 'she is young and happy, and stands less in need of a friend than I do.'

'Catherine has already promised to stop with Barbara,' said Sir Reginald.

The young girl remained silent; she looked serious and somewhat troubled, leaving those around her in doubt whether she wished or not to accept Lady Adelina's proposition. Barbara, who had stood by smiling while her aunt was speaking, feeling quite sure that her dear friend would not quit her, now looked anxiously at her.

'Catherine,' said Sir Reginald kindly, 'you know that my desire is that you should remain with my daughter; but if you think such an arrangement would not contribute to your happiness, or if the proposal of my sister-in-law appears more pleasing to you, do not hesitate to tell us so. Much as I should regret your loss on Barbara's account, I would not for any consideration press you remain, if doing so should tend to make you unhappy; that would be ill rewarding your devotedness towards Barbara. Speak, therefore, without fear.'

'Sir,' replied Catherine, encouraged by the kind manner of Sir Reginald, 'it seems ungrateful of me to wish to leave you all, who have been so good to me and it does pain me to part from Barbara, nor would any worldly consideration unmake me do so; but,' she added, and there was something more than usually grave and earnest in her tone, 'but there are calls to which the soul cannot with safety turn a deaf ear. It has long seemed to me that God wished me to embrace a life entirely consecrated to His service and devoted to works of charity. I did not know how I could accomplish this until I saw the life led by the nuns at the convent yonder; and even then, I hesitated, having no one whom I could consult. At last I have spoken to the priest there, and he having assured me that I had a vocation for a religious life, I resolved to make known to you my desire to enter the Convent of St. Michel.'

Scarcely had she finished these words when the listeners gave vent to their astonishment in various exclamations.

'O Kate, you will not leave me!' cried Barbara.

'It would be better to come with me than to shut yourself up in a convent,' remarked Adelina.

'Very strange idea, certainly,' said Mr. Algernon half to himself.

Sir Reginald remained silent for a moment; and then, turning to his little daughter, who with joined hands was praying of him to tell Catherine that she must not go away, he said: 'Catherine has chosen the better part, and it shall not be taken from her.'

'O, thank you, sir,' murmured the young girl.

The following days were spent by the inmates of the chateau in preparations for two departures; that of Adelina and her father to England, and that which was to place an eternal separation between Catherine and the world. Adelina looked forward to her future lot with much less confidence of being happy than did her young friend, who seemed perfectly satisfied with the path she had chosen. Before Adelina the prospect was less inviting. She was about to bid farewell, perhaps for ever, to kind and sympathizing friends; to leave a spot to which she had, during her short stay, become attached; even the sorrows which she had there suffered had endeared to her the old chateau and its precincts. And what awaited her on her return to her native land? A home? Alas, she was now alone, and a widow; and the vast apartments of her London mansion would seem the more desolate when Cuthbert was there no longer. And friends? Alas, who among those whom she had called by that deceiving name would value the society of the fallen rebel's wife? or how, with her sorrow-stricken countenance, could she even show herself in the gay circles in which she had formerly shone? These thoughts pressed sadly on her, and she mentioned them to Catherine, who urged her once more, and with still greater earnestness than before, as the days which they were to spend together were nearly at a close, to seek comfort not in creatures, but in God.

'You are right,' replied the lady sadly; 'but I feel that when you are no more with me, to encourage me, I shall fall into despair.'

'Would you accept, my lady,' said Catherine, 'an old book which my mother left me? It will console you, I am sure.' Without waiting for an answer, she left the room, and soon returned with a handsomely-bound old volume of the Following of Christ, and placed it in Lady Adelina's hands.

'My name is in it, but you can scratch it out,' she said.

'My dear child, I will not; but I shall write mine under it, with the date and place when you gave it to me. For your sake it will always be precious to me.'

'And you will read it?' said Catherine.

Lady Adelina smiled at the earnestness of her friend, and promised to do as she desired.

The departure of Catherine caused Sir Reginald some perplexity concerning Barbara. He had the welfare of his little daughter too much at heart to wish to see her grow up in idleness and ignorance; and feeling unequal to the task of educating her himself, he at last resolved to deprive himself of the pleasure, which under these circumstances would have been a selfish one, of having her at home, and determined to place her under the charge of the kind and enlightened religious into whose ranks Catherine was about to be received. Barbara was delighted at the prospect of being near her friend; and a few days after both entered the Convent of St. Michel, the one as a scholar, the other as a novice.

CONCLUSION.

YEARS glided by so quietly, so calmly for the inmates of the Convent of St. Michel, that the footfall of Time was scarcely audible to them. That relentless measurer of human existence seemed to pass with softer tread through the silent cloisters than among the scenes of ceaseless agitation and constant turmoil of the outer world. Not that the hours hung heavily on the hands of the religious; on the contrary, they were so well filled, each one brought its appointed duty with such regularity, that their lives lacked those sudden transformations, those unforeseen events those crushing sorrows, and those dazzling moments of success which form marked epochs in the existence of those less-favored individuals whose lot is cast on the wild ocean of the world; for them, Time appears to redouble his speed, and to take a cruel pleasure in snatching from them the few moments of happiness they possess.

But let us return to the convent of St. Michel. The novice, Catherine Tresize, is now 'Sœur Marie,' and Barbara had passed from childhood to youth.

At seventeen Lady Margaret's daughter displayed in all her person the same candor and innocence, the same gentle gravity which had marked her earlier years. Although not gifted with rare talents, she possessed a serious mind and a clear judgment. Her whole appearance and manner denoted a happy but thoughtful nature, endowed with deep but not passionate feelings.

She had a taste for painting, and received instruction in that art from one of the nuns. Among Barbara's most successful attempts was a portrait of her, loved friend Catherine, in which she faithfully rendered the intelligent and expressive eyes, the noble forehead, and the heavenly smile of the young nun. That picture she took with her when she left the convent to return to her father's house, to be the comfort of his declining years; and when a fresh sphere opened itself to her virtues in the duties of a wife and a mother, the likeness of the faithful guardian of her childhood occupied an honored place in her new home. Her children, the eldest of whom bore the name of Catherine, loved to gaze on the sweet face of their mother's friend, whom they frequently visited at the convent. Some years later another generation of little ones crowded eagerly around 'grandmother,' to listen with never failing interest to the tales of her childhood: they learnt how the good Catherine, who had now passed to a better life and whose portrait hung over the old chimney round which they were wont to gather, had taken Madame de Reant (once Barbara de Courcy) from the Cornish Manor, when the cruel men had seized her father and the priest; how Catherine had promised Lady Margaret to care for and love the poor forlorn child; and how nobly she had fulfilled that promise.

Generation after generation passed away; the descendants of Sir Reginald's daughter had long ceased to speak the language of Barbara and Catherine; they were French by name and race, and French in heart and feelings; but one thing concerning their English ancestor they had not forgotten; namely, the history of the young girl who had watched over her childhood. And thus the picture and the tradition were preserved for well-nigh two hundred years, until the once numerous family of the De Reants was represented by only one individual, who, at the dawn of the French revolution, embraced the sacerdotal career, and some years later was forced to fly from the relentless fury of those desperate men who, in the name of liberty, exercised so fearful a sway over the lives and properties of all whom their virtue or their rank marked out as fit objects of vengeance.

L'Abbe de Reant sought refuge in London, where his presence soon became known to the Catholics, who hailed with joy the arrival of a priest at a time when there were so few in England.

Among the objects which the Abbe had brought with him, in his hasty flight, was the portrait of Catherine. It may seem strange that he thought it worth while transporting this rather cumbersome and not very valuable painting; but there it hung on the wall of his modest chamber, and, save an ancient crucifix, it was the only mural adornment the room possessed.

As Monsieur de Reant sat one afternoon reading his Breviary, he heard a knock at the door, and, his only servant being at the time absent, he proceeded to admit the visitor, who proved to be a Catholic gentleman with whom he had become intimately acquainted. He introduced the visitor with that dignity and urbanity of manner which characterises the French priest, the best chair in the room was placed at his disposal; he was politely assured of the pleasure which his presence afforded; and Mr. Algernon felt all his natural stiffness vanish beneath the genial warmth of his friend.

The seat which the new-comer occupied was opposite the oval frame which encircled the sweet countenance of the nun; the setting sun lit up her features. Time had softened the tints of the oil-color, and as Mr. Algernon gazed on the portrait he thought he had never seen a more lovely face; the eyes seemed fixed on him with a calm happy look, and the lips, on which played a smile so full of kindness and intelligence, appeared ready to speak.

'What a pleasing picture!' the Englishman at length exclaimed. 'Did you bring it with you from France?'

'Yes, sir,' replied the Abbe with a sigh, as his thoughts reverted to his native land. 'Yes, I could not consent to part with it; I owe so much to it.'

'O, to that nun, I suppose,' retorted his friend. 'Well, I fancied that picture was a much older production than is possible, if you knew the person it represents. I should have said it was painted a hundred years ago.'

'And you may say nearly two hundred years; that is about its date.'

Mr. Algernon was fairly puzzled, and, having nothing to answer, remained silent, with his eyes fixed on the picture. His friend hastened to satisfy the curiosity which he had awakened in the Englishman's mind.

'Sir,' he said, 'I count among my ancestors a countrywoman of yours; she it was who painted the picture—there, you will see her name in that corner.'

Mr. Algernon read with some difficulty the words, 'Barbara de Courcy, Evreux.'

The priest then continued the narrative of Catherine Tresize's life, such as it had been handed down in the De Reant family from father to son since the days of Louis the Thirteenth.

'Catherine Tresize—Barbara de Courcy,' repeated Mr. Algernon thoughtfully, when his friend had finished speaking. 'I think your good nun has done something for my family also, one of whom many generations back married a De Courcy; we have in our possession some old plate bearing their crest and the initials C. de C. But here is something which proved more valuable to us than the plate; and he drew from his pocket a very old volume of the Following of Christ. He opened it, and showed the Abbe the fly-leaf, on which was written in a large legible hand, 'Catherine Tresize,' and lower down in much smaller characters, 'Adelina de Courcy, Evreux, 1602.'

Mr. Algernon proceeded to give an elaborate account of the manner in which he himself was related to this Adelina, and through her to the De Courcys. 'You see, sir,' he added, 'that you and I are consequently distant connections.'

The good Abbe, although he confessed unable to follow the long genealogy traced by his friend, willingly agreed henceforward to look on him as a distant cousin. The latter continued:

'This Catherine Tresizo can be no other than the nun whose portrait is before us. Now the book she gave to my ancestor was the cause of my fathers conversion to the Catholic Faith, and perhaps also her prayers in heaven obtained for him the grace to profit by the words he read.'

'The deeds of the just live after them,' remarked the Abbe. 'And now I must explain what I meant when I said that I owed much to that picture. It used to hang in my father's chateau, near Evreux; above it, beside it, below it were portrayed, in various dresses, the bygone generations of the De Reants: there were fair ladies, once doubtless the admiration of the society in which they moved; there were courtiers of the days of the 'Grand Monarch,' clad in costly velvets; and grim warriors of a more remote date, who gazed sternly from their frames. Concerning all these there was little to be said; this one was famed for her beauty, that one for his wit; of many others nothing was known, save that they had lived and died, and borne the name of De Reant. But of this poor woman of obscure birth, who had come from a foreign country, the deeds had been recorded: over and over again did my mother tell me of that holy life always spent in pleasing God, and finally consecrated to him in the Convent of St. Michel, which still existed in Evreux when I quitted that town; how long revolutionary fury will let it stand I know not.

'Well, the thought that worldly grandeurs and frivolous pleasures pass, to be forgotten in this world by our posterity, and to be remembered in the next life, perhaps to the eternal shame of the soul who revelled in them, sank deeper each day into my heart, and at length made me resolve to dedicate my life to God in the priesthood. My parents wondered at me; with tears and entreaties they endeavored to turn me from the path I wished to follow; they bade me consider that I was the last of a noble family; that large revenues and an extensive domain would one day be mine: but the happy countenance of the humble nun was ever before me; like her I rejected the allurements of the world. Sir, had I done otherwise, what would now remain to me of them? It is true, the storm which has burst over my unhappy country has driven me into exile; but God is to be found everywhere, and none can deprive me of my sacred character.

'It was by that picture that God was pleased to foster in my soul the first germs of a vocation; that is the reason why I could not bear to part with it. And you see,' added Monsieur de Reant, smiling, 'it has been the means of my finding a relationship where I little suspected one; and since I have no near connections, the picture of the mutual benefactress of our families shall be yours when I die.'

Mr. Algernon thanked the priest, assuring him the legacy would be most acceptable, only he hoped he should have to wait many years before receiving it.

'Sir,' he said, 'what you have told me of the life of Catherine Tresize would make a pretty story.'

'Yes,' replied the Abbe; 'and it might serve to exemplify the words of the Psalmist: "The just shall be in everlasting remembrance."'

THE END.

A TALE OF THE PAPAL BRIGADE.

CHAPTER I.

BROTHER AND SISTER.

IT is probable, dear reader, that the name of Schrambeck is to this day utterly unknown to you. Nothing recommends it to the attention of the learned; nothing distinguishes it in the eyes of the world; it is only the very obscure name we shall give one of the prettiest villages of the Campine,* where we are going to often meet the heroes of our story. A neat, pretty village in truth! See it backed towards the east by a chain of sandy hills raising their undulating outlines and arid summits above the evergreen pines grouped at their feet and climbing up their sides. At this side of the village all is dull and sterile; only some bushes of broom here and there, some clumps of heather waving their pale verdure above the bare soil where they could hardly live and bloom. However, in that very desert the perseverance and energy of the agriculturist have succeeded in triumphing over stubborn and sterile nature. The hills have been leveled, the heather turned up, the pines cut down in many places. Already, one can foresee the time, near enough perhaps, when the last sands of the moor, the last thickets of the forest, will have disappeared, thanks to those all-powerful efforts of labor and science.

But a few years ago, when the traveller, going to the village of Schrambeck, approached it from this side, he was continually impressed, sometimes even sensibly moved, by the aspect, at once grand and mysterious, of this sombre forest. The profound solitude of those woods, the solemn silence that reigned over that vast mass of branches, interrupted only from time to time by the monotonous cry of the cricket or the melodious cooing of the wood-pigeon, the vague murmurings of the wind gliding through the branches like an aerial voice from the world of the spirits of air, created a sudden impression in the strange traveller, and plunged him into a silent and profound contemplation.

But at length when he cleared the limits of the forest he could repose his eyes at leisure all over a picturesque and charming landscape. At his feet the houses of the village—small, white, and in regular rows, half concealed in their nests of verdure, ranged in a circle around a grass-plot in the centre of the town under the shadow of the clock-tower. This humble rustic clock-tower itself hardly rises above the surrounding roofs, as if it feared, in exhibiting to the eyes of the distant traveller its iron-pointed spire with gilded weathercock, to rob him of a pleasant surprise by apprising him too soon of the beauties of this little paradise. Then, on the opposite side, towards the west, quite another view, indeed, attracts the eyes by its charming freshness. These green meadows, smiling, blooming, waving fields of golden grain seem to rival the sun's rays in splendor and beauty. To the northward the undulating soil gradually rises, overlooking at its base a sweet green valley perfumed by sainfoin, † trefoil, and hawthorn, and ending at the summit in a large fresh velvety plateau or green sward adorned with a thousand wild flowers, like a large garden, and forming a splendid natural terrace, whence the eye may freely wander over the surrounding country. It is in the valley itself the village nestles, at the foot of the mountain, under the shelter of the pine trees that form, with their imposing mass, their crowded trunks and green branches a wonderful pictorial background to its red-tiled houses. In fine, a short distance from the village, under the shadow of a fine group of oaks and limes rose too the old mossy ramparts and high grey towers of an old feudal castle now abandoned.

That old castle had, in times past, its moving history that many an inhabitant of Schrambeck could still tell you; for it was the cradle of a race as noble as valiant, whose name is mentioned with honor in many parts of the history of Flanders, and whose warriors formerly acquired great glory and renown.

In the middle of the large green plain rises a chapel consecrated to the Mother of the Saviour. Pause a moment near the threshold opposite the iron railing that serves as a gate. Is not this modest edifice as simple and beautiful as the blessed sanctuary where the Queen of Heaven has her image and where prayers fly upwards, ought to be? Rest an instant at the half-worn seat at the entrance, and raise your eyes to the white stone crowning the summit of the narrow façade and bearing this inscription: "To our august Lady of Consolation.—1615."

Here the afflicted, the poor of the village, come to deposit their burden of pain and anguish; here they come to implore the help, the pity of the Divine Mother. Should you draw near the little chapel at the first glimpse of morning or long after sunset, you are always certain to meet there piously kneeling on the seat, some anxious, weeping woman, often even some peasant, from the neighborhood; for the people of Schrambeck have not yet learned to blush for their respect for God and the faith of their fathers; they have preserved all their love and simple devotion to the worship of their Saviour and the belief of their ancestors. And now dear readers, that we have attempted to trace for you the frame and sketch the picture, we are at last going to begin our story.

It was a fine evening in May, 1860. The sun, purpling the plain with his last rays, was already declining towards the summit of the eastern hill. A pious youth and a young girl advanced sadly along the pathway that leads from the village of Schrambeck to the Chapel of Consolation. Both seemed a prey to bitter grief, their glances, gestures, and bearing revealing acute and profound suffering. From time to time a long mournful sigh swelled the breast of the young man, who walked on in silence, and big glistening tears coursed down the pale cheeks of the girl in the light shade cast over her face by her modestly-worn hood.

But at length these bitter tears were lost in a long and painful sobbing which constrained the young man to at once break silence.

"O! dear Mary," he murmured gently, "why do you let yourself give way to such despondency? Your sobbing goes to my heart. Believe me, dear sister, there is no occasion yet to despair."

"Let me cry, brother," she replied, still sadder. "Our poor mother will die; I see it; I feel it."

"My poor Mary, don't speak so. We ought to have courage and confidence to the last. A voice, I know not what, at the bottom of my heart tells me to believe and to hope."

"Hope, Joseph! Oh! how can we hope? Isn't the hand of death already on that dear brow—those venerated features? And those poor, thin hands, those pale cheeks hollowed by fever—don't you see signs—too certain signs? Surely the doctor was not deceived this morning in saying he could not ensure that our beloved mother had three days yet to live?"

And the sobs at these words suffocated the poor child, and her gentle voice was lost, stifled by her tears.

O tears, pious tears, divine tears, precious gift of the Creator! Woe to him to whom you come not to refresh, to so-lace—divine pearls!

The young man wept, too, but he strove to moderate his grief so as not to heighten the pain of his sad companion.

"Undoubtedly our dear mother is in great danger," he continued, after a moment's silence. "Believe me, dear sister, I share your grief; but—I don't know why—I haven't yet lost all hope. First of all that holy unction that the priest, in his solicitude, gave her yesterday, and that Holy Communion that fortified her body and gladdened her soul to-day, may they not bring her precious solace and powerful succor?"

"Assuredly, Joseph. Only wouldn't it be rash on our part to hope for a miracle? And it would indeed be a miracle if she were preserved to us, if she were restored to health. The doctor says so, brother."

"Assuredly, my poor sister. But here we are approaching the place where they invoke her who is justly named the Health of the Weak and the Comforter of the Afflicted. Let us fearlessly address to her our most fervent prayers, and, believe me, sister, even if it is a miracle we ask, it will not be the first obtained by the Queen of Heaven in favor of filial love, of all love the humblest and the purest. Let us pray, then, I repeat, with love, courage, and confidence, for something tells me we will be heard. The omnipotent God, who, when He pleases, opens the abyss of the tomb under His creature's foot-steps, can He not also snatch them from it if such is His will?"

Talking thus, the pious children stopped before the chapel of the Immaculate Virgin, and, kneeling on the wooden seat outside, began to pray in profound silence. For the health of their sick mother they invoked that other Mother, the incomparable Mother of men and of God.

During all that month of sunshine and roses—blessed month consecrated to the Queen of Heaven—their pure and fervent prayers were breathed forth at the foot of the star of that Blessed Mother. Now the sun was about to set, and the first shades of the evening were slowly descending over the plain; yet their fervor was even increasing, their zeal abated not; and they still remained kneeling in silence near the threshold, offering the Lord their tears and prayers for the health of that tender mother.

And the last rays of the sun had faded away; and night had come. The distant sounds of the Angelus, borne on the breeze, floated melodiously over the plain, inviting the laborers still occupied at that hour in the silent field, to salute the Immaculate Mother with a prayer and an expression of love before returning to their rustic dwellings to repose after the day's labors.

The sweet tinkling of the Angelus had probably interrupted Mary's prayer, for the last vague far-off sound had scarcely died away in the air when she turned towards her brother continually buried in a mysterious reverie.

"My good Joseph, it is time we should return to our mother."

The young man shuddered at these words as if he had started up from a dream, although his calm, serious face still preserved the expression of prayer and recollection.

"Brother," continued the young girl, who looked at him with a surprised air, "how beneficent, how incomprehensible, indeed, is the power of prayer! I begin to feel calmness and confidence revive within me; and you seem to me even more reassured, more tranquil, than when we came here."

"It is true, dear sister; but do you know for whom I have just now implored the Virgin Mother?"

"For whom you have prayed? For our mother, no doubt!"

"Certainly; but I have addressed other supplications also to the Queen of Heaven and her Divine Son. Oh! my dear sister, are we not—at least I sometimes think so—too exclusive, too selfish in all our earthly preoccupations and griefs? For you know we have another mother too, the holy Church of Christ, for whom we shall have good reason to weep, and perhaps tremble. However, I know well this mother cannot perish; but she may have to undergo very cruel trials, very bitter sufferings; and at this moment, for instance, to what dangers is she not exposed in the person of her visible chief, our first pastor?"

"It is but too true, Joseph; only what shall we do, what can we do, poor children that we are! We can only offer the Church our prayers and our tears. Besides, has not the Lord promised to watch over His eternal spouse to the end of ages, and will He not save her from the attacks and insults of hell were He Himself, to that end, to multiply miracles?"

"Assuredly the Lord sees and measures the sufferings of His Church. And, when the hour of His vengeance shall at length have come, He will give her victory and confound her enemies. But He also asks—and it is only justice, sister—that creatures shall aid Him by their submission, by their efforts; and it is only very rarely, you know, He has recourse to miracles."

"I know, dear Joseph; only why, at this single thought of the perils and sufferings of the Church, do you let yourself be overcome with such bitter grief, when you have only your prayers to give it?"

"Nothing but my prayers, do you say, dear sister? Ah! do they give nothing else, those devoted men, those heroic youth our Belgium has produced, or those who abandon their beautiful countries, France and Ireland, and many other Catholic lands, too, to defend the common Father of the faithful against the avidity of usurpers or the hatred of His enemies? They know how to find, at need, other arms besides prayers and tears; they joyfully place their blood, their lives, at the feet of the Sovereign Pontiff, and would joyfully die to save him if Providence required it. Yes, sister, those generous volunteers may at length succumb to the superiority of numbers; but they will fall without a groan, well knowing that the land will not be bedewed in vain by their innocent blood. The voice of their blood, Mary, will be their voice and their prayer, much more powerful, much more glorious too, than the greatest victory acquired by force of arms."

"My good Joseph, your words are generous and noble, but they make me tremble. Would you leave our poor mother at this time. Would you leave your sister; an orphan and alone, thinking of your hard-heartedness, and weeping over her tomb?"

"I do not say that such indeed may be my resolution, dear sister; still, I confess, I cannot forbear envying the glorious destiny of those brave fellows who fly with such ardor to the martyr's death. The thought of them inflames my heart; I burn with the desire of following their example. And yet Providence has marked out my place here beside my sick mother's pillow, and nothing less than that sacred duty of unbounded devotion and filial love would hinder me from flying to the succor of that other dear mother. When I was at college I used to read hundreds of times those eloquent words, Dutec et decorum est pro patria mori. Oh! how much more honorable and sweeter it must be to die for the faith, for the Church of God!"

Poor Mary, incapable of sharing those heroic transports, was content to keep a deep and painful silence. Joseph, fearing to disquiet her by his desire of communicating to her a little of that generous ardor, said no more, and retraced, by her side, the way to the village. They were not long in reaching the first whitewashed cottages of the little town of Schrambeck.

There they met Teresa, the old crippled beggar-woman, who, stretching out her hand to receive the destined alms, eagerly availed of this opportunity to wish them good evening, although she scrupled to disturb their painful reverie.

"How is your mother?" she asked in a really sympathetic, anxious tone.

"Ill, oh! very ill, my poor Teresa. I beg you won't forget her in your prayers."

"My good Monsieur Joseph, how could I forget her? Who then helped me when all had abandoned me? Who then nourished and clad me during that rigorous winter? No, no! Believe me, the poor old cripple will never be ungrateful. May God protect you, my poor children, and bless your excellent mother, too."

And the good old woman, supported by her crutch, limped towards the Church of Consolation, as the good people of Schrambeck have called it, to offer up her prayers and vows of Schrambeek, after their prayers and vows of filial love.

The day had been hot, and this fine fresh evening seemed so much the sweeter and more tranquil. Most of the villagers were at their doors at that hour, partly attracted by the desire of hearing the news usually communicated to them at that time of the evening by old Piquet, garde-champetre of the little town, for the good man was accustomed to take his seat in the Café de l'Aigle to read the papers, after which he was able to answer the eager questions of the peasants curious to know of the events that lately occurred at different points in this vast world.

The good inhabitants of Schrambeck, seeing the two young people approaching, testified by their salutations, their gestures and their glance, their affectionate interest and real sympathy. They were particularly desirous of knowing the state of the poor invalid. But Joseph and Mary only briefly replied to those kind questions; they were longing to return to their dear mother.

Alas! at the very threshold of their house, Rika, the servant, awaited them, crying and wringing her hands.

CHAPTER II.

A VOW TO MARY.

Madame Van Dael, mother of those two poor children, was the widow of a just, honorable, and much respected man, who had long filled the functions of notary in the little town of Schrambeck. He was already ten years dead at the time we speak of, only leaving his widow, along with a moderate income that might ensure her a modest competency, the sympathy of his numerous friends, and the respect of his neighbors.

Madame Van Dael, dating from the time of her widowhood, had constantly lived in close retirement, only receiving a small number of intimate friends, and devoting herself entirely to the education and happiness of her two beloved children. An affection so devoted, a solicitude so constant, had been rewarded with the happiest results. Joseph and Mary were truly—and, indeed, deserved to be—the sole pride and joy of her heart, and their names were always cited by the good inhabitants of Schrambeck when they mentioned the most virtuous, the most submissive of the young people of their age. Thus long years glided by for the widow in the midst of profound peace and sweet tranquility; her calm, modest happiness had never been troubled except by the bitter remembrance of the love and virtues of the husband who had so soon left her on this earth. And even then the earnest, tender piety that inspired all the thoughts and sanctified all the virtues of the noble woman, brought her powerful consolations; a deep and tender calm that told her to raise her weeping eyes from the tomb to heaven, where the blessed spirit of the dear departed henceforth, she doubted not, watched over his children and his widow.

But for some weeks a new grief had overwhelmed the virtuous inhabitants of the modest house. Madame Van Dael had been stricken with a dangerous malady that increased from day to day; and henceforward the poor mother, groaning and dejected, seemed to have no more strength to struggle against the malady that menaced her life.

The physician who attended her, an old and faithful friend of the family, had not, it is true, yet lost all hope; still he had not the courage to tell the poor despairing children and weeping friends that he momentarily, expected a last crisis that might certainly offer some favorable chances but would be fated to bring with it a more complete prostration, a more imminent danger, and perhaps death.

But on the evening we speak of, when they came to tell him that the widow's two children, not knowing the entire extent of the peril that threatened their beloved mother at that moment, had left her to perform at the accustomed hour their pious pilgrimage to the Chapel of Consolation, he immediately reproached himself with his want of courage, and hastened to his patient to watch by her bed, awaiting the return of the poor weeping children.

The venerable curé of Schrambeck, who was always ready to go to the house of mourning, had also repaired to the widow, upon whom he lavished his cares and consolations. The old servant Rika, seeing her mistress in such good hands, had withdrawn for an instant, stopping at the doorway to at length give vent to her tears and apprise the two children as soon as she saw them returning.

They had no sooner remarked the dejected and disheartened expression of the faithful servant's features, the tears streaming from her eyes, the convulsive trembling of her hands and lips, than their tears that had stopped for an instant recommenced to flow.

"Oh! Rika," they cried, seized with a new dread, "our mother—our poor mother—is much worse again?"

"Alas! I'm afraid she could scarcely be worse than she is," she replied, weeping. "O my good mistress, my dear children, what'll become of us? Oh! if God took pity on us! If I could die for her!"

But Joseph had rushed into his mother's room, and with choking sobs, knelt by her bed.

"O mother, O mother, surely you're not going to die," he cried in his grief, pressing one of her worn hands convulsively to his lips and breast.

"My son, my poor dear child, who told you that?" she murmured in a feeble voice; "but if it must be so, Joseph, may the holy will of God be done: may it be blest!"

The sad Mary, unable to speak, had seized her mother's other hand and silently covered it with kisses and tears.

The curé, quite moved, was also weeping in a corner, and the doctor himself, with the back of his brown hand, was stealthily wiping away the tears that began to gather in his eyes.

"Come my children, be calm," he said to them, at last; "all hope, I assure you is not lost. But be calm, I repeat. Your groans and tears only increase the fever, and consequently the peril that threatens your mother." In uttering these last words he had lowered his voice, so that they should not reach the invalid's ear.

Then Joseph, after a long kiss, letting go the feeble hand he pressed to his lips, rose, made a sign to the doctor, and drew him into a corner of the room.

"Dear doctor, I conjure you, don't deceive me," he murmured; "speak fearlessly, in the name of God; tell me the whole truth: it can only more or less confirm my presentiments, my fears."

"All hope is not lost, I repeat, Joseph," replied the physician; "however, this last hope is very uncertain, very weak. Besides I ought to tell you, I await a crisis, a very grave crisis, this night; but if your mother bear up against it, and struggles on until to-morrow morning, I can, in all probability answer for her life."

This answer of the doctor, however fatal the forebodings it contained, and however imminent the peril it seemed to announce, appeared to give this dejected young man a ray of reviving hope and courageous confidence; he raised toward heaven a calm, earnest glance, imploring its protection and invoking its succor.

"And now, Lord, life for life," he murmured in a low, earnest tone so that no one could hear him.

"The dean and I," continued the good doctor—"we have resolved for this night not to leave you until"—and here the worthy man hesitated, "until your mother has passed the crisis, the crisis that threatens her."

"Oh! a thousand thanks! Bless you both for that act of devotion and generous friendship!"

And, both clasping hands, they both left the dark corner whither they had retired for an instant, and quietly drew near the invalid's bed.

The most complete silence reigned in the sad house. A carefully shaded lamp shed a softened light in the invalid's room. The brother and sister, praying and weeping, knelt by their mother's bed. The priest read his Breviary in a corner by the pale light of the lamp. The poor servant, telling her beads, from time to time let a sigh escape. The doctor had unfolded a paper over which he ran his eyes confusedly, interrupting himself every instant to cast his eyes on the invalid's bed, anxious to watch the least changes in the condition or features of the invalid. The night—that solemn night—was already advanced. The deep and gloomy silence was only interrupted, from time to time, by the sibilant and oppressive breathing, or the still more racking cough which made the widow's chest heave painfully. But those sorrowful closed eyes had at length opened, for the doctor quitted his chair and quietly approached the bed. He held the invalid's hand firmly clasped in his, and felt her pulse with visible anxiety.

"O mother, mother!" cried the brother and sister together, bathed in tears. "Bless us mother. Lord have mercy on us!"

At that instant a glance from the doctor arrested the words on their lips.

But Madame Van Dael had heard that cry of filial love, wrung from such fervent attachment, such bitter anguish. She raised her trembling hand over the fair heads of the prostrate children, and murmured in a scarcely audible voice:

"O Joseph, O Mary, may God bless you, my dear children! Farewell, farewell, loved ones, until we see each other again in the sojourn of the blessed along with your father!"

And the feeble hand, icy and motionless, fell back heavily and the doctor again clasped it between his fingers.

As to the priest, he fixed a look of sadness, and deep anguish, first on the livid countenance of the invalid, then on the altered countenance of the doctor, as if to ascertain by that single glance what was to be hoped or feared.

Some minutes passed without any abatement of that solemn expectancy—that dreadful anxiety.

The poor weeping children saw nothing, heard nothing more, and scarcely breathed. Rika, prostrate in a corner, cried as if her heart would break. The curé already stretched forth his hand to give his last benediction to the dying woman, when suddenly the doctor dropped the hand he had until then held in his, and the two children trembled, moved by a sudden dread.

"Dead!" they cried, growing pale.

"Saved" triumphantly replied the physician in a joyful, tremulous voice.

Yes, saved indeed by celestial mercy and power. The decisive crisis had happily ended; the danger had henceforth disappeared; the patient soon fell into a deep, calm slumber, and the grateful priest began the Te Deum of the hour of the Matins. Along with this hymn of glory and benediction a tender and fervent prayer, breathed from those beating hearts, arose to heaven.

Oh! what a glorious day was that which followed that solemn night! The rays of a charming summer sun glittered in a clear sky; the glad birds hopped and chirped in the shade of green branches, the young flowers expanded their cups to the golden light of the dawning day. Oh! how radiant and charming that calm nature, the good God's beautiful earth seemed to the widow's children!

They had taken no repose during the remainder of that night. Should they not, before anything, go to thank their divine Mother, their august Queen, our Lady of Consolation?

Teresa, the old beggar-woman, had gone to the Chapel of Consolation at day-break, to pray for the restoration of her worthy benefactress. The brother and sister met her kneeling piously before the modest altar, and told her the joyful news, which she immediately went away to communicate to all the houses round about. Imagine the joy, the delight of the widow's numerous friends! Above all, the good Rika's happiness was indescribable; the poor girl laughed, wept, cried, and, in a word, seemed to have lost her senses. We will say nothing here of the feelings of Joseph and Mary; a happiness so complete, so pure, may be imagined but cannot be described.

In all justice we ought to state here that the good doctor, far from attributing the marvellous cure to his attention, and the resources of his art, hastened to recognize, on the contrary, that a more powerful hand than his could alone have snatched from death the much-loved invalid of whose recovery he had despaired from the first moment.

A few weeks passed by, and Madame Van Dael's health progressed rapidly towards a complete restoration. A slight paleness, which decreased from day to day, and an inevitable weakness, that would soon disappear, alone revealed to attentive eyes the sufferings she had undergone and the deadly danger she had run.

The good curé, too, continued his visits, for he was in the habit of often visiting, as pastor and friend, all the invalids and weaklings of his dear flock.

The moment he presented himself one evening at the widow's quiet dwelling, the two children quitted their mother's room on seeing him enter, and Joseph, passing him by, in the shadow of the corridor, murmured in his ear:

"Don't delay any longer, I beg, Monsieur le Doyen; time presses—I can't wait; promise me to speak."

The priest, consequently, as soon as he had carefully closed the door leading to the lobby, replaced against the wall the chair Mary had prepared for him at his approach, took another, and established himself quite near Madame Van Dael's arm-chair.

He had to summon up all his courage to accomplish the mission the devotedness of a good son had confided to him, and he deemed it more prudent to preface this difficult avowal with a few words of paternal solicitude and affectionate sympathy.

"And how are you, to-day, dear Madame?"

"Quite well, I thank you, Monsieur le Doyen. My strength at present is completely restored," replied the widow, with a joyful look and accent.

"Poor mother!" murmured the priest in an undertone; "poor mother, how little you foresee, how little you divine, the price that marvellous cure is to cost you!"

"Explain yourself, sir," she cried, deeply moved; "your words seem to announce to me—O my God!—a new trial, perhaps a bitter grief."

"Christian mother," resumed the curé in a solemn voice, "do you know to whom you owe strength and health, cure and life?"

"Assuredly I know it; it is to the ineffable goodness, the omnipotence of my God."

"Undoubtedly. And I may justly add that this great celestial mercy has been granted to you in consideration of the prayers and merits of your children. It is to their filial love, above all, you owe this happiness and this grace."

"Oh! I have no doubt of it, father. How I thank God, who, in giving me such children, has given me happiness and glory."

"Yes, you are justly proud of them; you ought to be happy too; and yet, I repeat at this moment: Poor mother! poor mother! a cruel wound is soon to pierce your heart. You don't understand me; you can't understand me. Alas! know you to what a degree those dear children love you? Listen to me, and pray with me to the Lord, who in His goodness will give you strength. Your son, your beloved Joseph, has offered himself to the God of mercy and love, in hope of obtaining your cure, your health, your life. The day you were in the greatest danger your noble child made a vow opposite the altar of the Chapel of Consolation to take service in the ranks of the Pontifical Zouaves if the Lord deigned to restore you to health. I should add, dear madame, that he first consulted me, and I only authorized him to contract that vow on this condition, that you should give his generous project your full and entire approbation."

At this sudden declaration, this terrible disclosure, the poor mother was seized with a profound consternation. At first a deadly paleness overspread her countenance, almost as quickly fired with a feverish flush. She bowed her head, clasped her hands, and was for an instant on the point of fainting, under the pressure of this violent interior emotion.

"Your son," continued the priest, "not having the courage to communicate to you his pious resolution, charged me with speaking to you, poor mother, in his name. I thought it more prudent to wait. You were for a long time too weak, still suffering too much, for it to be possible to inflict upon you at that time this news, this bitter grief. At length, however, yielding to Joseph's prayers, his reiterated entreaties, I decided on making known to you this sacred vow, on revealing to you the secret. And now, dear madame, it is for you to decide. Shall Joseph depart or remain with us, grieving no doubt, but half resigned and obedient to his mother's will?"

"Where is he?—where is my amiable, my generous child?" cried Madame Van Dael, her heart palpitating. "Ah! I knew well he loved me—not a doubt of it—but could I ever think he loved me so tenderly, that he was willing to sacrifice for me his future, his life, and perhaps his whole happiness!"

"Here I am, mother," gently responded Joseph, who had fallen at Madame Van Dael's knees, taking the hand of that beloved mother and kissing it fervently; "shall I go, good mother? Oh! accede to my prayer; say I may go!"

"Ah! my child, what love! My Joseph, thou fillest my heart with joy and sadness."

"But you'll not retain me,—you won't, dear mother? Heaven itself wills it. The Lord, who heard me, has subscribed this engagement and poured down His graces on us. The first part of that vow is already accomplished; say when shall I be permitted to accomplish the second?"

Alas! a painful struggle must then have certainly wrung the widow's heart; but it was easy to foresee that pious resignation, fervent Christian heroism would in the end triumph over paternal regrets, affections and tears. The widow's sad glances at one time were raised to heaven—at another time rested on her son; then, as it were, a ray of joy, pride and hope gleamed in her eyes. The humble and valiant Christian, the devoted mother, was going to unite her sacrifice to that of her son.

"Could I retain you, my son!" she cried. "Oh! no; I don't wish to appear less valiant, less generous than you. As well as you offered yourself for your mother's safety, I wish to offer my mother's love and tears on the altar of my Lord for the safety of the Church, His spouse, and our common mother. Go, my son. My love, my thoughts, my benediction shall not cease to follow you. Oh! certainly, your sister and I will suffer deeply, cruelly by your absence; but the God of goodness to whom we give you up to-day will undoubtedly grant us strength to bear it. Go, and when you shall have the happiness of saluting the Holy Father, tell him if I had millions I would joyfully send them to him, but not having them, I send him my only son. We pray God earnestly that He may restore him to us. And, my son, if it should please God that you should sacrifice your life in His honor, be resigned to that holy will, and face danger with a joyful heart, for, know well, that I join heartily in your sacrifice; I bless the intention, I accept the consequences, and I would esteem myself happy if you were to perish for the triumph of Christ and the holy faith. Say all that on my behalf to the Holy Father, and ask him for me, in exchange, his prayers and his benediction. And now, my beloved son, go fearlessly, joyfully, hopefully; your mother, whom you have saved, confirms your vow and joins in your sacrifice."

The voice of the courageous mother died away in pronouncing these words. The new Pontifical Volunteer, transported with gratitude, happiness, and love, seized the affectionate mother's hand, clasped it warmly and pressed it to his heart.

CHAPTER III.

"PRO PETRI SEDE."

We have not yet become acquainted with the hero of our story. Let our readers kindly allow us to introduce him to them.

We are in a large, superb gallery occupying the first floor of an elegant house in the city of Antwerp. The aspect of this apartment, sumptuous as it is, is somewhat strange. It is impossible to distinguish the color and appearance of the tapestries on the walls, for the large shelves disappear themselves under the mass of books, big and little, old and new, bound and unbound, ranged in order and with a certain elegance.

Allow us to examine for an instant this chamber and these books; for when we are opposite to a bookcase it is easy, after a few moment's examination, to ascertain the tastes, aptitudes and opinions of him who has accumulated and consults all those works. Qui se ressemble s'assemble, says the old French proverb.

Now what books do we find here? Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, Volney,—dangerous acquaintances! A little further on; Dante, Tasso, Milton, Shakespeare, Vondel;—these titles are more reassuring.

The third compartment contains purely literary works, written in different languages—Flemish, French, English, Swedish, German, &c. No need to give the catalogue.

Here, further on, is an imposing collection of scientific books, history, antiquities, natural sciences, jurisprudence, what not. To my thinking it might be that that grave studious person for the moment seated yonder and studying at his desk, was only an indifferentist in matters of religion,—a libre-penseur as it is called now-a-days.

A libre-penseur! Assuredly it is a great rarity among our good people of the Campine! And, honest Campinese who listen to me, if ever you come across one of these rare birds, put on your spectacles directly and contemplate him with all due respect, for it is an object interesting to look at and curious to study, the instructive and amusing sight of which will recompense you for your pains.

A libre-penseur is then a particular species of animal, that indulges in and imagines many things, but, however, is not very sure of being able to justify his title—that is to say, to think freely.

But we have not yet done examining the room.

In the centre are placed low tables supporting glass cases; only a narrow passage separates these crowded cases from the bookcases in which are ranged the volumes we have examined. Here are placed and classed, according to their importance and antiquity precious collections of medals and coins from the time of the Romans down to our days, and all shapes and all countries; these round, oval, octagonal or square—those of gold, silver, or copper, or even nickel. Here and there stand antique urns of pottery, marble, or stone, containing a little grey ashes or fragments of broken bones; then flint hatchets, rusty swords and poniards, trinkets, and pieces of armor.

Further on still, carefully classed and ticketed, we see skeletons of animals, great and small, and quite a multitude of stuffed birds, from the ostrich, roamer of the desert, to the humming-birds—those melodious winged flowers; then collections of insects, minerals, seals, portraits, postage stamps; in a word, this cabinet contains a collection of collections. Lastly, at the very end of the gallery, a multitude of small wooden figures, rudely carved, very like those children draw on their class books—two big dots forming the eyes, a stroke the mouth, and another stroke the nose. Beneath these hideous, grotesque figures we read the following inscription: "False divinities of the North American savages."

But where is the image of the true God, of the Crucified Saviour?

You will look in vain for it; it is nowhere to be found in this cabinet of the savant, the thinker, the philosophe.

Now we cannot doubt it any longer; we have actually penetrated under the roof of a libre-penseur.

Only this libre-penseur possesses more merits and virtues than many people perhaps think. Monsieur Morren—that's his name—is only indifferent and forgetful of the worship of his God; he is careless of his Christian duties and the destiny of his immortal soul, but he has, at least, received an excellent education in his youth, and has remained an honest man in the rigorous acceptance of that word. His manners are grave and reserved, his exterior serious and becoming; his private life peaceful, honorable, and strictly moral. M. Morren is simply a philosophe, with a mind too proud to believe without examination and reverence mysteries that so much exceed in depth the narrow limits of his reason.

Nevertheless, he is just and tolerant, and sincerely desires that all men may be able to guide themselves according to their lights and the bent of their personal convictions. So he sees no inconvenience in his wife openly devoting herself to those holy practices of piety that make an accomplished Christian woman so worthy an exemplar. In that respect, too, he leaves full and entire liberty to his only son, Victor, whom his mother's example encourages and sustains in the way of salvation, and who, in truth, has nothing of his father's tastes and leanings but his ardor, his enthusiasm for learning. For M. Morren we must repeat—and, besides, have we not divined it from the sight of his library alone—was always passionately devoted to study, to learned researches; and, alas! it was this thirst of knowledge, his ardent desire to be his own instructor, that ended by driving this man of sincere and upright mind—who needed the assistance of a prudent counsellor, a good guide—in the ways of error.

But when, twenty-five years before, he had received the hand of the amiable Rosa Verbruggen, sister of Madame Van Dael, he was still true to the calm faith of his childhood, to the holy law of his God; otherwise the pious Rosa had never resolved to be his spouse. It was only long after, through a gradual series of doubts and denials, that the fatal teachings of a false philosophy succeeded in extinguishing the light of faith in his soul.

M. Morren had always had a marked predilection for the study of languages. Of the seven or eight languages that had been the object of his persevering studies and profound researches, he spoke English, German and Italian with most elegance and facility. In this respect his son Victor seemed to have inherited the dispositions and brilliant faculties of his father.

At the time our story opens, young Morren, absorbed in the reading of a sublime, a divine poet, was leaning on a little table in a corner of a gallery, while his father was writing, seated before his desk. A moment after, the studious young man laid down his book, and, raising his head, said:

"How sweet and melodious is this beautiful Italian tongue! And what a poet is Dante! Let me read these verses to you? Aren't all the features of the picture reproduced in the harmonious sounds!"

This sudden interruption could not but be pleasant and agreeable to paternal ears. M. Morren was passionately fond of his son, was very proud and pleased when he saw his dear Victor devote himself with ardor to his favorite occupation—the study of literature and languages.

The reading of the passage in question, however, was suddenly interrupted by a slight bustle outside, and a few discreet knocks.

"Come in," said M. Morren at once.

And the door opened, and Joseph and Mary, accompanied by their good aunt, Madame Morren, appeared on the threshold.

"Victor," cried the good father joyfully, "here's a pleasant surprise! Our good friends from Schrambeck!"

The "Divina Commedia" immediately fell with all its weight on the table, and Victor, transported with joy, came forward, and cheerily clasped the hand of Joseph Van Dael, his cousin and the friend of his childhood.

"What a happiness to see you! And how are they all at Schrambeck? Your mother, then, is now so well that you could both leave her? You came, no doubt, by express?"

Thus they greeted the two young people with such a great number of questions that they hardly knew which to answer.

"You got our letter, telling you of the happy recovery of our mother, didn't you?"

"Certainly, but we never thought her cure was complete and her convalescence so rapid that——"

"It pleased Providence, however, dear aunt; otherwise we shouldn't have had the great pleasure of embracing you today."

"Meanwhile, be seated, my children," interrupted M. Morren, pulling the bell. "See, we are so surprised, so glad to see you, that be even forgot to make you take some refreshment, and rest yourselves. It is indeed a surprise, a pleasure! Barbara"—addressing the servant who made her appearance at the door, "bring us directly two bottles of the best wine and some cigars."

"Yes, sir," replied the good woman, hurrying off as quick as her old limbs could carry her.

"Barbara, take my cigars, I recommend you," cried out Victor, after her, following down stairs the good old creature who had nursed and cared him when he was a child, and since then cherished a mother's love for him.

"Mary and I are going down to the garden," said Madame Morren. "There's such splendid weather to-day that it will be a real pleasure for us to rest under the shade of the arbor, and while Joseph will tell you all the particulars of his mother's happy cure, Mary will tell me."

The two ladies quitted the gallery just as Barbara reappeared bringing in the wine and cigars.

"Our visit seems to have surprised you," said Joseph, smiling to both his friends. "I have told you first of all that the attendance of our servant Rika is amply sufficient for my mother in the very favorable condition in which she is at present. But we have another reason, too, for making this little journey. My dear uncle, my dear Victor, I have come to bid you farewell—perhaps forever."

"To bid us farewell, Joseph? How? What has happened, then?"

"Very appropriately you have a volume of Dante there on the table. Well, I am going to see the country of the great Florentine poet."

"What! you're going to Italy! But what are you going to do there?"

"Fight for the Church and against the Revolution—shed my blood, sacrifice my life, perhaps, for the holiest of causes."

M. Morren was about to reply, when the conversation was interrupted a second time by a knock at the door. Almost immediately, two young men, evidently admitted to the intimacy of the family, of elegant manners, graceful appearance, and dressed in the height of the fashion, made their appearance.

"Very good! Two more friends!" cried the master of the house. "Good day, Tommaso; welcome, Ernest; come, my friends, be seated."

The visit of these two new comers, however, did not seem so agreeable to Victor as to his father. At the sight of them a visible expression of discontentment, perhaps of contempt, was depicted in his face, although he strove to keep his countenance.

The two strangers began by making their excuses; they had simply dropped in to bid good day to their good friends, they said; but, as M. Morren was then occupied, they would retire, and not trouble him any longer with their presence.

"Upon my honor, you'll do nothing of the kind," replied the master of the house, with pleasant courtesy; "you'll surely give us some minutes—a half hour, at least. Come, my dear Tommaso, I know you are an Italian of the Italians! Well, I have the honor to introduce to you my nephew, Joseph Van Dael, who purposes visiting your beautiful country very soon.

"My dear nephew," continued M. Morren, addressing Joseph, "these gentlemen are my friends, Ernest Van Dormael and Signor Tommaso di Roccabianca.

"I would always be very happy, my good uncle, to make the acquaintance of your best friends."

"Come, gentlemen, be seated, and let us drain a glass together. We'll afterwards go into the drawing-room," continued M. Morren.

But the young Italian had fixed a strange piercing glance on the honest face of Joseph, after which he exchanged with Ernest another glance, which seemed to say: "This young man cannot be—certainly is not one of our friends."

This haughty Italian with the tawny visage and aquiline profile was none other than a Carbonaro, formerly affiliated at Rome to many secret societies, and since then a refugee in Belgium. There he had introduced himself under the sonorous and pompons name of Tommaso di Roccabianca.

The drawing-room in which M. Morren and his guests assembled was particularly remarkable for the number and beauty of its old masters. One of the walls was covered with gilt leather hangings; the other disappeared under the floating fold of a precious old tapestry bearing this inscription: "Reydaurs fecit." Chests, sideboards, and old oaken coffers admirably carved completed the furniture, at once grave and sumptuous, and presented to the dazzled eye exquisite specimens of Chinese and Japanese porcelain, Limoges enamel, and Venetian glass.

It was not long before the conversation, which had flagged for a moment, was resumed with renewed spirit and vivacity. They all spoke Flemish, for Tommaso, who had resided for several years in Belgium had readily enough acquired the Flemish language, not only understanding it with the greatest ease, but even using it without the least difficulty.

"You told us now, my good Joseph," resumed M. Morren, "that you were on the point of entering the Pope's service. But what motives could have determined you to take such a decision?"

It was easy to see that the young man, thus questioned, felt a very natural repugnance at the idea of having the secrets of his heart exposed to the light of day, in presence of those two strangers. Nevertheless, after a moment's hesitation, he replied:

"I offered myself to God, my dear uncle, in return for that immense benefit He has deigned to grant me—my mother's cure."

"Ah! that's it! And do you really believe then, my child, your offering, your prayers co-operated in that cure? It was a miracle took place, then, according to you, my young friend. Come Joseph, how can you, an intelligent, sensible lad, delude yourself with such imaginings?"

"Allow me, my dear uncle—I by no means affirm that in that cure a miracle took place. The recovery of our good mother might very well have been owing to natural causes, frequent and regular. However, if God willed to accomplish a miracle in her favor, who then, tell me, I beg, could have hindered Him doing it?"

"A miracle, indeed! What an absurdity! Miserable old prejudices, old women's tales!"

"Tales in which many learned men, many heroes, many sages have believed. Tell me was the great Englishman, Shakespeare, your favorite poet, an old woman? Well, it was he who said, 'There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy.' Besides I refrain from affirming that there was a real prodigy, a miraculous intervention in my mother's cure. However, the doctor has declared that this cure took place contrary to all his forecastings, and, alas! all his fears. For my part I would be tempted to attribute it to the beneficent influence of the sacrament of Extreme Unction."

"Better and better," interrupted Ernest Van Dormael, with a mocking smile. "M. Van Dael, I see, is actually two centuries behind the age. He imagines an invalid can be cured, thanks to the marvellous effect of a little bottle of oil!"

"Sir," Joseph replied calmly and with dignity, "I will take good care not to seek to contradict you. As far as I am personally concerned, I consent to be classed, not a century or two, but indeed eighteen centuries, if need be, behind, if, to be counted among the wise men, the adepts of the present time, it is absolutely necessary to enrol one's self in the ranks of the libres-penseurs. Only," he continued, with increasing energy, "please, abstain, I beg, from wounding in this my religious sentiments, from turning into derision my most-cherished, my holiest beliefs; that is a rash impiety a Christian can not tolerate. Do you then think, sir, you can shake, weaken, by your doubts, your raileries, that august and holy religion which has been the strength and consolation of mankind for so many hundreds of years?"

"In any case I hope I am free to express my opinion, to give my advice. Why do you wish I should respect your rites, your mysteries—I who do not believe in them?"

"Ah! you do not believe in them! Well, I predict a day will come when you will regret not having believed; an hour will come when you will invoke with the supreme anguish of remorse and despair, the presence, the succor of a minister of God. But that God you shall have contemned, will He then grant you those precious means of asslation, those all powerful graces you shall have so often turned into derision? He alone knows! For my part I pray He may deign not to remember at that hour the blasphemies uttered by you against His heavenly goodness."

"But, allow me, my dear Joseph," said M. Morren here interrupted, eagerly desirous of giving another turn to this conversation so awkwardly begun, "what, I beg have all these explanations in common with the resolution you have taken of going to serve at Rome? Don't you know that to devote yourself to the defence of the Pope is to embrace a party without support and without hope—to dedicate yourself to a desperate enterprise, a lost cause?"

"As I told you, uncle," replied Joseph, become calm and serious, "I enter the Sovereign Pontiff's service in order to fulfil the vow solemnly formed by me during my mother's illness. But how, I beg, do you discover that the sacred cause of the common Father of the faithful is, as you say, a cause without support and without hope? Let us suppose that one of your neighbors—let him be named Jean Broron or Victor Emmanuel—without more ceremony, prepares to take possession of your orchard, your garden, your meadows, alleging that he wants those different portions of land to enlarge his estate. In that case would you look favorably upon those of your neighbors or friends who would appear disposed to sustain those exorbitant pretensions? As to my cousin Victor, would he really deserve to be called your son, if he would not entirely devote himself to the defence of your rights, even to exposing and sacrificing his life? And now, when a usurper, whom the just sentence of history will brand, when a crowned invader has ravished from my Father the possessions that rights the most imprescriptible, and contracts the most sacred, have guaranteed him, could I, ungrateful child, degenerate son, resolve to look on with folded arms while this act of violence, this work of treason was accomplished and the idea not even occur to me of upholding my glorious flag, defending my Father, drawing my sword! Oh! in that case would I not, bid farewell to my glorious name of Roman Catholic?"

"Bravo! Joseph!" cried Victor; "well said! you are the worthy descendant of the old Crusaders, our fathers. See now what consequences the consecration of those soi-disant principles of the extension of nationalities they are so audaciously striving to apply to Italy entail! Let the Emperor Napoleon discover some day that it is quite natural and perfectly legitimate to fix no other limits to his empire than its natural frontiers—the Rhine, the Rhone, the Alps and the ocean—what'll become of Belgium then, and what'll she have to say? Isn't that as clear, gentlemen, as the sun at noonday?"

"No, capperi! cried the young Italian. "There's a great, a notable difference between the two hypotheses, Monsieur Victor. The Unita d'Italia—my dear sir, don't forget that!

Italy ought to be Italian—you can't deny it, and for that reason she ought to be one. Ah! the unity of Italy! All Italians desire it—wish it. Corpo di Bacco! The interest of a single class ought not to prevail against the interests of all. The Pope, whether he wishes it or not, will be forced to yield. Our beautiful country has but too long groaned under the yoke of foreign tyrants, nobles, and priests."

"So, sir, it is the unity of Italy you want,—it is that you wish for?" replied Joseph, with a slight smile. "And yet you know it is a dream—a chimera to which all the audacious attempts, all the triumphant arms of the Revolution can never give reality or life. Your ardent Carbonari hardly believe in it, and their more intelligent chiefs believe in it still less. Would you like to know what the great men—the zealous leaders of the Italian movement—have said of this soi disant unity of Italy, applauded in every accent, popularized in every form? 'The independence and unity of Italy,' wrote the Freemason Felice, then residing at Ancona, in 1829, 'are only vague dreams, vain utopias. But in the demanding of those rights, in the claiming of those impossible possessions, we find precious means of agitation, excitement, enthusiasm, and, consequently, we can make use of them.' Moreover, this avowal from the lips of the tribune, the great agitator, Vindici, at Castellamare, in 1838, dissipates all doubts, tears aside every veil from the tendencies and final aim of the Revolution: 'We have resolved,' said that factionist, 'not to allow in future a single Christian to remain on the face of the earth. The Church is our enemy; we will hurl it from its throne, and with our valiant hands dig its grave.' Rash madmen! Didn't even the experience of eighteen centuries teach them that the Church, at the moment of the most imminent danger, triumphs over the apparent death in which it is thought to be sunk, and suddenly arises, radiant and glorious, scattering widespread ruin over the graves of her persecutors? Ah! to be sure, your device, 'Unita d'Italia,' may be pompons and sonorous, but, indeed, it is vain and illusory. I tell you, beware of uplifting it on your flags, at the head of your battalions, before our more modest and more Christian 'Pro Petri Sede'—'For the See of Peter'—for, be convinced, if you were so audacious, you might expect the final humiliation of an irreparable defeat, all the more bitter and decisive after the ephemeral pride and exaltation of a fleeting triumph."

The conversation, thus begun, continued in this strain for several minutes longer, during which nothing was talked of but the political and religious situation of the Sovereign Pontiff, and the conditions of the existence of his temporal sovereignty. At length, Joseph, supported by his cousin Victor—who, during this discussion, had displayed an exact knowledge of the situation and of the facts, as well as a noble spirit of equity and remarkable good sense—overwhelmed the two Liberals under the weight of arguments so solid and reasonings so happy, that they soon prepared to take leave of the entire company, and at length withdrew, giving unequivocal signs of discontent, spleen and rancor.

"Per Bacco!" murmured the Italian Maso, as soon as they had gained the door, "if in place of finding myself now in Antwerp, I was in Italy, I would have recourse to my good dagger to promptly close the mouth of that odious soldier of the Pope. And, upon my faith, your friend Victor Morren would deserve it just as much. What business had he meddling?"

"Joseph," observed M. Morren to the young man, who remained with him in his room, "I'm afraid you have greatly irritated those gentlemen by your discourse and your violent retorts. You are a valiant champion, my good nephew. Woe to him who dares attack your principles in your presence!"

"My dear uncle, believe me it is for your sake alone I sincerely regret what has passed; but, as for those gentlemen, they only got what they deserved."

"Certainly," replied Victor. "My dear, good cousin, you have fought valiantly, with a sincere heart and loyal arms. That Maso, with his conceited airs, his provoking audacity, and his sinister look has to me the very air of a rabid conspirator—a dangerous man. That name, Roccabianca, with its romantic tournaire, its sonorous syllables—is it actually his real name? It may be doubted."

At this moment Madame Morren, who had returned from the garden, accompanied by her dear Mary, came in. The conversation then became more intimate; they talked particularly of the happy recovery of Madame Van Dael, of Joseph's approaching departure, and of the state of things in Italy.

M. Morren, finding he had henceforward to sustain and defend single-handed his opinions against a number of adversaries so justly formidable, had at length to recognize that the Pope's cause was not so bad nor so desperate as he had at first affirmed. He, nevertheless, persisted in blaming, in a sense, his nephew's resolution.

"You are doing a foolish thing, my poor child," he said, "there's no doubt of it. But it is a generous and heroic folly. I venerate and admire the man who knows how to sacrifice his life in defence of his faith."

The hour of departure at length struck. The young people took affectionate leave of Madame Morren, their good aunt. Joseph walked in front, giving his arm to Victor, while M. Morren followed at some distance, escorting his niece Mary. The two young men seemed to engage in a serious and interesting conversation; they were evidently interchanging their intimate, perhaps their most secret thoughts.

When they reached the station, the train was about to start; so the brother and sister had hardly time to take leave of their friends, and address a last friendly salutation, when the train already moved off.

"Adieu, adieu, my children," cried M. Morren.

"Addio," repeated Joseph, quite proud of his first conquest in the domain of the sweet Italian tongue. "Adieu, until we meet again in one country or the other."

Again they exchanged a salutation, a glance, and the train disappeared.

But when M. Morren went into his library next morning at the accustomed hour, he remarked at once, to his very great surprise, that his son was not there. While the various motives that might have caused the absence of his dear Victor at that hour passed through his mind, his eyes chanced to fall upon an open letter placed upon the table before him. He took up this letter and read it, and then grew visibly pale; a rush of blood mounted to his cheeks and as quickly disappeared, leaving them livid; his lips contracted violently, his teeth gnashed, a gloomy glance flashed from his half-closed eyes, beneath his frowning brow, and stretching out his hand, he hurriedly rang the bell before him at the side of the mantel-piece.

CHAPTER IV.

THE CHILD OF THE RICH AND THE CHILD OF THE POOR.

"WELL, Father John, what news?" asked stout Sus, the blacksmith of Sebrambeek—who, in the midst of a group of impatient villagers, awaited with curiosity, the goodman's coming—one fine evening of old Piquet as he left the Eagle Tavern.

"What news, Oh! great news, my boys. But I must tell you, I didn't get it from the papers."

"What is it then! Tell us, Father John, don't keep us in suspense."

"Well, then, tell me, do you know the Pope of Rome?"

"No, no, not at all," cried several voices in the crowd.

"That is to say," replied Tist, the baker, "we do not know him personally; but you may be sure we're not such folk as to be ignorant of his name and existence."

"That's all that's necessary," sententiously responded old

Piquet. "Well, know then, the Italians have resolved to deprive him of every acre of land he possesses."

"Ah! the brigands!" cried the blacksmith. "Ah! if I had them stretched on my anvil——"

"Silence, Sus, and let me finish. When I've done every one will be free to say what he's got to say. I told you, the Italians have resolved to seize upon the Pope's entire dominions, inasmuch as they want to make one large kingdom of Italy, to which they naturally wish to give a capital—and it's the city of Rome they've thought of for that. They want to compel the Pope, then, and the other princes, to give to them the cities and territories they've still in their hands.

"And if they won't give them up?" asked Wouters, the carpenter.

"Then," observed Tist, "they will take them forcibly. That's the way now-a-days."

"It is as clear as daylight," answered the blacksmith; "but at the same time, it's as black as the face of the devil himself."

"As to that," replied old Piquet, "it doesn't seem to me as clear as you say, and no more will it be so easily done as you seem to suppose. Know that at this moment a large number of young men, full of hope and resolution, strong and courageous as lions, are going to Rome to fight the Italians and protect the Holy Father."

"To be sure, I know that," retorted the short, stout, fat-faced proprietor of the Cross-Bow Tavern, in a disdainful tone. "It seems to me you think you are the only one that reads the papers. But what have these affairs in common with your Schrambeck news?"

"Well, since you won't wait for the news in question, here it is: Joseph Van Dael is going to leave the village here in a few days. He's going to Rome to enter the Pope's service."

"Bravo! it's well of him. Joseph Van Dael is a brave lad!" they all cried.

"For my part," continued Father John, in a mysterious tone, "I would readily believe—and indeed it seems to me I heard—that Joseph is going to serve at Rome, and fight the Italians, to fulfil a vow he made to obtain from God his mother's cure."

"Better still. Joseph Van Dael is a good son!" cried all these fine fellows.

Teresa, the old beggar-woman, attracted by all this noise, had approached the group.

"Well, Mother Teresa, do you know the news? Joseph Van Dael is going to Rome," said the carpenter to her.

"As if I didn't know it," replied the beggar-woman, bursting out laughing. "Well, what is there to say to that? Joseph Van Dael has a right to do so; and, besides, he'll not be the only one to go there I hope."

And, disdaining any clearer explanation, she hurried off at once, knocking her crutch noisily on the pavement, as she made her way to the hamlet of Laarhoven, in the neighborhood of Schrambeck, to visit her son Martin, who was in service with a farmer.

"I would like to know what he'll say to my project, my poor dear boy," she murmured as she limped along. "And then the farmer, and his wife and children, who like my good Martin so much! Ah! who'd ever have thought it? But isn't it really him I see there near the hedge with farmer Andries? Yes, yes; I'm not mistaken."

The young man the cripple had seen was a fine, vigorous lad, with well-developed muscles, broad shoulders, and round massive head covered with a forest of fair curly hair. Woe to him who would have aroused the anger and fallen into the hands of that giant, that athlete! It is only just, however, to say that the brave, robust Martin had a frank, open bearing, and a quiet, honest look; that the glance of his blue eyes expressed the benevolence, peace, and gentleness of a good and loving heart, and a tranquil conscience. This big Martin the laborer seemed indeed to unite the strength of the lion to the meekness of the dove,

"Martin," said Teresa, going up to him, and motioning him to advance, "couldn't you accompany me a few steps of the road? I have something pressing and important to tell you,"

"Here I am. What is it, mother?"

"You'll know. Come this way; follow me."

Both then left the field, and Teresa resumed: "My dear Martin, my son, you must go to Rome."

"I to Rome, mother? But I don't know how to read,"

"What! my poor boy do you think I'm sending you there to be come learned? No, no; 'tis to fight I want you to go there."

"To fight? But when I was young didn't you tell me it was very wrong to fight, mother?"

"Certainly, when it's foolish to fight with backguards, idlers and scamps in the streets. But it has nothing to do with that now. You'll not fight on your own account, Martin; you'll fight for the Pope."

"Why so, mother? What are they going to do to the Pope, then, that he wants me so badly to fight for him?"

"They're going to take away his States from him, drive him out of Rome, his capital,—aren't they capable of everything, those malefactors who dare to attack him? Martin, don't you remember what I told you when you were only yet a very little boy—that the Pope is our father, and that we ought to love, honor and help him as our father? So, my son, just as you would have had to help and protect your dead father, you ought now go and defend the Pope."

"You've already said it, mother. But what good would I do the Pope if I go thus all alone to help and defend him?"

"But, foolish boy that you are, you'll not go all alone. Just now, in every country in the world, there are volunteers who are going to Rome to protect the Pope; already there's a large number in our own country. Well, what do you want now? Why do you look so embarrassed; you don't hesitate to go—to enlist—I hope?"

"Hesitate, mother?" Oh! certainly not; for, at all events, the Pope is the Pope, and we are all his children. But—"

"Well, what does that 'but' mean?"

"But I don't know the way. I have never been there," cried Martin, despairingly.

"Bah! what nonsense! Joseph Van Dael is going to Rome, and you'll keep him company. Take good care that nothing happens to him, for it is to you I commend him. I hope you haven't forgotten to whom your mother owes her life. Now, you know, I couldn't by myself pay Madame Van Dael all I owe her. But the mother's debt is the son's debt: so, if ever you happen to see any danger threatening the widow's son, defend him, sacrifice your life, if necessary, to save his."

"Enough, mother—I go. You needn't say any more. And yet—"

"Well, what next?" interrupted Teresa, impatiently.

"It is when I'll have gone, mother, you'll find yourself without any support, and all alone in the world."

"Come, come, don't let such a little thing disturb you, my brave son. I'm only a poor woman, it is true, but I'll get on very well as long as I have life, and if I come to die, some good Christian soul will be found to give the old beggar-woman six feet of earth. Once more, my lad, don't busy yourself with such trifles. So, every thing is arranged, and you're really ready to go?"

"It's all right, mother. And when do we go?"

"I'm going to find Joseph, and, when I'll have spoken to him, I'll come back and fetch you, that you may have an understanding together. Now, go tell the farmer from me that you're obliged to leave him."

At the same hour that Teresa was limping towards the hamlet of Laarhoven, a moving and painful scene, a solemn colloquy took place between an afflicted father and son in the library of M. Morren, our old acquaintance. The old man still held in his trembling hands the fragments of the letter he had found on the table. Before him stood his son Victor, disheartened and abashed like a criminal in presence of his judge.

"Have you lost your reason, my son?" stammered the old man. "Is it, can it be yours—this letter I've found that I've torn to pieces in my just anger? The testimony of my eyes assures me, indeed, and yet I can't believe it."

"Dear father, that letter is mine. Forgive me—I should have otherwise acquainted you of my resolution—my wishes—but I feared to afflict you, and I hadn't the courage."

"I can easily believe it. But how had you the audacity to communicate to me in writing your mad projects, your absurd folly?"

"My folly, father! It is thus, you recollect, you qualified the generous action of my cousin Joseph; but you qualified it, at the same time, as a generous, an heroic folly? Now, should this act which, being done by your nephew, seemed to you praiseworthy become absurd and reprehensible only because your son purposes doing it?"

"Folly, I repeat—signal madness, manifest aberration, phantom of a sick mind and a feverish imagination," cried M. Morren, striking the table and pacing from one end of the gallery to the other. After a few moments he seemed to become suddenly calm, and placed himself, still and immovable, opposite the unhappy Victor.

"And you come to ask my consent at the moment of accomplishing this act of signal madness?"

"Certainly, father; such, I know, is the duty of a submissive son, and—"

"A submissive son, say you? Irony, temerity, falsehood! Yes, you are a submissive son; yes, you are as docile as the serpent rending in its rage the bosom of the benefactor who imprudently warned it. Then what do you say to me in this insolent epistle? That you have heard the voice of the Lord speaking to your soul, and ordering you to quit everything—your father, your country—to go to fight, to suffer, perhaps, for the holiest of causes; that you will not remain deaf to this voice. All these big words—admit it frankly—do they not clearly signify that, to follow the impulse of your blind fanaticism, you are quite resolved to keep no account of my advice, but put in execution, at any cost, your culpable and insane resolution?"

"Certainly not; it's not that I meant, father. I have asked your consent, I ask it again on my knees, by my prayers and my tears, and, before I've got it, you'll not see me go. O father! forgive me my great temerity in consideration of my affliction;—are you not afraid of having already too long offended heaven by your doubts, your sarcasms, and your indifference? Oh! don't place yourself between me and my duty, between me and my God, I entreat, I conjure you. Don't seek to separate me from my Saviour, to make me, in turn, ungrateful and faithless; for, father, if I were retained and turned aside by you, I'd be afraid God would justly smite you with some unforeseen adversity, some sudden and terrible chastisement."

"A trace to your menaces, your sermons, I beg," M. Morren here interrupted, in a cold and disdainful tone; "you ought to know I am not disturbed by the one nor moved by the other. But you say, don't you, that you'll not leave if you don't obtain my consent? Then I'm easy—you'll never go. How can you suppose—" and here the agitated old man recommenced to traverse the room, with hasty steps—"how could you have supposed I'd be so weak and senseless as to sacrifice my son—my only dear child, the pride of my old age and the joy of my life? And for what good cause, too, would I sacrifice him, I beg? For the defence of priests and monks whom I never liked, and whom I can't bear—"

"Father, for pity's sake—" interposed Victor, with bent brow and suppliant voice.

"For a foreign Pontiff, a Pope of Rome, for whom I don't care. You're pleased to call him—aren't you?—the Father of the Faithful—but am not I your father—I who reared you, I who nourished you, I who have loved you? And, ungrateful fellow, you want to leave me? And, pray tell me what has the Pope done for you, that his interest, his authority should thus supersede mine?"

"Oh! forgive me, father; I respect you, I love you, I'm not ungrateful," cried poor Victor. "Oh! if I could only tell you how much I love you!"

"You love me, cruel child! And you say you want to leave me! How can I believe you? Still, I'm wrong to irritate myself; I feel it and confess it. It's myself alone I ought to blame. I alone am guilty, since I allowed your mother to bring you up in the vain, foolish practices of her bigotry and superstition. It is she, I'm sure, has inspired this culpable extravagance, this mad resolution."

"No, father, I swear to you," Victor here interposed, raising his head with calm dignity, and extending his hand as if to call heaven to witness the truth of his words. "Your suspicions are unjust; my mother has had nothing to do with my resolution. I haven't told her of it, and to this moment she knows nothing of it."

"And, now," continued the unhappy old man, "I would crown a long series of weaknesses and imprudences by an act of signal folly! I would expose your life to chance, to the fury of the Revolution, for the sake of I know not what divine rights, I know not what principles! No, no. Let us speak no more of it, Victor; and, remember well, if you should now ask my consent to go and fight under the flags of Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel, you'd obtain it just as little."

"But, father," resumed the young man, hesitating a little as if he regretfully recurred to this argument to gain the victory, "didn't you say yesterday you always had a sincere respect, a profound esteem, for the man who sacrifices his life in defence of his faith? So, don't you see you contradict yourself now?"

"But what is your faith? What are your principles?" replied the father, at once confused and irritated. "Nothing but bigotry, superstition, illusions, falsehoods! In fine I declare it is useless to discuss it any longer. Don't count on my consent; you'll never obtain it. This is my last word, and you know I'm accustomed to keep my word."

"O father!" cried the young man bursting into tears and embracing his angry father's knees. "Have pity on your son, don't look inflexible. I shall die of regret, of langor, if you refuse me. Can you pronounce my sentence of death, my best friend, my father? Could you, unmoved, see your son suffer and die because he sacrificed his heart's emotions to your paternal will?"

M. Morren knew well his son's extreme sensitiveness, which, at the same time, did not exclude a remarkable firmness of character. At that moment his father's heart began to be touched; he knew well that a fatal issue was possible and might perhaps be near.

"Unhappy child!" he cried in a voice husky from love and anger. "Victor, O my son Victor, you'll drive me mad, perhaps kill me. After all, happen what may, it doesn't matter. I prefer to see you die of languor by my side than send you to a distant land to fall miserably under foreign bullets. Besides, I'm mad myself to entertain such fears; one dies not so easily at your age. Go away and drive those projects, those absurd visions from your mind. Go," he repeated in a severe and irritated tone, "or I'll leave the place. I've had but too much kindness, too much indulgence for your rash discourses and foolish visions."

The young man, without replying then left, with bent brow, and tears in his eyes, while his father, a prey to painful emotion, continued to pace the room, his head drooping on his breast. But Victor, turning towards the staircase, suddenly found himself in presence of his mother, who glanced at him with lively astonishment. They descended together, and repaired to the lime-tree grove, where, seated on a verdant bank, Victor repeated to his mother all that had occurred.

"My dear Victor," she said, "your father is very far from having such an opinion of you; they are only vain words, unreflecting accusations that escaped from him in his anger."

"But the vow I have formed—my resolution, mother, that my father will never, never, alas! permit me to accomplish?"

"Your resolution, my son! ah! God alone knows how it grieves a mother's heart! And yet should I hesitate a moment to let you accomplish that act of devotion, of generous sacrifice that God certainly requires of you since He Himself has inspired it. No, I should not be less resigned, less strong and courageous than Joseph's mother—my dear, noble sister. And, Victor, my dear son, if your devotion should only be crowned in heaven; if the most painful of all trials were imposed on me, I'd still esteem myself happy to be the mother of a martyr. But, as you say, my poor child, I fear you can't obtain your father's consent. He doesn't understand, like us, the duties, the sacred mission, the will of God imposes on you. Be assured, then, my son, of all the goodness and indulgence of God, who will certainly exhibit His satisfaction at your good intentions, your generous abnegation, and will not demand from you an account of that vow your father's wishes shall have prevented you accomplishing."

"Then the justice of God will weigh heavily on my father. Oh! I would a hundred times rather be the only one to expiate, the only one to suffer."

"Well, my dear Victor, let us redouble our zeal, piety and fervor, every time we pray for the salvation, the conversion of your father. Oh! the Lord will at length be touched by so many prayers, so many tears; we will triumph, my son; a secret hope tells me so."

The young man seemed to reflect for an instant, observing a profound silence; suddenly, trembling and raising his head he cried:

"Mother I must—I ought to go!"

"But your father forbids you. Where is then your resolution? Will you persist in braving the paternal authority?"

"Oh! certainly not. But this consent, I feel I ought to obtain it at any price. Mother, I must go, I must; God calls me. Ah! if I could tell you everything! But no; it is a secret that belongs not to me alone—that I ought to bear with me into the tomb."

Madame Morren here fixed a glance of profound astonishment upon her son.

"What, Victor! secrets from your mother! Oh! believe me, this is bad, this is unheard of, and above all very cruel! My child, my beloved son, give me what belongs to me, give me my part, let me lighten your burden or share your pain."

"Well," replied the young man resolutely, "since you wish it, mother, you shall know all. Listen, dear mother, and when you'll know you'll blame me no longer." And here he bent over close to his mother's face, and blushing murmured some words in a low, tender, and almost inaudible voice.

His mother's countenance beamed with the light of heavenly joy; a look of ecstasy and love glanced through her tearful eyes, and doubtless reached, through the azure depths, the throne of the Divine Majesty.

"Oh, Victor, my dear son! Oh! what a treasure heaven has given me! Yes, my dear son, you shall go, even if your mother were to address her last prayers to heaven, and shed her last tears for you!"

And, pressing him to her heart, she imprinted on his brow the holiest, the tenderest, and sweetest of holy maternal kisses.

"Alas!" resumed the young man sadly, "my father will not consent; he'll keep his word."

"God will help us; we'll unite our prayers, my son. I'll undertake to speak to him; to renew your entreaties. God will do the rest; confidence, my child, and good hope. Go, now, and rest yourself and resign yourself to the protection of God and your mother's efforts."

Madame Morren had no doubt presumed too much on the influence she ordinarily exercised over her husband's mind. M. Morren remained deaf to all arguments; indifferent to all reasonings, insensible to all prayers.

"Such is my will; my resolution is immovable," he repeated in a determined tone. "Let Victor cease to solicit me; let him be resigned; I'll never, never, consent to this departure."

And Victor appeared to be resigned, and ceased to importune his father. But a few days had not passed by when the wearied look of his young face betrayed the fatal traces of those secret pangs, those holy, saddening aspirations. The young man with the rosy complexion, the brilliant eyes, the light, graceful, yet robust figure, gave place to a sad and gentle dreamer, a frail exile who seemed drooping towards the shadows of the tomb. Now this complete change, as sudden as fearful, naturally could not escape a father's eye. The old man grew anxious, afflicted, and yet would not give in.

"My consent" No, never! never!" he repeated after each new terror, each new grief. Indeed, could a skeptical and indifferent, incredulous and unbelieving father, consent of himself to the accomplishment of that sacrifice of an only and tenderly loved son on the altar of faith and love?

CHAPTER V.

THE DEPARTURE.

The much-desired day at length dawned. It was one of the calmest, purest, the sun had ever adorned with its radiant light.

The whole village of Schrambeck was en fête. From the trees overshadowing the great market-place depended the Belgian tricolor, or Pontifical banners displaying on a white ground the Tiara and Cross-keys. The façades of several buildings and some large houses were decorated with devices expressive of joy and prosperity to the defenders of the Holy Father. Some of the town-folk were putting the last finishing touch to the decorations of their dwellings; others, including several of our old acquaintances, were assembled near the church door exchanging comments and reflections.

"What are they waiting for so long? They ought to be here already," declared the hostess of the Cross-bow.

"Bah! they can't be long now," replied the rural guard. "Half an hour ago I saw Martin, happy as a king and newly accoutred, going into Madame Van Dael's."

"Was his mother with him?" asked the baker's wife.

"Not a doubt of it," replied the blacksmith. "Truly that old Teresa is a brave woman."

"She's a good soul any way," said Wouters, the carpenter. "But, don't you know Madame Van Dael and Joseph spared neither applications, trouble, nor efforts to get that poor old Teresa into the almshouse? It's certainly a great happiness for her; she has now an asylum and a morsel of bread for the rest of her days."

"Indeed those Van Daels are excellent people," continued the blacksmith, Sus. "If I could be any use whatever to the lady, in Joseph's absence, she may count on me; I am entirely devoted to her. There's nothing I'm not ready to do to please her."

"What a pity Victor Morren can't accompany them!" sighed old father John. "The poor lad would have given his right hand to obtain his father's consent; but that stubborn old Morren wouldn't listen to him." 'Twas Joseph told me, for he got a letter from his cousin, who'd be here now rejoicing, and ready to go, if his father were more tractable.

"Here they are! here they are!" suddenly shouted the spectators grouped in the high street of the village. For Madame Van Dael approached with Joseph and Mary, Teresa following with her son Martin.

The young volunteers were received with clapping of hands as well as vociferous and sympathetic acclamations. Old Jean Pierre Piquet, who had made his way to the front, applauded with all his vigor, to show the sincerity of his enthusiasm.

"Bravo! Joseph, bravo! Martin; you're an honor to Schrambeck!"

"Indeed, my friends, you're too good; believe me, we don't deserve such honor," said young Van Dael, cordially shaking hands with Piquet and his honest companions.

"You deserve much more," responded Piquet in a determined tone. "I served under Napoleon, and you know I'm proud of it; but I'd be prouder still if I could serve the Pope. Ah! I'd like to be able to go with you, Joseph; only these old bones have refused to do service.

"No matter, my friends," replied the young volunteer; "while we'll be fighting yonder, you'll not forget, at least, to pray for the Pope and us. In this way we'll all work together unitedly for the triumph of the same just, noble, and holy cause. And as soon as, on my arrival in Rome, I shall be presented to the Pope, I'll beg him to send his benediction to all his children in Schrambeck." Here Joseph's voice was lost in the midst of a tumult of bravos, huzzas, and joyful exclamations.

Already the majestic sounds of the organ floated in long cadences under the church roof—one had said a hymn of victory blending with the meek and humble murmur of an ardent prayer breathed by angel voices. At one time the moving strains of a sweet and impressive melody rose with a delicious harmony and flew to heaven on the wings of the breeze; at another, resounded the metallic notes of the trumpet, proclaiming deadly vengeance to the enemy, while the lugubrious and sonorous roll of the solemn, far-sounding drum, broke on the ear, like the mutterings of the thunder, ragnacing, at God's command, the guilty and the impious.

The new volunteers accompanied by their relatives, had entered the church, where most of the inhabitants of Schrambeck had already assembled, and knelt side by side at the foot of the altar. The venerable curé, vested in his white surplice, was not long making his appearance, emerging from the sacristy, and slowly approaching the altar, where he knelt and intoned the Veni Creator, while his voice, trembling under the sway of profound emotion, blended with the majestic strains of the choir, invoking the power and favor of the Lord God of Armies.

When the last notes of the solemn hymn had ceased to resound through the church, the priest, turning towards the young warriors, addressed them in his paternal language, at once simple and eloquent, tender words of adieu in his name and that of all the inhabitants of the parish, vividly and touchingly portraying the sufferings and oppression that overwhelmed the Church and See of Peter, and the glorious mission of those who courageously devoted themselves to its defence. "Go, children of my love," he pursued, "go, fly to the combat, full of zeal and valor! The God of Armies will environ you with His strength and His glory; He will overshadow you with His wings, at once your rampart and your buckler. He has given His angels charge over you, to keep you in all your ways. In the midst of the combat, He will fight by your side; and you may then see accomplished those words of the sacred volume: 'A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee. But thou shalt consider with thine eyes, and shalt see the reward of sinners.' And, dear children, on your joyful return we will intone the Te Deum of deliverance, more striking and solemn still, than that hymn of invocation in which we have implored God's benediction and graces."

The priest descended from the altar, the congregation left the church, and the stirring strains of the Schrambeck band playing the Belgic national airs, caught up by the crowd and repeated with incredible vigor, as, singing and clapping hands, they proceeded to the railway station in the midst of a regular transport of joy and enthusiasm, filled the air with music.

They were not long in reaching the station, quite near the market-place. Joseph and Martin shook hands several times with their friends and acquaintances, and then withdrew to bid their families a last farewell. Madame Van Dael was pale but firm; Joseph was equally courageous and resigned; but Mary, younger and weaker, shed torrents of tears. Teresa, meanwhile, had taken Martin aside, and placed in his hands a bag containing twenty-five francs she had got from Madame Van Dael and others in charity, and which she sent as an offering to the Pope.

At length the train drew up, the clock struck, and the band immediately began Magzari's fine popular air, the "Hymn to Pius IX." Then a last clasp of the hand, a last embræ, and mother and son, sister and brother, were separated for a long time; hats, handkerchiefs, and friendly hands were waved in air; and a great shout of joy burst from the crowd. "Long live the Pontiff King! Long live his valiant army! Farewell! farewell!" and "Come back conquerors," were the exclamations that accompanied them as the train moved rapidly off.

But what had become of Victor all this time?

The young man seemed completely metamorphosed, his face beamed with such hope and confidence. His mother and he had struggled so courageously, prayed so humbly, that M. Morren had at length yielded to the influence of that mute despair, those tender and fervent prayers. Besides, his philosophic pride triumphed over his obstinacy. Nothing irritated him so much as the justly merited reproach of partiality and inconsistency, and his wife continually insisted on the flagrant contradiction between his actions and his principles. He always professed, and loudly proclaimed, as an essential maxim, that every one was free to act according to his convictions; he even looked on the man who did not conform his acts to his principles, at any cost, as a coward and a poltroon. Yet he refused Victor leave to act according to the inspirations of his conscience and the bent of his mind, and thus placed himself in contradiction with his principles.

Thus, paternal love long struggled with the austere stoicism of the philosopher in that lacerated heart. Then the god of the free-thinkers—Pride of Reason—triumphed. Still, paternal love, it must be admitted, had its share in that decisive victory; for M. Morren could not witness, without a lively emotion, the habitual state of lassitude and suffering that, from day to day, gravely menaced Victor's health, and seemed to presage a fatal issue of this struggle between the aspirations of the son and the repugnance of the father.

"After all, Victor is of age, and consequently free to do as he likes," said he one day, irritated and fatigued by this useless resistance. "I consent then to his going if he persists in his design. But let him not imagine, however, that I can ever approve of such conduct."

Desirous of avoiding as much as possible painful parting scenes, he had resolved to go away for some days, and not return until Victor had left for Rome; but intimated that if Victor wished he might come and say good-bye.

Victor hastened to respond to his father's summons.

"Oh! how happy you have made me and how much I thank you!" he cried, going in, and clasping his hands.

"No thanks," interrupted the old man harshly, "my weakness, I know well, only deserves reproaches. Oh! unhappy child," he continued, in a gentler tone, his eyes already filling with tears, "you, whom I have loved so much, and who, in return have given me such pain, may you be happier in your hazardous enterprise than your father! Farewell! don't forget us, and may I soon see you back!"

"O father, I have strong hopes of it: God will grant us that—the greatest happiness of all. And let me tell you a time will come, I'm sure, when you'll bless that favorable and happy hour when you let me go, and then you'll know—yes, you'll surely know how much I love you!"

And here Victor, tenderly clasping the hand extended to him, dropped a loving tear upon it. The paternal firmness could not resist such sincere affection, such touching tenderness. M. Morren threw his trembling arms around his son's neck and pressed him to his breast.

All this occurred the day before Joseph's departure; consequently there was not time enough for Victor to go to Schrambeck. But he hoped to be able to join his friends at Brussels where the train was to stop; so it was agreed he should start that evening.

Meanwhile, mother and son, their hands clasped in each others, silently tasted the sad joy of a last conversation, a last meeting. For poor Victor, too, it was a very trying moment; but a pure and earnest faith—and faith is strong enough to overcome the weakness of finite perishable human love—animated and sustained his soul.

At length Victor, trembling, broke silence:

"Mother, it is time. At last we must part!"

The poor woman's hands for a moment shook with a painful trembling; then, controlling herself with a powerful effort, she replied in a calm, firm, but infinitely tender voice:

"Well, my dear child, my beloved Victor, may God's will be done! Let us separate, full of faith and confidence, like the early martyrs. And take this last souvenir from the mother who loves you."

Here she gave him her portrait, on the back of which she had traced with a firm hand these words: "Go, my son; obey the call of our God! May His angels watch over you every instant of your life. Fear nothing, my child, but God and sin. Pray for us all, and particularly your father. Pray for your mother, who blesses you from the bottom of her soul, who will constantly pray for you, and whose love, whose heart, whose thoughts will follow you unceasingly wherever you shall be. Your mother and friend, Rose Morren.—Mary, I confide my beloved child to you; preserve from all evil, I entreat you, his pure and innocent soul. Ask your Divine Son to deign to restore him to us, at least if such is His Divine will. But, above all, let my son ever remember the words of Queen Blanche to her royal pupil, and be happy to die rather than offend God."

"Oh! thanks, thanks, mother," cried Victor, deeply moved. "I'll never forget that advice in those noble words. This gift of your love will rest on my heart; it will surely protect me against the poniards and balls of the enemies of the Church; and if God grants me the grace of one day joyfully returning to embrace you, I will triumphantly deposit it in your hands as a glorious souvenir of the holy crusade."

"May God grant you that grace, child," cried the poor mother, sobbing; "but Victor, oh! Victor shall I see you again?"

"Let us hope so, mother. The Lord is omnipotent, and takes care of His own. Don't afflict yourself with vain alarms."

"No, my dear son; have no fears of me. I've already told you I'll not give way to a culpable despair, an unworthy weakness; and, even if the greatest of all sorrows should be reserved for me, God, I hope, will give me grace and strength to say that I am happy to be the mother of a martyr. No, my son, my vision will not be bounded by the narrow horizon of this short life; it will be elevated, if need be, to the pure regions of eternal light, to behold you triumphant at the foot of God's throne!"

"And now, mother," interrupted Victor, kneeling before her, "in the name of my father and yours, give me your blessing." And a tear gushed to the lad's eyes, as he thought of that absent father who had refused to bless him and follow him in his glorious enterprise with the eyes of faith and love.

The mother then raised her eyes to heaven, whence she sought strength and grace to calmly pronounce these solemn words, and, in a voice husky from deep emotion, said:

"May the Lord bless you as your mother blesses you, my beloved child! Fight valiantly for the cause of God and His Holy Church; remain faithful and devoted to the love of your Redeemer; faithful and devoted unto death if the Lord requires it; do all this, as I do it, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." And with her still trembling hand, the noble mother traces the sign of salvation on the pure brow of her son.

"Amen, amen!" sobbed Victor, and, having gone down into the kitchen to take leave of Barbara he rushed into the garden to give free vent to his tears.

Madame Morren followed her son to the door, and, in the midst of her tears gave him her last kiss and embrace. At length, the young man tore himself from her embrace, murmuring: "Farewell, dear, good mother; courage until we meet again. Au revoir!"

"Adieu, my dear child, adieu! May God's grace accompany and protect you everywhere." And suffocated by her tears and overcome by emotion, she broke down at these words.

Then when he had disappeared at the turning of the streets, and she had kissed hands to him for the last time, she returned to her room, where, prostrate at the feet of the Immaculate Virgin she poured out all her heart's grief in a torrent of tears, and addressed the most fervent prayers to her for grace for her son to persevere to the end.

As Victor was going to the station, he was recognized by two strangers.

"I say Ernest, isn't that young Victor Morren?" asked one of them.

"Yes, indeed, it is he. He's going to the railway. Where can he be going, Maso?"

"Per bacco!" suddenly exclaimed the Carbonaro, bethinking himself, "isn't this the day that young Schrambeck fanatic was to set out for Rome? Mightn't Victor be going too?"

"He's simple enough to do so, I think. But it's easy enough for us to ascertain. Let us go at once to Morren's."

A few moments later they knocked at the door. Barbara, still weeping, hastened to open it.

"Is M. Morren at home?"

"No, gentlemen; he went to the country yesterday."

"And his son?"

"Alas! he left for Rome only a moment ago!" And, at these words, the poor servant shed a deluge of tears.

The two visitors feigned the profoundest sympathy, told her to give Madame Morren their most respectful compliments, and without waiting any longer went their way.

"Maledetto Papalino!" cried Maso, clenching his hand. "He shall pay for it, Ernest; yes, he shall pay for it, I swear to you." And while he spoke, his eyes gleamed with hateful fury, like those of the tiger greedy of carnage and ready to fling itself on its timid prey.

As to Victor, when he rejoined the young Pontifical Volunteers at the Brussels Station the same evening, he was at once saluted with a chorus of joyful acclamations.

"Hurrah! hurrah! here's Victor," they cried in a transport of joy, surprise, and enthusiasm.

"Welcome!" repeated Joseph, joyfully, and moved even to tears. "My dear Victor, something told me you wouldn't abandon us here."

And the two young cousins, mustered under the standard of the same God, were clasped in a fraternal embrace.

CHAPTER VI.

ROME.

A few months had passed since the departure of the young volunteers. The Morrens had, as usual, retired for the summer to their beautiful seat at Schrambeck, where Madame Morren could observe the progress of her sister's convalescence.

Since Victor's departure, M. Morren was singularly reserved, dull and dejected, often passing whole days in his library, where no one was accustomed to intrude. He scarcely uttered a word to his wife when they met at meals; and even those he dropped were extremely few and frigid, and tinged with a secret bitterness.

It was certainly very painful for this loving spouse, this afflicted mother, to meet with nothing but coldness and injustice; but she was resolved to persevere to the end in her generous sacrifice, and strove to be calm and courageous, laying her burden and her cross every day at the bleeding feet of Christ and the Mother of Sorrows.

M. Morren, despite all, was too upright and generous at heart not to perceive the injustice, the folly of such conduct; so, when his irritation began to abate, when he gradually reassumed his customary calmness and moderation, he at once became more attentive and affectionate towards that noble and patient wife who had never ceased to bear his coldness and injustice with the most amiable indulgence and the most perfect meekness.

It is true he had not once uttered Victor's name since the day of his departure. But let it not be imagined that the flame of paternal love was utterly extinguished in his soul. Although the proud reason of the philosophe was very far from avowing itself vanquished, there was a secret struggle between the restless solicitude of the father and the apparent indifference of the obstinate stoic. So, immediately after Victor's departure, M. Morren, without saying anything about it, had privately written to an artist friend in Rome, begging him to look after his son and send him news of him.

The husband and wife were scarcely two days installed in their Schrambeek residence when they already expected letters from our young volunteers. The villagers of Schrambeek shared the impatience of both families in this regard,

At length, one morning, at the very moment Madame Morren reached her sister's, the long-expected message arrived. It was a letter bearing the Roman post-mark.

With feverish impatience they tore open the envelope, and immediately two sheets of paper, covered with small close writing, dropped on the table. Victor, judging his parents had repaired to Schrambeek without delay, had joined his letter to his cousin's.

"We have just arrived in Rome," they wrote with filial alacrity, "and we don't like to let to-morrow morning's mail go out without hastily addressing you these lines, which will fully inform you of the principal details and incidents of our voyage. After quitting Paris on Tuesday evening, we reached Lyons on Wednesday morning, and Marseilles that evening. As there was no direct line, we had to go to Civita Vecchia by Leghorn, where we disembarked on Friday evening. As our vessel had to remain a day at anchor in the port, we availed ourselves of this delay to visit Leghorn. We had delightful weather going to Civita Vecchia, where we arrived on Saturday. Oh! what was our happiness, what joyful transports were ours, when at length we were permitted to tread that sacred soil so long the object of our dreams and our desires! We spontaneously flung ourselves on our knees to cover with kisses that sacred land as dear and as precious to us as Palestine was to the valorous Crusaders of yore! But we cannot describe to you the vivacity, the intensity of our rapture when, from the window of the train when traversing the banks of the Tiber, our eyes saw outlined against the blue sky first the grand basilica of St. Paul, then the noble old church of St. Mary-Major, and in fact most of the fine churches of Rome. We alighted at the Porta Portese, where we were received by a large number of our brave compatriots who had preceded us some months." "At that moment," continued Victor, "Tasso's fine verses describing the Crusaders' transports at the sight of the ramparts of Jerusalem occurred to me. Rome, our Jerusalem, lay at our feet, disclosed to our gaze, and I could find no other words to express the transports that filled our hearts than the words of the sublime poet:—

'Ecco apparer Gerusalem ai vedo,
Ecco additer Gerusalem ai scorga;
Ecco da mille voci imitante,
Gerusalemme esultar si sente.'

"But we mustn't forget that good Martin," continued the brave young fellows; "you can't think how happy he is. He says continually that now, for two thousand francs, he wouldn't wish to return to Belgium. The excellent lad is sometimes comical to the last degree, and has amused us prodigiously en route. When we asked him if he hadn't some message to send his mother, he promptly replied: 'Pray tell her that all's for the best; that I'm very well; that the twenty-five francs are still untouched, safe and sound.' When we asked him, on the way, what he thought of the cities we had passed through, he contented himself with replying: 'Bah! it seems to me I am at Liege or Antwerp. It is not such a great thing after all, this journey to Rome. Really it costs no more than to wear out a pair of old shoes in walking.'"

The letter went on in this pleasant strain, which showed the happy dispositions of our young Zouaves, who concluded by promising very soon to send a longer letter, and requesting a prompt reply from their dear friends.

Victor, in a postscript addressed to his mother, had added: "Let me tell you, dear mother, that our separation, your absence, are and always will be very painful to me. Still, from the fervent desire that decided me, I draw an invincible strength, an ineffable consolation, and I thank the Lord, who has so paternally pointed out to me the way I should go, the sacrifice I was to make. Dear mother, may those same motives, those same hopes be your refuge and your consolation! Have no uneasiness on my account; don't afflict yourself; hope in Providence, and draw your courage from the same source whence I have drawn mine—in the thought of the holy duty it is given us to accomplish."

A few days after their arrival they were incorporated in a battalion of Zouaves but were allowed to remain some time at Rome to visit the principal monuments of that sacred city before joining their companions at the camp of Collesepoli.

Penetrating into the dark passages of the Catacombs—those glorious monuments of the heroic piety of the early Christians—in a transport of holy respect and tender fervor, he prostrated himself before the tombs of the martyrs who had bequeathed him their examples, and, in presence of their venerated relics, renewed the vow he had formed in consecrating like them his youth and his life to the defence of the faith.

One day, in the catacomb of St. Callixtus, having knelt before the sepulchre of that glorious pontiff, he suddenly arose radiant and as it were transfigured. He thought he had seen those immortal martyrs arise from their tombs and, joyfully displaying their wounds and their crowns, pour upon his head and into his veins, with their benedictions, some rays of that celestial fire that, in the days of their earthly life, had animated them and guided them to the port.

Another day, accompanied by Joseph and Martin, he went to the basilica of St. Sebastian, where he prayed long and fervently, feeling inspired and doubly fortified at the remembrance of the heroic end of that glorious saint who of all others first merited the honorable title of the Defender of the Church.

His happiness was at length complete when he obtained audience of the common father of the faithful, the good and beloved Pius IX. With what tender exaction, with what joyful tears, he knelt to receive the benediction of that paternal hand to which the Lord had deigned to confide the keys of the kingdom of heaven! But his happiness was to be still greater, as this letter to his mother, written a few days later, shows;

"My dear mother, imagine, if you can, my joy and happiness; We—Joseph, Martin, and I—have just had audience of the Holy Father. Indeed I don't know how to give you an idea of his affectionate affability, his paternal kindness, and the deep impression his noble and saintly presence made on our hearts.

"It is to the obliging intervention of Mgr. S—— we owed, not only this inestimable favor of seeing and conversing with the Holy Father, but also an additional favor, a very special happiness, of which I shall presently have occasion to speak to you.

"We have been admitted to the presence of the Holy Father this evening. While Mgr. S—— preceded us to announce our hour of arrival to his Holiness, we remained in the ante-chamber a long superb gallery, crowded with domestic prelates, chaplains, almoners, &c., all clad in violet, like bishops. I had a long conversation with one of them, who, besides his violet soutane, also wore a ring of the same color, and whom we naturally took for a bishop, titling him Monsignor all the time our conversation lasted, although he hadn't the pectoral cross. We afterwards asked the chaplain of St. Peter's the name of the worthy bishop with whom we chatted so long; he informed us that that prelate was simply one of his Holiness's chamberlains, and we were much amused at this innocent mistake.

*The letters the author here attributes to the two cousins, Victor and Joseph, were really written, almost textually, by young Belgian Zouaves during their sojourn in Rome. Nothing has been taken from, nor added to Martin's words, which were uttered on a similar occasion by a brave and honest volunteer from a village of the Campine.

"A few moments after Mgr. S—came out of the inner apartment and invited us to follow him into the presence of the Holy Father. At that instant we were seized with a sudden and violent emotion; one might have heard the hurried beatings of our hearts, which trembled at once with dread and pleasure. We were then introduced into a small adjoining chamber, furnished with the greatest simplicity, and, after having accomplished all the prescribed ceremonies, at length found ourselves at the feet of the good and noble Pius IX. I can't describe to you the supreme, profound emotion that overwhelmed us at that solemn moment. O mother, I am now amply recompensed for the anguish and bitterness of my sacrifice.

"The Holy Father, after having permitted us to kiss the ring he usually wears on his finger, tapped us gently on the shoulder, saying, with a paternal smile:

"Well, my dear Zouaves, you are all Belgians, I suppose?"

"Yes, Holy Father," I answered, "and our families have sent us here to throw ourselves at your Holiness's feet, and assure you of our profound sentiments of respect and affection, and devotion to the holiest of causes."

"The Holy Father then interrogated us with a solicitude thoroughly amiable and paternal, speaking to us of our country, our friends, our parents. He appeared deeply moved when he learned that Joseph had made a vow to serve him to obtain from heaven his mother's cure. As for me, I spoke to him of you, my good mother, and of my father also; he then promised me to pray for you both.

"But when we had delivered to him poor Teresa's offering (for Martin, in his simplicity, wanted to put the purse into his hands the moment we had entered the room together), a tear glistened in his eyes, and he exclaimed with a voice of emotion:

"This is truly the widow's mite, and who would have the courage to refuse it? But, my children," he continued, "it is quite necessary that I should do something in turn, to worthily recognise your devotion and your faithful affection. Stay; here's a little souvenir I charge you to transmit, in my name, to your parents."

"And speaking thus, he gave us three gold medals.

"But," he resumed an instant after, addressing Joseph, "I forgot that you have a sister. Stay, my son; here's something for her, too." It was a beautiful mother-of-pearl rosary, which Joseph no doubt will send to Schrambeck.

"He still continued, for some moments, to speak to us of our dear and beautiful country, for which he has told us he has always had a deep affection. After that I ventured to make known to him our dearest and most fervent desire, which until then we had not dared to manifest, fearing to importune the Holy Father.

"Holy Father," I said, "we would wish to solicit a very precious favor from your kindness. Could we have the happiness of receiving Holy Communion from your hands, and in that way obtain the graces and benedictions of the Lord for our present enterprise?"

"Assuredly," he replied. "Be at Mass in my chapel to-morrow morning. How could I ever refuse anything to my dear Zouaves."

"Holy Father," we all answered with one accord, "we are profoundly grateful to you for all these proofs of interest and paternal kindness, and we hope in return, with the help of God, to be able to serve you as becomes good and loyal Belgians—that is to say, as true, and devoted soldiers of Christ."

"Then the Holy Father blessed us again, and even deigned to bless some beads and medals we had brought with us; after which he permitted us once more to kiss his ring, and we left the chamber. But suddenly a chamberlain hurried after me, and said the Holy Father desired to speak with me alone.

"Would you believe it, my dear mother, his paternal glance had read my soul, he had discovered, divined my secret—that secret I confided to you in the garden before my departure, and which so deeply moved your Christian heart. And his eyes were now humid, and his tender and emotional voice had a prophetic tone when he murmured in my ear, while I prostrated myself before him:

"Go in peace, my son; the Lord is with you; you have strength and love on your side. The peril is great, perhaps, but the work is noble and holy, and you will triumph!"

"O mother! mother! these words of hope and consolation since then constantly resound in my ears. Was it not our Lord Himself who deigned to speak to me by the voice of His minister and representative on earth?"

"It is impossible for me to describe to you here the sentiments of joy, gratitude and ecstasy that filled our hearts after this visit to the Holy Father. Martin, the simplest and least eloquent among us, was the one who knew, however, how to express them in the sublimest manner when he answered at the moment when, traversing the Vatican, we wanted him to admire all those marvels of art and nature: 'It's little I care about that now! All I desire more is to see the Holy Father again, to receive Communion from his hands, and then die for him. In that case I hope the good God will consent to call me straight to heaven.'

"Surely he was right—our brave and honest Martin. And assuredly we are very happy in having seen our well-beloved Pius IX. to-day, in having conversed with him like children with their father; and to receive to-morrow the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ from his paternal hand.

"Will our compatriot's wish be one day accomplished? I don't know; but in any case I hope, my good mother, that you still feel courageous enough to be the mother of a martyr, if God, in His wisdom, should have so decreed it.

"And now, farewell, dear mother; I must prepare to receive my Redeemer to-morrow. You know well my most fervent prayers will be for you, for your consolation, for your happiness and my father's."

Victor, having finished his letter, was thinking of the great joy, the inestimable favor that awaited him with the first glimpse of morning, when he fell into a sweet, peaceful sleep. But this sleep was soon troubled by agitated dreams,—by a strange vision!

The young man saw stretching before him, farther than his eye could reach, a limitless ocean, whose giant waves, swollen and agitated by the breath of a powerful storm, rose hoarse-responding to the clouds of heaven, scattering everywhere dread, destruction and death! Naked rocks, dark and dangerous, lifted their menacing ridges high over the troubled waters; huge fierce birds flew along the crests of the billows, and enormous marine monsters, with scaly backs and confused and horrible forms, raised their gaping mouths above the surface of the waves in the hope of gulping down the unfortunate shipwrecked mariners who were to be the sport of this horrible tempest.

Still in that vast chaos of light and darkness, clouds and foam, a noble vessel floated, cleaving the roaring waters and preserving in its course a sovereign tranquillity and indescribable majesty. Despite the fury of the winds and the mighty wrath of the waves, it traced, in the midst of the sombre rocks, its broad and luminous track as it might have done on the bosom of some beautiful blue lake on a peaceful summer evening. One had said that all the mariners who manned it were tranquilly sleeping, for none of them was seen in the lofts or rigging; the majestic vessel seemed to steer, bend and move of its own accord without anybody's help. However, calm and solitary, a man was seated at the rudder; it was a venerable old man, whose features, at once august and gracious, very closely resembled those Victor had admired that very day on the noble countenance of the common father of the faithful, and which had made such a profound and lasting impression on his mind. The young man was not slow to perceive that he himself was on board this majestic vessel, sheltered from all danger, in company with some friends and his beloved mother. But, oh terror! in casting a glance of horror and pity on that tumultuous chaos, on those foaming waves, he sees, faint, inanimate and half-swallowed down, a castaway whom the angry waves at one time poise on their crests at another clasp in their sinuous coils and suck down into their whirlpools, while around him the monsters of the abyss grind their sharp teeth, their gnashing jaws, and make ready to devour him. * * * O powers, O decrees of heaven! That miserable wretch is his father!

The courageous Victor has uttered a cry of anguish, and already he has launched—plunged in the midst of the waves.

He struggles with all the strength of despair against the waves, the winds, and the sea monsters. The screaming birds of prey wheel before his eyes and over his head, the monsters of the deep set upon him furiously, rending and bearing away strips of flesh from his body; still he struggles on. A few more struggles, another effort, and he will have saved his father. . . . Alas! a gigantic wave, breaking over him, flings him back. His strength fails him; an icy shudder shakes his exhausted limbs; already the cold hand of death seems to clasp him and drag him down into the abyss. . . . He has resolved, however, to conquer or to die. Courage, forward! forward! At last—at last—he has rejoined, he has seized his father! But the unfortunate old man struggles against him, writhes convulsively, and seems to want to draw him with him into the depths of the gulf. Victor, poor Victor, shall you then be vanquished in that supreme combat of devotion and love? No, the heroic child has cast a prayerful glance towards the noble vessel; he sees his weeping mother pointing to heaven with a radiant countenance, and the divine pilot turns towards him and smiles. Then he utters a cry, murmurs a prayer, and imploring heaven's succor, makes a last effort. . . . At last he has succeeded in raising the old man in his arms and drawing him out of the reach of the hungry monsters seeking to tear him to pieces. . . . He has regained the vessel—he has placed the poor castaway in the arms of his joyful, weeping mother—and falls fainting, exhausted, dying at the feet of the divine pilot, who, at that moment, gives him his last blessing. The hand of death is on him, but his father is saved!

And then, as dusky vapors mingle with the splendor of a golden sky, the mournful images of the dream vanished in the midst of a calm sweet sleep. But was it indeed Victor, but a vain dream, a fleeting vision, that at that hour could thus disturb you?

CHAPTER VII.

THE CARBONARO.

One fine summer evening, several young girls of the Trastevere had come to draw water from the fountain Paulina, called by the Romans Fontana di San Pietro in Montorio. Laughing, gossiping and sporting together, they did not seem in the least hurry to finish their task and go home. One of them was remarkable for her regular and energetic features and large dark brown eyes, which seemed to indicate rare and firm courage; she looked as if she had not counted more than fifteen summers, and her companions called her Nunziata.

But the eldest of the young girls were chiefly occupied in telling the news of the day, and babbled joyously, like so many swallows."

"Do you know what has happened to that brave Pietro Marini?" said Giannina, the gravest.

"No, indeed. Tell us, Nina," cried several voices.

"You know him well—that worthy, honest man," she replied. "Well, suddenly, a few days ago he had the misfortune to lose his horse; and it was impossible for him to do his business without the help of that poor beast."

"Oh! yes, yes, Pietro Marini, I remember him well," here cried Carlotta, one of the youngest little girls of the group. "He's a poor man who sells sand, and brings it in on old cart."

"That's him, just," said Nina; "but before calling him 'poor,' wait for the end of the story. Pietro, as I've told you, was, as well as his wife, plunged in profound grief owing to that loss, when all at once, starting up joyfully, and, in his excitement, giving himself a thump in the head, he said bluntly: 'Maddalena, I was a fool to annoy myself so.' And as she regarded him with satisfaction: 'Yes, it's just as I say,—I'm but a fool,' he pursued. 'Don't you know, and didn't I know too, that we've an excellent neighbor here—the Holy Father? And he doesn't want for horses, and he'll not refuse me one if I ask him. Quick, give me my Sunday clothes. He's so good, they say—I'm going to see him, to speak to him at once, and you'll see, Maddalena, if I don't bring back a horse.'"

"And did he really go there?" interrupted Ursula, one of the youngest girls.

"I believe so. He went straight to the Vatican—but as you may well think, they stopped him at the gates. Nevertheless, our brave man was not discouraged at such a little thing. 'I must speak to the Holy Father!' he cried. 'I must converse with him at once and treat with him on an important subject.' Now these words of Pietro weren't long in drawing the attention of a messenger who, passing close by, had already remarked the brave man on account of his confident bearing and his frank, honest face. The prelate asked him why he desired to be admitted to the Vatican. 'I'll very willingly explain the matter to you,' he replied. And, without waiting to be pressed, he immediately related the misfortune that had happened to him, and the idea he had of imploring the Holy Father's aid on that occasion. 'It was an excellent idea,' replied the worthy prelate. 'I'll transmit your request to the Sovereign Pontiff, and I'll do my best to influence him in your favor! Return to-morrow, my child, and I hope to have the happiness of announcing to you the success of your humble request.' Pietro, as you may imagine, did not wait to be told twice. The next day he was at his post, hopeful and joyful, and the good Pius IX., touched to the heart by the faithful confidence his neighbor testified towards him, not only sent him a horse out of his stables, but also a good sum of money to help him to harness it. Now, I leave you to think if Pietro was proud and content. He sprang with a bound on the beautiful horse, a glorious present from the Holy Father, and triumphantly riding through the Trastevere, shouted: 'Evviva Pio Nono! He has given me a horse out of his own stable!'"

"The Holy Father is really very good," observed a Trasteverina named Julia—"particularly to little ones and the poor. One day, accompanied by a single prelate, he took a walk outside the gates of the city, when he met a simple peasant going along quite joyfully, making great strides and munching a big piece of black bread under his teeth. 'Good day, my son,' said the Holy Father, at once pleased with the frank and open countenance of the honest countryman. The latter, too busy with his mouth full to answer, nodded familiarly and passed on. But, lo! at a turning on the road he suddenly perceives a handsome carriage with liveried lackeys and two of the Holy Father's chamberlains. 'Surely,' he said to himself, 'it must be the Pope.' And, without losing time he throws himself on his knees and cries out with all his might, 'If you're the Holy Father, pray give me your benediction.' And Pius IX., at once understanding the good man's words, turns aside and very graciously gives him his blessing."

At these words Julia broke off and Ursula suddenly cried out:

"Look! here's a foreign Zouave walking with a gentleman!"

† This trait of the Sovereign Pontiff's beneficence is several years posterior to the epoch to which our story refers; but the reader will pardon this innocent anachronism.

"See what a handsome soldier, and what a noble dignified, courage as air he has?"

Nunziata, turning round, joyfully exclaimed:

"Long live the Zouaves, those generous and valiant defenders of the Holy Father!"

But hardly had she glanced at the young Zouave and his young companion than, without even waiting to bid adieu to her companions or stooping to lift up the pitcher left near the fountain, she dashed off rapidly in the direction of the narrow streets adjoining the Trastevere, where she instantly disappeared.

It was Victor Morren, accompanied by Maso di Roccabianca, who thus attracted the notice of the young girls. They seemed to be coming from the Lungera quarter and going in the direction of the Porta San Pancrazio. The young Romans, grouped under the shadow of the arches, followed them for a moment with their eyes, and then promptly resumed their pleasant chat.

"But why did Nunziata fly away so hastily?" observed Carlotta. "See, she was in such a hurry, that she has forgotten her pitcher near the basin."

"Who can know what's on her mind?" replied Giannina. "She's a singular child, that Nunziata. At one time she's pensive, grave, and almost sad; at another she's gossiping and singing, laughing and joking. Really I could never understand her."

"Yes, indeed, she's a strange creature" said Julia. "Sometimes she's as meek and kind as an angel, and at other times rash, irritable, and untractable as a demon. You remember at the last fire that took place in the Trastevere, how courageously she rushed into the midst of the flames and burning ruins, where even men did not dare to venture, afraid of sacrificing their lives, and, at the danger of hers, succeeded in saving a poor little child whose parents had perished, devoured by the flames. And with what glad affection, what loving emotion she afterwards pressed the dear little innocent to her heart, as a sister, a mother would have done!"

"Do I remember?" retorted Carlotta—"I should think so; I saw the child last Sunday walking with her. She placed it in the orphanage of the Immaculate Conception, where she had it maintained at her own expense. The poor little child loves her beyond anything and calls her his mother. You should see her dance with joy when he gives her that name!"

Just at this moment a young man quitting the Trastevere passed by the fountain, making for the Porta San Pancrazio in all haste.

"Stay!" resumed Julia; "there's Stefano, Nunziata's brother. What can he have to do at this hour outside the gates of the city that he should be hurrying so? Really, one would think he was running for his life."

All this time Victor and his companion, conversing uninterruptedly, had passed the Porta San Pancrazio and were rambling in the direction of the Via Vitellia. Maso had met the young Pontifical volunteer in the Lungera, and had cordially shaken hands with him. He came from Belgium, he said, anxious to revisit his country, whose dearest interests were actually at stake. At the same time he had not told Victor that for two days he had been looking for him in every corner of Rome. But he feigned a lively interest and deep sympathy for the young stranger, and hastened to give him news of his friends at Antwerp whom he had recently quitted.

"And where do you intend going now?" he asked.

"I purposed visiting the Church of San Pancrazio to-day," responded Victor,

"I'm delighted," said Maso, "It will be a real pleasure to accompany you. There is a delightful walk to it. I'll show you, on the way, the Vascellos and the Villa Corsini, where the French opened a way to the ramparts of Rome in 1849. Besides we can talk more at leisure of your country and your family."

Victor could not expect to find very much pleasure in Maso's society; nevertheless, he received him cordially, and they both began their walk.

"What's become of my father?" he asked. "How is he?"

"His health is always good, but he's really inconsolable at your departure. Listen to me, Victor," resumed Maso, after a moment, and with apparent hesitation; "your father gave me a message for you, in case I should meet you; but, truly, I don't know whether it's right to make ——"

"Don't let anything embarrass you; speak frankly," the generous young man at once interposed.

"Well, since you wish it, pray don't be annoyed with me then, and believe me that, in acting thus, I'm guided only by the interest I have in yourself, your respectable father, and all your family. Your father, conquered by your entreaties, at last allowed you to take service in the Pontifical army; but after your departure, after seriously reflecting on the subject of your resolution, he charged me with speaking to you in his name, and sparing no efforts to get you to renounce this deplorable determination."

Now Maso, in speaking thus, was guilty of an odious and flagrant imposture. Since Victor's departure he had not exchanged a single word with M. Morren, then at his Schambeck villa. So Victor was by no means convinced of the truth of this assertion.

"Monsieur di Roccabianca" he replied, "I don't believe my father ever retracts his word solemnly given; such conduct would be in direct opposition to his principles, his acts, his entire life. Besides I would dishonor and despise myself if I were ever capable of failing in my engagement. No, Maso, nothing could ever make me betray my duty; my father himself wouldn't wish I should break my oath in so shameful a manner. Spare yourself then the trouble of urging it any longer you'll never persuade me."

"But, my friend," replied Maso, who was resolved to draw away Victor by his perfidious arguments, or, in case all his ruses should fail, to wreak upon him, the ferocious vengeance he had so long pondered—"but, my friend, how can you feel yourself engaged by a decision taken haphazard, in haste, in complete ignorance of the situation, the circumstances, the cause you had embraced? Don't you see how this cause is unworthy of you, unworthy of the constancy and devotion of brave men? Don't you perceive, in fact, that our age of progress and enlightenment is thoroughly resolved to bear no longer the tyrannous and odious yoke the Papacy imposes on the ancient city of the proud Romana, a free people?"

"Listen to me, Maso," here interrupted Victor, flushed with anger, indignation and disdain; "the subject to which you have just alluded is one that cannot be discussed between us; the words you have uttered profane and sully this august and justly blessed land. The glorious cause I defend is the cause of my conscience, the cause of all Catholicity, in brief, the cause of my God!"

"A very glorious cause, indeed!" retorted the Carbonaro, with an ironical smile—"that of a decrepit old man; a few bigoted monks, and some credulous or idiotic women. What honor will you owe it, if you die for it? With what glory would it crown you even if it triumphed—which it never will? Do you wish to embrace a noble and a just cause, to exhibit a sublime and generous devotion? Fight for Italy. It is a grand and noble cause, that of a people breaking its chains; it is the cause of liberty opposed to the cause of slavery. Follow me, Victor; join those generous and intrepid combatants who came from all parts to do battle and triumph in holy patriotic combats; cast away from you fanaticism and error, those vain idols of your fathers; break the shameful bonds of that gross superstition in which a fatal education has too long enchained you. You have a grand and generous soul, a soul capable of understanding and appreciating the sublimity of such an aim, the beauty of such devotion. Come then, abandon those crumbling altars, those decrepit dogmas; hasten to range yourself under the flag of Italy to be revived at our side by the breath of liberty!"

"Enough!" replied Victor, in a firm voice, interrupting the tempter with a motion of the hand; "believe me, I know those Garibaldian bands thoroughly; I estimate them at their just value. I consider, then, as an insult, any proposal designed to engage me to join those adventurers and condottieri of our epoch, half soldiers, half bandits. Enough! I tell you; you have perhaps spoken without a bad intention. Such solicitations are, nevertheless, enough to bring the blush of shame to my face."

At these words the irritated Carbonaro bit his lips so angrily that his blood tinged his white teeth clinched with rage. Then he slipped his hand under his coat as if looking for a weapon; but the road they were then walking on doubtless did not appear to him deserted enough for the accomplishment of his vengeance; so he pursued with apparent calmness:

"Very well, sir, let there be no more talk about it. Believe me, however, I had no intention of offending you. Haven't I told you at the outset, that my interest and sympathy in yourself as well as your respectable parents was my sole and only motive?"

"I believe so" replied Victor, "but you are strangely mistaken if you think that earthly honor, that fleeting, fragile and contemptible glory, of which you spoke to me just now, is the sacred end to which I aspire, the motive that determined me to this resolution. Other careers more peaceable, more brilliant, in which I wouldn't have to sacrifice my blood, my life, are open to me; but I have preferred sacrificing my whole future, all my hopes, to the august and sacred cause for which I have offered myself, and I will gladly persist in this supreme resolution, even if shame and death were to be my only reward here, for I should have at least confessed my faith and satisfied my conscience,—and my conscience and my faith are the sole judges at the tribunal to which I am summoned."

A profound silence followed this solemn avowal. Victor had ceased to speak, and, absorbed in his thoughts, kept his eyes fixed on the ground. As to the guilty Maso, he knit his dark brows, and his eyes, riveted on his young companion, seemed to dart flames.

There was a lonely, silent country around them; not a murmur, not a sound—no breath of wind waving the branches, no sweet song of birds among the leaves, no cricket chirping among the tall grass; nothing but a deep, sinister silence. Our two promenaders had left the Vascello and the Villa Corsini behind, and without Victor perceiving it, had quitted the high road and penetrated into a solitary path which Maso knew well.

They were approaching a dense copse where the young trunks grew thickly, and the branches interlaced. Suddenly a light breeze made the leaves gently rustle, and then died away without leaving a trace, like the icy breath, the last sigh of one dying. And that faint sound gone, everything relapsed into silence.

"Listen, Victor," resumed Maso in a strange accent, and designedly laying stress upon his words, as it were to give them a sinister significance. "Listen to me. There's nothing before you but defeat and death if you persist in this deplorable disastrous design. Poor dupe that you are," he continued, with a disdainful smile, "how could you have thus abandoned your father and your country to die unknown and dishonored, in some forgotten corner of this foreign land."

"Maso, Maso, stop, be silent," cried the incensed Victor. "You blaspheme, you insult the Divine Majesty audaciously; you make me blush with shame and indignation for you. Know well that that death with which you threaten me in your blind rage has no terrors for me, for I am prepared for it, ever since the day God inspired me with this pious resolution. I shall behold it as a benefactress, as a friend supporting on its wings those green palms of victory, a thousand times more pleasing and more glorious than all the crowns lavished on earthly conquerors. Far from me such weakness; far from me such terrors! Who could fear to die fighting for the holy cause of God and the Church?"

"Well," cried Maso, no longer restraining his fury, "as you wish it, here is that benefactress, that friend! She'll not keep you long waiting, wretched fanatic, pitiful maniac. It is come at length, the hour of thy death with the hour of my vengeance!"

And before the astonished Victor had time to defend himself, the robust arm of the Carbonaro had seized him and clasped him in its iron grasp.

The young volunteer, however, did not lose his bravery and self-possession. He had first grown pale, but at once raised his eyes to heaven as it were to offer his last sacrifice to God.

"Ah! accursed," continued the Carbonaro, "I haven't returned in vain to this fatal city. If I've consented to come, it was because I hoped to rejoice thee, to be revenged! Die, coward! die, maniac! and may all the enemies of Italy perish like thee!"

And Maso raised his arm, and over the young Zouave's head flashed the glittering blade of a poniard.

But a cry of pain and distress suddenly resounded along the path, and the terrified Carbonaro let his arm fall.

"Gennaro, Gennaro!" cried the voice, drawing near, and assuming a beseeching tone.

"Who calls me?" murmured the assassin. "Who's here, then, that knows my name? Who dares name Gennaro without dreading his vengeance?"

Suddenly, as if in answer to his question, a man with dishevelled hair, dusty clothes and flashing eyes, emerged from the thicket and met his gaze, arriving at the supreme moment like a messenger of fear and justice. This man was Stefano, Nunziato's brother.

At the sight of him the Carbonaro grew dreadfully pale, and trembled all over, as if a thunderbolt, hurled by the hand of God, struck him.

"Stefano," he murmured in a feeble voice, "Stefano, is it really you? How did you come here?"

"Gennaro," answered the new-comer. "At least I see you still recognize me. Whatever power has guided my foot-steps, I'm fortunately come in time to spare you a crime. Gennaro, are all traces of that blood clinging to your hands then effaced, that already you're thinking of soiling them with a second murder?"

The guilty Maso—or Gennaro, for henceforward we know him under his real name—seemed totally disarmed, humiliated, vanquished by the voice of that stranger who thus spoke so bitterly to him. His still flashing eyes were confusedly averted, then fixed on the ground; it was easy to see some secret influence arrested and overpowered the blind fury that boiled in his breast.

As to Victor, scarcely had the vigorous arm of the assassin relaxed its grasp, when he fell upon his knees, thanking God with all his heart for his sudden deliverance. Then he regarded with surprise the strange and unexpected scene before him. He could not understand by what singular chance—if indeed there was really nothing but chance in all this—this unknown liberator had appeared so suddenly, and just at the supreme moment, nor what were the circumstances that gave this stranger such a mysterious influence over the mind of the assassin.

Meanwhile Stefano conversed rapidly with the Carbonaro in a mixed dialect utterly unknown to Victor. He spoke with evident solicitation, entreaty, and, at the same time, authority which did not prevent him lowering his voice and gazing anxiously around him, as if he feared some one in the depth of the thicket could have overheard him. As to Gennaro he only murmured in an irritated undertone some words that did not appear to calm Stefano's indignation. The latter at length—this time in Italian, without being any longer afraid that Victor would overhear him replied:

"Well, let it be so, as you wish it, God knows, despite all, I don't desire your ruin and your shame. Only, listen to me and don't despise my advice. Quit Rome immediately, or else I declare, Gennaro, nothing shall restrain me. If to-morrow's sun shall find you under our wall, neither the affection that the laws of nature inspire me with towards you, nor the thought of the dishonor that would fall on our name, shall prevent me denouncing you and delivering you up to justice. And now," continued Stefano with a mournful glance, "if nothing in your heart awakens you to repentance or moves you to weep for your crimes, may I have seen you for the last time on earth or in heaven. Farewell, farewell, Gennaro; let us separate without any further delay. Here's your road."

And, with a gesture of authority, he pointed to the pathway leading to the Porta Portese, then made a sign to Victor and walked before him along the road which, turning in an opposite direction, led them back to the city.

For some moments Victor and his courageous guide observed a profound silence; but scarcely had they emerged on the high-road than Victor, seizing the hand of the brave Stefano, pressed it respectfully to his lips.

"Oh, my noble liberator!" he cried, "how can I ever thank you for your kindness?"

"What's the good of speaking of those things, Signor," replied the brave young man. "I have only done my duty; and, believe me, I am sufficiently rewarded by the thought of having been fortunate enough to prevent a murder."

"I shall do as you please," Victor quietly responded, "but nothing shall prevent me vowing a sincere friendship, a lively gratitude towards you. But by what mysterious and divine will of Providence were you there precisely at the instant when a crime was to be prevented, and how comes it—supposing, however, my question is not indiscreet—that my adversary who, for many years, has habitually resided in Belgium, is so intimately known to you?"

"It was indeed an inspiration of Divine Providence that led me to that place," replied Stefano. "Know then, Signor, that your perfidious enemy is none other than my own brother, a real prodigal son, who has long overwhelmed us with shame and sorrow. Judge then, after that, if I ought to esteem myself happy—despite the profound grief his unworthiness causes me—at having arrived in time to save him a crime! O my poor, dear brother, we have known him before to be honorable and virtuous, but the fatal influence of some treacherous friends, and particularly that of bad societies he frequented but too often, led him astray, corrupted him, and brought him to ruin. Then terrible occurrences, leaving traces of mourning and sorrow in our memory that will never be effaced, compelled the unfortunate fellow to abandon his country. For many years his fate was unknown to us, and we were not aware of his return to the country, to the Eternal City, until to-day, by God's visible permission, my sister Nunziata saw him passing with you near the Paulina fountain, where she had tarried. Although she was still quite a child when he left us, she recognized him in a moment, for in our happy days our little Nunziata was Gennaro's favorite, and those sad years passed in error and crime could not have so changed our brother's features that it would be impossible to recognize them when they were forever engraven on one's memory. But, having seen Gennaro in company with a Pontifical volunteer, Nunziata felt immediately moved by a fatal presentiment, and hastened to return home to tell me what she had seen. I instantly felt it my duty to follow you, hoping to find an opportunity of conversing with my brother, to whom I wished to speak alone. But when I saw you quit the high-road and disappear with Gennaro into the thicket, a profound terror seized me and I bounded after you. You know the rest, Signor; it was the hand of God saved you!"

"It guided yours, my friend," replied Victor effusively. "It is to you I owe safety, life deliverance. O Stefano, how can I ever repay you? Let me at least speak to you, heart to heart, as to an old friend. And, if you like, Stefano, we'll pray together for your unhappy brother."

Stefano wept. It was a good, true Christian he had had the happiness of saving; he saw it clearly then, for the true servants of Christ alone are capable of pitying, loving, succoring those who persecute them. In his emotion the words died away on his lips, but his heart beat tenderly, and he pressed Victor's hands.

"O thanks, thanks!" he murmured, drying his tears.

"Your good words restore calmness and hope to me, and pour balm into my heart."

Then, as they drew near the city, clasping each other's hands, they observed a profound silence.

The church of San Pietro in Montorio rose before them in the shadow; they entered to pour out before God the gratitude and love with which their hearts were animated. Both knelt before the altar of the Virgo della Lettera. Stefano prayed for his brother; Victor implored God's grace and pardon for his enemy, and, mindful of the peril that menaced him, returned thanks to Providence.

Meanwhile Gennaro had fled, blasphemy on his lips, rage in his heart. In his fury he multiplied his mad maledictions and exclamations, raising his hand to heaven as if to threaten God himself.

"The coward has escaped me this time;" he cried at last, stopping exhausted, his forehead bathed in perspiration, his eyes glaring, "but I'll meet him again, and destiny, I'm confident, will not always protect him. Forward, forward, on my fatal road! Courage; I'll meet him again. Thou wilt have thy revenge, Gennaro, before hell claims thee!"

And his infernal laughter resounded in the evening stillness like the dismal chuckling of a damned soul!

Then, as if he had taken a sudden resolution, he continued his way in the direction of the Porta Portese. All at once, at a turning in the road, a young girl rushing on hastily found herself before him.

"Gennaro!" she cried.

"Nunziata!" he repeated, for he had recognized his sister by the sound of her voice.

"Gennaro, have you seen Stefano—have you spoken to him?"

"Have I spoken to him!" he replied, transported with rage at that name, at the recollection of his brother. "Back, Nunziata! all is henceforth broken off, all is ended between us. Stefano has baffled me, he has snatched away my revenge from me. He has threatened, in his stupid anger, to bring shame, exile, and death upon me."

"Wretch!" cried Nunziata, "I wasn't deceived! You were going to shed innocent blood! Your confiding victim trusted himself to you! Gennaro, Gennaro, have you stifled forever the voice of your conscience! That bleeding, livid shadow—that shadow you knew so well—does it never rise before you? Does it never trouble your dreams?"

"Back, back, mad girl!" interrupted the Carbonaro transported with fury. "Let me pass, Nunziata, or I'll crush you beneath my feet, to chastise you for your insolence."

But, at this threat, the courageous child, in place of recoiling, dashed before him, exasperated, indomitable, like a lioness caught in a snare.

"Courage!" she cried with all the intrepidity, all the noble ardor of a Roman maiden. "Courage! Now raise your hand to your sister! I'm not afraid of you, Gennaro, and you shall hear me to the end, despite your fury and all your threats!"

"Once more, back! away maniac!" he stammered, rudely shoving her aside and throwing her down on the road. "Go, tell that stupid Stefano, who has robbed me of my revenge, to beware, if he will, of the consequences of the hatred I henceforth bear him."

"Hate me, too, then;" replied the courageous girl at once rising, "for it was I who first robbed you of your revenge. God knows that in crossing your path, I had no wish but to touch your soul; but I see, wretched brother, that your heart is closed to me. Your hour is not yet come. Alas! when will it come?"

"Yes, when will it come then—the hour of revenge!" he repeated, as he walked away from her.

"Wretched being, it is not that I await; it is the hour of salvation, the hour of grace," she replied, heaving a deep sigh.

"O, Gennaro, Gennaro, formerly you loved me so much! In the name of the happy past, in the name of our old affection, recall to what end I speak these words, I address to you this prayer:—By your regrets, by your repentance forestall the hour of justice, were it only a single moment !”

And she stretched out her hands towards him, weeping bitterly. But the guilty one did not deign to listen to her, and sad and solitary she returned to her dwelling in the city. She had scarcely entered when Stefano and Victor appeared.

“Alas ! brother, I’ve spoken to him, but he would listen to nothing,” she cried. “Oh ! my God, my God ! is there no more hope for him ? Pardon, pardon, Signor,” she stammered, perceiving at Stefano’s side the young foreign Zouave, at whose feet she threw herself, blushing and confused.

“Pray, rise, Signorina,” responded Victor, painfully moved by this humble attitude, those passionate demonstrations. “Don’t I owe my safety to your brother here ?”

“Alas ! he too—he’s my brother,” she murmured, bending low and blushing deeper.

“And he is also mine,” replied Victor. “He’s a stray brother for whose return we will constantly pray with our whole soul.”

At these tender words the astonished Nunziata glanced earnestly at the young Christian soldier. No threatening cloud, no perceptible expression of rancor or anger darkened Victor’s brow, and his frank open visage, breathed nothing but love and pity, generous indulgence, and divine mercy. Nunziata, to get a better look at him, wiped away her tears for a moment.

“O, Signor, you’re an angel,” she cried, sobbing.

“Alas ! I’m very far from resembling those pure spirits of heaven,” he replied, with a gentle, modest smile. “And don’t call me ‘Signor,’ I beg, but simply Victor, for I earnestly desire that you and Stefano should regard me as a brother. True, in a few days my duty summons me to the camp rather far from Rome ; but I shall certainly return, and I do hope I shall then be treated by you as one of the family. You’ll grant me that favor, won’t you, dear Stefano ?”

The young Italian’s only reply was a warm pressure of the hand extended to him. Victor was not long without meeting true friends in this new land.

Out of regard for this amiable family as well as compassion for the wretched maniac, the young Pontifical volunteer only disclosed the dramatic circumstances in which he thought he would have lost his life to his cousin Joseph and the faithful Martin, who both promised to have a watchful eye to his safety.

The next day Victor received a long letter from his mother, who said that for some days she had remarked a strange and extremely satisfactory change in her husband’s conduct. M. Morren had pointedly betrayed, in every thing that concerned his son, a deep estrangement, or, at least, complete indifference ; but, suddenly, he seemed to have reverted to better sentiments, and impatiently asked to see Victor’s letters to his mother. Then he recommended his wife to write immediately to Victor and request a prompt reply, warning his son to carefully avoid the company of Maso if he met him, “for the latter,” he added, “intends to injure my poor child.”

Victor, overjoyed at receiving such pleasant news, hastened to answer his dear parents, in order to dispel all their disquietude, and, (without, however, informing them of the danger he had run) completely reassured them in his regard ; for all Maso’s projects, he told them, had come to nothing and evaporated in smoke.

But how had M. Morren been led to suddenly conceive such a lively solicitude in regard to his son ? And who could have informed him of the sinister projects of the Carbonaro, who had not announced his departure to him, and besides would have taken care not to disclose his reason for going to Rome ?

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SPIRIT OF GOOD AND THE SPIRIT OF EVIL.

The old castle of Schrambeck, of which we have spoken at the outset of this story, is an antique and venerable remnant of the splendors of the Middle Ages.

It is a vast quadrangular building, flanked, at each of its angles, by a large round tower, joined by a wing, in the center of the façade, with a fifth tower, an immense formidable structure that looks like the eternal sentinel of the old chateau, overlooking the approaches and defending the entrance. A large moat nearly surrounds the vast and gloomy edifice ; a very lofty crenulated and turreted wall completing the line of defence. The rusty vanes, half bent on their rods, creak on the tops of the turrets ; the old oaken doors are bending on their hinges ; the walls are falling in in many places ; and the tall weeds, sown by the breath of the tempest, wave their green leaves from the base of the posterns to the summit of the battlements. A portion of the old edifice is already a heap of ruins ; and time, which is doing its work, will not be slow to destroy what remains.

Some time before the events related in the preceding chapter, M. Morren and his friend, Ernest Van Dormael, were taking a walk towards the close of day, along the hills to the north-west of Schrambeck. Ernest had arrived the evening before on a visit to his friend, purposing to lay a snare to draw the proud philosophe further into the dark abyss of impiety and error. But since his arrival he had not had an opportunity of talking to his friend Morren alone ; so, desirous of creating a favorable occasion for the execution of his plan, he proposed they should take a long walk together to the ruins of the old chateau.

Now, on their way was the Chapel of Consolation where they saw old Teresa kneeling at the threshold and praying fervently.

“Ah ! you’re there, my good Teresa,” said M. Morren, who knew the old woman well, and never refused her an alms, for he had an excellent heart. “And, as I perceive, always praying. It seems, my good woman, that you’ve nothing else to do than recite your Aves.”

“A poor, weak, old woman like me has nothing else to do,” she replied, rising and leaning on her crutch. “But, do you know” she continued, “for whom I am praying, just now ?”

“How should I know, my good woman ?”

“Well, I’m going to tell you. I was praying, just now, for our children who are at Rome ; for your Victor, Monsieur Morren, and then for Joseph and Martin.”

“Upon my faith, your poor Martin oughtn’t to be very much obliged to you. Didn’t you send him there, yourself ?”

“And do you think on account of that,” she sturdily replied, “that I haven’t a true mother’s love for my poor child ? Believe me, sir, the rich can’t love their children more nor better than the poor. And do you imagine the thought of my dear absent son isn’t enough to occupy my days and trouble my nights, that I’m not every instant disturbed with a thousand uneasinesses, thinking of the hazards and dangers that await him, far from me ?”

“Well, foolish woman,” interposed Ernest, with a look of disdain, “in that case, then, whom have you to blame but yourself ? Isn’t it you—you’ve said so—who decided him to undertake that adventurous expedition ? Why didn’t you keep him near you, far from hazards, far from dangers ? You’d then be spared all those useless afflictions and those barren prayers.”

At these words old Teresa fixed one of her keen, curious glances on the new-comer.

“Are you a Christian ?” she asked. “To hear you, one would say you never were——”

“One wouldn’t be far out, perhaps,” Ernest replied, smiling disdainfully.

“In that case you’ll not understand me. And yet I’ll try to explain to you the reasons that decided me in not keeping my son at home. It was" she continued, in a slow, solemn tone, "because I'm not a mother only; I'm a Christian, too. And I can't forget I was a Christian even before I was a mother. And when, not only the Father of all Christians, but the religion of Christians, too, is so seriously threatened, could I have the heart to be wanting in every duty, in keeping my son alongside me in the hour of danger, depriving our Holy Father of a devoted defender? And if I were so weak, selfish, and cowardly, couldn't God punish me for my indifference by depriving me of my son even if he were at my side? On the other hand, can't God reward my devotion, by guiding and protecting my child, and preserving him safe and sound, even in the thick of the fight, under fire of balls and bullets?"

M. Morren turned round greatly astonished at old Teresa's words; he had never heard her express herself with such force, nobility, and eloquence. As to Ernest Van Dormael, his lips essayed a contemptuous, mocking smile.

"God again! always God," he murmured. "God! It's the only word by which you explain yourself. But where is your God? Have you ever seen him?"

"Can't we believe, then, in the existence of things unless we see them, sir?" she replied.

"I never had the pleasure of seeing you until to-day, and yet didn't you exist? Surely it is impossible for us to see God, and yet everything around us affirms His existence."

"Come along, Morren," interrupted Ernest, at once confounded and irritated by the logical appositeness of the old woman's repartees. "What's the use of losing our time here, disputing with that old fool? There is no God—that's all about it. Let us resume our walk."

"No, sir, it's not all," pursued Teresa earnestly, raising her voice so as to make herself heard by the two men, who were walking away. "Take care the hour doesn't come when you'll wish with all your heart to be able to believe in the existence, the providence of God. But will that last grace be given you? I hope so, sir, but I don't believe it."

Ernest walked rapidly away, raising his shoulders and biting his lips. It was already the second time a direct and menacing allusion recalled to his remembrance the dark, fatal hour of death, and seemed to forebode only anguish and despair at the decisive moment of that fatal passage.

Nevertheless, a still more painful misadventure was reserved for him on that day. A messenger from the Schrambeck villa soon overtook them, running in all haste, and begging M. Morren to return to the house, where a pressing affair awaited him. The free-thinker was then obliged to postpone to a more favorable moment the conversation he calculated on having with his indulgent friend; but he still continued his walk around the ruins of the old castle, and, having found one of the large iron gates open, unceremoniously entered.

At first he wandered at random among the rubbish of the old chateau, passing through several empty apartments he met on his way, until at length, in an angle of one of the towers, he saw a winding stairs, which he ascended, until he had reached the second floor of the turret. After examining its little vaulted chambers a few moments he descended the turret by another stairs; but, before reaching the bottom, was plunged into complete darkness. At the same time, the steps he was treading suddenly shook and crumbled beneath his feet; he felt himself suddenly precipitated, tumbled down into the darkness—found himself one moment arrested by the fragment of an arch, which soon yielded to the weight of his body—and, at length, from fall to fall, reached the bottom of a dark, subterranean passage or kind of cave.

He was at first slightly stunned by the suddenness of the shock. However, he soon recovered his senses and was glad to see that he had received no bruise. But his position was not less critical, as he soon perceived with profound terror.

A dim light—doubtless that of the sky—shone very high overhead. But all around him in the darkness he could feel the thick walls of his stone prison. No stairs, no door, no passage—no means of escape!

Had he already found his tomb suddenly opening under his feet? That solemn hour of which he had been just reminded—was it already come? These gloomy thoughts disturbed the soul of the poor wretch, who, losing at that moment all his presence of mind, forgot that his friend, M. Morren, not seeing him returning, would immediately institute an active search. In his terror he saw nothing before him but abandonment, oblivion, despair, and death. Drops of cold sweat rolled down his livid face as he strode round his dingy cell, making the dark arches resound with the echo of his broken voice. Suddenly he thought he heard a slight noise far overhead, at the top of the walls, and held his breath that he might hear the better.

"Who's there? Answer!" cried a tremulous voice through the crevices of the old wall.

"Oh! for pity's sake, save me, save me!" he replied, recovering hope at the unexpected sound of that human voice.

"Who are you?"

"I'm a stranger, who came to visit this chateau and have unfortunately fallen into this cave——"

"Ah! ah! it's you. Well, it's come at last—God's hour of which I spoke to you just now, the hour of expiation, the hour of vengeance!"

And Teresa, who had recognized the sound of his voice, thus smilingly answered the captive's entreaties.

"Ah! don't speak so!" cried the unhappy Ernest. "No, no! It's not possible; have pity on me, pray, help me. You'll not be sorry for it. I'll give you lots of money."

"Bah! What do I want of money?" retorted the old woman.

"Now, tell me do you believe there's a God?"

"Help! help!" he cried.

"Call as often as you like—I'll not help you and no one will come here from the fields nor from the village, for all the villagers think this place is haunted."

At these words the unfortunate man groaned with anguish, and Teresa on the top of the wall began to laugh heartily.

"Now, do you believe God exists?" she repeated.

"Save me, save me, for pity's sake!" he replied beseechingly.

"I'll not save you unless you consent to recognize the existence of God. Remain, if you like, in that well! In that case, good-bye to you, and I abandon you to that All-powerful arm that will know well how to wreak its vengeance on you."

"Wretched woman! horrible vixen!" he cried, "well, yes, I recognise—I believe there is a God."

"Very good. Now, I'm going to get you out of this. Wait for me quietly a moment. You have my word."

And she went as quickly as her legs could carry her towards the garden of the farm adjoining the old castle.

"Father Nelis," said she, going in, "there's a rat in the well, or, in other words, a fine city gent fallen into the Spectre's Tower. Come with me; we must get him out."

"In the Spectre's Tower! I'm sure I'll not go——" replied the good farmer, terrified.

"For shame, father Nelis! who ever could have put such foolish things into your head? I'm sure you're not a child; how could you have the heart then, to let a poor wretch perish, simply because you're afraid of a spectre that never existed except in your imagination."

So the courageous Teresa succeeded, not without difficulty, in persuading him to accompany her to the old chateau, where she showed him the place where Ernest had fallen, and helped him to make an opening in the debris encumbering the stairs at the end of which he had slipped into the cave.

Van Dormael heard his liberators accomplishing his deliverance: it seemed to him a deadly weight was suddenly lifted off his breast; he raised his head and began to breathe freely.

Without losing any time Teresa threw him a strong rope.

"Tie it firmly round your waist," she cried. "And now pull the rope. Hoist him up cautiously, father Nelis, for the arch is half demolished. One, two, three—there, thank God, here he is!"

Van Dormael was saved; but in those moments of humiliation half dead by terror, he vowed vengeance against his liberatrix. Had not that common peasant, that beggar-woman, shamefully vanquished him; him, the proud free-thinker, the triumphant unbeliever—had not she forced him to an act of weakness, to do homage to the greatness of God—a homage, it is true, his heart belied?

Still Ernest, before going away, threw her some gold pieces, but she kicked them away from her with a disdainful gesture.

"Keep your gold, sir," she replied, "and take care in future not to blaspheme so extravagantly, for you see how the dread of death easily made you change your tone. Father Nelis, have the goodness to accompany the gentleman as far as the turning of the road; I'm sure my society wouldn't be agreeable to him." And she turned her back contemptuously on Ernest and hurried away.

One can easily believe, from this adventure, that the unlucky free-thinker was not pleased with his stay at Schrambeck; so he experienced a real feeling of relief when, on that very evening, he was on his way to the railway station.

It seemed to him a favorable opportunity for putting his plan into execution.

"My dear friend," he began, as soon as the train had passed the last houses of the village, "circumstances haven't allowed me, until now, to inform you of the principal motive of my present visit."

"The principal motive of your visit?" interrupted M. Morren, with some astonishment; "had you then any other than the very natural one of first coming to see me, and then taking some recreation by a little excursion into the country?"

"Assuredly," replied Van Dormael, "it is my earnest desire to testify to you my esteem and regard in every possible way that determined me to come to you. You know, my good friend, that a large number of the most honorable and intimate of our common friends form part of the powerful society of Freemasons. Now, every one knows you've allowed your son to enter the Pope's service. Allow me to tell you in confidence that this conduct has damaged you in the minds of our companions. They accuse you of weakness, lukewarmness, and conclude that you've ceased to be consistent with your principles."

"But, my dear Ernest, don't they know, on the other hand, that the profound respect I profess for the sacred rights of man, for justice and liberty, obliges me to leave my son entirely free to select a rule of conduct for himself?"

"All that would be very well if they believed that you simply restricted yourself to letting that mad-cap have his way; but, on the contrary, they think your secret leanings, your inmost sympathies, adhere to that detested party, that foolish enterprise. This paternal weakness which you have exhibited, alas! in the opinion of our friends is called cowardice, and from that you may assume that they can't pardon your thus associating yourself, were it only distantly, with the Pope's zealots, the Church's defenders."

"They may, however, be thoroughly convinced," Morren calmly interposed, "that I'm far from approving Victor's resolution. Only—and I frankly admit it—I have left him completely free to select his flag, his cause, his career."

"I sincerely believe it," resumed the crafty tempter. "You know, my dear friend, it would be impossible for me to doubt the truth of your words. But our friends don't share my confidence, my security, as regards that. Come, I'm going to speak frankly to you; it's worth while. Several members of the powerful society of which I spoke to you just now, who are strongly opposed to you because you have always refused to unite with us, have profited by this circumstance and Victor's departure to represent the matter in its blackest colors. They say you have cowardly forsworn your beliefs, entirely deserted the Party of Progress, and are disposed to return to the vain superstitions, the devout errors that cradled your youth."

"But those are only false calumnies—empty words," replied M. Morren, whom Ernest's persistency had visibly "Believe me, my friend, that's what I said at the lodge—what I repeated a hundred times. But all that's no use. Their conviction is immovable; they believe it's well founded. To put an end to this misunderstanding, here now is what I propose to you: your interest and your honor you have no doubt require that those shameful calumnies should be publicly and triumphantly refuted by you. Follow my advice, then; I engage you, and from this moment enrol you in our glorious society. Acting thus, you will allow us to recognize in you the courageous free-thinker, the adept in progress, whom we have always so cordially esteemed. You will thus close the mouths of your calumniators, the enemies of your good name, and at once regain the confidence of all your old friends."

"Ernest," replied the old man quietly, "I'm thankful to you for your advice—inspired I'm sure by your friendship for me; but at the same time I declare to you I can't follow it. You are long acquainted with my opinions on this subject. As a bold free-thinker—as you are pleased to call me—my reason and my heart, which I've refused to accept the austere despotism of faith, equally kick against bowing down under the tyrannical yoke of Freemasonry. True, several of my friends are Freemasons, and I see nothing bad in their carrying out their principles, just as I'm not displeased at seeing my wife strictly practise the observances of her religion. But I absolutely refuse to accept for myself that yoke and these bonds. I have not resolutely quitted the ranks of the Church to impose upon myself this new slavery."

"We are not slaves," stammered the Freemason.

"It's useless to interrupt me, my friend. You know perfectly well I know your society as well as you know it yourself. Tell me, is not the solemn oath by which you bind yourself a real slavery? And the severe punishment menacing any of you who breaks his engagements? And the secret which you feel bound to surround with all your rites and ceremonies? Tell me, then, why doesn't each of your Freemasons loudly profess and proclaim his opinions as I profess and proclaim mine?"

"No matter," replied the irritated Van Dormael, whose tone betrayed ill-concealed vexation and secret rancor. "Your honor requires that you should submit to this obligation."

"Do you think so? For my part, I'm very easy about it. My conduct will suffice to show everybody I haven't changed and that I'll remain to the end attached to my principles and faithful to myself."

"Still, I repeat, they have ceased to believe you—to have confidence in you. Besides, the pretended slavery of which you speak is very different—confess it—from that of the Church. Moreover, they'll take care to leave you full and entire liberty."

"But it is useless to insist on it any longer. Such a proceeding on my part, I tell you for the last time, is completely impossible."

"At least, don't decide absolutely. Believe me, your own interest will induce you to follow my advice. You love your son, don't you? Well, by your entering into our powerful society, you can effectively protect him against very grave dangers."

"Against the balls and bullets of the enemies!" interposed the old man, smiling disdainfully.

"At least against the dagger and poniard of the secret societies—arms often employed, and more terrible than those you speak of," quickly responded Ernest, whose glance at that moment assumed a strange, dark expression.

At these words, M. Morren bent down his head thoughtfully, and seemed for some instants plunged in a deep reverie, to the great joy of the Freemason, who thought this powerful argument, reserved for the last, had found a way to the paternal heart.

"Do you think, then," the old man at length resumed, in a grave, thoughtful tone, "that your recommendation is powerful enough to protect my son from the dangers with which your Italian friends threaten him?"

"Most undoubtedly," replied the Freemason. Then, leaning over, he whispered in a mysterious tone, this sinister disclosure in the ears of the agitated old man: "I'm going to reveal to you, on this subject, a secret that has been confided to me, and of which, as a friend, I feel bound to inform you. Maso di Roccabianca, with whose lofty sentiments and ardent patriotism you are acquainted, has left for Italy. His purposes, I know, assassinating Victor, who at his first visit to you, mortally insulted him. There is only one power that can arrest the upraised arm and turn aside the Carbonaro from his sinister designs, and that power is ours. There is only one way of disarming Maso, forcing him to submit to an authority he respects and dreads. Join us my friend; become a Freemason. Entrust me with the duty of informing the society of your adhesion to our statutes, our principles, our dogmas, and I swear to you, upon my honor, your son is saved."

"And you are certain of Maso's obedience to the orders of the lodge?"

"Perfectly certain," responded Ernest, whose eyes at last began to glisten with a ray of hope.

M. Morren relapsed into a profound silence. He let his head droop; a visible expression of anguish and hesitation was depicted in his features; a painful and desperate struggle raged in his heart; it was the solemn conflict of conviction and love, of philosophic firmness struggling with paternal affection.

Probably Victor's prayers had already been heard in heaven, for old Morren was not slow to raise his head.

"No, no; let us say no more about it. It is useless to insist, I cannot——" he replied.

"You are determined not to consent?" replied Ernest. "Know, then, that you have passed sentence on your son. Henceforward, I can do nothing to protect his life."

"But I——I can," said Morren. "I'll write to my son recommending him to carefully avoid the society which has the cowardliness to weave plots against his life."

At these words, Ernest grew pale with anger, and bit his lips. In making this imprudent revelation to Victor's father, he had himself destroyed his own plan, and, at the very least, compromised the ferocious emissary's sinister projects of vengeance. Nevertheless, he strove to dissimulate his vexation and rancor as best he could, for it was all important not to quarrel with his friend Morren, with whom he had contracted various obligations, and was to some extent indebted. Only, when they reached their journey's end, he hazarded a last observation before leaving him.

"You may write," he said, "but your letter will arrive too late. Be assured, we alone, thanks to our secret communications, can cause our instructions to reach Tommaso before he acts. Besides, if Victor had the luck to escape him now, that would not save him from an inevitable danger. The Carbonaro's dagger, sooner or later, strikes, and strikes without mercy—despite every precaution to escape its strike. Once more, I conjure you, my good friend," continued the hypocrite, imploringly; "consent to take this salutary resolution that every one expects of you, or know that all my friendship, all my devotedness, will henceforth be useless to you."

At these new entreaties, the poor father, deeply affected, clasped his hands for an instant; then instinctively raised his eyes to heaven. Was it a prayer he uttered then? No one knows; but with bent head he almost immediately replied:

"Impossible, Ernest, impossible; I've said my last word. And if I can do nothing for my poor child, may God, at least, protect and guard him!"

A few moments later Victor's father was slowly wending his way to his Schrambeck dwelling, while Ernest returned to town, with a heart full of rancor, vexation and bitterness.

When M. Morren reached the village, he experienced an unusual quietude and repose, and congratulated himself on his courageous resolution. Noiselessly opening the door leading into his sister-in-law's garden, he found on the arbor table, alongside a work-basket—probably left there by Mary—the "Imitation," and mechanically turned over the leaves until he came across this remarkable passage:

"Make no great account who is for thee or against thee; but let it be thy business and thy care that God may be with thee in everything thou doest.

"Have a good conscience, and God will sufficiently defend thee.

"For he whom God will help, no man's malice can hurt.

"If thou canst but hold thy peace and suffer, thou shalt see without doubt that the Lord will help thee.

"He knows the time and manner of delivering thee, and, therefore, thou must resign thyself to Him.

"It belongs to God to help and to deliver us from all confusion."

M. Morren read and meditated, with profound attention, on the remainder of this chapter. What a marvellous doctrine was this!—humble and modest, and, at the same time, so serene, so consoling that it poured confidence and hope into his heart like balm, despite his customary disdain and incredulity. What an admirable and precious philosophy, so grand and sublime in its simplicity, that after it all novel theories, all audacious systems, faded away like vain dreams! The more the freethinker sought to penetrate it, the less he was able to comprehend it, and was well-nigh amazed. And yet he himself had studied and practised this doctrine in the happy days of youth when he had faith; but he had long forgotten and despised it, having given up his heart and reason to all the sophisms of incredulity, error, and licence. Still he could not forbear recognizing the divine teachings of Christianity, that doctrine of hope and love he had formerly professed. And he felt the desire of again learning to love and revere it revive within him, for his philosophe's heart was not yet irretrievably perverted, and that heavenly doctrine alone had brought some solace to his saddened heart and troubled spirit.

The philosophe, however, was not converted. Dense clouds still obscured his reason, and he had, unfortunately, too much pride, too much obstinacy, to openly recognize the emptiness and inanity of that darkness that had so long been his light.

He was still seated in the arbor, abandoned to painful and absorbing reveries, when Mary lightly tripped in unobserved.

"Ah! dear uncle," she said laughing, "you want to give me a fright! What! you came in here stealthily, without saying anything, crouching in the shadow of the vine stalks in our arbor like a stranger!"

"You're not displeased to see me here, I suppose," he answered gently, folding his niece's hand in his.

"But what's the matter with you, dear uncle?" she cried. "You seem troubled, your face is so pale. Has any mishap occurred to you?"

"No, no, don't be uneasy," he answered mildly. "I only feel a little tired, agitated, and triste. Mary," he continued in a low voice, after hesitating and reflecting for some instants, "aren't you sometimes uneasy about our poor Zouaves, who are so far away from us in Rome?"

Judge of Mary's surprise at this unexpected question! Up to that moment M. Morren would not let anyone speak to him of his son, and here now, far from appearing to dread the subject, he touched on it himself.

"Certainly, I don't forget them," she replied, "and very often I suffer more than I could say, thinking of all the dangers they are exposed to. Still, I try to put away those sad gloomy thoughts as much as possible. In the midst of my affliction, I turn towards the Lord, praying Him to extend His divine protection and omnipotent arm over those young soldiers armed in His defence; and I confess, dear uncle, prayer gives me good courage, firm hope, and great consolation."

"So you believe, then, my child, your prayer can draw down upon them the favor and protection of heaven?"

"Assuredly, uncle. Doesn't it belong to God to succor and protect His servants? And what can the violence and wickedness of men do against him whom God wishes to save?"

As Mary uttered the very words he had read in the holy book,

Victor's father, deeply struck, bent down his head, sighed, and remained silent for a few moments.

"How happy you are, my child," he sighed, "to believe so firmly in the powerful intervention of God and His providence!" And here, astonished himself at those words he instinctively uttered, he hastened to add: "But, unfortunately, all those consoling beliefs are only vague reveries, vain imaginings. It is only blind chance, and not divinity, that governs this world."

"Blind chance, uncle? Are you speaking seriously?" cried Mary, who had not failed to perceive the favorable impression her words had produced on this wavering soul. "If our splendid universe, in its sublime unity and its majestic beauty, had only been created and governed by blind chance, would there not, in that fact alone, be a miracle much more evident and a thousand times more incomprehensible than that great miracle of the creation of the universe by the omnipotent, perfect, and eternal God? And if it is impossible that all created things owe their origin to chance, it's just as impossible they should owe their perfect maintenance and preservation to it. Get along, uncle, it's no use talking like that; you're far too learned, far too clear-sighted, I'm sure, to believe chance alone created, directed, and organized the universe."

"Indeed," M. Morren smilingly interrupted, "I knew long ago my dear little Mary is as intelligent and as learned as good, but I'd never have expected to hear her reason so logically and so accurately. Really, little girl, one would think you had studied philosophy. No doubt" he added, pointing to the "Imitation," you have studied "your system, and drawn your reasonings from this little book?"

"That precious book," she modestly replied, "undoubtedly contains those dogmas and lessons, with a number of other truths not less sublime and consoling. However, we have no need to search so far for them when we wish to find them. Don't we every day invoke 'Our Father who art in Heaven' that His holy will, which we reverence, may be done 'in heaven and on earth,' and whom, at the same time, we pray to 'deliver us from all evil?' Ah! dear uncle," she continued, fixing a glance of love and solicitude on the man's face, "I would like to make a request of you that will appear, perhaps, rash and importunate. But pray, think of my affection for you—which has dictated it to me—and don't refuse your little goddaughter, who loves you so tenderly this slight favor!"

"What is it, then?" asked the old man, whose curiosity was aroused. "Believe me, my dear Mary, if it depends upon me to satisfy you, that it will be impossible for me to refuse."

"And it's really such a little thing," she interrupted.

"Only promise me to say every day a Pater and Ave for my intention, and also—and particularly—for those dear Zouaves."

The old man's face darkened and it was some moments before he replied.

"Impossible, my child," said he at first; "this is only childishness, pure superstition."

"First of all, it's not impossible; in the second place, there's not the least trace of superstition in it; and lastly—I've not forgotten it—you've given me your word. You wouldn't wish to make me believe you were afraid of the secret power, the magic influence of two poor little prayers?"

"Certainly not," he replied, laughingly—"what harm could your Pater and Ave do me?"

"Then," said she, caressingly, "why refuse me?"

"Well, after all, who's thinking of refusing you, little enchantress," he replied in a half-bantering, half-reluctant tone. "I'll do it, if you insist on it, and since I've promised to do it."

"On your word of honor?"

"Well, yes, on my word of honor."

At these words Mary again raised towards heaven a lingering glance of joy and gratitude.

As to M. Morren, when he maturely reflected at night on the various incidents and experience of that day, he owned to himself that he felt a quietude and satisfaction of mind that he had not known for a long time. And yet, thinking of the dangers Victor was running, he sometimes endured heart-breaking anguish and bitter grief; but in those moments he thought he heard close to him the voice that dictated those words of the holy book: "For he whom God will help, no man's malice can hurt."

The spirit of good and the spirit of evil contended for the philosophe's heart on that day. Assuredly, the bad angel was very far from having plucked the palm and carried off the victory; but still the free-thinker was not yet converted, although deeply moved.

CHAPTER IX.

IN CAMP.

Some weeks have passed since the events narrated in our last chapter. Victor and his companions, after their farewell visit to Stefano and his sister, have quitted the Eternal City for a time, and repaired to the camp pitched between Terni and Collescipoli.

Both Joseph and Victor took care to keep their Schrambeck friends informed of all the leading events and interesting details of their new life. For their part, the villagers impatiently watched for the days when it might be expected the postman would bring news of the young Zouaves. Jean Pierre, the old rural guard, never failed, every day after Mass, to ask Mary if she had heard from Joseph or Victor, and when he had obtained some fragment of a letter, or, at least, some valuable information from the young girl, he hastened to communicate it to his enthusiastic auditory.

But old Sus, the farrier, not feeling satisfied with the recapitulations of the old soldier, who could only transmit some disconnected scraps of correspondence, boldly asked Mlle. Van Dael to please lend him such of Joseph's letters as did not contain private details, to read them in public. The young girl, far from refusing his request, hastened to place a packet of her brother's letters in his hands. So the Sunday following, after High Mass, old Jean Pierre triumphantly accosted the ordinary members of his little Schrambeck society, and joyfully flourishing the packet of letters, cried: "Hurrah! here's news of our Zouaves!"

Then with profound gravity he took his spectacles out of his pocket, carefully wiped the glasses with the skirt of his coat, majestically placed them on his nose, and with becoming deliberation, unfolded the first sheet.

"First of all," he began, "here's how Joseph briefly relates their march to the camp: 'I'll tell you very briefly our march on Terni. We have left Rome at night to halt at daybreak. Then in a trice, they fetch the water and wood, the fire crackles and the coffee boils; every one holds out his porringer and the breakfast's over, and we're again on the march with arms and baggage. The atmosphere is glowing, the perspiration inundates our foreheads and streams through every pore, our throats are parched with thirst, and our tongues adhere to our palates, our legs bend under us and our feet are swollen. But what's the odds? We're only the more gratified when the captain raises his voice and cries: 'Halt!' in some shady valley.'"

"That's right," cried the carpenter. "They're brave lads, true soldiers, there's not a doubt of it."

"And then," resumed the guard, continuing his reading, "we have music: the drum beats, the hingle sounds, which naturally increases our enthusiasm and gaiety. At length the music stops, and to lighten our march we sing; we sing in Flemish as well as French, for we Flemish were in great force in the detachment going to Terni. It was on the evening of the first day, I recollect, that approaching the town of Civita-Castellana we felt so exhausted, so overcome by fatigue and heat, that all our courage and gaiety vanished, and a profound silence reigned in our ranks—a strange thing and quite novel! But Martin, who, as you know is a great enemy to sadness, and, besides, knows not fatigue, suddenly struck up, near me, in a ringing voice, our popular song, Klass en trouwat zijn leven niet. Thereupon the entire company burst out laughing and all our comrades from Flanders chorused the refrain of our jovial companion.

"But, as you may imagine of all our national airs, it is the hymn of the Belgian volunteers, "For the See of Peter," we repeat oftentimes and with most pleasure. Victor, who, in his leisure moments, sometimes takes to rhyming, has translated it, and turned it into a kind of Brabançonne. So the hymn of victory of our dear native land arises and resounds every day among us under the beautiful Italian sky. I hasten to transcribe the national and poetical work of our friend Victor in this letter, so that, in remembrance of us, our good friends may sometimes repeat the refrain to the echoes of our fair land."

"Bravo! bravo!" cried all the bystanders unanimously. "We'll copy it and learn it from this day."

"We'll begin this very instant," said the blacksmith.

"That's not the question," interposed Jean Pierre. "I suppose you'd prefer first to hear the rest of the news. Listen, then," he continued, unfolding a second letter; "here's what Joseph writes on the subject of their camp life: 'We are now camped a short distance from Terni, where the staff are stationed. We sleep under tents, and when we came here we had first to learn to pitch them. Now, in this respect, our education is complete; so henceforward we devote ourselves to other occupations. Hardly have we finished the exercise and manoeuvres when we disperse in different ways to look forward, draw water, and buy provisions. Our hardest task is in providing ourselves with water, for, unfortunately, the springs are a great way off, in the neighborhood of Colescipoli, a small village, perched on the top of a steep hill, three miles from our camp. We generally use large wooden pails to draw water from the spring, but jovial Martin finds those enormous pails infinitely too light for his robust shoulders. 'Haven't you got anything else to give me?' he cried, with a burst of disdainful laughter. 'These little half-pints hold no more water than I could carry in the hollow of my hands.' Our captain then placed at his disposal a regular trough, nearly as large as an ordinary wherry. Without stopping or stumbling he brings it back full on his back, and it's a pleasure to see all our thirsty companions, impatient for their share of the refreshing liquid, which he generously dispenses, crushing around him on his return.

"Now we've got to clean our belts, polish and furbish up our arms, and perform a thousand other little occupations incidental to camp life. You see by that our days are very well occupied, and that we can't be dull in the midst of such perpetual activity and constant diversity. And yet, despite so many fatiguing exercises and incessant manoeuvres, such a multiplicity of duties and toilsome labors, we have never been so happy or contented as we are now. We wouldn't exchange our modest and laborious life for all the grandees and triumphs of the universe. Aren't we working, and shall we not henceforward be suffering, for the Church, the divine spouse of Christ; and isn't there consolation, joy, and sweetness in that thought alone to render all our sufferings light and our privations supportable. Ah! of what isn't man capable when he works for God and with God!

"The Pontifical volunteers for the most part belong to rich and noble families; they have been reared in the midst of all the luxurious comforts, delicacies, and delights of prosperity. One might expect, then, to see them disheartened by privations so severe, or become weak and emaciated, and succumb to such constant fatigues. For instance, when they return from the morning exercise, after marching, running, leaping and climbing for six or seven hours, without taking breath, they re-enter the camp harassed and weakened, with eyes swollen, lips burning, mouths gaping, and chests heaving. And yet a moments' repose, a few instants' sleep, suffice to banish fatigue and recover strength; half an hour hasn't passed when they re-appear, quite restored, full of vigor, courage and animation, with renewed enthusiasm and gaiety.

"Scarcely have we rested for an instant than one of us begins to sing, another to play the flute, a third rises and grasps his companion's hand or pinches his ears playfully, and then rings out, from all our joyful groups, the grand cry of "Long live the Holy Father! Long live the valiant colonel of the Pontifical Zouaves!"

"Hurrah," suddenly shouted the blacksmith in a thundering voice, interrupting worthy Jean Pierre in the middle of a paragraph. "There are brave young fellows, true soldiers, it's easy to know them! Ah! you'll see they'll beat the revolutionary armies just as easily as a piece of red-hot iron beaten on an anvil!"

"Then, in the course of the evening," continued the rural-guard resuming his reading, "we delight to wander back in thought to the plains and villages of our dear Campine, for I needn't tell you we can't forget it: a true son of the Campine remains faithful at once to his creed and country. Then we sing in chorus some one of the songs of our country, or we discourse—always with renewed pleasure—either of our ancient legends or old national customs, traditions, and manners, or of the numerous friends and acquaintances we have left behind us at home. Among other things, we have devoted an entire evening to recalling the popular surnames, and sobriquets that, as you know, the different towns of the Campine bear. But, above all, we feel an indescribable joy and emotion every time we speak of our dear Schrambeck, its old manor, its pine forest, its green prairies, and particularly its good inhabitants so sincerely beloved."

"That's right!" cried the carpenter. "That's what I like to hear. Jean Pierre take care to tell Mademoiselle Marie she mustn't forget to write to her brother to tell him from us that we're never so glad as when we receive good news of our dear Zouaves."

"Certainly, I'll not fail," responded old Piquet, greatly flattered by the interest and pleasure his reading excited. Then he paused for a moment, readjusting his spectacles and looking through the packet for a fresh letter, leaving his numerous auditors leisure to exchange reflections on what they had heard.

"Ah! ah!" he cried at last, "here's a passage about Victor in this letter. 'I must tell you,' writes Joseph to his mother, 'of an adventure of which our dear Victor was the hero. There's a butcher at Terni who, on account of his extraordinary strength, as well as ferocity, has, with good reasons, become the terror of the entire town. Truth compels me to say that he is by no means a friend of the Zouaves; however he consents to sell them his beef, pork, and mutton, provided he gets a good price. Now, it being Victor's duty lately to go and pay him the disbursements of the entire company, this Hercules of the block, thinking to easily intimidate our young volunteer, claimed much more money than was due to him. Victor distinctly refused to give him a ha'penny more than the actual amount. The angry brute then became furious, and brandished his cutlass with a horrible imprecation. 'Do me the favor of putting down your knife,' said Victor quietly to him. At these words the ruffians, thinking himself stronger and braver than our companion, flung himself upon him with the intention of plunging the blade into his heart; but Victor, exhibiting the greatest coolness at that terrible moment, parried the blow with his left arm, and used his right to deal the murderer a blow, full in the face, so well aimed that the latter, with smashed teeth and bleeding lips, went spinning along the pavement, having, as he deserved, received an excellent lesson, which will make him less desirous in future of a fuller acquaintance with our Zouave's fists. This adventure, as you may well think, has resulted in still further increasing the general esteem and sympathy for our dear Victor, who possess everyone's good opinion, and was not long in being raised to the grade of corporal, to our unanimous satisfaction?"

And the old guard, wishing to enjoy his success to the fullest extent, continued his reading, to the great delight of his auditors.

But there was an aspect of the life of the Pontifical Zouaves upon which Joseph's extreme modesty hindered him expatiating—the admirable piety, the constant and tender devotion that, above all things, animated the young volunteers.

Certainly there was nothing strange in that. There can be no doubt our friend Victor and his two companions—who were all three so generously vowed to the defence of the Church of Christ—distinguished themselves, even in the midst of that rude camp life, by their constant fervor and perfect purity.

But they were not the only ones to give such grand examples of virtue, zeal, and piety. All the Pontifical Zouaves were as much distinguished by their devotion as by their firm courage; many of them slightly concealed, under the soldier's rough uniform, the halo of the saint and the white wings of an angel.

"In the ranks of the Zouaves," writes Bresciani, in his "Olderico," "were found in great numbers valiant young men of truly angelic innocence and purity who had voluntarily offered themselves as holocausts to the great God of battles, resolving joyfully to die in defence of the rights of the Holy See. Everywhere might have been encountered these young men and intrepid combatants, animated with holy joy and triumphant ardor, but, at the same time, preserving that calm dignity and wise restraint that alone become Christian heroes marching to the perils of a glorious enterprise. In the evening, they thronged the churches to assist at Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament, and in the morning, those who could spare a half hour hastened to town to hear Mass. On awaking, they never failed to kiss with pious respect the medals for which they were indebted to the loving solicitude of a fiancée, a sister or mother, on their departure, and many of them knelt at the head of their bed reciting the three Aves in honor of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin. When the new Zouaves who came to be enrolled in Rome after the battle of Castelfidardo presented themselves at the camp of Monte Rotondo, their first care was to assist at the Vespers the clergy of that town were then celebrating in the church; after which, as is customary in many parochial churches in Belgium and France, they ranged themselves at both sides of the choir and chanted psalms and canticles in a loud voice. All the faithful assembled in the church felt penetrated with respect and emotion, hearing those young soldiers singing the praises of God with as much fervor and recollectedness as if they wore the soutane and chasuble instead of uniform.

When they kept garrison at Terni, and later, when they encamped in the neighborhood, it was a sight at once moving and sublime to see this valiant and faithful army at evening prayer. Then, in the centre of each battalion of Zouaves who had formed squares, its chaplain took up his position to say prayers. There was nothing more beautiful and edifying to see those young and valiant soldiers—fatigued from the labors of the day, exhausted by the multiplicity of exercises, manoeuvres, sham attacks and assaults, marches and counter-marches—thoughtful, prostrate and with heads uncovered, humbly directing their glances to heaven, raising their voices in prayer to the Lord, thanking Him for all the benefits accorded to them during the day, asking grace for days to come, and renewing, in His presence, the offering of their hearts, their blood, their lives. Who, after that, could be astonished at seeing those young Christians—so grand of soul, so pure of conscience!—marching to the combat—one against ten—despite their numbers casting terror into the ranks of their enemies, and, if they could not triumph, selling their lives dearly!

When General Lamoricière visited the camp at Terni, where he found the Zouaves assembled—the German battalion and Pontifical Legion—he ordered a sham assault on the heights of Callescipoli. The Legion defended the little town which the Germans and Zouaves were to simultaneously attack. The general, witnessing the incredible ardor, address, impetuosity, and brilliant courage those heroic young men displayed, cried out on the battle-field at the end of the assault; "Let me only have ten thousand such soldiers as these under my orders and I'll undertake to drive every conspirator out of Italy."

CHAPTER X.

BEFORE THE STORM.

The Piedmontese Fanti had sent his disgraceful ultimatum* to the General-in-Chief of the Pontifical army. Immediately afterwards the Zouaves, as well as the other divisions stationed at the camp at Terni, marched to Foligno, Serravalle, Tolentino, and Macerata, to form a junction with Lamoricière's troops preparing to defend Ancona against the Piedmontese attack.

Pinodan's Zouaves quitted Macerata on the night of November 9th, and camped a short distance from the town and sanctuary of Loreto. But the enemy, to the number of twelve thousand, had already seized on the town of Pesaro, heroically defended by Colonel Zappi and his twelve hundred brave fellows. By notorious treachery, they had gained a dishonorable victory at Perugia, crowned by the massacre of a virtuous and innocent minister of God; in fine, they had seized on the citadel of Spoleto, which, commanded by the valiant Irish Captain, Miles O'Reilly, made, to the last, a vigorous defence.

But we must confine ourselves to rapidly adverting to these occurrences—all of which contribute their share of glory and honor to the Pontifical legions, and of shame to the Piedmontese generals and soldiers—and hasten to rejoin our Zouaves.

Evening was come, and darkness was spreading over the plain. The camp in which the valiant little army was entrenched presented, at that moment, a spectacle well worthy of attracting the attention of angels and men.

M. de Beledelièvre, Commandant of the Zouaves, had them assembled around him, to address to them the following words:

"My men, at length we approach the eve of that glorious and much longed-for day when we are to testify before God, before the Church, before Christian Europe and the civilized world, by the fervor of our zeal, the courage of our hearts, the steadfast and unswerving resolution with which we are going to defend the standard of the faith against those impious enemies who confront us ten against one, and threaten us with their arms. Many among us will certainly appear before the throne of God to-morrow. Let us strive, then, in view of that supreme moment, to sound and interrogate our hearts and purify our souls, in order that baptism of our blood may appear more meritorious and acceptable in the eyes of the Eternal Majesty—the Eternal Purity! I have already discharged that duty at Foligno; whoever wishes to again perform his has only to go and find the chaplain."

In a little corner, separated from the rest of the camp by two thick hedges and a deep trench, was our compatriot, the Rev. Mgr. Saeré, chaplain of the Zouaves. Each of those brave young fellows, respectful, modest, and full of recollectedness, came in turn humbly to his feet, and when he had received absolution, rose joyfully, and went to kneel upon the sod some distance off, and piously perform the prescribed penance.

While the minister of the Lord distributed the benedictions of heaven to the young soldiers on their knees, Joseph and Martin, who had finished their confession, were chatting in a low tone, about fifty steps from the extremity of the trench.

* The Minister Cavour, when he sent his celebrated ultimatum to the Pontifical Court, ordered Generals Fanti and Cialdini, at the same time, to cross the frontier of the States of the Church at the head of two divisions; and, to crown all, before even the Court of Rome had time to reply, the General-in-Chief of the Sardinian army addressed his audacious declaration of war to the Vicar of Jesus Christ, in presence of the triumphant revolution and astounded Christendom. The reader will recollect the opprobrious epithets cast upon the Pontifical Zouaves by Cavour, Fanti, Cialdini, and the journals in the interest of the cosmopolitan revolution; and how nobly their conduct vindicated their characters from those unmerited reproaches.

As to Victor, he had received absolution and was performing his penance aside, plunged in a profound meditation and absorbed in prayer. His glances rested on the summit of the dome that shields the modest and holy house of the Virgin Mary. That noble cupola, tracing its sombre outline on the blue back-ground of the clouds, seemed clearly pointing to heaven with its tapering spire. With hands crossed upon his breast, and his face beaming with faith, hope, and fervor, he lovingly repeated the name of the Mother of God, the heavenly Mary.

At length he arose and joined his friends.

"Well, we are ready," he cried out to them, as he drew near. "Here, at least, is a good work done, isn't it? So, my friends" he continued, in a more serious tone, "the victims are now prepared for the sacrifice. We await nothing now but the sacrificer; and, in all probability, he'll not be long coming."

"What sacrificer?" replied Martin. "Do you mean the general enemy? Well, he has only to come and all his soldiers with him. I promise them, it'll not be with little lambs and weak, gentle sheep they'll have to do."

At these words the giant rose rapidly, stretching out his enormous arms before him, proudly raising his head and throwing himself at a single bound into a posture of defence with contracted brow, fury and disdain in his face, and blue eyes dilated.

"Keep up your courage, my brave Martin," Victor quietly resumed. "We are certainly soldiers as well as victims, and, at least, we'll sell our lives dearly. But, you know, the enemy's forces are far superior in number to ours. No doubt, many of us, to-morrow, will have to seal, with their blood, their solemn engagements contracted before God and the Church. I know it, I am prepared for it, and yet, let me own it, I never felt so tranquil—so happy!"

"It is the same with me," interposed Joseph. "Besides, my friend, isn't our future destiny, when regarded with the eyes of faith, truly happy—thoroughly desirable? Whether victory crowns, or death smites us, we are equally certain to triumph. If we must die, we fall at least fearlessly, with the paternal benediction of the Vicar of Christ, and from the plain crowned by the humble house of Nazareth, soar upwards to the glorious tabernacle of the heavenly Jerusalem."

"Really, Joseph, how well you're able to speak!" cried Martin, seized with admiration at his comrade's words. "All you say is really so fine that I'll be inconsolable if I should happen to survive to-morrow's battle."

The two young cousins could not help laughing at this simple but touching exclamation of their valiant comrade.

"You're right, Joseph," resumed Victor, after a few moments' silence. "Our lot is really enviable and thoroughly happy. For my part, at least, I'd not exchange the destiny that awaits me for all the glories and pleasures of the universe. Haven't I had the honor of kissing the venerable hands of the Father of the Faithful. Hasn't he graciously given me his prayers and benedictions! Haven't I prostrated myself before the blessed relics of the martyrs and apostles, and on the earth bedewed by their precious blood? And shall I not have the happiness, the ineffable joy, to-morrow, of seeing Him descend within the shadow of those very walls where, according to the word of the angel, he descended into the immaculate womb of His holy Mother? I have only one grace, one happiness more to obtain, to hope for, and perhaps I'll render myself worthy of that happiness by joyfully dying for my faith and the glory of Christ. It is to that end I have offered my youth and my blood, my heart and my life to God? And I have nothing more to ask of Mary, when I shall go to kneel in her house to-morrow, than this grace—the greatest of all."

Here the three friends kept silent for some instants, for they were deeply moved by Victor's words.

"Do you know whom I was thinking of that moment?" Victor at length resumed. "Well my thoughts wandered very far from me to our native land. I seemed to see our dear friends praying for us, all together, at the threshold of the Chapel of Our Lady of Consolation."

"Perhaps it's what they're doing just now. Besides, you know, we'll never be without their prayers, and their love."

"Have they had time to receive our letters from Foligno," asked Martin anxiously.

"I don't think so," replied Victor. "But the papers will not have failed to inform them of the Piedmontese invasion and their disloyal conduct."

"Poor mother! dear friends! Nothing for them but tears and tribulation!" sighed Joseph.

"God will come to their aid—we've so long besought Him!" Victor promptly resumed. "And even if we should die on the battle-field, far away from them, they'll still be sustained by faith, by hope, by the divine promises of heaven and the happy certainty of rejoining us there. But my father, my unhappy father!" cried the noble and generous fellow, whose voice betrayed heart-rending sorrow; "my father, whom I have loved so tenderly and whom I cannot save! Oh! where will he be for all eternity? Shall I see him again? My friends, my brothers, you will pray for him along with me to-morrow, at the feet of Mary, won't you?" and he broke down, covering his face with his hands, to stifle his sobs.

"Confidence and hope, my friend," said Joseph to him, grasping his hand, "Don't you know the divine power of prayer—above all, the prayers of a child for a father? Who tells you your father's heart hasn't already felt the mysterious influence of grace? Doesn't your mother tell you he's completely changed. Come, my dear Victor, I can't tell you why, but a secret presentiment tells me that your father will recover the faith and return to God. Don't despair, then—courage and confidence."

"Thanks, Joseph, your good words fortify and console me," replied Victor, rising. "May that consoling promise be realized! Believe me, I, too, would like to be able to hope; and yet, each time I think of my father it seems to me that the blade of a poniard buries itself in my breast, I experience such doubts, fears, disquietudes, and grief."

But darkness had soon overshadowed the horizon, veiling all the details of the picturesque and graceful tableau of mountain and plain, and our three friends rose to rejoin their companions who were preparing for sleep, with the earth for a pillow and the sky for a tent.

Before his departure from Foligno, Victor had written to his parents. "My good father, my fond mother," he wrote, "these lines are perhaps the last you will receive from me. We are going to encounter the enemy who is coming to meet us with very superior forces. And yet, my dear parents, don't be grieved. Whatever may happen, you and I are in the hands of the Lord, and doesn't it belong to him, as the 'Imitation' says, to succor and protect His children in their distress? And then, you know, already I've long offered the sacrifice of my life and blood to God; I renew this offering to-day, with the same tranquility of mind, the same resignation; and, if this sacrifice of blood is soon to be demanded of me, I hope to be able to prepare for it with calmness and accomplish it with joy. As to you, my very dear parents, don't despair, I implore you, if this sacrifice should also be imposed on you, but raise your eyes to the Lord and put your hope and confidence in Him. My dear mother, didn't you tell me that you'd have the courage to thank God if you were one day to be the mother of a martyr?"

"Father, forgive me, if I now dare speak to you with unusual liberty. Far from me the thought of laying aside the respect due to you, but the moment is so grave, so solemn, that it will be my excuse. O father, don't resist any longer the voice of God; draw near to Him—your only refuge; don't remain deaf to the only prayer—perhaps the last prayer—of your poor child; don't refuse to fulfil his last wish, the most ardent desire of his soul. Father, if sometimes the thought of death, appears to me bitter and sinister, it is because then I feared that I should be separated from you for all eternity. But it won't be so, will it, dear father? You'll be moved by the fervent prayer of your exiled son; you'll return to God—to that God of forgiveness and love, whom you have loved and served in the days of your youth. For a voice speaks in my heart and tells me to hope; henceforth, consoled and sustained by that divine hope, I can joyfully return to my heavenly country. Then, dear father, my victorious and happy soul will constantly seek you, follow you, as well as my beloved mother, so fondly and justly cherished; then our transient separation will have lost all its bitterness and severity, and will be followed by the never-ending joys and delights of an eternal re-union. And in that sweet hope, adieu, adieu, fond father, beloved mother.—Your Victor."

As Victor anticipated, the papers had published details of the Piedmontese invasion, and, at the news of this sacrilegious treason, all loyal souls and generous hearts in every European home were transported with indignation.

M. Morren, from the very first, was greatly irritated.

"The misfortune I foresaw has at length occurred! O unhappy child! How could he have allowed himself to be overcome—to be carried away by such a folly? And I, blind, senseless father!" he continued, beating his forehead in his angry transports—"why was I so weak as to let him go?"

Nevertheless, at that moment all his paternal affection awakening in his heart, dispelled the bitterness of his resentment, and aroused his indignation against the invaders of the Church's patrimony.

"The traitors, the cowards! They don't blush to go into the fight ten against one!" he cried, striking with his clenched fist the paper containing Cialdini's manifesto, which he had spread out before him on the table. "And those usurpers, those traitors, have the signal audacity, too, to insult my noble Victor and his innocent companions, whom they treat as 'brigands,' 'drunken foreigners,' 'whom the love of gold and the thirst of booty have brought into Italy.' Shame on those calumniators, shame on those fools who thus outrage an assemblage of devoted, courageous, heroic young men!"

And the unhappy old man, in his indignation, hastily seized the paper and tore it in pieces, after which, leaning sadly on the table, he sighed.

"Victor, O my Victor," he murmured, "hope of my old age, honor of my house, alas! what is to become of you? shall I see you again?"

From that moment there was no more repose for that afflicted heart. And yet the studious philosophe thought he could find in study a remedy for his grief. He opened, by chance, a volume of Voltaire, and his eyes alighted at the place where these words are inscribed: "All our actions are subject to fatality; the empire of necessity rules all man's movements, and the world's too." He flung the book far away from him with a gesture of disdain.

"O proud, vain reason, which affords no solace to my afflicted heart, but faith in a ferocious necessity—a blind instinct equally governing the most illustrious men and the commonest animal!" he murmured, with a mournful sigh. "Oh! how much sublimer, sweeter, and more consoling are the words of Mary's book!"

Uttering these words, he rose, his forehead burning, his chest oppressed. All the rest of the day he wandered about the fields, no rest anywhere for his bruised feet, no consolation for his unrestrained grief.

From the day the papers communicated the fatal news to the ladies, they repaired every evening to the Chapel of Consolation. They never failed to meet Teresa, the beggar-woman, there; and the three poor mothers, anxious but trustful, together prayed to God for the safety of their children.

The two brave sisters were calm, courageous, and resigned. Carefully dissembling their grief, they always knew how to find words of hope to keep up poor Morren's sinking courage, or dry the good and affectionate Mary's tears.

Poor Mary seemed to grow yet more uneasy and suffer more. The once lively, laughing, joyous child had lost her gaiety, enthusiasm, and vigor. Retiring into her little room every evening, she passed long hours on her knees praying to Mary Immaculate. Then, when she started up out of her sleep at night, bathed in a cold perspiration and choked with terror, under the influence of some horrible dream, she again prostrated herself before the sacred image of the Queen of Angels, and again sought courage and consolation in prayer.

One night she was so terrified that she sought refuge in her mother's room. Madame Van Dael, after protracted and distressing sleeplessness, had at length fallen into a slumber.

"Mary, my dear child, what has happened to you?" she asked, somewhat startled at this sudden apparition.

"Oh, mother, I was so terrified!" she murmured. "I dreamt I saw Joseph dying on the battle-field. He smiled gently upon me for the last time, and then——"

Here Mary's voice was lost in a torrent of tears.

Madame Van Dael pressed the poor child affectionately to her heart, and wiped away the tears that coursed down her cheeks.

"My dear child, why torture yourself thus?" she said with forced calmness. "Those visions—those images—are only vain dreams you ought to strive and banish from your mind. Hope, my dear child, hope. Our Joseph will certainly return to us, happy and healthy. God and Mary will restore him at the united prayers of his mother and his sister."

The young girl then returned to her room, somewhat consoled, and strove to forget her terrors in sleep.

In the course of the same night, Madame Morren, after weeping a good deal, at last fell asleep, about daybreak, when a terrible dream disturbed her tardy repose. She thought she saw her dear Victor surrounded by wild beasts with tawny manes bristling, and eyes flashing; tigers, lions, white bears, leopards, and panthers, all crowded round him, seeking to devour him, and stretching forward their formidable jaws and sharp claws. The young man, exposed to their ferocious attacks, valiantly defended himself; nevertheless, his strength and blood were beginning to be exhausted, his sight was failing, his breathing slow and sibilant. Suddenly, an enormously large lion rushed at him, flung him down upon the ground, and the troop of monsters, simultaneously flinging themselves upon the innocent victim, soon left upon the plain nothing but shapeless, palpitating, bleeding remains.

The terrified mother awoke in the midst of the horrors of this dream, and wildly gazed around her, as if she still expected to see the dreadful vision that had troubled her sleep unfold itself to her gaze. But the rosy rays of morning already shed their pearly tints on forest and plain, and the unhappy mother, half-quieted, humbly prostrated herself near her bed of pain.

"O Mary," she cried, raising her eyes to the image of the Virgin Mary, "you see the tears I am shedding, the anguish that tortures me. You know, O Mother of God, what a mother may suffer! Upon Golgotha you have drunk to the very dregs the deepest chalice of grief and abandonment that was ever presented to maternal lips! Have pity on me; ask of God to grant me courage to bear to the end the sorrows of the sacrifice. Preserve my son to my love, my God, if such is Thy will; but in all things, and at all times may Thy will be done! Let Thy providence decide what is most necessary to our salvation and happiness!"

At the time his mother was praying for him, Victor knelt, along with his companions, in the sanctuary of Loreto, where for ages has been miraculously preserved the humble terrestrial dwelling under whose roof became incarnate the Divine Word.

In the interior of that temple was about to take place "a scene as moving as solemn, worthy of the glorious times of the Crusaders," said a holy French priest, to whom it was given to be an eye-witness of it.

"At four o'clock in the morning, Lamoricière Pimodan, the whole staff, flugelmen, Dutch and Franco-Belgian regiments, Foreign Legion, Italian artillery and guards, received the Body of Our Lord in the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar. I saw them thoroughly recollected, most of them prostrated on the pavement of that church which illustrious foreheads have already so often touched. Above all, the recollectedness of the two generals was so profound, so calm, so sublime, that I could not repress my emotion at the sight of them. Besides, most of the officers who surrounded them shed abundance of tears."

Who, indeed, could have restrained his tears in presence of such devotion and courage united to such faith and piety? Who would not have felt moved at the sight of so many heroes, who, prostrate at the feet of the Mother of God, renewed in her presence the sacrifice of their lives at the very moment when they were about accomplishing it.

Joseph and Martin slowly withdrew from the altar, with profound recollectedness and touching fervor. As to Victor, one had taken him for a marble statue, so absorbed was he in fervent prayer, and completely indifferent to all that was passing around him. At that solemn moment he had only one thought, one wish—he was praying for his father.

And when at last he recrossed the threshold, going, with his companions, towards the place of combat, he stopped for a moment to turn aside his head and glance again beseechingly towards the smiling Virgin on the altar, murmuring: "O father, father!"

CHAPTER XI.

THE ADYSS.

While Lamoricère's valiant little army halted for an instant under the shadow of the sanctuary of Loreto, the Piedmontese forces, who were manœuvring to surround them, distributed themselves in great numbers through all the neighboring villages. Already Orsino, Camerano, Castelfidardo, and the intervening hamlets had been occupied by the enemy's regiments, who, confiding in their immense numerical superiority, saw, undismayed, the moment of combat approaching.

On the evening of the appointed day—on that very evening when Victor and his companions, to prepare for battle, were reconciled to God in the sacrament of Penance—two Piedmontese soldiers, quitting their comrades' noisy groups, were walking side by side to the top of one of the hills overlooking the town of Castelfidardo.

One of them, who looked from twenty-five to thirty years of age, had recently arrived at the Piedmontese camp, and seemed to be a native of the southern provinces of Italy. He had presented himself at the camp a few days before the invasion of the Pontifical frontiers, and after a rather long interview with the General-in-Chief, had been incorporated in an infantry company.

No one knew this new-comer; and the mystery surrounding him was not slow to excite general curiosity. To what end had he come, and what secret mission had he to fulfil? Several of the officers of the army, wishing to appear more far-sighted and better informed in their comrades' eyes than they really were, maintained that this stranger was none other than one of the chiefs of the Carbonari sent by Garibaldi to carry out in the army some project known to the revolutionist alone. Be that as it may, they knew nothing positive touching the origin and plans of that unknown one who, moreover, appeared extremely reserved and very uncommunicative towards his companions-in-arms.

He seemed, however, from the first, to exhibit a very special confidence in one of the soldiers of his company—the Piedmontese Orazio; so they were often met walking and chatting together. The Piedmontese, very probably, knew well the history and antecedents of his mysterious friend; but he was as mute as the tomb on that subject.

At the moment we speak of, the two friends, having reached the edge of a little plateau that crowns the summit of the mountain at this side, had stretched themselves on the grass to rest.

"What a fine evening!" cried the stranger, after an instant. "And it precedes a day still finer—the day of my vengeance!"

"Say of our vengeance," interrupted the Piedmontese. "Indeed, aren't we going to-morrow to attack and vanquish the enemies of Italy! Or, now that I think of it, might you have besides some personal vengeance, Gennaro, to wreak in the tumult of the fight?"

Gennaro—for that unhappy one had joined the Piedmontese battalions immediately after his departure from Rome—Gennaro paused and appeared to reflect for some instants. At length he replied:

"Indeed I have a vengeance to wreak. Listen to me, Orazio; I'm going to tell you my history. I shall not have to blush before you, for I know you, my friend. Have you not obeyed one commandment of our society, which ordered you to plunge your poniard into the heart of your own brother?"

Orazio here grew pale; a convulsive trembling shook his limbs, and his brow drooped under the sharp glance Gennaro fixed upon him.

"Don't be afraid; you have nothing to fear," quickly resumed the latter, with an indulgent smile; "only I wished to show how far I had the pleasure and honor of knowing you. I even know something more; I know that at first, at that supreme moment, the poniard fell from your hands, and that, if you again raised it to boldly execute the order given, it was because you feared our powerful society, frustrated in its designs, would wreak its vengeance upon you. Well, Orazio, have I spoken the truth?"

"Certainly," stammered the miserable fratricide in his excessive confusion and terror—"certainly. But it was so dark then—how could you know?"

"What's it to you? You see nothing escapes our society. But this, however, has nothing in common with my history. Let us come to the point, then; it seems to me I'll solace my heart in telling you upon whom I wish to revenge myself, and why I've come here. My family is of Neapolitan origin. My happy childhood glided by in the cool and pleasant shade of a villa situated a short distance from that city. My mother's name was Benedetta, my father's Bernardo Bianchi; I was their second son; I've a ready told you my childhood was careless and happy. Fortune smiled upon us; we had friends. My father passed with good reason for the most eloquent advocate in the city, and every day pleaded several causes brilliantly and successfully. However, this peaceful happiness was not to last long. My father, however honored he was, had enemies. They circulated malevolent rumors, hateful calumnies adroitly, dissimulated about him, and the number of those who esteemed and respected him was not slow to sensibly decrease, while the influx of clients and cases diminished. What could one do under such circumstances? Bring a legal action against the calumniators? But unfortunately, the plot was so carefully woven, the source of the calumnies so cleverly dissembled, that it was impossible to discover it by such means. My father felt himself sinking under the weight of anger and despair; my poor mother, cut to the heart, decayed and languished. Alas, she was not long in succumbing to her suffering. O mother, justly cherished, how much I lost in losing you! Oh! you loved me so much, too tenderly loved perhaps!

"Our sojourn in our native city had become odious to my afflicted father! Immediately after my mother's death he abandoned it for ever, and came to establish himself in Rome.

"He then attributed, I don't well know why, the infernal calumnies of which he had been the victim to the powerful influence of the secret societies he had always combated with all the power of his eloquence, and hoped to shelter himself from their dreaded sway by establishing himself in the capital of Christendom. Besides, he had bade adieu forever to the labors and duties of his profession, and only wished to pass the rest of his days in the humble tranquility of the domestic hearth.

"As to me, as long as my mother lived, I had remained faithful to the habits of order, prudence, and moderation my parents strove to make me contract from my childhood. But scarcely was I left to myself than, unfortunately, I made bad acquaintances, and soon abandoned myself to idleness, debauchery, gambling, unbridled licence, and all kinds of excess. One of my new companions, whom I'll content myself with calling Silvio, had then very great influence over me. He was rather tall and weakly looking, his lips pale, thin, and close together, his nose aquiline, his eyes full of fire, and his glances penetrating. Such was the tempter who was to gradually lead me to my ruin. 'Bravo Gennaro! drink fast and play on,' he'd cry to me in his strident voice when by chance, I heaped up notes and gold pieces before me at the gaming table. 'Courage!' he murmured in my ears when fortune had betrayed me. 'Drown your vexation in wine, and then confidence and hope! You must learn to persevere and learn to conquer!' Alas! I followed those counsels and persevered. Very soon I had debts, debts of honor, considerable debts! I hadn't the courage to expose my situation to my father, to confess my delinquencies to him. My father himself, moreover, couldn't have helped me; we were very much reduced, and lived struggling on some of my good mother's savings in prosperous times.

"I saw the abyss open before me, beneath my feet, and I didn't hesitate to plunge deep into it every day. Silvio, my bad genius, wasn't chary of his advice. Despair at last seized me, and I tried to drown my remorse in debauchery and drunkenness, when I saw my creditors, irritated by such a long delay, were going to pursue me,

"One evening, sad and silent, I took refuge in the lower room of a café in the Piazza Navone, when Silvio entered, and, as soon as he saw me, came up.

"Ah, my good Gennaro!' he cried 'what has happened to you that you look so very sad.'

"Alas! it's not without reason; I'm very unhappy.'

"Come, tell me. Let me share your troubles,' he continued, resting his sharp glance upon me.

"Well, Silvio, I've debts.'

"Really nothing else?'

"But listen to me now, Silvio; those debts are considerable.'

"And you've no other subject to annoy you, I again repeat?'

"But, Silvio, I have no money.'

"Well, some must be found.'

"It's easy for you to say that, but I'd like to know how.' I replied with some bitterness.

"Money, I assure you, my dear friend, is not so rare. So Gennaro, you want some?" he continued after a pause; "well, come with me, we'll look for it.'

"Where are you taking me?'

"What need you care, provided you're supplied with funds enough, not only to provide for to-day's expenditure, but also for future eventualities?'

"I followed him mechanically. Necessity, fatality, drove me on. Oughtn't I avoid pursuit, prison, shame at any cost?'

"When Silvio had led the way through several streets for a good while, he stopped about the middle of the Via Ripetta before a rather fine-looking house. He rapped and a domestic at once appeared and opened the door.

"Oh! it's you then?' he said, seeing Silvio.

"Yes, you see. But tell me, is he here?' The lackey nodded affirmatively. We followed him, silently traversed a rather large number of passages and corridors, and at last knocked at a carefully closed door.

"Who are you?' was asked from within.

"Friends faithful unto death!' responded Silvio. And, as if those words had exercised a really magical power, the door turned of its own accord on its hinges, and opened before us.

"In the centre of the apartment into which we entered was placed a long table covered with papers, at which an old man was then seated. A heavy grey moustache shaded his upper lip; his lofty forehead was almost entirely bald; the expression of his face was affable and benevolent, although the glance of his bright black eyes was sharp and piercing.

"Ah! it's you, Gennaro Bianchi,' said he as soon as he saw me. 'Well! my lad, you've come at last?'

"At these words of the old man I felt seized with such a profound astonishment that at first I couldn't answer him. How could this stranger who was so completely unknown to me have known my name and my present situation?'

"I leave you with him; the affair will be concluded in an instant,' murmured Silvio in my ear.

"The old man nodded assentingly,

"Gennaro Bianchi, he resumed, when we were alone, 'you're just the man we're looking for.'

"I conjure you, signor, explain yourself more clearly,' I replied. 'How can you know me, since I don't know you?'

"Do I know you, my young friend?' he replied with a smile. 'For some time I haven't ceased to watch you—to follow you. Stay,' he pursued, handing me a sheet of paper upon which, among a list of names, mine was inscribed,

"I seized the sheet and read,—what should I tell you, Orazio? It was a detailed and perfectly accurate description of my person, character, faults and capacities!'

"You see I know you,' continued the old man. 'And now, Gennaro, you want money—don't you?' And his glance, which seemed to go to the very bottom of my soul, rested upon me.

"Assuredly! I murmured, without daring to raise my eyes.

"Don't be uneasy, my friend; you shall have it and on one sole condition. All I ask of you, Gennaro, is that you should consent to enrol yourself in the ranks of our glorious society, devoted to and actually working out, the deliverance of Italy.'

"At those words of the old man, I stepped back,—I trembled with horror. I thought I saw the phantom of my beloved mother suddenly rise before me, imploring and conjuring me to resist this temptation—to fly from this fatal place,

"No, no, never! I cried. 'If it is on that condition you consent to aid me, let me go!'

"And I dashed towards the door, when the old man, bounding after me, seized me with a vigorous arm that seemed to nail me to the ground.

"Go! he cried, 'don't think of it, Gennaro. You'll not leave this before you're ours.'

"Let me—let me go! I cried. 'I'll quit the city; I'll not betray you.'

Here the old man's brow darkened—his glances, hitherto tranquil, assumed a ferocious and menacing expression.

"Maniac!' he cried, placing the barrel of a pistol to my breast, 'silence, or I send a ball to your heart to make certain of your silence!'

"I dropped half fainting upon a chair.

"Gennaro,' continued the tempter, re-assuming his sweet, insinuating voice, 'why make such a to-do, why resist so, when it only concerns your legitimate satisfaction and prosperity? Poor child, you know neither the aims nor the intentions of the Carbonari. They are noble sons of Italy—generous, devoted sons, devoting themselves to defending this land of liberty—this common mother.'

In vain he sought to move, to persuade me; I had no longer strength nor wish to answer him.

"Gennaro,' he at length resumed, 'select, wretched man, between submission and shame!'

"And yet I still resisted. But the tempter was determined not to let me go. He employed persuasion, remonstrances, threats, promises—everything with infernal tact, with consummate art. Could I resist him, Orazio—I weak, despairing, without strength and without defence? When I departed from that dark abode, I was no longer my own—I was altogether the society's; I was a Carbonaro—I, the son of Bernardo Bianchi, who had sworn an eternal hatred to that powerful association!

"From that moment a complete revolution took place in my sentiments, in my mind, and in my heart. I had a sister younger than myself—a faithful and living image of our poor mother. Until then, my charming sister had been the object of my dearest hopes and fondest affection, her joys were my joys, her griefs my griefs; a pleasant smile playing upon her lips and beaming in her eyes was enough to make me forget long days of anguish and misery. In a word, Orazio, I would have given my life a thousand times for Nunziata, my beloved sister; and, likewise, there was nothing in the world dearer to Nunziata than the peace and happiness of her brother Gennaro.

"She was still very young at that time, but had always displayed remarkable sensibility and penetration, as well as uncommon energy. She sounded me at once, but saw nothing in me but some great change that had taken place. Still I made every effort to be always the same to her, and only show her a serene brow and smiling lips. Impossible, Orazio; I carried hell in my breast, remorse gnawed at my heart. Despite myself, I was dull, taciturn, impatient or silent and reserved, even before that loved sister. Oh! what I would not have given to be able to reverse that fatal resolution, to resume my liberty, my tranquility, and my independence! Still impossible; henceforth, I must always march on, always be silent and obey. To withdraw had been to pronounce my death-sentence, for I knew that in case of faltering, revolt or treason, the Carbonaro's poniard was infallibly suspended over my head.

"Forward, then, forward! I resigned myself to my destiny, I stifled my remorse. And yet, before succeeding in hardening my heart, I had a long and painful struggle with myself. Orazio, man is not born for evil; he has to suffer much before abandoning his mind and soul to hell!

"At first, Nunziata was content to follow me with her eyes, to observe me in silence. At last she ventured to ask the reason of the change that took place in me. This question irritated me; I harshly replied that I'd never allow a child to criticise my conduct. Poor Nunziata! she never murmured, but quietly wept in silence. But her tears fell like a weight upon my heart.

"Perhaps Nunziata acquainted my father with the fears she had conceived, for he sent for me, and interrogated me with a severity he had never yet shown towards me. I then lost all self-possession, all respect for paternal authority, declaring I was resolved to no longer brook a needless control and insupportable tutelage.

"It was a last step taken in the bad way, Orazio. I had successively disdained my sister's affection, despised the advice and ignored the authority of my father. What curb could restrain me? My family henceforth saw in me only an immoral young man—a miserable debauchee—and were very far from suspecting I was enrolled in the ranks of a secret society. I took the greatest precautions to prevent my secret from being discovered; my companions, moreover, had strictly enjoined prudence. And yet my father hadn't long to wait to learn that his son was henceforward included in the Carbonari.

"Little by little, I ceased to observe so rigorously all the precautions with which I had until then surrounded myself. Besides, I only went to our meetings about midnight, when everybody under our roof was fast asleep. No one could see me then; at least I supposed so. It is probable, however, the secret of my nightly excursions had not escaped the piercing eye of my sister Nunziata.

"I had quitted the house one night, directing my steps towards the place of our secret meetings where I was to attain to a higher grade at the expense of a new oath, when at the moment of entering the house in the Via Ripetta I saw, at the corner of a bye-street, enveloped in a large mantle, a shadowy figure which seemed to dog me and following at a distance. I turned round and hastened to retrace my steps, desirous on my part of closely examining the unknown one who followed me, but I couldn't discover anything; the spy had disappeared, the street was solitary; no trace of the passage of that shadow was distinguishable, even on the surface of the pavement. Then abandoning my researches, I walked, with a tranquil step, towards our meeting-place, into which I readily penetrated by the aid of the password. The hall was already full; the ceremony began.

"Orazio, I'll never forget that dreadful night. I placed myself in the centre of the hall, accompanied my two witnesses—my dangerous friend Silvio, and another Carbonaro.

"'Do you promise,' the old man who had enrolled me then asked, 'do you promise to labor with all your might and all your power to dethrone Christ and His Church—to efface the name of God Himself from the face of the universe?'

"'I promise.'

"'Do you promise to break all the ties of family, relationship, and nationality that may still retain you?'

"'I promise.'

"'Do you promise to employ all your strength to make—as far as you can—every man his own God and his own master, master also of nature and creation, a free and powerful, strong and pitiless creature, like the serpent of the great forests and the lion of the deserts?'

"'I promise.'

"'Take the oath then.'

And, at these words, the old man, drawing aside a curtain which disclosed to my gaze a kind of altar, pointed out to me a poniard placed upon a marble table in the midst of lighted torches. Upon one of the faces of the triangular blade was engraven this word, 'Fraternity,' upon the second this device, 'Death to tyrants!' and finally upon the third, 'Death to traitors!'

"The old man first put this poniard in my hand; then took it back and placed it upon the altar.

"'Rest the palm of your hand on the point of this poniard,' said he 'and repeat after me the words I am going to say:—I swear to faithfully fulfil all the promises I have made. If ever I break my oath, may this blade, piercing my heart, punish me for it. From this moment I authorise those of the members of this society who shall judge me unfaithful to revenge themselves by striking me, as I shall strike, without regret and without fear, all felons and traitors!'

"I repeated the words of the oath after the initiator; then the old man proclaimed me a friend and brother, impressing a kiss upon my forehead. The last step was taken; I had tumbled into the abyss.

"The morning had scarcely dawned when I returned home, still impressed by the events of the night, sustained and animated by a new exaltation. Besides, inebriation was beginning to produce nervous excitement, for they were not sparing in their libations when a new comrade was to be fêted. I opened the door noiselessly, and glided furtively into my chamber, thinking surely no one had heard me returning at such an early hour in the morning.

"But, at the moment I crossed the threshold, I stood trembling, and, as it were, thunderstruck.

"My father was there, erect and motionless, at the head of my bed. His face was livid, his forehead bathed in perspiration, and he fixed upon me his dark, gleaming eyes.

"At this sight, I recoiled, seized with profound terror.

"'Why do you recoil, Gennaro? Do you no longer recognize your father?' he demanded in a hoarse, hollow voice, whose measured tone and bitter irony made me shudder.

"'What do you mean?' I stammered. 'And why, pray, should I no longer recognize you?'

"'Gennaro,' my father then continued, without answering my question, 'pray where are you coming from now?'

"'I'm coming—after taking a walk,' I replied, assuming a tone of indifference. 'I felt somewhat indisposed to-night, and thought a little excursion in the air—'

"'So, you stopped nowhere?'

"'Nowhere, I assure you.'

"'You lie, wretch,' he said, in a loud, ringing voice. 'You're after being at a meeting of the Carbonari! Henceforth, you belong to that infamous secret society. O misery, O grief, O shame! My son, a Bianchi, is a traitor—my son is a Carbonaro—my son is accursed!'

"'Silence! You lie!' I replied, my blood boiling with shame and fury.

"'I lie, say you!' he replied, with a bitter smile and a broken-hearted look. 'So my son is not leagued with those infamous Carbonari, he has not inflicted that eternal disgrace upon his father's name, he has not enrolled himself in the ranks of the enemies of his Church, the enemies of his family, the enemies of his country? But if I lie, Gennaro, these papers, however, do not lie,' he continued, showing me a bundle he had taken off the table before him. 'Ah! my son is not a Carbonaro—my son is not an accursed one!'

'I cast a startled look at the manuscript. It contained various plans and secret documents that had been entrusted to me by the society, and which, in my pre-occupation, I had left on the table when leaving home.

'I made a furious bound, like a lion caught in a trap.

'Give me up those papers,' I cried in a voice choking with surprise and terror.

'My father made no reply, but looked at me ironically. I rushed at him, Orazio; I was distracted with rage, and had only one idea, one object—to recover those papers from him.

'The hand of the demon was on me. I flung myself like a madman upon my unhappy father. He wrestled courageously; he struggled to the last, disputing with me the possession of that fatal manuscript.

'Give me up those papers, they are mine,' I cried. And carried away as I was by my blind fury, I gave him such a violent blow in the chest that he immediately reeled backwards and fell inanimate upon the carpet, while a stream of blood spouted from his lips.

'At that moment, my sister, awakened by the noise of the struggle, rushed into the room.

'Gennaro! father! father!' she cried distractedly in a heart-rending voice, and fell unconscious upon the old man's body.

'The spirit of darkness overmastered me at that moment. I had become mad, furious, ferocious. I snatched the papers violently from my dying father's hand, and rushed out of the house I had sullied with the crime of parricide.

'During all that dark day, I wandered through the streets of Rome, unable to find shelter or repose anywhere. When evening came, however, I felt drawn by an irresistible force towards the peaceful hearth I had deluged with blood, and where I was but too soon to learn the result of my crime.

'I had scarcely opened the door when my brother Stefano, severe and menacing, confronted me. My brother's character had always inspired me with profound respect, and even a kind of terror, for he was as wise and prudent as he was resolute and intrepid.

'Gennaro,' said he, in a restrained tone, 'our father died to-day, and, dying, left a supreme recommendation—a last message for you. Will you abandon for ever the fatal society to which you belong?'

'I distinctly refused. Those entreaties, those representations were to have no effect. What arguments could touch the heart of a parricide?'

'Well,' my brother concluded, when he had lost all hope of convincing me, 'since you feel neither shame nor remorse for your horrible crime, engage to quit this country; break for ever the ties that still unite you to a family you have forever dishonored, or, if not, I'll deliver you myself into the hands of justice, which will know how to make you expiate your crime. Attend to what I tell you now, Gennaro; up to this, everybody thinks Bernardo Bianchi died of a fit of apoplexy. If you quit this house and this city immediately, your precipitate departure may arouse suspicions. I require you, then, to remain a few days longer with us; it is a precaution due to the honor of our family. Oh!' he continued, looking at me, with a bitter smile, 'I know well that, in acting thus, I'm warming a serpent in my breast, and that some misfortune may happen to us. But I warn you, Gennaro, I've taken precautions against that. In case of murder done by you or your friends, my sister's blood or mine will be immediately avenged. Whereas, if, in a few days, you elect to abandon this country, we promise you to be as silent as the tomb about all that has occurred, so that the honor and reputation of the Bianchi may remain unblemished in the eyes of the world. Are you resolved, Gennaro? Do you consent to go?'

'Yes, I consent,' I replied, really glad to quit that cursed city.

'It is, indeed, the safest thing,' retorted my brother; 'your hardened heart is henceforth inaccessible to every feeling of remorse, pity, and shame; still, may I have the happiness of finding you some day converted and penitent! Then, Gennaro, but only then, can I offer you my hand, as to a friend, a brother.'

The Carbonaro paused at this part of his story. Even at that moment, the bitterness and acuteness of those mournful memories seemed to make his voice falter and to move his soul.

'I quitted Rome,' he pursued, 'after my father's funeral, and repaired to England, where I was to fulfil a mission with which I had been charged by our Italian brothers. I met Mazzini in London, where I wasn't long in being affiliated to another secret society. It was thenceforward by incessant activity, by continual efforts placed at the service of the cause I had embraced, that I strove to stifle the voice of remorse. I took an infernal pleasure in drawing men out of the safe and regular path, in making other souls—young, generous and pure as mine had been—fall with me into the abyss. A treacherous instinct secretly told me that I should feel solaced when I had succeeded in kindling in other hearts the dull and fatal flame that little by little consumed mine.

'How many sincere men—brave, loyal young men—I have drawn down with me into the bottomless gulf of Freemasonry! And I was proud of my triumph, I rejoiced at their ruin; I laughed at their fall, at the anxieties the present brought them and the evils the future had in store for them.

'I didn't remain long in England. I afterwards repaired to Rotterdam to put myself in communication with the Dutch societies, and from thence to Belgium, where I proposed remaining several years.

'Thanks to the letters of recommendation with which the Italian, English, and Dutch lodges had abundantly supplied me, I wasn't long in entering into relations with a large number of Freemasons belonging to the opulent classes. I went into the elegant society of the cities where I successively resided as professor of music and Italian; my new friends got me pupils, and soon—under the counterfeit name of Tommaso di Rocca-bianca—I passed for a first-class linguist and a musician of high reputation.

'But I took care to add other instructions, other precepts, to those I had to give my pupils. My new profession supplied me with an opportunity of enlisting new adherents in our society, and, while appearing to be engaged in forming linguists or musicians, in reality I was procuring adepts for Freemasonry.

'One of those young men, nevertheless, was not slow to become my master. His name was Ernest Van Dormael, and I confess to you, Orazio, he was really superior to me in many points. It was the ardor, the impetuosity of my passions, that had fatally hurried me on to my ruin. He, Ernest, knew not passion, and seemed even ignorant of ardor. He did evil in cold blood, after having measured the extent and calculated the consequences; and he did it for the pleasure of insulting the Creator, and injuring others. I sometimes heard the harrowing voice of remorse arise within me, and often made vain efforts to escape the dull anguish that tortured my soul. He, Ernest, seemed never to have heard that voice; he pursued his route, marched to his end with complete coldness, calmness, and impassibility.

'I could never entirely banish the idea of God from my mind nor my heart, while my pupil, this new friend, was a confirmed atheist, an atheist penetrated with the most radical principles of universal negation.

'Van Dormael had gradually become my pupil, my friend, my inseparable companion. I experienced a secret satisfaction at the thought of meeting on my way a being more wicked than myself,—and yet he had never assassinated his father!

"Besides, he'd have no need of it. From his childhood, his father had made him a rebel, a sceptic, an atheist.

"'Ernest,' I asked him one day, 'if it were necessary to you to remove an obstacle—a man who was in your way—would you recoil before any act of violence—let us say a murder?'

"'By no means, I assure you,' he coldly replied.

"'But if the man you were to strike was your own father?'

"'Well, what of that!' he replied, with the same coldness. 'Still,' he continued with an infernal smile, 'assassination is a clumsy process, to which it would be difficult to tempt me to have recourse, because it rarely succeeds. Believe me there are other ways by which one strikes harder and revenges himself more safely.'

"So you see, Orazio, I had found my master. But I return to my friend, Van Dormael. His chosen weapon was calumny, with which he excelled, and with which he destroyed and blackened at pleasure his friends and adversaries. Still, he employed it oftenest, not so much against private persons as against entire classes, whom he rendered suspected or obnoxious in public opinion, placing them in a false light. This was so much the more easy to him, as he had access to the columns of several journals in which his infernal malignity and cleverness, his great command of style and rare power of invention, enabled him to pour poison, gall and mud upon the wounds his scathing darts had caused and which nothing could cure. Above all he attacked with most violence, fury and acrimony, the men and things of God—religion and its ministers. Besides, he had been one of the founders of the society of the Solidaires. Such, in fine, was the friend I was to meet in Belgium, and who was undoubtedly sent to me by hell.

"He presented me in all the circles in which he habitually moved, in the recommendable houses in which he was received, and, thanks to him, I was not slow to become acquainted with the Morren family, of whom I shall have occasion to speak.

"The head of the family was a loyal libre penseur, an old, obstinate philosophe who proudly pretended to keep his reason strong and free, independent of every prejudice and exempt from all restraint. Despite all our efforts and all our persuasions, he had firmly refused to submit to the yoke of Freemasonry, which he said had only bonds and slavery to offer him, as displeasing and unacceptible in every respect as those the precepts of Christianity could impose upon him. But, for the rest, we knew well that, though refusing to join, he would never oppose us; so we were content to see him remain as he was—independent philosophe, obstinate libre penseur.

"But as to his son Victor, whom old Morren left entirely free to select the faith and dogmas that suited him, and who was educated under the eyes of a pious mother, he opposed an obstinate and absolute resistance to all our efforts, all our solicitations, despite our zeal and perseverance. We were even quite resolved to leave him thenceforward in peace, when a fortuitous circumstance occurred, which changed the indifference I had until then felt towards Victor into a deadly, implacable hatred.

"One we met at the old philosophe's one of his nephews, a mad devotee, who had come to tell his uncle of his engagement in the Pontifical army and his departure for Italy. Our projects, our hopes, the grand and holy cause of fatherland then came in question; I defended it as long and as well as I could. But, being quite out of myself in a strange house, I was at last, by courtesy, constrained to beat a retreat before that Joseph, that young maniac whom his cousin Victor supported; and I left that house in a state of indescribable rage and fury.

"Unfortunately, that was not all. That young bigot, Joseph had prevailed on his cousin Victor to accompany him, and the old philosophe foolishly allowed his son to carry out his resolution. I then decided to abandon Belgium and return to Rome, where I hoped to find an opportunity of ponarding those two dreamers.

"Indeed, I wasn't long in meeting Victor in Rome. It was him, him particularly I wished to strike. If I were lucky enough to see him fall under my poniard, I could easily abandon his friend to one of my accomplices. I easily prevailed upon my victim to accompany me for a walk outside the city walls; I had already led him to a solitary place where I could strike him and a dagger was gleaming above his head, when suddenly my brother Stefano placed himself between me and my revenge.

"At first, I was tempted to assassinate him, too; it was impossible; there were then two against me—Stefano, courageous and strong as a lion, and Victor, ever calm and brave. My brother wishing, before all, to protect the honor of the family, violently reproached me in our Neapolitan dialect, not easily understood by a stranger. He reminded me of my crime, of the solemn promise I made to him and which I had infringed, asked me if my heart was forever closed to every sentiment of justice, shame, and repentance, and at last threatened to deliver me up to justice if I didn't as quickly as possible quit the city and the Roman territory.

"From that moment, my hatred of Victor naturally only increased; rage, vexation, the bitter feelings of abortive revenge inspired all my acts and boiled in my breast. I took a solemn oath to wipe away my shame in the blood of my enemy at any cost, and wherever I'd have to follow him.

"I had met at Rome, Silvio, the bad genius, the infernal tempter, who had formerly corrupted my youth. I had pointed out my victim to him and he had promised me to make him promptly acquainted with the point of his poniard. But, unfortunately, the pursuit of the police constrained him to withdraw from Rome before he could find an opportunity of keeping his promise.

"As for me, I hastened to fly that fatal city, whose very walls seemed to salute me with the name of parricide. First, I joined Garibaldi's bands, hoping under their flags to find an opportunity of wreaking the vengeance so long awaited; but when I learned that the Piedmontese were going to invade the Pontifical frontiers at several points, I hastened to enrol myself in their ranks, hoping at last to meet my enemy face to face."

Gennaro here finished his story, which Orazio had silently and attentively listened to. The Piedmontese soldier, however hardened he might have been, felt penetrated with fear and surprise at the recital of the adventures and crimes of his new companion.

As to Gennaro, his countenance, his gestures, his attitude betrayed no other sentiment than that of a ferocious hope and infernal joy at the approach of that decisive day when he was at last going to have an opportunity of striking his enemy.

"Orazio" he resumed, in a grave tone, after a few instants' silence, "I'd never have made such disclosures to you if I hadn't, first of all, to ask a service of you. You've understood it—haven't you? I must wreak a double vengeance on the persons of these madmen. Joseph, like Victor, must die. Henceforth, I'll taste neither repose nor happiness until I've seen their accursed blood flow and their two corpses stiffen before me. My friend, will you help me to accomplish this work, this useful and glorious vengeance?"

"Undoubtedly," replied the Piedmontese. "But how shall I recognise your two foreign Zouaves in the confusion of the battle?"

"Don't trouble yourself about nothing; it is I—I alone—who take upon myself to meet them, were they concealed in the bowels of the earth, at the bottom of hell itself! Don't embarrass yourself my friend; leave that to my vengeance. And yet," he pursued in a sinister tone, "Once already, O sorrow, that vengeance has escaped me! But what matter? A secret presentiment arises within me and reanimates me. To-morrow, to-morrow, for me revenge or death! Yes, I'll know how to find them; we shall meet—it is I who tell you. Then, you'll take care of Joseph; but Victor—Victor is mine alone! Let him tremble; he shall die to-morrow!"

CHAPTER XII.

CASTELFIDARDO.

It was the 18th of September, 1860. The heroes of Castelfidardo were at last about to hail the dawn of the holy day, the day of martyrdom. The General-in-Chief of the Pontifical troops, after serious consideration, had determined, if they could, to open a way through the enemy's forces in order to reach Ancona by the coast.

Alas! only that chance of safety remained, and that, too, accompanied by many obstacles.

First, their valiant little army had to cross the Musone, a little river that rises in the mountains to the north of Loreto, and extends towards the south in the direction of the sea into which, swollen with the waters of another river, the Aspio, it flows. Both these rivers have very steep banks.

Deep, narrow valleys, intersected by drains and covered with timber, stretch along both banks of the Musone, while, quite near the junction of the two rivers, opens out a plain about three miles in extent. At this very spot, the mountain that crowns the village of Castelfidardo divides, separating the valleys through which both rivers flow, the Musone watering one side, the Aspio the other. On the western slope of this mountain, and nearly opposite the church and town of Loreto, are the two large farms of Cascino and Crocetto, around which all the fury of the fight was to concentrate itself.

All the environs of Loreto, the mountains and valleys, swarmed with Piedmontese troops. On the Camerans side those troops occupied the summits, and, consequently, commanded the valley. Moreover, they had seized upon the bridge that unites both banks of the Musone, and established several batteries there to hinder access to it.

About half-past eight on the morning of the 18th, the first division of the Pontifical troops formed in columns, and began its march under the orders of General Pimodan. The second division was to follow at nine.

The right bank of the Musone was not occupied. The general and his brave men soon had crossed that little river; and scarcely had this valiant column planted the last piece of artillery at the other side, when the general ordered his troops to take possession of the two farms occupied by the Piedmontese on the heights of Castelfidardo. Fiery, irresistible, and rapid as the lightning, the Zouaves rush to the attack, supported and accompanied by about a hundred of the Irish light infantry and the advanced guard of the Roman infantry. They charge up the mountain under an incessant shower of shells and bullets, fall upon the Piedmontese bersaglieri, overthrow and repulse them, and make a hundred of them prisoners, including one officer. Then they hasten to place two pieces of cannon on the height to provide against a fresh attack, and plant two howitzers under the guard of Lieutenant Daudier before the house itself.

Four cannons and two howitzers of Richter's battery had been placed on the top of the Castelfidardo hill. From that elevated post, Colonel Blumenstille directed a murderous fire on the enemy's army, while the valiant Daudier, by his courage as much as by his strategical knowledge, made up for any insufficiency in the Pontifical artillery. Colonel Richter, who had been struck by a Piedmontese bullet, had nevertheless refused to abandon his post on the field of honor.

But the moment had come to attack the second farm. Pimodan gave the word of command in a loud firm voice, and his valiant little troop began to march. But, alas! it did not foresee the number and gravity of the obstacles it was to surmount. In the wood those brave fellows were to traverse, an entire army blocked the way. At their approach a hailstorm of bullets, cannon-balls, and grapeshot suddenly showers down on them from the enemy's ranks placed out of reach in the depths of the thickets, and decimates and crushes them so powerfully and so furiously that they are almost immediately constrained to retreat.

The enemy, seeing them recoil, emerges from the wood and advances. But suddenly the heroic battalion faces about, steadily awaits the Piedmontese, directs against them a murderous and well-sustained fire, and with revived ardor rushes upon and attacks them with the bayonet. Cialdini's soldiers, astonished at this heroic resistance of an enemy very inferior in numbers, falter, hesitate, recoil, and at last leave Pimodan's soldiers sole masters of the ground so valiantly reconquered.

But their gallant general is wounded; his face is pale and gaunt; the blood is flowing from his forehead. Still he keeps at the head of the column.

"Forward, my lads?" he cries. "Forward brave soldiers!"

"Long live Pimodan!" they all unanimously respond with a burst of enthusiasm.

"Don't shout," he replies, "but still advance!"

At that moment a bullet shatters his right arm; he at once seizes his sword in his left hand.

"Forward, my lads! God is with us!" he continually repeats.

Near him, Colonel Beedelievre, on foot, in the midst of his men, quietly folding his arms, gives his orders with admirable coolness and perfect tranquility.

For the third time the Zouaves attack the farm, and for the third the heroic Pimodan receives a bullet that lays half open his leg.

"Young men, God is with us! Courage, still onward!" he repeats, as, stiff and motionless in his saddle, he precedes them.

But the Piedmontese, in still more compact and numerous ranks, thronged round these brave men. The Zouaves fought desperately, like heroes, facing the enemy like lions entrapped; but the cavalry and the Swiss, essaying a murderous fire, had retreated in disorder, and re-descended into the plain.

The brave Daudier alone remained at the entrance of the first farm; all his soldiers (writes his noble companion, Tresvaux de Fraval) were dead or dispersed. A cannon was abandoned at about fifty paces from the enemy.

"Help, Tresvaux! Let us save the cannon!" cried the heroic officer. Tresvaux rushed forward, followed by Le Camus, Saint-Brieuc, and another of their gallant compatriots. And under a shower of bullets they detach the cannon, drag it to the edge of the rocks, hurl it down the declivity to the bottom of the valley, and then, intrepid and resolute, rejoin their companions.

The fight becomes furious, confused, and the battle rages. On one side, two hundred brave fellows who will not recoil and are ready to die; on the other, hordes of Piedmontese, who seem to rise out of the ground at every instant, still more numerous, still more savage. And yet those two hundred heroes still fight with the same valor, the same ardor. But, alas! there are gaps in their ranks at every fresh attack.

Still Pimodan, whom nothing discourages, orders a fresh assault. But at that instant, a fourth bullet, striking him on the right side, traverses the body and comes out on the left. This time the wound was mortal.

"Renneville," said he to his aid-de-camp—then, for the first time, tottering in his saddle—"I'm dying; go on my part, and get together our infantry."

Among the heroic soldiers of Castelfidardo was the gallant Ernest Maestraeten, a young medical student of the University of Louvain. "During the entire fight," he wrote subsequently to his parents from the prison of Alessandria, "I had two duties to discharge—that of surgeon and that of sergeant. Our ambulance was stationed at about five hundred paces from the line of battle. I was incessantly going from my battalion to my hospital, according to circumstances, transporting a wounded comrade, firing my gun, charging with the bayonet, or dressing wounds; in a word, doing whatever came to my hand and was most pressing."

The general, who was losing all his blood, flowing through five wounds, was borne to the care of this young and gallant Belgian, who had obtained the assistance of another physician. But at the very moment when the two doctors were going to dress the general's wounds, they saw the Pontifical troops falling back in disorder, abandoning the field of battle to the victorious Piedmontese. Maestraeten's companion saw the danger.

"Let us fly, my friend. It is time to go," he cried in extreme terror.

"I go? Never!" replied the noble young man. "I'll never abandon the general nor our poor wounded."

But, without answering, his colleague hastened to escape. "I need scarcely tell you he wasn't a Belgian," observed Maestraeten, writing to his parents. And the young Zouave, himself slightly wounded, alone remained with his dying general and his mutilated companions—a prey to acute sufferings.

The ambulance then presented a truly heart-rending spectacle. There were about thirty wounded officers and privates in it; those who were first brought in had their wounds washed and dressed; the others were waiting their turn. Blood flowed on all sides, pain and delirium wrung piercing cries even from those heroic combatants—those martyrs in a good cause.

To crown their misfortunes, the Piedmontese were not slow to surround the house. Then those self-styled soldiers of civilization, who were pleased to accuse the Pontifical volunteers of cruelty and perfidy, signalized themselves by strange and odious conduct. Although the black flag adopted by the ambulance had been hoisted on the housetop, those ferocious assailants, rushing to all the outlets, fired through the door and the windows upon the unfortunate wounded, repeating those atrocious volleys—which, rather badly directed, however, produced little effect—ten times. But all hope was lost, and those heroic remnants of an army of heroes, fainting and abandoned, were constrained to surrender.

The illustrious Pimodan, whom Bresciani justly compares to Judas Machabens, made no allusion to the gravity of his condition, and awaited death with admirable calmness. At his request, Cialdini consented that the young Maestraeten should remain by him to the last.

And, alas! the end of that hero was very near. "The general suffered cruelly," wrote one of the young Belgian prisoners a few days later, "but did not cease for an instant to bear his sufferings with the patience, courage, and resignation of a martyr. Exhausted by pain and the loss of blood pouring through five wounds, he drew his last breath a little before midnight." God had crowned His soldier, and summoned him to heaven to make him partaker of His glory.

The General-in-Chief of the Pontifical troops tried, however, to rally the straggling and scattered fugitives who jostled each other on the battle field. He had vainly striven to form them into a battalion behind the stone fence and around the farm, where they were protected from the ravages of the artillery. But he could not succeed in reforming them, and had to order what troops remained to retire behind the heights of Musone, and cross the river in the direction of Umana. These dispositions having been made, he returned to the farm where he was to clasp, for the last time, the hand of his friend, the noble Pimodan.

"General," said the dying man then, "they have fought like heroes; the Church's honor is safe—Farewell!"

Lamoricière next ordered the retreat to be sounded; then, as the farm of Crocetto could no longer be defended, he charged Colonel Condenhoven to hunt up the troops who still remained there, and direct them up towards the river, making every effort to save at least the heavy artillery. These latter combatants covering the retreat in the battle field, fought with the courage of lions and the vigor of athletes. Soon, of the twenty-two last defenders of the Crocetto farm, only eight remained—all the others having been wounded; but those eight for a whole hour defended that perilous post against the reiterated attacks of an entire Piedmontese column.

A few steps from them those eight heroes saw the bundles of straw and fagots in the granary blaze up to the top of the grange. The last breath of wind might blow those burning sparks to the roof of the farm and scatter them among them, and yet they wavered not, but still fought on. Their incessant volleys thundered one after another, and every shot brought down an enemy.

"Ha! look out there!" cried the Zouave d'Hout, and the Sardinian rolled on the ground, drowned in blood, and thus twenty-one Piedmontese fell one after another.

Their guns burned their hands, and might at any moment explode, killing themselves. But before them the dead and dying lay heaped upon the farm-yard, and they continued to spread around them in terror and damage. They were surely swayed by the spirit of war, by the genius of vengeance, those eight heroes with faces blackened with powder and perspiration, eyes glaring, lips compressed, and chests heaving.

Suddenly a discharge of artillery resounded and tore away half the roof. A cannon ball falls in the middle of the room; the floor shakes, the wall crumble, a torrent of flames and clouds of smoke burst through the opening. The Piedmontese, despairing of reducing this little handful of heroes by force, had set fire to the roof that sheltered them.

"Surrender! surrender!" they cried out to them on all sides.

"Rather die a thousand times!" replied Le Camus and Trevaux, discharging their pieces through the windows of the burning house.

But the fire is spreading, the flames coil upwards, the beams crackle, and the walls burst asunder. At this sight the wounded cannot repress a feeble groan.

Rage then gave place to pity in the hearts of the valiant Zouaves; they wave a white handkerchief, knotted round the butt-end of a gun, through one of the windows. The Piedmontese cease firing, and the Zouaves, placing the wounded on their shoulders, emerge from the ruins of the crumbling house. They then glance around them, looking for their comrades, their generals, the remainder of the army; no more traces of them, no more hope—the Pontifical camp was completely destroyed. "At least our honor is safe," they all cried together; "and blessed be our dead—they repose in the Lord."

Thus ended that glorious combat, of which, strange to say, all the honor reverts to the martyrs, to the vanquished, to the defenders of the persecuted faith, while, since that day, an ineffaceable stain remains on the hands and brows of the conquerors.

Moreover, the illustrious General-in-Chief of the Pontifical army had, despite all, succeeded in carrying into execution his bold and ingenious project. Collecting around him the debris of his valiant little army, he had cut his way through the enemy's ranks, and before nightfall was safe under the walls of the fortress of Ancona.

"When Lamoricière saw that all was lost, he hastened to gather us all around him," writes M. Résimont, a young cavalry officer, on the subject of that brilliant retreat. "Until then we had remained in our ranks on the field of battle; but as soon as the order was given we fled off, two by two, and galloped rapidly away, to prevent the enemy cutting off our retreat. The road we took was impracticable for cavalry, but at that moment such slight obstacles didn't stop us. We flung the reins to our horses, which bounded over streams, hedges and ditches; and yet, to my great astonishment, there were only three or four riders unhorsed and flung from their saddles. Still, they escaped any serious accident, and got off with the loss of their head stalls.

"The Piedmontese had already occupied the heights by which, if the battle was in our favor, he would have withdrawn in the direction of Ancona. Nothing remained for us, then, but to follow the shore road; and soon an entire regiment of Sardinian lancers, charged with cutting off our retreat, galloped upon our heels. Despite everything, we sought to continue our route, but we had hardly gone a few paces when we found ourselves taken between two fires. All resistance was impossible. What could a weak handful of combatants, opposed to an entire army, attempt. We closed up our ranks, then, behind the General, and, abandoning the road, fled to the mountains. But at that place the route became totally impracticable—no road, no pathway. We were obliged to dismount and lead our horses by the bridle through thickets and gorges, slopes and ravines. Nevertheless, after about an hour's march, we reached the Convent of the Camaldolese, where the dull and distant booming of the bombardment of Ancona reached us from time to time. At that moment our situation seemed desperate. Our retreat was obstructed by the enemy's troops; it might be that Ancona, the only port of safety that then remained to us, was likewise blockaded from the land. Still, forward! forward! Such was the word of command of our illustrious captain. Our enthusiasm revived, and success crowned our efforts; we arrived without any impediment."

Meanwhile, the second division of the Pontifical army—that which began to march later, and had no occasion to take part in the fight—had retired under the walls of Loreto; and the pious edifice dedicated to Mary was, at that hour, encumbered with the wounded and dying. That very morning those heroes had come there to seek divine grace, succor, strength to meet their bloody martyrdom; they had now returned thither, bleeding and mutilated, to ask the Heavenly Consolatrix to procure them grace to remain patient and faithful to the end. Noble and courageous soldiers, chosen combatants of Christ, who had united the strength of the lion to the meekness of the dove!

For their heroic courage had excited the admiration of their enemies themselves. "Those troops," wrote General Cialdini, in a report to General Cacciari, "attacked us with superb enthusiasm and real fury. The fight, it is true, was short, but bloody and desperate."

And besides, the generosity, the tender compassion of those valiant soldiers has been attested by numerous testimonies. "Alas!" said one of them to his companion, in the heat of the battle, "I'd never have the courage to aim at that poor young Piedmontese I saw yonder. Look; he's so young; no doubt he has a mother—a mother who will wear mourning for him. No, no; I'd not have the strength to kill him."

And yet victory had been denied to such magnanimous efforts, such pure devotion! The storm was over now, it is true; but the poor flowers, crushed and bent down, strewed the soil.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CARBONARO'S REVENGE AND THE CHRISTIAN'S VENGEANCE.

Victor and his two companions distinguished themselves by their coolness and courage during their entire action. They were in the same company and fought side by side.

The robust Fleming, Martin, made many an enemy bite the dust, not with his sabre, but simple with his enormous fist, while using his gun to cast destruction and death in the ranks of his adversaries. Victor and Joseph took aim and fired with a precision so exact and a self-possession so remarkable, that each of their shots brought down an enemy.

The three friends at that moment seemed endowed with supernatural strength. In vain the balls and bullets whizzed over their heads; they appeared to see nothing, hear nothing, and applied all their strength, attention and ardor to repulsing the enemy. Often, isolated groups, small detachments of Piedmontese tirailleurs, attacked the three valiant companions, over whom they hoped to gain a very easy victory, but those assailants were always received with a murderous fire, which forced them to retreat.

And yet our three friends were at last compelled to yield to superior numbers and join their companions, who were beginning to beat a retreat. Martin withdrew slowly, step by step, as if he could not make up his mind to abandon the advanced post he had valiantly conquered. But when at length he rejoined them, he was suddenly astonished and startled at not seeing his two friends.

"Joseph! Victor!" he cried out, in his distress, bitterly reproaching himself, "I've broken my promise, I've abandoned you! Oh, mother, mother, mother, shall I no longer be allowed to watch over them, to keep my word to you?"

And the unhappy Martin, in his excessive grief, wandered hither and thither over the battlefield, forgetful of danger and exposing his life twenty times, seeking to fulfil the duty his mother's will had imposed upon him.

Joseph and Victor were indeed separated from their companions in the confusion and tumult of the retreat. At length they reached the borders of the wood in whose shade they were out of the reach of the enemy's fire, when Joseph, stopping to take breath, saw two Piedmontese soldiers following, and, at that moment on the point of reaching them. Thenceforward, flight was impossible and had been shameful. Why, moreover, decline the combat? Their numbers were equal.

"To arms, Victor!" said Joseph, "we are pursued!"

But before they could assume the defensive, the two Piedmontese rushed upon them, sword in hand.

"Ah! cowards! bigots!" they cried on their fury, "we have you at last—the hour of vengeance!"

At the same instant blades leaped to light out of their scabbards and sabres crossed. The profoundest silence reigned in the wood around them; only one might hear from time to time in the distance a solitary shot from the Piedmontese camp.

Gennaro had attacked Victor; Orazio, struggling vigorously, sought to disarm Joseph. But the two young Zouaves defended themselves well, like good and brave soldiers. Joseph, on his guard, parried with marvellous dexterity all the strokes of Orazio's sword, which, formidable as it was, could not draw a drop of blood from his courageous adversary.

But it was a furious, desperate combat between Gennaro and Victor. All the ruses, all the efforts of the Carbonaro were in vain. His eyeballs, swollen with fury, became bloodshot, his face livid, his lips pale, firmly compressed, only parted painfully from time to time to emit a hollow groan.

However, the courageous Victor, who continued fighting, began to gradually lose both his vigor and energy. He was ready to succumb to fatigue and heat, after the arduous trials of that day of combat, and the indomitable ardor that had animated him on the field of honor, as long as he was fighting for the holy cause of the Church, seemed to abandon him little by little when the young Zouave was only fighting in his own defence, and, if fate favored him, to plunge his adversary's soul into eternal torments. Alas! was his life so dear, so sweet so precious to him, that he should seek to preserve it by expressing that misguided, that impious, that miserable enemy to eternal damnation.

Suddenly, the Carbonaro, having thoughtlessly sprung forward, lost his equilibrium and fell heavily upon the ground. In an instant Victor's arm was raised, and Victor's sabre gleamed over his head. All at once he stopped.

"Oh, Stefano, Nunziata!" he murmured, "could I assassinate your brother?"

But the enraged Carbonaro had already arisen. He had heard the exclamation of his generous vanquisher, and those noble words only redoubled his hate and rage.

"One of us two must die, and die here!" he cried.

And in a paroxysm of rage he rushed at his noble adversary, who, exhausted, irresolute, overpowered by fatigue, defended himself with difficulty. The hour so longed for—the hour of vengeance—had come at last!

The other two combatants seemed to redouble their efforts. Orazio had received a large, deep wound, but the sight of his blood only aroused his mettle and redoubled his fierceness. The point of his sword darted hither and thither, like a flash of lightning, menacing the young Van Dael on all sides. Suddenly a rush of blood suffused the face of the young hero; the sword of the Piedmontese had touched his forehead. Joseph wavered for an instant, but was not slow to resume the defensive. At that moment, a loud cry suddenly resounded at his side; then he heard a dual shout, a dreadful shock; unfortunate Orazio, as if thunderstruck, fell at his feet, his head fractured, and vomiting torrents of blood. Martin's stout fist had done its work.

Gennaro looked aside, saw his companion stretched on the ground, and trembled. Was his last joy, his revenge, going to escape him, too? He then put forth all his strength, all his rage, in a supreme effort; with a bound he dashes at Victor, who had turned aside, occupied and distracted by this novel incident in the struggle. And the young Zouave, taken unawares, has let his arm drop, and the Carbonaro's poniard is plunged in his breast. Victor has uttered a cry; he puts his hand to his side, grows pale, totters, falls.

But Martin has heard that cry of anguish, and bounds forward.

"Ah! coward!" he cries, "ah! brigand, ah! assassin! Now it's thy turn!"

And he falls with all his strength upon the Carbonaro, who lunges forward to give his victim the last thrust. And, felled by that powerful hand, Gennaro falls backward and rolls upon the ground, stunned by the shock. But it was only a slight blow; he rises at once and springs with rage at his new adversary.

Joseph, meanwhile, hastened to help Victor, forgetting the pain of his wound—rather light one, however, for Orazio's sword had only grazed the flesh. But the unfortunate Victor lay unconscious upon the ground, motionless and perhaps lifeless. The blood that spouted from his wound reddened the ground around him and saturated his clothes.

"Victor, dear Victor!" cried Joseph, weeping. "Oh! wake up. Must I see you die so painful a death?" And he tried to bandage the wound with his handkerchief, and stop the blood which gushed from a large hole in the breast, near the region of the heart.

Martin and Gennaro, foaming and furious, and interlaced like two serpents, continued to struggle desperately. The Italian, feeling his strength going, felt for his poniard in his breast; at last his trembling fingers met the handle and drew it out of the scabbard. Already the glittering blade gleamed over the valiant Zouave's head. But Martin has disengaged his right hand; he sees the flashing steel glitter before his eyes, summons all his strength, raises his formidable fist, and Gennaro, stricken with a mortal stroke, totters and falls to the ground in the midst of a stream of blood. The giant has sent him to rejoin his victim.

"Our poor friend is avenged," said he then to Joseph, mopping his forehead.

"Silence!" murmured the latter. And both, attentive to Victor's slightest movement, leaned over him and examined his wound. For some instants they hold their breath and listen attentively. O happiness! they have heard the indistinct murmur of his weak and broken breathing.

"O my God, my God, I thank Thee!" cries Joseph, rapturously. "He lives, he lives—perhaps he will be saved. Oh! let us implore the holy Mother of God in his favor. She can save him—that good and loving Mary."

And the two young men, hardly out of danger, knelt down humbly, with faces turned towards the Holy House of Loreto, and for some instants remained motionless, with clasped hands and an expression of ardent and profound fervor.

But their prayer was short, and when they had ended they hastened to lavish their cares on their unfortunate friend. First, Martin ran to the stream that flowed hard by at the base of the mountain to draw water to bathe the temples and forehead of Victor, who gradually revived.

"Where am I?" he murmured at last, in a broken voice, slowly opening his eyes, and still looking cautiously about him. Suddenly he shuddered, for his glance encountered the corpse of Gennaro stretched upon the blood-soaked grass.

"O poor, unhappy, misguided Gennaro," he cried, weeping. "O Stefano, Nunziata, you've lost your brother!" And speaking thus, he tried to crawl on his feet and hands towards the poor wretch's body. In vain his companions wanted to draw him aside.

"Oh! don't hold me, I beg!" he repeated, "but rather assist me. Perhaps there is yet time; his soul, my God, his soul!"

In fact, a painful rattling in the throat from time to time raised the chest of Gennaro, who seemed gradually coming to life.

"O my good Joseph, and you, Martin, help me, I beg," cried Victor, in his anguish. "He lives, he lives, my God, and I'm not avenged."

And, by an effort, he succeeded in getting on his feet, to get near him. His two friends dashed after him, seeking to restrain him.

"Victor, Victor,!" they said, "let him lie there, I beg. It's too late—think first of your own safety."

"But his soul! Think of his soul," repeated the noble young man.

Then he knelt on the grass quite near the dying man.

"Gennaro, my friend," he said, in his gentle voice.

"Who calls me? Who speaks to me thus?" replied the wounded man, in a weak voice. "Who calls himself the friend of a wretch, an exile?"

"I'm your friend—Victor. Don't you recognize me, Gennaro?"

"Victor!" repeated the Italian, choked with anger. "Victor, say you? You lie—I've killed him, your Victor. Now, let me die in peace; I've got my revenge at last."

"You're wrong, Gennaro. God has spared my life in arresting your sword, and here I am near you to sustain you."

At these words the Carbonaro opened wide his dull eyes, and fixed them for an instant on the young man's face.

"Are you really Victor?" he murmured. "But no—he exists no longer; I've killed him. It's his ghost that returns from the region of the dead to snatch my soul from me. Back, horrible spectre, back, back, cursed vision! Oh! it oppresses, it stifles me! Am I, then, going to die?"

And, at these words, a stream of dark blood spouted from the lips of the poor wretch, whose drooping head fell backward.

"O my God, my God!" sighed Victor; "he's going to appear before Thee, and he dies unrepentant!" And clasping his hands, he burst into tears at this terrible thought.

Joseph and Martin, terrified and motionless, silently regarded this mournful spectacle. Quite near them lay the bloody body of the miserable Orazio. But if their glances could have beheld the radiant world of spirits, they would doubtless have seen the good angels of heaven moved, in the midst of a respectful silence, at Victor's noble devotion and sublime vengeance.

For the second time the young Zouave bent over the body of the unfortunate man.

"Gennaro, my friend, my brother, the Lord calls you, invites you to repentance," said he, in a suppliant voice.

"The Lord?" replied the dying man, bitterly. "Yes, I see it now. But He does not call me; He curses, He threatens me. He holds His thunderbolts ready. He's going to plunge me forever into hell!"

"Undeceive yourself, Gennaro. If He threatens you, it is to invite you to repentance and penance."

"No, no, it is too late," he replied. "There is no more pardon or repentance for me. I have hated and blasphemed all sacred things; I am now damned; let me die in peace."

"But, Gennaro, think of your noble brother, of your beloved sister Nunziata!"

"Don't utter their names. I see them—they are serpents; they have stung me; they have driven me from my home and plunged me into the abyss."

"Gennaro, think, at least, of your venerable father, of the pious mother who—"

"Ah! ah! my father, indeed," interrupted the wretch, with a burst of hellish laughter. "My father, yes, I see him—The blood streams from his face, his lips, his breast— And he collects that blood in his hand and flings it in my face. My father, say you? Know you, then, who assassinated him? Well, it was I, Gennaro, the damned one! Don't you see the bluish bloody stain that soils his breast? Well, it was I who struck him—assassinated others, too—many others," continued the unhappy being, a prey to dreadful delirium. "There—hold, along side my father—here's Victor Mor.en. He died by my hand. Look—he uncovers his breast, and from his breast, his lips, his eyes, burst forth flames! Flames and fire everywhere! All that's to consume me!"

And the miserable parrieide wrung his hands despairingly, uttering hollow groans and cries of rage and pain, and rolled convulsively on the grass, reddened by the streams of blood that flowed from his wound.

At the sight of this appalling spectacle, not one of our three friends could retain his tears. Victor wept bitterly; Joseph and Martin covered their faces with their hands to conceal their emotion, and withdrew in horror from the miserable dying creature.

"All human succor is henceforth useless," murmured Victor sadly. "O my friends, let us pray. My God, don't let him die before I'm avenged!"

And all three, turning towards the Holy House, began to pray. The dying man was already breathing his last sighs and uttering his last groans; the fatal instant was near.

"Oh brother, may you one day be able to forestall, were it only for a single instant, the terrible hour of justice!" Nunziata had said to the guilty Gennaro. But could such an impious one as he receive that gift of the Supreme Mercy? No doubt he was very far from having merited it; but the heavenly goodness of the Lord is unbounded.

The dying man suddenly opened his eyes. He seemed at that instant to be animated with new strength. It was the last spark of life that scintillated, the last moment of hope before the end—before death.

The Carbonaro cast an anxious and wandering look about him; but with an expression less ferocious and despairing.

"What have I done, then?" he murmured, raising himself with difficulty upon his knees, and resting on his elbow. "Oh heaven!" he cried, after a moment's horrifying silence, "Oh heaven, I'm an assassin—I have put an innocent man to death!"

At these words he tried to hide to hide himself from view, to conceal his face, but his hand fell heavy and nerveless by his side. Victor, moved even to tears, tremblingly approached him. There seem to be a ray of hope in the poor wretch's last words. He tenderly pressed his already icy hand, and held it in his arms.

"Hope, hope, my friend," he murmured, in his gentle, tender voice. "You haven't killed me—look, I'm here, alongside of you, quite ready to lavish my care upon you, to offer you my pardon."

"What! You can pardon me! Impossible!" And those words, interrupted by the death rattle, issued spasmodically from Gennaro's lips. "But even if you would, what use would be your pardon? God does not pardon lost souls—damned souls like mine!"

"Be silent, unhappy man. Don't blaspheme, Gennaro. I, who am only a miserable sinner, pity and pardon you! Oh, brother, undeceive yourself; that omnipotent God, on the contrary, only waits for a sigh, a tear, a sign of true repentance, to overwhelm you with love, to admit you to His bosom as a long lost child returned to his father's hearth. O! Gennaro, Gennaro, don't shut your heart to the voice of His love!"

"My God, my God, should it indeed be possible?" cried the unhappy man, palpitating, distracted, while bitter tears, rolled down his cheeks and fell upon his breast. "And you will pardon me, too—you whom I have hated, persecuted, alas! unto death!"

"I forgive you with all my heart," said Victor, in a moving tone. Give me your hand, brother."

"Oh! no, no, it's a soiled hand. Just now it was bathed in thy blood," he replied, drawing back his hand with a terrified gesture.

But Victor had already seized it, held it in his, and covered it with tears and kisses.

And the heart of the guilty one was touched; divine charity had at last triumphed over hellish hate; the hour of grace had, for an instant, forestalled the hour of justice, as Nunziata had hoped.

But at that very moment death came to claim his prey.

"Victor, oh, good Victor," gasped Gennaro, "I'm dying—friend—forgive—pray for me—for an unhappy sinner. Forgive, forgive, father. And tell Stefano—Nunziata—that I beg them to forgive me—that I—O my God—and you—Jesus—Mary!"

And the poor wretch's drooping head fell back. Victor tremblingly clasped his hands. Gennaro Bianchi was no more.

Victor and his companions knelt by the body of the unfortunate Gennaro Bianchi, and commended his soul to God in the midst of a respectful silence. Then Victor rose and gently closed the eyes of the dead, while he dropped tears of compassion and love upon his pale visage, and quietly kissed those lips, forever closed.

"Sleep now in peace, poor friend," he murmured, "and may I have the happiness of transmitting the last words of repentance that have fallen from your lips to your brother Stefano and your sister Nunziata!"

But a sudden weakness seized him at the moment he uttered those words; a livid paleness overspread his brow, a shadow veiled his eyes, and he fell back motionless upon the ground.

"He's dying, he's dying!" cried Joseph despairingly, while Martin, in his excessive grief, wrung his hands convulsively, and blubbered disconnectedly, "Oh, my God! my God! take me instead—poor mother—and unhappy father—Oh! what a sorrow for you—what a dreadful day!"

"Victor, dear Victor, don't you hear me?" whispered Joseph, pressing his cousin's hand. And gradually that hand seemed to return that gentle, caressing pressure, and grow warm in his. Suddenly Joseph uttered a loud cry—a cry of surprise and joy—for the young man had re opened his eyes. With throbbing heart the two friends knelt close beside him, so as to catch his last words. "My friends," he murmured in a broken voice, "fly, I conjure you—for my last hour has come; it's approaching—I feel it—fly, without any more delay, the dangers that threaten you!"

"But you, my dear Victor?" asked Martin.

"I—I shall die here, far, far away from my country—from my home, but at least near the Holy House of Loreto. Go away my friends, my brothers, for from one moment to another the enemy may come and make you prisoners."

"Abandon you thus, without consolation, without help? Never, never!" they both replied.

"But I shall soon have ceased to live and suffer."

"No, no, Victor. Never, never. And the Piedmontese may come if they like," the faithful Martin hastened to add, "but may the thunder crush me if I budge from here, Victor—from you."

And at these words they could see the eyes of the wounded man fill with tears, so touched was he by these proofs of fidelity and sincere attachment.

But at that moment the sound of approaching steps, the clanking and clashing of horses and arms, was heard in the distance, and the startled Zouaves, listened attentively. It was not long before they saw one of the enemy's divisions, which had dashed off in pursuit of the Pontifical army in the hope of making prisoners.

"O heavens!" cried Joseph, "the Piedmontese are coming—O God! what's to become of us, what shall we do now?"

"My good friends," murmured Victor, "leave me and fly—fly, I beg of you!"

"Go away—without you? We'll never consent to that."

"But God will protect me; He'll help me in your absence."

"Useless to insist, dear Victor; we'll never abandon you."

"But think, my sufferings will soon be over."

"Anyway, I'll not budge from here," replied Peter, resolutely.

"Well, remove me then under the trees in the forest, and perhaps I'll escape them that way."

"Yes," cried Joseph, very bitterly; "we'd lay you there to let you die like a dog, friendless and helpless. No, no; God would never forgive us, and I'd never forgive myself, Victor."

And the noise and the steps seemed nearer, but none of the courageous young men thought of flight, and the wounded man in vain redoubled his prayers and entreaties.

"Fly," he repeated, "don't expose yourself; don't ruin yourself for me, for whom there is no hope of cure or safety in this world!"

The danger indeed was imminent. One moment's hesitation or delay, and their flight would be impossible. Suddenly a ray of hope glistened in Martin's eyes.

"Victor," he cried, "if I took you in my arms and put you on my back, would you be able to endure the fatigues and dangers of flight?"

"Perhaps so. But what's the use of asking, my friends? I'd only embarrass you in your retreat—only delay you. Leave me here, I conjure you, and fearlessly entrust me to the care of God."

"No, no, Victor, we'll never abandon you."

"Let it be so, then, as you wish it," murmured the young men, to whom the hope of seeing his good and devoted friends at last take to flight, seemed to give renewed life and strength.

"Let us go then," said Martin, "altogether, and with the help of God."

And, thanks to Joseph's help, he succeeded in raising him and placing him, as well as he could, on his broad shoulders.

Before going away, Victor cast a glance at the body of the unfortunate Bianchi.

"Farewell, poor Gennaro," he murmured, "we'll meet again before long in another land."

And Martin, a few paces in advance of Joseph, proceeded as quick'y as he could towards the outskirts of the forest, where they were not long in disappearing behind a green curtain of branches.

It was time; for at that very moment the enemy's division halted about a hundred paces behind them on the ground they had just occupied.

"Capperi! There's been fighting here," cried the Piedmontese commander, perceiving the two dead bodies.

"Yes; here are two dead, two of ours," replied one of the officers, stooping, so as to see better. "Hold per Bacco, this is actually the mysterious stranger who recently joined us. And here is his friend Orazio, the only one of our company in whom he ever deigned to confide. Upon my faith, I'm better pleased it's them than me, since their military career was to end thus."

"They must have been killed by some Pontifical Zouaves whom they were pursuing. Yes; here's one of their rifles. But where the devil can they have concealed themselves, the villainous birds of prey?"

"Probably in these woods; if we were to try there——"

"Oh, no; useless. Forward," the captain replied. "They must have long since got safe away elsewhere, for, you see this fellow's body"—and the commandant pointed to Orazio's body—"is already stiff and cold. As to the other, he must have suffered a long time after receiving that terrible wound."

Meanwhile, our three fugitives hastily withdrew into the thick of the wood, and recommending themselves to God, kept a profound silence. Victor rested his pale drooping head on Martin's robust shoulder, and sometimes, when shaken by an involuntary jolt or a slight shock caused by the unevenness of the ground, he could not suppress a groan.

"Courage, my poor friend" Martin then murmured sadly, "we'll soon find some retreat, I hope—some shelter where you'll be safe."

"God grant it!" responded Victor, "but, my good Martin, I afflict and disturb you, and weary you to no purpose. Why not leave me here all alone to my fate? Believe me, I fear that very, very little strength, or blood, or life remains in me."

"I think we may rest for an instant," interrupted Joseph, seeing that, as they drew nearer and nearer to the centre of the forest, they had penetrated into a narrow valley, or rather a ravine, shaded by tall trees and carpeted with grass. "I think we'd be very imprudent if we ventured to pass the limits of the wood before nightfall."

They then gently laid him in the shade on a bed of cool grass, while Joseph, seated at his side, raised his head and placed it on his knee. Then, taking out their beads they both invoked their good Mother in heaven to deign to favor their flight and solace their comrade; and Victor, weak as he was, heartily joined in their prayers, and with his affectionate glance seemed to thank them. Besides, Joseph was not slow to lavish his care upon him. He removed the blood-stained linen he had hastily bound round his wound, carefully washed it, covered it with a new bandage, and the poor invalid, half-solaced by these kindly cares, soon fell into a deep sleep, while Joseph was engaged in dressing his own wound, which, as we have said, was not serious.

Towards night they resumed their route, and soon reached the border of the forest. They had just passed it, when, to their great terror, they saw five Piedmontese soldiers, who seemed actually coming up to them. They had only time to again beat a retreat into the interior of the wood to conceal themselves.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE HERMITAGE.

But the Piedmontese soldiers probably had not seen the three fugitives, for they soon moved off in another direction without pursuing them.

Our poor friends humbly thanked heaven that had preserved them from this imminent danger, and halted rather long in a dense thicket, doubtful whether they should pursue or suspend their journey.

Still their position was very critical. Night had come, darkness was going to envelope them in its mysteries and shadows, and they were puzzled to know where to find an asylum, not only for themselves, but for poor Victor, who, in present state of suffering and weakness, would infallibly succumb to the rigors of a night passed in the woods, in the open air.

And yet, calm, confident and resigned, they pursued their way, plunging as far as possible into the depths of the thickets, avoiding beaten paths and open glades, until not far from them they saw a venerable man bent under the weight of years. He slowly advanced along a solitary avenue, stopping from time to time to pick up the herbs that grew in the way. His furrowed brow was bald, his beard thick and gray, his eyes deep set under the arching eyebrows. The simple and peaceful dignity of his whole countenance, the sweet affable expression of his features and glance, betrayed a soul as simple and innocent as that of a child, and at the same time loving and devout as a good father. He wore a robe of gray serge attached to the body by a leather cincture.

The fugitive Zouaves felt, they knew not why, suddenly filled with hope and confidence by his aspect. The old man stopped as they approached. He recognized the Papal uniform at a glance, and hastened to greet the new comers, speaking with the purest French accent:

"Good night, my dear children. You've escaped, then, the massacre. Pray, tell me what can I do for you?"

"We are homeless fugitives, as you see," said Joseph. "Please show us some place of refuge, where we may escape the enemy who is pursuing us."

"Blessed be God, then, who sends you to me," responded the old man. "Indeed, I've very little to offer you, but I offer it to you with all my heart, with sincere joy. Follow me, my children, my hermitage is quite near. It's far from being a palace, indeed, but it will certainly shelter you more agreeably than, perhaps, a palace."

Joseph and Martin expressed themselves profoundly grateful to the venerable unknown.

"Your comrade, I see, is severely wounded," pursued the worthy man. "I have, fortunately, some notions of medicine, and, perhaps, I'll succeed in curing him, with the help of God. I'd send for a surgeon to the nearest village, but that wouldn't be very prudent, I think; for almost all our country doctors are ranged under the flags of our turbulent patriots."

The hermit then led them into the thickest part of the wood, and soon stopped at the entrance of a kind of grotto, which opened naturally in a mass of rocks, but was afterwards opened out, enlarged, and built up by the hand of man. A simple wooden cross was raised upon the summit of the rock; a little kitchen garden lay at its base. The rustic edifice was backed against the side of a rather high hill, whose top spread out in the form of a plateau overlooking the entire country for several leagues round.

"Here, my children," said the old man, "is the hermitage of Fra Paolo; it's a name the country people give me. Welcome under the old hermit's roof."

The little room they entered was poor and almost bare, but very neatly arranged. A wooden table and two chairs, a little prie dieu at the head of a straw bed, and a crucifix attached to the wall over an image of the Blessed Virgin, composed all the furniture. But the hermit hastened to open the door of a second room.

"Bring your poor comrade in here, my children. Fortunately I have a softer bed than my own in this retreat, which I sometimes offer to some traveller who is fatigued or has lost his way. As for you, you'll be obliged to content yourself with my poor pallet and one or two bundles of straw, until I find a more comfortable and safer asylum for you to-morrow. But let us first think of your comrade's wound."

And the good old man approached the bed upon which the young Zouave was already laid. Victor strove to mutter his thanks in a weak, trembling voice, but the pious hermit immediately stopped him.

"Above all things, remain perfectly calm and silent, I beg," he said gently. "It will be time enough to-morrow to thank me, although the little I've done for you doesn't deserve such gratitude. Any Christian in my place would have acted like me."

And removing the bandage, he examined the wound, Joseph and Martin, profoundly anxious, silently fixed their eyes on him, and soon saw him shake his head with an uneasy and mournful expression.

"Well!" asked Joseph, in a low voice, "is all hope lost?"

"I wouldn't like to deceive you," replied Fra Paolo, seriously. "If the wound extended only the breadth of a finger in this direction, it would now be all over with your poor comrade. As things are, I've still hopes of saving him; above all, with the help and by the grace of God, which you and I will frequently implore."

The holy man then, having washed the wound, spread a kind of balm on a piece of white linen and placed it over it, rebandaging it with the skill and address of a practised surgeon.

In a few minutes the wounded man, soothed by these efficacious means, fell into a sweet, peaceful slumber.

"Now it is your turn, my friends," resumed the generous hermit. "The supper I've to offer is no doubt very simple and very frugal, but such a day as yesterday ought to sharpen your appetites marvellously. Only, my friend," he continued, addressing Joseph, "let me first dress your wound; my balm will soothe you. Oh! it's scarcely anything—only a simple scratch. You may thank God you got off so cheaply. And you, my young friend, you've escaped safe and sound from the perils of that terrible combat?"

"Thoroughly safe and sound," responded the brave Martin, "only one or two spent balls struck me here and there."

As a fact, the simple and valiant Campinese had received four balls, which, fortunately, lodged in his clothes; but the extreme disquietude he had felt until then, thinking of his friends, had prevented him from thinking of himself.

The modest repast was soon prepared, and our two friends did honor to it. Then, yielding to the good hermit's earnest entreaties and reiterated orders, they stretched themselves on his bed, and were not slow to forget, in the midst of a profound sleep, the perils, agonies and fatigues of the day.

With the first glimpse of morning, Joseph and Martin rose and were greeted by the hermit with a cordial "good-day," and a crowd of questions concerning their families, their country, and the various incidents that had marked that fatal day passed on the battle-field.

The young Zouaves had not done describing the battle of Castelfidardo, when all at once they saw the door open and a young girl made her appearance at the threshold. At the sight of the two strangers she quickly drew back, exclaiming, "Accidente!"—a word that involuntarily escapes from the lips of every Italian in moments of surprise, admiration or terror.

"Come in, Marietta," said the hermit at once, smiling, to the young girl. "Don't be afraid; these brave men that you see here have only come to defend the cause of the Holy Father."

At these words, Marietta, her fears dispelled, resolutely crossed the threshold of the cabin and smilingly advanced, saluting the foreign Zouaves with unaffected cordiality.

"Good day, Fra Paolo," she said. "My mother sent me to ask how is your health."

"Very well, my child," replied the worthy man. "And pray tell me, how are they at home?"

"Oh! none of us are ill," replied the young girl, "only we were terribly frightened yesterday all the time that dreadful battle lasted. And tell me, were these signori also engaged in it?"

"Alas! yes, Marietta, and I was fortunately able to offer them shelter after the battle. But you see my poor hermitage is too narrow for such a number of guests and good friends. For, unfortunately, I have to care for a wounded man, one of their brave companions in arms. If there's a family in the neighborhood upon whom I could rely to perform this act of charity along with me, it is certainly yours, my dear girl, isn't it?"

"Oh! Fra Paolo, what a good and happy thought! How happy my dear parents will be to be able to aid the defenders of the Holy Father?"

"Is your brother, Lorenzo, at home?"

"Not at this moment, for he had to go with a message to Loreto. But he'll be back shortly before noon."

"Very well; in that case we will not fail to hear the news. You'll tell him, Marietta, to come to me this evening, so that before nightfall he may be able to guide these young men, and introduce them, without danger, into your peaceful dwelling, where, I hope, they'll receive a cordial and fraternal hospitality, with which they'll have every reason to be satisfied."

But Marietta made no reply; she seemed thoughtful, and, with her eyes fixed on the ground, kept a profound silence.

"What are you thinking of, my child? You seem to be dreaming, little one?"

"I was thinking of the comrade of these signori—that wounded Zouave,—tell me, Fra Paolo, could I see him?"

"Certainly, my daughter," replied the good hermit. And he at once introduced her into the room where Victor was repos-

ing. Joseph and Martin following.

The young man was still buried in a sweet, peaceful slumber, and light colors were beginning to tinge his cheeks, brow, and lips. The young girl knelt near the bed, fixing a look of admiration, mingled with pity, on his noble countenance.

"O the poor young man!" she murmured, with a deep sigh. And then turning towards the softened hermit: "Oh! you'll cure him, my good Father, won't you?"

"I hope so, Marietta. But you'll promise me, on your part, my child, the help of your prayers?"

"Undoubtedly, Fra Paolo. I'll perform a novena for him to our Lady of Pity, and I'll offer up my Communion on Sunday for his cure. O the poor young man, what a pity he's wounded!"

At that moment the invalid opened his eyes, and cast a look of astonishment about him. But he perceived his two friends, and recognized the hermit.

"O thanks, thanks, holy man!" he cried, in accents of profound gratitude. "It is you who snatched me from the bloody hands of death."

"Don't speak of it, my child," interrupted the hermit. "Tell me, rather, how you find yourself after your rest last night?"

"Oh!" murmured Victor, deeply moved, "I already feel my wounds considerably assuaged with the help of God and thanks to your excellent balm."

"That's just what I expected. It's not the first time, thank God, my balm did miracles. Now try to sleep, my dear son," said Fra Paolo, preparing to leave the room. "We'll soon return to see if you want anything."

"O povero Giovanni," sighed Marietta.

The same evening Lorenzo presented himself at the hermitage. He was a robust, agile young man, with open air, brown hair, and brilliant black eyes. His countenance was simple and modest, but resolute, and he held his head firm and erect, as if he did not fear to look his friends and enemies in the face. He approached the hermit with every mark of sincere empressement and profound respect; then cordially shook hands with the two Zouaves.

"Bravi voi!" he cried, "you're valiant soldiers, you and your comrades. Ah! we shall be very happy and very proud to see you in our midst. But tell me, Fra Paolo, where's that poor wounded fellow? Marietta has told us so much about him that I'm longing to shake hands with him as with a brother."

"Follow me," said the old man, going towards the door. "Victor, my child, here's a new friend who's come to visit you."

But, before even the hermit had done speaking, Lorenzo, in his enthusiasm, had rushed towards the bed and embraced Victor with respectful compassion and real affection.

"O caro ferito!—It's a holy martyr of the Lord, isn't it, Fra Paolo?"

"Yes, my child; but a martyr we shall cure, I hope."

Indeed, the condition of the invalid was already sensibly improved, thanks to the good attendance of the man of God, who had formerly studied medicine. So the young man, rising with difficulty, hastened to thank his visitor and his host for the affectionate sympathy and interest they manifested towards him.

"But who," cried the generous Lorenzo—"who could be so insensible and senseless as not to be moved at the sight of the prodigious enthusiasm the Pontifical troops have displayed, and the barbarous treatment the victorious enemies have made them endure?"

"Alas, you say right, Lorenzo," replied the good hermit. "But since you come from Loreto, tell us what you've seen and heard there. And first of all, tell us was Lamoricière able to reach Ancona?"

"Certainly, my good Father. He slipped through their fingers just like a needle, and entered the fortress yesterday evening."

"How could he do that?" interrupted Joseph. "Have our troops then succeeded in cutting their way over the enemies' bodies?"

"Alas, no, signor. The General-in-Chief, followed by some faithful companions, alone was able to pass through Umana, where the road was open. As to the body of the army, it retired to Loreto."

"Were our comrades pursued by the Piedmontese?"

"No, signor. The Sardinian soldiers, you may be sure, had no wish to become better acquainted with the Zouaves bayonets. They were content to post vedettes on the tops of our mountains to watch their movements. Only this morning your companions have begun to treat with the Piedmontese relative to the capitulation of the place, which was to be carried out on the sole condition: that the Pontifical soldiers should retire with arms and baggage."

Joy sparkled in Joseph's eyes at this consoling news, which made him hopeful.

"But it's impossible for me to describe to you what I have seen at Loreto," continued Lorenzo. "I had entered the Church of the Santa Casa. Oh! what a heart-rending spectacle met my gaze! The ground was strewn with mattresses, carpets, coarse linen cloths, and bundles of straw, which served as beds for an immense number of wounded soldiers. Those Christian soldiers rested their icy-cold foreheads and bleeding hands against the marble walls or on the altar steps. They were God's holy victims immolated in his defence. Scattered through their midst the noble Sisters of St. Vincent eagerly lent their succor, their attendance their prayers; and all the time the Holy Sacrifice was offered for them at the altar. The sacrifice of those valiant soldiers was united to that of the Lamb of God, the unspotted Victim, and arose like incense, to the porch of heaven—Oh! as long as I live I'll never forget that scene of glory and pain, that pious, that heroic and heart-rending spectacle."

The good hermit and his guests were deeply moved at this account of Lorenzo, who, overcome himself by the recollection of it, was obliged to break off for an instant.

"The most heroic calmness, the most perfect resignation," he continued, "reigned in that sanctuary of suffering and faith. Sometimes, in the midst of the silence, was heard some half-stifled moan or involuntary groan wrung by pain from the unfortunate wounded, dressed or amputated by the surgeon. All these poor wounded were equally calm, equally serious, thoughtfully awaiting the command of their God, after having obeyed the command of their general."

"But tell me," interrupted Joseph, "what's become of the dead? They have received the last rites, the honors Catholic charity reserves for them everywhere."

"Alas! undeceive yourself," cried Lorenzo. "Indeed, all my blood boils in my veins, when I think of it. Didn't General Cialdini boast of having a great number of dead on his hands after the battle? Hasn't he refused the Pontifical soldiers the sad privilege of burying their dead comrades? Hasn't he thrown all their bodies, pell-mell, into one common grave, thus depriving fathers and mothers who tearfully toiled up the paths of the hill the consolation of weeping over their children's tomb's? Besides, the Piedmontese commandants have refused the chaplains of the Pontifical army authorization to exercise their holy ministry over the wounded and dying. 'If the rabble want priests, our chaplains are there,' he replied. 'But, General, the French, Belgians, Irish and Germans don't all understand Italian; they want priests of their own countries who'll understand them.' 'Come, come,' concluded the General, 'these ragamuffins who fight for priests hardly deserve one should take such trouble with them—Soldiers take care of them—they're your prisoners of war.'"

"O heaven, what barbarity!" murmured the hermit, with upraised hands. "And those are the men who pretended to deliver Italy from the tyranny of the priests?"

"And yet, despite such contempt, such sufferings," continued the young man, "the Pontifical soldiers preserved to the last their heroic constancy, and even their gaiety. Accompanied by my friend Antonio, I entered the church at Castel-fidardo, where the wounded, without beds or bandage, and almost without succor, were stretched bleeding on the stone flags. There were there—I counted them carefully—forty-nine Zouaves, and, among others, the captain of the second company.

“Oh! that poor Guitton, a Belgian! Tell me, Lorenzo, was he seriously wounded?”

“Alas, yes, the poor man! There were not less than three balls in his body, and the surgeon gave him up. There were several other Belgians, too, whose names I don’t remember, except Laigniel, a young man of eighteen. He told me he received a ball in the arm, and that it was then he dropped his weapon.”

“Courageous boy!” murmured Victor, “he had abandoned his studies and his class-room to fly to the defence of the Holy Father.”

“But would you believe it, Fra Paolo,” continued the narrator, “all those brave young men had still the courage to jest and laugh? A Zouave, whose body a bullet had pierced, had engaged in a lively discussion with a Piedmontese. I couldn’t understand what they said, but it must have been something very comical, for the Zouaves laughed heartily.”

“It must have been Tresvaux de Fraval,” interrupted Joseph; “he’s the best fellow I know—always gay, always content, and, above all, always talking. I never met him a single time that he didn’t greet me with some pleasantry.”

“Another of those young men,” continued Lorenzo, “was called, I think, Paolo or Poli.”

“Precisely; he had been wounded in the chest. While he was crawling painfully along by the church, he suddenly heard himself called. That voice, coming from an obscure corner, seemed to issue from a colorless and formless heap of blood-stained bandages. ‘What, my poor Poli, don’t you recognize me?’ murmured that plaintive voice. ‘No, indeed, my friend.’ ‘I’m your comrade, de Lacarie.’ ‘What! it’s you!’ ‘Yes, myself.’ ‘Aren’t you dead, then?’ ‘No, not that I know.’ The poor young soldier who lay in that corner had been hit by a bullet that pierced both his cheeks. He was a ghastly sight at that moment. Antonio and I were moved to tears. What most surprised us was to see those young men, despite their captivity, misery and suffering, with still courage and animation enough to laugh and jest, simply and joyously, as if they were in the midst of some feast.

“But aren’t they right, my friend?” interrupted Victor, smiling. “Their hearts are pure, their consciences tranquil, and death is for them only a blessed invitation to the never ending feast, the glorious triumphs of heaven.”

Lorenzo continued, for some time longer, to relate to his auditors everything interesting he had seen at Castelfidardo and Loreto. Then, when night came, he brought Martin and Joseph to his father’s home, where they were received with the greatest heartiness, and the sincerest affection.

Luigi, Lorenzo’s and Marietta’s father, was a good, honest peasant, apparently about fifty. Bettina, his wife, a brisk, prepossessing little woman, was as good, as affable, and as sincerely obliging as her husband himself.

The two Zouaves had hardly entered this hospitable roof, when they were received as if they really belonged to the family. They were glad to learn that the Piedmontese, after having long explored the environs, had gone away in the direction of Ancona. Marietta’s brother, however, was not in a position to acquaint them with the indignities to which the Piedmontese then subjected their unfortunate prisoners in the hospitals of Oscina, Alessandria, Genoa, and many other places, too.

Here is what one of those valiant Belgians—Verecken, Hevraert, Lacraix, and Callebaut, who formed part of the five hundred and fifty picked men with whom Colonel O’Reilly, for twenty-four hours, defended the citadel of Spoleto against an army of fifteen thousand, and who were afterwards led prisoners to Genoa, where they arrived on October 4th—wrote:

“After having been miserably transferred from one place to another, without ever having had a fixed residence, here we are now at Genoa, completely ignorant of the destiny that is being prepared for us, shut up in infected casemates, covered with rags, devoured by vermin, without linen, without money, and—what do I say?—without a hope of ever seeing our fair land.”

Alas! was not that the fate of a crowd of other heroes who had to undergo, on the one side, the dangers of fatigue, and, on the other the horrors of captivity?

CHAPTER XV.

PRISONERS AND FUGITIVES.

Victor and his two comrades, much more fortunate than their companions languishing in merciless and shameful captivity, and suffering every ill-treatment from their barbarous oppressors, were peacefully sheltered under the good hermit’s roof, or at the hospitable hearth of honest Luigi.

Now, one evening, a few days after the battle of Castelfidardo, Joseph and Martin went to the hermitage to see their wounded companion. Suddenly there were some knocks outside. The hermit immediately rose.

“Who’s there?” he asked.

“We’re poor strangers. we’ve lost our way. Couldn’t we rest an instant under your roof to ask you for some directions about our way?”

Fra Paolo opened the door.

“Zouaves! Zouaves!” he cried, joyfully, at the sight of three young soldiers standing on the threshold—three poor fugitives of the Pontifical army. “Welcome!” he continued extending his hand, “welcome!”

And they followed him into his modest dwelling.

“Here are comrades—friends, my son,” he said, addressing Victor.

Our young Belgians had hardly glanced at the first of the three fugitives, when they all exclaimed joyfully: “It is you, Van Gameren! welcome!”

And Joseph and Martin rushed forward to shake hands with their companion in arms. But the valiant Antwerpian tore himself from their arms to cast himself at the wounded comrade’s pillow.

“Victor, my dear comrade, I see you’re wounded, you’re suffering? Oh! how I thought of you, how I trembled for you when I lost sight of you in the retreat!”

“I believe all hope is not lost, my good Leo,” replied the invalid. “I’ve been wounded in the side, but I already feel better, and to-day, for the first time, I have been able to leave my bed.”

Meanwhile, Fra Paolo hastened to place a seat for the young Zouaves.

“And now,” said the old man, “tell us the news while I prepare a modest supper for you.”

“Tell me, first of all, Leo,” said Victor, “what occurred to yourself. Weren’t you wounded, as I feared?”

“No, thank God, my good friend. I didn’t receive even the slightest scratch. Only since that time my right ear’s deaf. It is the fault of a cursed ball that carried away a very little bit of the ear, killing a man alongside me. But the fight—the massacre! Ah! what a dreadful sight! I’ve seen almost all my companions fall, one after the other. Our battalion was almost entirely destroyed. And the Pope—the unhappy Pontiff has lost all his possessions, for everywhere victory favors the Piedmontese.”

“True,” replied Joseph; “but Ancona still holds out, for it is ably defended by our own heroic commander. Lorenzo told us to-day that up to this time the Piedmontese weren’t able to make a breach as large as a foot in the wall on the inland side.

“But that noble, that heroic resistance is now, alas! aimless and hopeless—at least, unless prompt succor guarantees and protects the Holy Father's last possessions."

"My friend, it would be impossible for me to describe to you," resumed the brave Leo, "all that we had to suffer in that dangerous flight. We were separated from the body of the army while it was retreating on Loreto; almost despairing of escaping the enemy, we fled to the mountains, where we had to conceal ourselves for several days in the caves and caverns of the rocks, all that time living only on wild roots and herbs, and old broken biscuits we had brought away with us. We even ventured from time to time to quit our retreat at night, and to advance into the interior of the country. But, after having wandered about for several days, we saw that, in place of advancing in the direction of Rome, unfortunately, we hadn't quitted the neighborhood of Loreto. We dared not stop to get a guide for fear of meeting traitors, who'd have given us up to the enemy. At the simple sight of the cross surmounting the hermitage, we felt emboldened to knock and implore succor from the generosity of its inhabitants."

"Truly it was the hand of God brought you here. Our good hermit who received us and cared for us with a fatherly fondness, will give you every information you may desire."

"He'll do us a great service, for all we want is to get to Rome as quick as possible."

At that moment Fra Paolo entered, inviting his guests to a modest repast. At first, he tried everything to get them to remain at least one night more; then he gave them every explanation he could to enable them quietly to pursue their way and reach Rome without danger.

"But why do you want to go away so soon?" he repeated. "Wait at least until the morning; you'll rest to-night."

"No, no, my good father; Rome, Rome, nothing but Rome," responded the three Zouaves.

Joseph and Martin vainly joined their entreaties to those of the hermit. Van Gameren and his companions, as soon as they had sufficiently rested, took leave of Victor and all their friends at the hermitage.

"We'll rejoin you at Rome as soon as we can," cried Victor after them.

"Well, au revoir, then,"

"Au revoir, my friends, Success to you and a safe journey."

"Poor fellows!" sighed Victor, however, as soon as they were out of hearing; "I'm very, very much afraid they'll soon fall into the hands of the enemy."

He was deceived, however. Van Gameren and his two companions, although exposed to the cruellest fatigues, and surrounded with perils, reached their journey's end safe. "I wish you had seen me," wrote Van Gameren to his brother. "I had all the look of a mendicant, a beggar. My clothes were falling off me; my handsome Zouave's uniform, which I had put on quite new scarcely a month ago, was literally in pieces. Fortunately, they've given me another."

Victor's health appeared to improve day by day. Thanks to the hermit's doctoring, his wound was already almost cicatrized, and he would have been able to proceed towards Rome along with his companions if he had not been sensibly weakened by the copious hemorrhage.

But the hermit would not listen to their going.

"Wait," he said to them, "wait, my children until your friend's strength is completely restored and the surrounding country quieter. You mustn't forget the Piedmontese are still scouring the country."

They said the same thing at Luigi's. The young Zouaves then were constrained to yield to these entreaties, and defer their departure. They were greatly distressed, thinking how uneasy their Belgian friends would be on their account. And yet they could not make up their minds to write a few words with a view of reassuring them; for they were afraid, by so doing they would reveal the place of their retreat to their enemies. Besides, if they could have got rid of this anxiety, they would have led a quiet, happy life with their good friends, for all vied with each other in testifying their respect, interest, and affection for them. Lorenzo and Marietta particularly could not exist without their company.

The young man had the greatest admiration and deepest sympathy for the brave Martin. The two friends were inseparable, and although it was not very easy for them to understand one another, they conversed with an animation and a vivacity it was a pleasure to witness. Lorenzo particularly admired the prodigious strength and splendid stature of the hard volunteer.

"What a splendid soldier!" he cried. "Oh, Martin, I'd like to see you hug Garibaldi. Without any flattery, I think you'd settle his business!"

Marietta liked to talk to Joseph, who spoke to her lovingly of his dear native land, of his beloved mother and his gentle sister.

"My sister's name is Mary, like yours," he said, "and she is nearly your age."

"Oh! how I should like to know her."

"That would be a little difficult," replied Joseph, smiling "but when I shall have returned to Belgium, I'll send you her portrait. I'll tell her what affection and devotion Marietta and her respectable family have shown towards the poor volunteers, and she'll pray for you, I assure you, for she is as pious and good as your mother's children."

Marietta blushed at this unexpected praise, and to give a turn to the conversation, she asked, in a timid voice:

"Is Belgium a fine country?"

And then Joseph described to her the beautiful landscapes and the charming views of the Campine, recounting to her their memories, traditions, manners and customs. Often, when the evening came round, they sat together before the door of the cascina, to take the air, and Marietta then, accompanying herself on the harp, sung one of those touching canzonette one hears so often sung by the fresh voices of the villagers under the beautiful Italian sky. Then it was Joseph's turn, and the young man intoned the war song of the Belgian volunteers, while Lorenzo, Marietta and Martin chorused the refrain.

Then, at nightfall, Joseph and Martin, in company with Lorenzo, went to visit their friend at the hermitage. Victor, in turn, as soon as he was able to walk, was accustomed to follow them from time to time to the cascina, where he passed a whole day with them.

The good hermit found it difficult to accustom himself to Victor's absence. He had devoted an unbounded affection, a real father's love, to the young invalid. The noble lad was not slow in opening his heart to him, speaking of his love for his parents, his father's errors, and of the grief this deplorable blindness caused him.

"Hope, my dear son, your father will be converted," the hermit responded.

"Oh! may your words come true, Father!" murmured the young man, overcome. "I would willingly give my life to obtain that supreme favor. But, alas! will God deign to accept, to bless my sacrifice?"

"Have confidence, my child; who knows but the Lord has already heard you? In any case, I assure you, you may sooner or later safely count on your father's conversion."

When they talked this way, Victor usually ascended the hill at the base of which the hermitage was built, and kneeling on the summit, from which he could perceive the holy House of Loreto, he prayed to the Mother of Grace and Goodness.

At last, when the day of their departure came, in the beginning of November, all the inhabitants of the cascina were plunged in grief.

Fra Paolo, accompanied by Victor, had quitted the hermitage on the preceding evening, and both passed the night under the good peasant's roof. The young men provided themselves with arms, as they might have to measure swords with some of the enemy's soldiers on their way. As to Lorenzo, he had firmly resolved to be their guide; at least as far as the frontier of the Papal States.

"No, no," he cried, smiling; "I don't want you to fall into the hands of the Piedmontese. You've caused us too much anxiety on that account. And it would be for the sake of these scoundrels we'd have given ourselves so much trouble! Make yourself easy; I know all the country round about us as well as my right hand, the roads and the woods, the gorges and the hills; and, I believe me, we'll traverse them without risks and without difficulties."

They could not refuse him this last favor. Next day, at dawn, the four companions, dressed as peasants, were ready to start; but the separation, as one may well think, was very painful. One would have thought beloved children were quitting the paternal roof without a hope of returning.

Bettina and Marietta wept bitterly. Luigi was in a very bad humor, for that was his way of showing his grief. Fra Paolo, leaning on a stout oak stick, glanced sadly at Victor.

"My child, my dear child," said he, in a low voice, "pray for the old hermit, who'll always pray for you."

The young travellers, at the moment of crossing the threshold, knelt at the venerable old man's feet.

"Give us your blessing, Father," they said.

Fra Paolo raised his eyes and hands to heaven, and made the sign of the cross over their bowed heads. Then they exchanged a last greeting, a last clasp of the hand.

"Farewell, farewell! Addio, dear children!"

And the young men, crossing the threshold, went away in the direction of Rome.

CHAPTER XVI.

END OF A FREETHINKER.

The henceforth illustrious names of Castelfidardo and the Crocetti had resounded throughout Europe. The glory of the courageous martyrs of light and justice, as well as the shameful triumph of the conquerors, were published everywhere. Every one heartily admired the heroic courage of the volunteers and the prudence of their brave generals, and recognized the crushing numerical superiority of the enemies as well as the ferocious severity and implacable rancor of the chiefs who had led them to battle.

And yet, with how many tears and sighs of regret was that glory accompanied! There parents were weeping for a son of whom the murderous bullet had deprived them; elsewhere sisters were going into mourning for a brother of whose fate they were ignorant—or perhaps it was a husband or betrothed who had fallen on the blood-stained battle-field, or dear friends separated forever.

But who could paint the constant and painful anxiety of relatives and friends without tidings of their dear ones? What had become of those for whom so many tears were being shed? Were they dead, or severely wounded? Had they escaped—were they languishing in prison? Alas! who could tell?

Every time the papers published a new list of the wounded, they were eagerly snatched up, each expecting to see his fears happily dispelled or fatally confirmed. And for many those cruel tortures of doubt and uncertainty were prolonged; they could not find the names of their children, brothers, friends in the list. All hope was then lost; they were dead and buried in the inglorious trench dug for them by the cruel hands of Cialdini's soldiers. How else account for their silence?

It was this doubt and uncertainty that for several weeks wrung the hearts of our Schrambeck friends. Since the papers had conveyed to them the deplorable news of the Castelfidardo massacre, not even doubtful news of their three volunteers had reached them. Days passed in indescribable anguish awaiting the moment when the last glimmer of hope would be extinguished—for who knows whether they should ever hear of the fate of their children?

The three mothers and the sisters, however, bore this great grief calmly; faith compensated for joy and hope; but the unhappy father, the proud philosophe, who had nothing to rest on but his human courage and his cold, austere reason, could not bear it, and was gradually falling into a profound melancholy. While his wife, his niece, and his sister-in-law were drawing hope and consolation at the foot of the tabernacle or before the humble altar of the Mother of God, he was roaming about the county a prey to brooding sorrow, or passing long hours shut up in his chamber, silent, motionless, and with his head buried in his hands. Although the season was already advanced, he had not yet been able to make up his mind to leave his country house. In the first place, he knew his wife found some consolation in her sister's company. As for himself, he had not the courage to tear himself away from his dear Mary, who by her simple affection and loving solicitude, alone could sometimes dissipate his sombre melancholy.

"Dear uncle, why are you always so sad?" said she affectionately, trying to conquer her own grief in order to soothe his.

"Alas! my poor child, how could I be merry? We'll never, never more see our poor unfortunate exiles."

"Still, uncle, all hope is not lost. You know every day young Zouaves whom one thought dead are writing to their relatives or returning their families."

"I know it, my good Mary, and that's exactly why I'm despondent. All those who've come back were at first prisoners of war, and none of them have come across our poor friends. They haven't been seen either at Genoa, Alessandria or any other prison. Tell me, Mary, tell me what hope remains to us now? They have certainly been killed in action, abandoned on the field of battle."

And the unhappy father stopped abruptly, and vainly strove to restrain the tears that rushed to his eyes, while, strange to say, Mary felt a mysterious peace, a supernatural strength; understanding that God had made her the only support and consolation of this unhappy father, whose heart was closed to every hope from heaven, and who was consequently every instant on the point of succumbing under the burden of grief.

"Still, nobody has seen them fall upon the battle-field, dear uncle," she resumed. "Even those of their companions who fought by their side up to the close of the action say they didn't lose sight of them until the moment the retreat commenced. Favored by the disorder that prevailed in the ranks, couldn't they have escaped and found some secret hiding-place?"

"No, no, my poor Mary. How could they get safely away in a country invaded by a victorious army? Besides, wouldn't they have written since then to relieve us of any uncertainty as to their fate?"

"Who knows? Perhaps they are concealed at Loreto itself or in the neighborhood, and won't write for fear of making known their place of retreat to the Piedmontese commanders!"

"Alas! poor child," pursued the unhappy father still more sadly, "it is the voice of your love that, despite everything, cradles you in these consoling illusions. You'd like to make me share them to calm and sustain me by the shadow of a hope."

"No, no, my very dear uncle, I'm not deluding myself; but a firm and pious confidence tells me to believe and to hope, so long as hope is possible and confidence allowable. I am obeying the voice of faith, pure and potent faith, which tells me of a mysterious Father in heaven who watches over all His children, and protects them even in the midst of the greatest dangers, the most terrible trials. It is this divine confidence and faith I wish to communicate to you, my good uncle; not to cherish vain illusions in your heart, but to engender a sweet, strong hopefulness in your soul."

"My good and dear Mary, I heartily admire your resignation and courage, but I can't share them; for me it is too late! If the God whom you adore really exists, and controls and directs the actions of men, He can only be to me a severe Judge, a pitiless Executioner, and not a kind and loving Father; for I have outraged and insulted Him; I have denied His existence, despised His power, and defied His wrath."

"Oh! my dear uncle, don't speak so. Banish those melancholy thoughts; know better that God loves you. He is, without contradiction, infinitely holy and infinitely powerful, and, consequently, detests and punishes every fault, every injustice; but, at the same time, His goodness is inexhaustible and His mercy infinite; He is never deaf to the penitent's voice, never refuses His pardon to the humble soul. Oh! if you would but be moved to hope and believe at last, to yield to His powerful voice who invites and calls you!"

At these touching words, the old man bent his head and made no answer, but remained lost in thought. It had certainly cost him too much to confess his blindness, to recognize he was wrong; and yet that pardon which his niece's words seemed to announce—that promise of peace from a Divine voice—unknown, alas! to the unhappy man for many a sad year—and that hope in the goodness of the Almighty—all those graces and benedictions fell like the dew of heaven on his saddened soul and showed him clearly what treasures he had lost in voluntarily separating himself from the faith of the Eternal God. And, once more, the spirit of darkness and the spirit of light struggled secretly in his soul.

Besides, as often as Victor's father conversed with Mary, the sombre veil that darkened his features, his countenance and his glance, seemed withdrawn, and a ray of hope appeared to brighten his pale face. But he soon relapsed into his usual melancholy, and wandered sad and lonely through the forest to the east of Sehranbeck, or stopped, dreamy and motionless, before the hill where the demolished castle raised its ruined walls.

Walking one day near the Chapel of Consolation he met Teresa there praying. Handing her an alms, and without looking at her, he murmured gently:

"Pray for our children, my good woman, and—don't forget me."

And he walked rapidly away.

The beggar-woman raised her head and looked after the old man in profound astonishment.

"Ah, Monsieur Morren, Monsieur Morren, your day will come," she said, "make your mind easy; others beside me are praying for the poor wanderer."

It could not be otherwise. Madame Van Dael, to whom Mary related the conversation her uncle had with her in the garden, joined her fervent prayers to those of her daughter and Victor's mother. Madame Morren, however, despite the strength of soul she constantly displayed, was beginning to succumb under the burden of her griefs and heart-rending disquietudes. One morning in November, when, after a night passed in tears and sleeplessness, she came down to breakfast, she looked so completely downcast that her husband at once exclaimed:

"In the name of heaven, my dear Rose, what's the matter with you? You really frighten me—you are so pale, so changed!"

The poor woman, touched by his solicitude, tried to smile, but at that instant her strength failed her, and she could only murmur, through her tears, which fell abundantly:

"Oh, my Victor, my poor child, what can have become of him?"

The old man made no reply, but bent his head, and both were silent for some minutes. At last, he rose, and seemed to have taken a sudden resolution.

"I'm going to town," he said, decisively. "It appears a volunteer has just arrived; perhaps he can give me some information—some news. Meanwhile, keep up your courage. As long as we're not certain of our boy's death we may, we ought to hope. Who knows but I shall bring you some consoling news?"

Thus he strove to dissemble his own grief to arouse his wife's courage if possible. A few moments later he left for town, and had hardly alighted from the train when he began the search. But his fleeting hopes were soon disappointed. Vainly he multiplied his walks and his visits; he collected, indeed, a good deal of information about the heroism of the Zouaves, the number of the dead and wounded, and the sufferings of the prisoners, but not a word to reveal the fate of Victor and his two companions. The young volunteer who had come home could tell him nothing more, unless that he had lost sight of his comrade Victor in the thick of the fight, and that probably he had perished along with his companions. None of the prisoners had seen him or heard of him since the defeat.

All this was certainly calculated to afflict a father's heart. So, weak and hopeless, the unhappy man wandered through the streets. At last, by chance, he found himself before his friend Ernest Van Dormael's door. He knocked mechanically, he seemed to have lost all his presence of mind. A servant opened it.

"Monsieur Morren—it's you? But, alas! at what a moment!" she cried, astounded.

"How? What's the matter with him?" replied the old man, surprised at such a reception.

"Ah! don't you know? Monsieur Ernest is dying. This very morning he was as well as you or I. Oh! if you saw him! It's really a dreadful thing!"

"Can I see him, then?"

"Certainly, sir. All his friends are with him—will you wait a moment? I'll go and announce your visit."

And she introduced him into the parlor, went up stairs to the first floor, and in a few moments returned, requesting him to follow her.

The sick man, stretched on his bed, was at that moment suffering from excruciating cramps; his face was convulsed, and becoming gradually blue; his eyes were flashing, his distorted features betrayed the most dreadful anguish, and the veins on his forehead were swollen horribly, and, as it were, twisted.

Around the unhappy man's bed several persons were assembled: first, his sister; then his eldest brother, owner of the house; the family physician, all dressed in black; and, lastly, a friend of the dying man—a so-called friend, come there with the intention of carefully stifling all the aspirations, pious desires, and remorse that might awaken in that soul. All these men assembled around his bed formed part of the famous society of the Solidaires. They had come to carefully watch that departing soul up to the last moment.

M. Morren had hardly crossed the threshold, when the dying man already stretched out his hands towards him, fixing upon him a look almost of despair.

"Oh! Morren, my friend," he cried, "a priest! Don't let me die thus, without consolation, without succor!"

"But, Ernest, you'll not die. It's only a momentary indisposition, a passing illness. Your friend, the doctor, can't fail to cure you."

"No, no, don't believe him; it's death; I feel it already; already its chill freezes me; already its hand is drawing me away. A priest, a priest, I conjure you. They won't send for a priest, and still I can't die like a wretch, like a dog."

"Sir," said the old man, then, in a graver tone, addressing Ernest's brother. "You see as well as I do what your brother wishes in this; still I think you are in all justice obliged to do what he wants. You'll be guilty of real barbarity in refusing to comply with his last wishes."

"Come, come," said Van Dormael in a tone of indifference. "Can we bother ourselves with such childishness? Ernest himself will blush at such puerile solicitations when he has recovered his health. Hasn't he often recommended us never to yield to such entreaties, were he to repeat them a hundred times under the sway of a complete aberration—a sudden weakness of mind?"

"But at this moment he formally expresses his will."

"And my will in the case is as formal. He'll thank me one day for not having acceded to his request."

"A priest! ah! for pity's sake a priest!" interposed the wretch, writhing in his bed. The physician drew near and wanted to administer a soothing draught. But all his efforts were useless. The dying man in the midst of his agony, continued writhing and repeating despairingly: "For pity's sake a priest, a priest!"

Mr. Morren, contemplated with irrepressible horror this dreadful scene, turned towards Ernest's sister, who was weeping in a corner.

"Mademoiselle," said he, "couldn't you at least try to fulfil your brother's last wish?"

"Alas! we don't know any priest," sighed the unhappy young girl.

"But the first passer-by could point out one."

"Would he consent to follow me to a freethinker, as we are called?"

"Undoubtedly, my good child. Go quickly, make haste, if you would spare yourself everlasting anguish."

"A priest! a priest!" repeated the dying man at that instant in a voice so loud and terrible that the young girl fled from the room and rushed out to satisfy his last wish.

"Know that the priest shall not enter here," cried the eldest brother rushing after her.

Meanwhile, Victor's father drew near the bed.

"What are you suffering from, my poor Ernest?" he asked compassionately.

"Alas, my friend, I don't know. This morning I was in perfect health. All at once the hand of death has seized me, and my whole body seems to have become his prey. Oh! Morren, Morren, I feel it is a chastisement, a vengeance from heaven. A few days ago I mounted guard just the same at the bedside of one of my friends. He, too, asked for a priest, and I pitilessly, cruelly refused him. I brutally shut the door in the face of the messenger of the Lord; in my malignant obstinacy and guilty indifference, I let my friend die like an abandoned wretch, like a pagan, an animal.—Wretch that I am," he cried, wringing his hands and gnashing his teeth, in his excessive despair: "the priest will not come, and I'll die in the same way. These fellows"—and he pointed out the three friends ranged around his bed—"these fellows have come to guard me. I have richly deserved it!"

Ernest's brothers and his two friends quitted the bedside to place themselves before the door.

"To die, to die so young," he repeated, "to die like a vile animal when I felt still full of strength and life! Oh, woe, woe to me! And tell me, what will happen to me after my death? What is there beyond the tomb, Morren, do you know? What have I to expect?"

The philosophe, dejected and confounded, remained mute with horror. The miserable Ernest, in his mad transports, writhed in his bed; all his members were dreadfully convulsed.

"No, no, the priests will not come," he cried at last. "The priests! I have persecuted, calumniated, insulted and disdained them at my pleasure. Yes, I have done it; and they know it. They know well the freethinker, their adversary, their enemy, and they'll refuse me their succor. And, even if they should accord them, what use would they be to me? It is too late; I feel it; no more hope or pardon for me! I have denied everything, blasphemed everything, sullied everything with my disdain, my insults."

And the wretch, speaking thus, wrung his hands and tore his hair in despair.

The door suddenly opened, and Mlle. Van Dormael reappeared, accompanied by a priest.

"This way, sir," said she, introducing him into the room.

The ecclesiastic who accompanied her was a fine, robust old man, calm and dignified. But before he could even cross the threshold, the three associates, pale and menacing, stood before him, barring the way.

"Get out of this!" cried Ernest's brother, in an angry voice; "you'll not cross the threshold of this room while I'm here."

At first the servant of God seemed surprised at the exclamation; but he soon resumed his modest confidence and self-possession.

"Gentlemen," he replied, "I'm told there is a dying man here wants to see me."

"You're wrong; you're not wanted."

"But this poor invalid seems to suffer so much," interposed the old man, pointing to the unfortunate Ernest.

"Oh! yes, I'm suffering a great deal. Come! a priest, a priest!"

"Get out of this house this instant, hypocrite!" cried Van Dormael, furiously; "withdraw this instant, or I—"

"But you can't deny that I've been called in—"

"No one has called you in. It is I alone who decide and command here—"

"Consequently your victim is not entitled to my prayers, to my assistance, nor to the exercise of his liberty—that supreme liberty of which you are resolved to deprive him with so much hatred and fury?"

"Don't argue with me—go!" retorted the wretch furiously. "And go without delay, or else my people, whom I am going to call, will kick you out of doors."

At these words the venerable priest, undismayed by these unworthy menaces, drew himself up to his full height proudly, and with great dignity replied:

"You may do what you like, sir, but you will not succeed in frightening me, in driving me away from my post beside this Christian soul. It is an urgent case, gentlemen, and I call upon you in the name of that liberty of conscience you vaunt so loudly, to give me free access to this sick man's bed."

"Enough!" interrupted the solidaire, who no longer restraining himself, furiously snatched a pistol fixed to the wall and took aim at the venerable priest. "Depart this instant, or recommend your soul to your God."

Victor's father, out of himself, rushed forward, flung himself upon the wretch, wresting the pistol from him. But in vain they strove to recall him to himself; in vain the unhappy young girl threw herself on her knees, bathing his hands with her tears and imploring his pity; he repulsed them both furiously and would listen to nothing. Meanwhile the physician and his companion, each seizing one of the poor priest's arms, drew him out of the room, and hastened to close the door behind him.

"Sir," said they to him, "please observe that we can bear witness if necessary to your rash and entirely inopportune intrusion into this house where you were not invited, and are resolved to depose to your inexplicable conduct before a court of justice if you don't leave this instant."

Henceforth, all hope was lost, and the noble old man, going down stairs, slowly withdrew, with tears in his eyes and a prayer on his lips. But he had hardly crossed the threshold of the house, when the door of the sick man's room again opened with a bang. This time it was Van Dormael's brother, the solidaire himself, who bounded wildly down stairs.

"Horror, horror!" he cried. "Help, my friends. He's mad; he wants to assassinate me!"

The two companions, thinking he was just seized with a violent fever, sought to restrain him.

"It's no longer a man—it's a demon!" he cried, terrified. "Let us fly, let us fly, my friends; he will tear us to pieces."

The room of the dying man presented at that moment a dreadful spectacle. The unfortunate Ernest, stretched on the floor, was trying, by convulsive efforts, to escape from the arms of his sister and M. Morren, who was trying to hold him back.

"Let me go," he cried, "I'll follow them; I'll punish them—the monsters! They have sworn to deliver me alive to eternal torments? Where are they that I may tear them in pieces? They've sent for a priest to mock me, to mock my sufferings. No, no, I don't want a priest. I know how to die like a brave man; I am a freethinker!"

The wretch was delirious. Large, reddish blotches now spread over his livid face, his bloodshot eyes seemed starting from their sockets, and a whitish foam gathered on his already blackened lips.

"Where are they—where are they? Let them come—the freethinkers and the priests!" he cried madly. "I'll take care of them. Ha! ha! ha!" he pursued, in a burst of hellish laughter, "let them come—the cowards; let them show themselves if they dare!"

In a few moments his strength was exhausted, and M. Morren succeeded in raising him in his arms and replacing him in bed. He then stood beside his pillow in such a way as to be able to restrain him if another crisis supervened. But such a precaution seemed no longer necessary; he lay exhausted on his deathbed, motionless, speechless, and almost lifeless. Only from time to time a convulsive shuddering shook his limbs—the last flickering of the flame. His mouth was already wide open, his cheeks hollow and livid, his lips waxy pale; his eyes alone still gleamed vividly, while his face alternately assumed blackish or blueish, livid or purple hues.

With folded arms, gravely and silently, M. Morren kept his eyes fixed sadly on the dying man. He saw death rapidly approaching, and would have wished to allay the poor wretch's sufferings, but he had not in his heart a single word of consolation to address to his friend. He was forced to decline the combat, and leave Death—that implacable enemy, that judge of all sinners—free to torture this condemned patient, this unfortunate victim.

Victor's father, too, was scarcely conscious of what was going on around him. At one moment he thought himself stretched in his turn on that bed of pain awaiting the visit of his Sovereign Judge, struggling with death. All his resolution and all his courage were beginning to fail him; an enormous load weighed on his chest; he felt he was on the point of being suffocated, and instinctively sighed for a purer air, a calmer and more invigorating atmosphere.

The freethinker's sister was sobbing loudly, with her face bent over the pillow; she dared not fix her eyes on the convulsed countenance of that brother whose errors she had shared and whose miserable and dreadful agony she now contemplated.

Thus the moments passed. The sick man, from time to time, shuddered painfully; the philosophe, grave and motionless, meditated in silence; the young girl wrung her hands in mute despair; below stairs the three terrified solidaires emptied many a bumper to give themselves courage,—but nobody prayed in that accursed house.

And a sad and solemn silence had long reigned in that room, when at last a half-stifled rattle was heard in the dying man's throat. The young girl then raised her head; but at that moment Ernest's features had a less feverish and ferocious expression; consciousness, no doubt, was gradually returning.

"Ernest," she murmured in his ear, "shall I call back the priest?"

"The priest!" repeated the dying man in accents of rage and fury, as if that word alone had awakened all his hatred. "No, no, the priest begone! Haven't I told you already he can't help me?—that I am condemned, lost!—that there is no longer any possible pardon!"

M. Morren, then approaching the unhappy man, strove to calm him.

"Go away, go away; it's all over," said he, with a horrible burst of laughter. "It's come at last—that hour your nephew told me of before, you remember. 'An hour will come,' said he to me, 'when you'll wish in vain to believe; when you'll implore the assistance of a priest entreatingly, despairingly. But who knows if God will then consent to hear you?' Yes, yes, I see it; that hour has come at last. Here, here"—and, speaking thus, he clasped his hand across his burning breast—"I feel a fire burning me here; it's like a foretaste of the fire of hell that will soon engulf me. . . For I see it now. Morren, there is a hell, and there is a God, don't you know? . . . Well, if you don't know it, it is I who tell it to you—I, the enemy of the Christians; I, the libre penseur. . . There is a God—and there is a hell!"

And he writhed convulsively on his bed, striving, in his anguish, to hide under his bed-clothes his brow, already inundated with the cold sweat of death. Suddenly, as if some horrible vision was unveiled to his sight, he shuddered dreadfully, opened his eyes affrightedly, and stretched forth his arms convulsively, as if to drive away some implacable phantom.

"Look!" he cried; "look! here they are! * * *

Here is your nephew, Van Dael, and the beggar-woman and Maso, and another, too. * * * Ah! I know him, too. That's Victor Morren, with Maso's dagger in his breast. It was I—yes, it was I who whetted that dagger; it was I who decided Maso to assassinate Victor. * * * Oh! the monsters, the tigers, the serpents, they are attacking me at their pleasure—me, weak and feeble! Oh! they are crushing me under their feet, they are rending my breast, they are tearing my heart out!"

And he cast his arms about feverishly and breathed painfully, while a convulsive gasping distended his throat as if some heavy burden was crushing him down.

At that moment the door opened and the sentinels of hell reappeared. The dying man recognized them and fixed a flashing glance upon his perfidious friends.

"Woe, woe!" he cried; "here they are, the accursed ones, the demons of hell who are coming to carry me away."

And, as if he felt the hand of death upon him at that moment, as if he wished to escape his inevitable fate, he bounded out of bed, dashing forward with all the frenzy of despair. But it was in vain. The poor wretch fell heavily upon the floor. The libre penseur—the freethinker—was dead, and Victor's father fled precipitately out of that accursed house.

When he returned home that night he witnessed another scene of grief and tears. He had scarcely entered the drawing-room when he uttered a piercing cry of pain and anguish. His wife, seated sadly in a corner, was weeping in the arms of her sister and her niece.

"What's the matter? What's the matter?" cried the old man distractedly.

Madame Morren, with a trembling hand, gave him a letter bearing the stamp of the Pontifical States. The unhappy father had no sooner glanced at it than he uttered a heart-rending scream, and, prostrated with grief, fell upon the nearest seat.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE TWO FATHERS.

"Good day, dear Nina,"

"Good day, Carlotta. And where are you coming from now, neighbor?"

Thus spoke, one pleasant December morning, two of the young girls whom we met in a previous chapter in the midst of their pleasant chat near the Aequa Paolo.

"And what do I see?" continued Nina, without giving her friend time to answer. "You've certainly been crying, for your eyes are quite red."

"Alas! yes; and if you were with me, neighbor, I'm certain you'd have wept too. I've left the Bianchi's, where I had been to see Nunziata, who is always busy nursing that young Zouave. Oh! Nina, one would have thought it was no longer a man but an angel—he's so sweet and patient and calm and—and—" here she began sobbing, covering her face with her handkerchief—"my heart is still ready to break when I think of it!"

"But I really thought he was getting better since yesterday!"

"Alas, no! . . . I'm afraid the Lord will soon summon him to his heavenly Paradise."

"And yet we were so hopeful a few days ago when we went with Nunziata to pray to the Madonna di San Agostino to preserve his life! How moved I was at the grief of that poor Nunziata when, weeping so bitterly, she began to recite the Litany of the Blessed Virgin! How fervently we all responded to her humble prayer: 'Grazia, grazia, good Mary. You'll grant us grace, Mother of the Divine Saviour.'"

There is a pious and touching custom at Rome among the women of the people in the Trastevere quarter. When one of their neighbors or friends is ill, the young girls of the neighborhood assemble, and repair in a body to the Church of Our Lady dell' Orto, or the Pantheon, or more particularly to St. Augustine's, to pray for the speedy recovery of the sufferer. Most of them prepare, by confession, for this work of charity, and, in token of penitence, go barefoot to the church. There they kneel humbly before the holy image, and, if the church is nearly empty, repeat in a loud voice, one after another, the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, to which all the others join, responding in chorus: "Grazia, Mary, Mother of God; grazia. Don't let us go without hope, without consolation; grant us this grace, O Mother!"

"And yet, I repeat, I believe our Lord means to call him to Himself," replied Carlotta, bowing down her head at those words of her friend. "For that young man is an angel—really an angel. He's too virtuous and innocent to remain on this earth. But I wish you saw with what affection and devotedness Nunziata cares for him night and day. Indeed she couldn't do more if it was her own brother."

"But how is it that this stranger is so well known to the Bianchi that they should treat him as one of the family?"

"E chi lo sa? Stefano and Nunziata never told me why, and I suppose you don't imagine I could be the first to ask them. That would be nice, indeed! No, no, Nina; my father, Maestro Toto, brought me up too well for that, and my mother, Sora Cecca, whom you knew well (may she rest in peace) took care to recommend me always; 'Carlotta, my child, don't meddle with other persons' affairs, unless they wish to tell them to you.' But I think I can tell you that this young man is none other than that young foreign Zouave whom we saw passing one day near the Acqua Paolo with an unknown signor."

"Do you really think so? For my part I've no recollection."

"But I—I recollect," promptly retorted the young babler, "and I remember the better, because, during the afternoon of the same day, I saw Stefano returning in company with that same Zouave, and entering along with him the Church of St. Peter in Montorio."

But, while the young girls were talking, Joseph and Martin, leaving the house along with Stefano, passed by them on their way to town.

"Exactly," resumed Carlotta. "I forgot to tell you that these two young men are the comrades and friends of the poor sick Zouave. They come from a very distant country, called Belgium, as Nina has told me, and are so attached to each other that they never quit their companion day or night. They're going to the station now, along with Stefano, to receive that poor young man's parents. Unhappy parents, and particularly the poor mother! How they'll suffer when they see their child dying so far away from home!"

But it was too true. The young invalid was none other than Victor; the fatigue and difficulties of the journey, and particularly, crossing the Apennines, had overpowered the poor convalescent, whose health was still very precarious, and resulted in a sickness which left little hope.

The first days of the journey had passed pleasantly enough, but Victor soon began to experience extreme fatigue and acute pains in the chest and side. The three friends had then to rest more frequently, and they were still afraid of falling into the hands of the Piedmontese; they had to continue the journey at any cost. In this perplexity Martin's broad shoulders were once more placed in requisition, to the great grief of Victor, who, to spare his devoted comrade this trouble, pretended to be stronger than he really was. He avoided as much as possible speaking of his fatigue, and yet, several times, after an hour's marching, his trembling knees gave way under him, and he was forced to rest under a tree.

But according as they approached the longed-for destination, the joy and happiness of reaching it seemed to give him strength. It was the last wish, the secret desire of his heart, to go to repose in God on that ground bedewed by the blood of so many glorious martyrs.

It was easy to perceive that his languor and suffering increased from day to day. Frequent weaknesses and a painful dry cough, accompanied with an acute pain in the side and chest, showed that the lungs were beginning to be affected.

On their arrival in Rome, a violent spitting of blood added to the young martyr's sufferings, and deprived his friends of their last hope. Still, according to Victor's earnest desire, they all three immediately repaired to Stefano's to bear the repentant Carbonar's farewell message, and announce the Christian death of his unfortunate brother.

They had just entered the Bianchi's house, when Victor was seized with a fatal hemorrhage which rapidly exhausted all his remaining strength. So, at Stefano's earnest entreaties, the young invalid was placed on a good bed in a quiet cheerful room at his new friends', who vied with each other in lavishing their care and devotedness upon him.

But it was easy to see that the poor patient's condition became each day graver and more painful. Joseph then hastened to write to his mother, begging her to break the news as cautiously as possible to Victor's parents.

Madame Van Dael then, in her brother-in-law's absence, went to her sister's to fulfil the painful mission with which she was charged.

"We have news at last of our children," she said, as soon as she reached the door. "Unfortunately this news is not the most reassuring."

"Alas! our children are dead!" cried the poor mother, seized with a painful presentiment.

"Very far from that!" responded the widow; "they've arrived at Rome. Joseph has written to me."

"And Victor? He doesn't write? You see he must be dead."

"I assure you, my dear sister, he is alive."

"The letter! show me the letter. Otherwise I couldn't believe you."

The unhappy mother took the letter and read it.

"O Lord, omnipotent God, Thy will be done," she murmured, returning it to her sister, and weak and speechless, fell into her arms.

It was at this moment the father arrived; and he was plunged into a state of indescribable stupor at the sight.

"What's to become of us? What shall we do?" he cried, when at last he had summoned up his courage.

"Ah! let us go—let us go to Rome!" cried the distracted mother, who seemed to derive new hope and strength from this sudden thought. "At least, our poor child shall not die alone, without having the happiness of seeing and embracing his parents again. God will permit him to live until we shall have seen him, that he may sleep in peace in his mother's arms."

M. Morren could not fail to approve of his noble and pious wife's resolution. The next day they were en route, having taken care to write beforehand to Joseph to announce their approaching arrival.

It was a great consolation to Victor to be able to indulge in the hope of soon embracing his good and loving mother. This pleasant prospect even seemed to have a favorable influence on his health, and his friends grew hopeful as his worn features began to wear an air of calmness and serenity.

The house the Bianchi occupied, and which Stefano had just left in company with Joseph and Martin, was distinguished from the other houses in the Trastevere by its modest and comfortable appearance and its extreme neatness. And yet the family was very much reduced from its former opulence since its departure from Naples; it could only be classed with the paine or petits bourgeois of Rome. However, the modest competence it still enjoyed would have enabled it to occupy a house in the finest quarters of the city. Nunziata and Stefano's father had preferred to select his dwelling in the midst of the Trastevere, where he could live more quietly with his children.

In a room on the second floor, in which the white curtains were carefully drawn down, Nunziata watched and prayed by the bed of the young Zouave. Her prayer-book, wide open, rested on her knees, and in the midst of the silence she raised her head from time to time, fixing her glances on her dear patient, and seeking in her heart to divino his wishes.

On a table next the bed was placed a statue of the Blessed Virgin and a rich ivory crucifix—a souvenir of better days. The portrait of Victor's mother rested at the foot of the crucifix; thus the young man had placed the purest and most ardent of his earthly affections under the protection of the cross.

Suddenly he moved, and Nunziata, closing her book, raised her head.

"Do you wish for anything, Victor? What can I do for you?" she asked with visible solicitude.

"I don't wish for anything," he replied. "No, absolutely nothing, unless that you should make yourself more easy. Why so much sadness and tears, my poor Nunziata?"

"Alas!" she replied, "can you ask me? Can I forget the name, the crime of him who has put you in that state, Victor?"

"Always the same fancies, the same imaginings! Banish those sad thoughts from your mind Nunziata, I entreat, unless you wish to make me very unhappy."

The poor girl made no reply to those kind words, only, bowing down her head, she began to weep.

"You distress me very much, my poor Nunziata," he continued sadly.

"But, Victor," she resumed, in the midst of her sobs, "how can I help crying, when I see you perishing, languishing, and suffering thus? Wasn't he my brother, my own brother, he whose resentment, whose ferocious hatred pursued you to the death? Wasn't it his hand that struck you—struck you to death perhaps? Haven't I reason then to weep and suffer, thinking that he whom I loved so tenderly on this earth has thus persecuted and stricken down an innocent and noble defender of God and Holy Church, and that at the very moment he had committed that dreadful crime he was summoned to appear before his Creator and his angry Judge."

And as she spoke, Nunziata bowed her head, and again burst into tears. Victor, who heard her in silence, first gave her time to grow calm.

"Nunziata," said he at last with the utmost gentleness, "I repeat, your affliction is too acute and certainly unfounded. Why do you dread the sentence, the rigor of an inexorable Judge? Haven't I described to you the repentance, the profound sorrow of poor Gennaro in his last moments? I have no fears for his soul, for he died, in my arms, contrite and penitent, and the mercy of the Lord is sovereign and infinite. Believe me that the God of goodness has not granted him the grace of repentance in vain. Gennaro dead to earth, now lives the life of heaven; he has led me to you. Don't let his death afflict you, Nunziata, and the thought of eternal justice make you tremble! Would you, then, weakly despairing of your brother's repentance and salvation, place in doubt the sovereign power and infinite goodness of your Saviour Jesus?"

Here the exhausted invalid broke off for a moment. Nunziata then raised her head, which, until then, she had covered with her hands, and a smile of hope and consolation played over her pure features in the very midst of her tears.

"Certainly," continued the generous Victor, "your brother may have fallen; he may have committed faults, errors, but his repentance, his profound and sincere contrition have certainly effaced them. Oh! if you had seen him—as I saw him then—weeping for the faults, the errors of his life, and imploring God's grace and paternal mercy, and begging your pardon and Stefano's, you'd be as sure of his eternal salvation as I am myself. No, no, be assured, poor sorrowing sister, Gennaro, the child of so many tears, so many vows and prayers, can't be lost, can't be damned."

"O Victor, good Victor," replied the young girl with a sigh of gratitude, "you are really good and merciful as a saint, an angel of God."

"You've told me so already, but I know only too well that that's not true," he modestly interposed. "Come, let us put away that, and only try, my good Nunziata, to calm your disquietudes, to appear more joyful. Don't you know that the sight of your grief, your tears, pains me very much?"

But the young girl made no reply; she seemed to have relapsed into a profound melancholy.

"What's the meaning of this?" pursued Victor. "Have I, then, entreated you in vain, Nunziata?"

She tried to raise her head to answer him, but burst out sobbing.

"I can't forget," she cried in the midst of her tears, "that it was a brother's hand——"

"But, Nunziata," Victor hastily interposed, "believe me, Gennaro was not the author of my death."

"But who, then, was the cause?" she murmured.

"Your brother, my friend, was only the instrument of God's providence. And, besides, wasn't my wound rapidly cicatrised? Wasn't it the fatigues of the journey—that because God so willed it—took away all my strength and reduced me to this extremity. But don't forget, all that God ordains is good and just and intended for our happiness, for our everlasting glory. Blessed be God's providence that has given me, for heaven and eternity, a brother for whose salvation I'd have given my life a hundred times! But I expect another grace too from the sovereign goodness of God. You know, Nunziata, for whom I've often asked your prayers. I've another soul to gain—another victory to achieve, and then I'll return to my heavenly country. While you bewail the unfathomable decrees of the Almighty, of the God of mercy, I secretly bless the wound that has been and will yet be, I hope, a source of benediction and eternal happiness to me. Do you wish that I alone should rejoice at the mercies of God? Was I deceived, then, Nunziata, in counting on your fervent piety and perfect resignation?"

Here, exhausted by the efforts he had made, he stopped for an instant to take breath.

"Come," replied Nunziata rising, "I promise you to be calmer, and more resigned in future. Who could resist your touching exhortations, your good words of hope and consolation? But now," she continued more gaily, "I must call you to order, and send you in turn, for you're exhausting yourself in trying to console others."

"That doesn't much matter," he replied with a gentle smile; "the time I've got to pass on earth is very short, and I ought to employ it usefully."

"Oh! don't speak so; such ideas terrify me. We'll succeed in curing you, Victor, with the help of God. We'll pray fervently and perseveringly."

"Nunziata," he interrupted gravely, "for myself I wish for neither cure nor life; I feel that God calls me to Himself, and wish for nothing but the accomplishment of His holy will. Only I desire to see and embrace my dear parents again, and they'll be soon here."

In fact, at that very moment, Joseph opened the door and entered softly. As soon as Victor saw him, he cried out:

"Where are they? Oh! let them come—don't detain them any longer."

Then they both entered tremblingly.

"O Victor, my child!" they cried, mingling their tears and kisses.

"My father! my dear mother!" he cried, as they pressed him in their arms, and their sighs of joy commingled in the midst of a profound silence.

"I return Thee thanks, O Lord," exclaimed Victor at last, "for the supreme joy Thou hast given me to-day. Now, blest by Thee, I shall sleep in peace."

"O my child, my child, don't speak so!" murmured the afflicted mother. "God won't take you from our love. We'll cure you; you shall live to be the support and honor of our old age."

"No mother," he replied, "I shall not be cured; I feel it, I know it. The Lord will deign to accept our common sacrifice."

And you'll be resigned to His holy will, mother, won't you?"

The poor woman made no reply; at that trying moment her strength failed her; she could only press her son in her arms, weeping bitterly. She sat near the bed, still holding his hand, and placing her pale face on his breast, with an expression of affection and grief impossible to describe.

"And you, too, my dear father. Thanks, thanks, for not wishing your child should die alone!"

The unhappy Morren, to whom these words of gratitude were addressed, kept standing next the bed, with folded arms, sombre and motionless. He could not account for the conflicting sentiments and powerful emotions that at that moment moved his soul.

Throughout the entire journey he had unceasingly fought against the divine inspirations, against the grace that was sometimes beginning to touch him. At first he bitterly reproached himself for having allowed Victor to accomplish unrestrainedly his deplorable resolution—for having, in some sort, sent him to perish in a foreign land. But, at that supreme moment, his paternal affection was stronger than his rancor and resentment.

"O Victor, my poor child!" he cried, shedding a torrent of tears, "can I reproach you, when I find you wounded and dying on your bed of pain? . . . Oh! no, no," he continued, casting himself into the arms of his son, "I'll not infuse gall and bitterness into your last moments. . . . Only, you may be sure, I'll not be long after you. . . . What consolation, what joy, can remain to me when you are taken from me!"

"God will remain to you!" said the young man in a grave, solemn voice, as if inspired, "God, the great Consoler, the hope of the despondent and the strength of the weak—God, who never abandons those who confide in His goodness. . . . O father, father, if you only knew how short and light will be the separation which is only the pledge, the promise of future reunion! O dear father, will you not turn to God?"

The philosophe moved, but not convinced, kept a profound silence.

"Father, will you let your son die in the dread and sorrow of an eternal separation?"

"But you will not die, my son," interposed the mother. "The Lord has always miraculously preserved you until now. He will grant this favor to our prayers and tears."

"My dear mother," Victor calmly replied, "do not let yourself be deluded by the illusions of your love, but rather prepare for the accomplishment of that Divine will which I am sure has led me here and has really called me. And then—my sacrifice, mother, my sacrifice!"

And it seemed Victor had spoken truly, for, from that moment, a rapid and fatal change took place in his condition. The last faint ruddy hues disappeared from his hollow cheeks. First a painful oppression stopped his breathing; then a racking cough, which, draining his last strength, terrified and saddened the hearts of those around him.

The physician, who only came once in the course of the day, was immediately sent for, and, on his arrival, shook his head mournfully when he saw the patient. However, he applied the stethoscope, and attentively examined him, while Morren and his wife anxiously watched every movement, striving to read their fate in his eyes, in the expression of his face.

At length the physician drew near Stefano and the two Zouaves.

"I'm very much afraid of the rupture of a new blood vessel, and, consequently, a new hemorrhage to-night," said he. "In my opinion they ought not to put off any longer the administration of the sacraments to this poor young patient."

"So, sir," said M. Morren, addressing the physician, "you have just pronounced sentence. According to you there is no other remedy; all hope is then lost?"

"Believe me, it is very painful to me to be obliged to deprive you of a last hope; but I think I am acting honestly in telling you the whole truth. It is true, sir, your son may live some days yet, and I wouldn't have insisted so earnestly on his receiving the last sacraments to-day if I were not afraid that an approaching hemorrhage might put an end to his sufferings."

Meanwhile the physician's sentence had been communicated to the young patient.

"I ardently desire to receive those divine helps," he said, "and I would have asked for them myself long since if I were not animated with the secret hope of again seeing my dear parents."

Then Stefano went for the priest, while Nunziata, with the help of Joseph and Martin, prepared everything necessary for the solemn ceremony.

The unhappy, dejected, and disheartened father stood mute and motionless at the foot of the bed, while his wife, with maternal care, arranged the snow-white pillows and warm bed-clothes around the wasted frame of her poor child. That heroic mother, who seemed for an instant ready to succumb to the dread and anguish of this approaching separation, had now recovered all her courage, calmness, and firmness. The irrevocable decree which the physician had pronounced, and which, to all appearance, should have broken her heart, seemed on the contrary to have inspired her with supernatural tranquility and divine strength. She had knelt for a moment before the crucifix, imploring the calmness and courage necessary at this trying moment; she had then seen her portrait, placed by her son's hands at the foot of the cross, and recalled that other Mother of Sorrows who in the midst of her dreadful agony contemplated her Son suffering and dying for the salvation of men. Thus, in her profound grief, but calm and resigned, she had united her sacrifice to the bloody sacrifice of Calvary.

"Mother," said Victor, in a scarcely audible voice, when she bent over him to press her lips to his forehead, "mother, are you satisfied now with all the Lord has willed and done?"

"O my dear child," she replied, "why shouldn't I be satisfied, seeing you so happy, so resigned, so calm!"

"Mother," said he again, "do you believe we'll be heard at last? You know well what I mean——"

"Let us hope," she replied. "Let us always pray and hope."

"O mother, how happy I'd be to die if that cherished hope were at last realised!"

At that moment the priest entered, and, as he crossed the threshold, said: "Peace be to this house!"

"And to all those who inhabit it?" responded the acolyte clad in a white tunic.

All those present then quitted the room, leaving the young invalid to confess his sins to the servant of God, and, a few minutes after, the pure and innocent soul beamed calmer and purer still, thanks to the benediction of the minister of the Lord.

The priest then re-opened the door, and Victor's friends, silent and deeply moved, came to kneel by the bed. The unhappy father, fainting and almost beside himself, had dropped on his knees in the darkest corner of the room. Not a tear came to refresh his dry eyes and burning cheeks, although he would have given all the world to be able to cry. Victor's mother had resumed her place at the head of the bed.

After a short pause the priest began to recite the touching prayers of the Church. Meanwhile, Nunziata had spread over the invalid's bed a fine damask cloth of dazzling whiteness, and while the acolyte recited the Confiteor, the priest prepared to administer to the young martyr the Holy Viaticum—the bread of angels, the bread of the strong, the divine nourishment. The young man's eyes suddenly beamed with joy, happiness, and ecstasy when the priest presented to his gaze the divine Lamb of God, the holy Host, sacred pledge of our redemption.

All was over. The Divine Heart of Jesus reposed on the heart of His dying servant in that moment of indescribable ecstasy and happiness. Suddenly the young martyr's brow seemed illumined, as it were, with a dazzling aureole—one had said a reflection of the eternal beatitude crowning him one of the elect.

The priest then began to administer Extreme Unction, followed by the solemn Miserere, which, despite its profound sadness and heart-rending sorrow, exhales a perfume of confidence so sweet to the Christian soul.

The poor father, in his obscure corner, listened; and it seemed that each of those divine words fell like heavenly dew upon his long-hardened heart, until at last he found solace in a torrent of tears. At the moment the priest uttered the words:—"A sacrifice to God is an afflicted spirit; a contrite and humble heart, O God, Thou never wilt despise,"—it seemed that a ray from heaven scattered a cloud that had long been before the old man's eyes. The priest continued to pray; but the repentant sinner heard no more, and seemed to be no longer conscious of what was going on around him. He had buried his face in his hands, and big burning tears trickled through his fingers.

Long, very long, he remained given up to this solemn meditation, plunged in a profound contemplation, motionless and distracted. The priest had already left, carrying with him the Holy of Holies, and followed by his acolyte, when the old man, radiant, and, as it were, transfigured, suddenly raised his head, and fixed a wandering, dazed look on the bed of suffering. Then he stood up, took a few steps forward, and fell into the arms of his son, whom, in his joy, he covered with tears and kisses.

"O Victor, dear Victor, it's all over," he sobbed. "It's all over; you have conquered. I believe, my God; I believe as my beloved Victor."

Another cry—a cry of victory and happiness—responded like a triumphant echo to this joyful exclamation, and Victor's mother, intoxicated with joy and surprise, mingled her tears of gratitude with the tears of her dying son and her converted spouse.

But Victor soon disengaged himself from his parent's arms. A truly heavenly joy irradiated his countenance. He gazed for a moment affectionately on the loved faces of that father whose blindness and errors he had so long deplored, and that noble mother who had so courageously shared his sacrifice; then raised his joyful eyes to heaven.

"And now, Lord," he cried, "Thou wilt let Thy servant die in peace, for his eyes have seen Thy salvation according to Thy holy word. I return Thee thanks, O God of Goodness, for Thy constant protection, Thy infinite mercy. O God, Thou hast heard my prayer, and accepted my sacrifice. For I can now reveal the mysteries of Thy goodness; I can henceforth loudly proclaim that before leaving my home and country I had offered Thee my life to obtain from Thee the most precious of Thy graces—the conversion of my beloved father. O mother, mother," he continued, turning towards the happy spouse, "did I not tell you that evening under the tunnel that the voice that called me was truly the voice of God? Oh! happy are we to have faithfully obeyed that voice! And thanks to you, my good Joseph," he continued, turning towards his cousin, "it was your generous devotion, your courageous resolution that inspired me with the thought of sacrificing myself to obtain the salvation, the happiness of my father!"

The unhappy Morren had no sooner heard these words, which revealed to him the secret of Victor's heroic resolution, than for the second time he felt suffocated by his tears, astounded and prostrated by the sublimity of that filial devotion which, in his culpable incredulity and blindness, he had not even suspected.

"O Victor, Victor, what love!" he cried through his tears. "Oh! woe to me—me, impious wretch, who dared, in my ignorance, to accuse you of ingratitude, to compare you to a serpent whom I had cherished in my breast, while at that very moment you were about to consummate this supreme sacrifice for me! Oh! dear child, noble child," he continued, falling on his knees by the bedside; "can I ever console myself for having so far doubted your love! Forgive, forgive me, my child, my dear Victor! Oh! can you still love your wretched father?"

"Enough, enough, dear father, your words rend my heart," interrupted Victor, deeply moved. "I assure you I have nothing to reproach you with, nothing to forgive you. Was not your whole conduct inspired by the sincere love you felt for your child? And—now that he is sincerely reconciled to God—you ask me if I can love that father whom I have always so tenderly loved, even in the midst of his errors? O father, O mother, come to my arms—to my heart, where the God of mercy and grace, in His infinite love, has descended—and let a loving kiss unite us three in peace with Him!"

Then, gently clasped in each other's arms, they forgot for a few moments the profound anguish of the approaching separation.

Suddenly, confused clamors arose outside, before the door of the house.

"Here's the Bambino of Ara Cœli," cried several voices.

In fact, at that moment, a large brown carriage, carefully closed, and with the doors veiled with long red hangings, might be seen advancing at the end of the street. It contained two religious of the Order of Friars Minor, one wearing a stole, while the other held in his hand a lighted taper.

This carriage was that of the Bambino of Ara Cœli, or miraculous image of the Infant Jesus, greatly venerated by the Romans, particularly at the approach of death. When the pious young man felt his strength decreasing and his end approaching, he had requested the priest who had come to administer the sacraments to him to procure him this favor. The carriage having stopped before Stefano's door, the two priests alighted and bore the holy image into the sick man's room. Then the young martyr's eyes were seen to beam joyfully at the approach of the good fathers and the image of the Saviour. He humbly bowed his head to receive the benediction so ardently desired, while a prayer of thanksgiving, as pure as it was fervent, arose from the bottom of his soul to the throne of the Eternal.

Another favor, too, was reserved for him—the Pontifical blessing sent by the Holy Father to his expiring son.

"O mother," murmured Victor in a broken voice, "mother, now I can die. . . . I am very, very happy. . . . But, my good mother, we must not—"

And here, as if destiny was hastening to bear witness to the truth of his words, a kind of convulsive hiccough, and dull, suffocating rattling suddenly smothered his voice. These fatal symptoms were soon accompanied with a painful oppression; every instant the rattling seemed to rise and increase in intensity and power. Suddenly, a dreadful fit of coughing tore at the invalid's chest, and that very instant, according to the doctor's fatal forecasting, a stream of blood issued from his mouth.

At this sight the unhappy father uttered a terrible cry, and rushed forward as if he would have protected and defended against the approaches of death that tenderly-loved son whom his calmer and more courageous wife heroically sustained in her arms, gently pressing his drooping head to her breast.

Night had come, and Nunziata rose and lit the lamp, while the profoundest silence reigned throughout that chamber of mourning.

The hemorrhage seemed to have brought momentary relief to the poor young invalid, who lay upon his bed, pale and weak, but calm; his cheeks sunken, his features drawn, his lips livid, big drops of cold perspiration trickling every instant over his brow, while the counterpane moved every time his chest rose with his broken breath.

It was about midnight; Joseph and Martin, Nunziata and Stefano, began to pray, next the table at the end of the room. The weeping parents had not quitted their place at the bedside. A priest who had come to attend the invalid in his last moments was silently turning over the pages of his Breviary. The unhappy father, overwhelmed with grief, felt all his courage vanishing at the approach of the terrible and inevitable separation; but the mother, courageous like a true Christian mother, seemed, in the moment of trial, to have recovered all her calmness and firmness. She knew that the Lord willed that she should give up her son to Him, and in her admirable submission, in her heroic constancy, she had succeeded in subduing all sentiment, all natural weakness, in order the more easily to resign herself to the accomplishment of God's adorable will.

The young man had moved on his bed of pain.

"Are you suffering much, my child?" she asked.

"Yes, mother, much, God be praised for it," he replied with great calmness. And then, after a short pause: "Do you think, mother, that I shall suffer much longer?"

"It will be as God shall wish," she responded.

"You are right," he replied. "I desire only the accomplishment of Thy divine will, O my God! Do with me as Thou wilt, and as long as Thou wilt." And he piously kissed the crucifix that his mother presented to his lips.

"What day will to-morrow be?" he asked after a moment.

"Saturday, my child."

"Oh! so much the better. I shall die on a day consecrated to my Immaculate Mother."

At these words the poor father burst into tears.

"Oh Victor, my child, what are you saying? You shall not die!" he cries. "It is impossible my son should die."

"Oh, dear father," interrupted Victor, "how can you be so afflicted and weep when I feel so happy? . . . Yes, what happiness, what inexpressible happiness!" he repeated after an instant's pause. "My God calls me to Himself and wishes to rejoice me with His Divine Presence!"

But still the old man wept bitterly and would not be consoled.

"O father," resumed Victor, in a caressing tone and with angelic tenderness. "Why do you abandon yourself to such bitter grief? . . . You love me, however, and desire my glory and happiness before anything."

His father had not the strength to reply immediately to those tender words.

"Father," he continued, "think our separation will be short. Yes, short, and, above all, happy, my dear father. . . . Cannot you console yourself in thinking that you have a son in heaven who died for the honor and glory of his God?"

The poor father raised his head a calm smile of resignation shone through his tears. He now understood the divine language of faith.

The dying man then stretched out his already icy hand to his companion in arms.

"My dear Joseph," he murmured, "thanks for love and affectionate care. Remember me to your good mother and sister. And you, my dear Martin, you who have so valiantly exposed your life to save mine, receive my thanks; don't forget your friend."

He then turned to Stefano.

"And you, generous friend," he continued in a voice still weaker and more tremulous, "you and your amiable sister who, in caring for me, have given me another home and another country, let me thank you a thousand times for your kindness and affection towards a poor stranger. . . . Farewell, friends; farewell, all. I'll not forget you in my heavenly country. . . . As to you, father," he continued, turning towards the priest, "remember me, I conjure you in your prayers at the altar of God."

"And you, my dear child," replied the old man, with affectionate gravity, "remember me when you are before His throne!"

Then there was a long silence, broken only by the stifled sobs and murmurs of the young man's friends.

The clock already marked the first hour of day, when the harsh, hollow death-rattle was again heard.

"Mother," murmured Victor, "The moment is now approaching—"

"Well—must we pray, my child?" she asked.

"Yes, mother, thanks."

She herself then began the prayers for the agonizing, and her maternal voice, which had ceased to tremble, was sweet and consoling to his dull ear.

Suddenly he was seen to shudder and tremble, and stretch out his arms towards his mother. A more violent rattling then tore at his throat, and a torrent of frothy blood issued from his mouth.

"Mother, I am dying," he murmured. "Life is going. . . I am dying—"

"My child," she replied with heroic firmness, "our God is good and great; may His holy will be done. We will recite the Te Deum for your deliverance, my son."

And that glorious and triumphant chant, the finest and sublimest victorious hymn of joy ever inspired, was breathed at that moment from the lips of that heroic mother by the death-bed of her beloved son.* And while the hymn of thanksgiving arose to heaven, the priest's hand was extended to give the last benediction to the soul about to begin its journey.

"O mother, father," murmured Victor, with a last glance and a last smile, "we will meet again in the glory and peace of the Lord. . . My Saviour, I love Thee! . . . O my God, Jesus, and Mary!"

And the soul had received the kiss of peace from the lips of the body, while the body, stretched motionless and lifeless, now reposed in the shadow of death.

But the martyr was already crowned; the peace and brightness of heaven caressed his pure and tranquil brow, his noble smiling countenance, with their divine rays.

Next morning the converted philosophe and his afflicted wife alighted from a carriage at the gate of the Vatican.

Victor's father desired, first of all, to pour his grief into the bosom of the noble Pontiff. When he was admitted to the presence of the Holy Father, he immediately threw himself at his feet, which he bedewed with tears.

"O Holy Father," he murmured in the midst of his tears, when the Pontiff, profoundly moved, gave him his hand to kiss, "our child has kept his word: he has sacrificed himself; he has died for his two fathers!"

CHAPTER XVIII.

CONCLUSION.

The young martyr's parents, who now occupy their country house at Schrambeck all the year round, still suffer from the deep cruel wound the premature death of their beloved son inflicted on their hearts; but time is gradually softening the anguish of that sorrow, which they bear like Christians.

At the foot of that bed of death, where he saw his son smile upon him and sleep in peace, the philosophe bade adieu to all the vain errors of his proud reason. Before quitting Rome, he was solemnly reconciled to God, and the tears he shed over his son's tomb were the humble, fervent, patient, sincere tears of a Christian. He is now the friend of the venerable pastor of Schrambeck, and the members of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul have elected him president of their confraternity. Along with his amiable wife, he has become the support, consolation, and visible Providence of all who suffer and mourn. The dwelling of the libre-penseur of former days has become the refuge where the sick and indigent seek health, consolation and hope; and the prayer of gratitude daily ascends to God from more than one grateful heart, invoking His benediction on that justly-revered roof.

Joseph and Martin, on their return to Schambeck, were received with lively demonstrations of joy and sincere respect. Since then Joseph has married; he had the happiness to find an amiable and charming wife, who united her efforts to those of her husband and his pretty sister Mary to make Madame Van Dael's old age as calm and happy as a fine summer evening. Indeed, the good lady seems to grow younger every day,—she is so proud, happy, and contented to see a charming little boy, whom she is accustomed to call Joseph—although in memory of his grandfather he bears the name of Henry—playing about her.

* This is an historical fact.

As to the good and brave Martin, he had the misfortune to lose his mother, old Teresa, a few months after his return. On her death-bed the pious mendicant, having made him draw near, addressed to him these words:

"My dear child, I am satisfied with you: you have done your duty. You have saved our good Joseph's life, and if Victor Morren is dead, it is not your fault. But I have another advice to give you now. As soon as you will have laid me in the ground, take care and go to Rome. When you went there first, it was not so much to serve the Pope as to pay your old mother's debt of gratitude; this time you will go simply for love of our good Father, the glorious Pius IX. I hope you will know how to find your way without anybody's help."

Martin made it his duty to obey these last instructions. After having prayed over his mother's grave, he hastened to return to Italy, where he resumed his place in the ranks of the Zocaves.

His first care, on arriving in Rome, was to visit his friend Stefano, who now alone occupies the house in the Trastevere. The good and amiable Nunziata, whose sincere piety, after Victor's death, became still more fervent, has separated herself forever from that world which had filled her youth with so many trials and sorrows, and consecrated herself to God in the silence and solitude of the cloister, where she soon became a model to her pious sisters, thanks to the tender charity, humility, and devotion which characterise her whole conduct, and where every day she never ceases to join, to the offering of her virtues, that of her prayers, to obtain from God the soul's rest and heavenly beatitude for the unfortunate brother to whose salvation she had devoted her efforts, her vows, and her life.

These few words suffice to tell my readers all they wish to know, and I have now reached the end of this story, which, in all its developments and details, has been to me a labor of predilection and love.

Our age, indeed, is an age of selfishness and cowardice, of corruption and error; but, nevertheless, pearls of innocence, honor, and virtue, by God's grace, are seen glittering here and there over the surface of this marsh, in the midst of that mud. And I have sought—according to the measure of my modest capacity—to draw from its obscurity, and fashion and polish, one of those priceless pearls, that it might shine, in all its splendor, before the eyes of the world.

Other pens more capable, other voices more eloquent have, I know, likewise celebrated this devotion and these virtues. But what matter? Although my name be obscure, although my voice be feeble, my lips shall never cease to proclaim your praises, to celebrate your glory, generous and valiant champions of justice, champions of faith, champions of the God of truth!

When impious conquerors strove to erase from the pages of history the sacred principles of religion and right, you replied to that challenge by arming for the holiest cause on earth. When rash enemies combined to shake the foundations of faith, you raised like a rampart of steel around the See of Peter your brows, your arms and your breasts. When vile enemies dared to declare war against the omnipotent God, you shed your generous blood and gathered the martyrs' palms. May eternal glory be given you, victims and heroes in peace and in war! The olive and laurel branches unite to form the diadem where-with you are crowned.

MARIE.

MY friend Valentine was sitting with me one day, and we were speaking of a man loaded with benefits, who that very morning had been arraigning the justice and mercy of God. These murmurs of the prosperous always raise strong indignation in my heart. On recalling the conversation some hours after it had passed, I could not help censuring it in a manner which might be thought excessive. My friend remarked it, smiling as if he were wiser than I was, although he was my junior by four or five years; and his naturally good temper checked me, when he feared that I was becoming too bitter.

"Like you," he said, "I cannot see, without some irritation a man make an imaginary misfortune a ground for bringing an accusation against God. But because of this feeling, I think, that when we are removed from the society of those that do so, it is best not to recall their melancholy words, but to endeavor to think of actions precisely the reverse. Both you and I detest from our hearts the sin of ingratitude towards either God or man; well, let us seek an example of the contrary virtue, and that will profit both of us much more than condemning the vice. For my part, I have a story all ready. Now, stir up the fire, and I will begin.

"You have not forgotten when we first became acquainted. It was at your native town, where I happened to be residing for a few months, studying medicine with a good doctor there. Having been brought up entirely in the country by my grandfather, I was somewhat shy and reserved, and did not seek to make any acquaintance. My chief pleasures were rambles in the neighborhood, and on the sea-shore; and I have often passed hours lying on the grass, or sitting on the rocks, but always with a favorite book in my hand. My walks had seldom any particular object in view; and so it happened, that one day I found myself in a narrow valley watered by a bright stream, with one side bordered by fields, and the other by a little wood of oaks and hazels. The stream, at this point, parted in two, leaving a little island not more than four or five yards across, and a sudden fall in the ground produced the prettiest cascades imaginable, the water dancing and sparkling over the moss-covered pebbles, until, in a shower like fine rain, it reached a pool below, whence it quietly continued its course. It required no effort to spring from the meadow to the little island, as the stream just there was very narrow; and I can hardly explain to you the pleasure I had in taking possession of my newly discovered domain. I threw myself at the foot of a tree which proudly raised its head from amidst the bushes with which the islet was covered, and for an hour lay there doing absolutely nothing; the murmuring of the water and the sensation of perfect repose, threw me into a half-dreaming state, most pleasant to experience, yet difficult to describe.

"I was roused at last by a slight noise, and looking through the bushes, I saw a little girl clinging to the back of a large Newfoundland dog, who was bringing her to my island. The child's head rested on the animal's back, and her fair curls mingled with the rough coat of her robust companion. They got safely to shore without perceiving me. However, when I arose and approached the little girl, who was sitting on a bank of convolvulus, her faithful guardian gave a low growl, which sufficiently intimated his suspicion of my intentions. The child, too, though she endeavored to smile, was evidently not very well satisfied with my appearance, and pale as she was when I first saw her, she blushed rosy red as she tried to cover her poor little bare feet with her wet frock. I thought at first it was fear of me that prevented her rising, as she still remained in the same attitude, leaning on her elbow, half hidden by the tall grass.

"Go and fetch them, Neptune," she said, pointing to the other side of the stream.

"Before obeying, Neptune fixed his large, anxious eyes on my face, and then came to lick my hand, as if he intended to into the water, and returned in a few seconds, carrying in his mouth a pair of little crutches.

"The child was paralytic.

"Nothing inspires one with deeper pity than the sight of these great human afflictions in the young. In old age we expect to see the limbs refusing to bear their weight, to see the eyes dim, if not quite dead to the light of the sun—those privations loosen the attachment of the soul to the earth, which she must soon leave—but to see these infirmities in one whose life is only just opening, is very melancholy; and I needed nothing more to induce me to address the child with pity and compassion in my voice. She could not mistake my feelings, and having raised herself from the ground, with the help of her hands clasping Neptune, she allowed me to take her to the shade of the tree under which I had been so long resting.

"I wished to know what brought her to the little island. She told me that while her grandmother was seeking mushrooms in the meadow for the market, she, on her part, assisted to fill the basket by gathering watercresses and crocuses, which met with a ready sale. This occupation would have been dangerous for the infirm child, had it not been for the vigilant assistance of the dog, who seated himself gravely close to her on the edge of the stream, and was always ready to seize her dress in case of an accident. Besides, the water was very shallow. The child surprised me by saying she was nine years old; she did not look more than six, she was so small and thin. Her face alone showed vigor, and notwithstanding the paleness, it was full of intelligence.

"A child's confidence is quickly gained. It was sufficient for me to caress Neptune and to reach a remarkably fine bunch of watercresses, which being in a deeper part of the stream, she could not otherwise have obtained, to hear the history of all her family.

"'Grandmother is named Lemaire,' Marie said to me, 'and we both live on what she can earn by a little washing, and by selling the mushrooms and cresses we get here and in some other fields. I hardly remember father. I know that he was coming home from a voyage, very happy, because he knew that he should find a little baby,—for mother had written to tell him so. Mother went up the cliff to the lighthouse, to see his ship enter the harbor. There she met a foolish woman, who asked her what ship she was looking for. My mother told her, 'Oh! do you not know that ship was wrecked just round the point, and every soul on board was lost?' A ship in full sail was just coming in, which mother, while going up the cliff, had taken for the one she was expecting (which it really was), but now she thought so no longer. She came down the hill, and when she got home lay down on the bed. Grandmother said, 'Take courage, because of the child our good God is going to give you;' but she would not listen to her, and turned her face to the wall, that she might see nobody. She was lying so, very ill, and the doctor with her, when she heard father's step in the passage.

"'Two days after mother died, kissing me—for, do you know, I was the baby she had promised father he should see. He went to sea again, and I have seen him two or three times between his voyages; but I only remember one thing about him, and that was how he cried when he found I was paralyzed. Grandmother used to say to me, 'Do this to please father,' or 'Learn that, because father will be glad when he comes home;' but one day she put on me a black frock, and told me that father was gone to heaven where mother was. I was very sorry; and grandmother asked the neighbors to let their children come in to play with me. These children jumped and danced, and rsed about as much as they liked; and when they found that I could not do the same, they used to beat me and call me sulky. The children have become much kinder now they are older, but they teased me so much, I asked grandmother not to let them come to our cottage, for I liked much better to listen to her stories, and to play alone with Neptune. He was only a puppy then; and father had brought him from a long way off on purpose for me.'

"These are almost the exact words in which Marie told her story; and as her eyes sparkled with the precocious intelligence so often displayed in sickly children, I was thinking on the unhappy lot which Providence appears to have assigned to some amongst us. Marie had continued making up her nose-gays while she was talking; and as her grandmother had now advanced to the opposite side of the stream, she threw over to her the fruits of her industry. She then prepared to regain the field on Neptune's back; but I raised her in my arms, and springing across, deposited her safely by her grandmother's side, who could not find words to thank me sufficiently for what she was pleased to call such condescension.

"After exchanging some friendly words, the old woman yoked the dog to a little chaise, into which she lifted the child, and then heaped around her the spoils they had collected. Flowers—yellow, lilac, and pink—formed a kind of frame for the child's sweet pale face, which I followed with my eyes until they had reached the gate which led into the road, when, turning the angle, they disappeared, Marie to the last waving her little hands in sign of adieu.

"In my childhood I had been taught to love visiting the poor, and now that by necessity I was separated from my dearest friends, I eagerly seized this opportunity which seemed to be presented to me, of putting in practice the lessons I had so early received. This old woman, with her wrinkled face and back bent with labor, but still supporting herself and her afflicted grandchild by her honest industry, was precisely one of the class which had been pointed out to me as eminently deserving of the respect and help of those above them in worldly station. I am sure that it is a most happy circumstance for a young man, living alone as I was, to find two or three poor families on whom he can bestow a little money, a little time, a little friendship; if he chooses, he can draw down abundant blessings on himself through such intercourse.

"Mrs. Lemaire dwelt in a very small cottage, much out of repair, close to the convent of the Sisters of Charity. I generally went to see her when Marie had returned from the school which the good nuns had the charge of. I often amused myself with hearing her repeat the lessons, and was astonished at the aptitude she displayed for learning, and especially for religious instruction. The faith of this dear child was so lively, that the Gospel histories, which she could repeat by heart, were often finished by a burst of tears she could not repress. We were reading together what we are told of our Lord receiving little children:—

"'Oh! if I had been there,' said Marie, 'Neptune would have managed to get through the crowd with me, and so I should have been able to touch the hand of my Saviour with my lips. What do you think He would have done when He saw my little crutches? Do you not think that He would have cured me directly?'

"The idea, almost the hope of a miraculous cure, frequently returned to her. However, her infirmities never impaired her bright happy disposition. These very misfortunes procured for her certain little privileges which at once flattered her innocent self-love, and filled her little heart with gratitude. One winter's day I met her coming from school, surrounded by the other children, who were all engaged in a friendly contest as to who should be the closest to her, and most completely protect her. Marie explained to me that there was a boys' school close by, and that the rude boys there amused themselves by pelting with snow-balls the little girls of the school. However, as if to prove the falseness of the saying of a certain writer, that childhood is an age without compassion, as soon as these unruly lads saw Marie pursuing her way with difficulty on the slippery road, a cry arose at once from amongst them, 'Let the lame girl pass! No pelting until she has passed!' Marie thanked the boys with a smile and inclination of her head; and her grandmother, on hearing the story, experienced a kind of pride in the misfortune of the child, which had checked even these rough boys in the midst of their amusement, and called forth for the moment their better dispositions.

"I fancy I can still see Mrs. Lemaire's room. A large bed at the end, a little crib between the fire-place and the window; in one of the corners an old chest, in the other a cuckoo clock. On the table in the window was an earthen dish with rose-leaves in it, which the good woman had placed in the sun to dry. Three chairs of the humblest description were near the fire-place, and over it, on the shelf, was an image of our Lady in plaster, who, all through the summer, held a bunch of wild flowers in her hand. There was one picture on the wall—the Flight into Egypt. Marie had an immense admiration for this picture; and she also cultivated a great intimacy with the cuckoo, who clapped his wings and cried cuckoo as each hour came round. You must excuse these minute details; but the recollection of this humble market-woman and her grandchild, who loved me well, and whose example was most salutary to me, is a bright spot in my heart. For two years I never passed a week without at least once taking a seat at their friendly hearth; they imagining themselves my debtors for the trifling assistance I afforded them, while, in reality, I owed them much which I could never repay. The old woman frequently expressed her astonishment that I found time to visit them, when what she considered the best society of the town was open to me. I endeavored to change her opinion, by pointing to her, in its true colors, the ordinary intercourse of the world.

“True friendship,” I said to her, “may be found in all ranks; but these very fine ladies and gentlemen, who profess so much, if they heard I were ill and dying, would send their compliments and enquiries to me, and go to a ball in the evening as cheerfully as ever; while you, I knew, would watch over me like a mother, and Marie would hobble to the church, and spend the last penny in the house for a candle to burn for me before the altar of our Lady, Help of Christians.”

“Mrs. Lemaire listened attentively to what I said, and the child, fixing her large eyes on me, thanked me by a look, which expressed much more than words could do. Neptune, too, licked my hand, as if he wished to assure me that he joined in the affectionate regard of the cottage.

“Some people say that anxiety for the necessaries of life dries up the hearts of the poor; but I have seen many times proofs of the contrary; and I affirm that a thirst for pleasure and luxury has made more selfish beings than all the poverty in the world. I must tell you of their charity to those poorer than themselves. This old woman, who was obliged, when she returned from the fields or the market in a heavy rain, to wear still her wet clothes on her limbs, stiffened with rheumatism, for want of others,—this woman, I say, in the midst of her indigence, found a thousand opportunities of doing good. Much of the produce of the fields, which she gathered with so much labor, found its way to the sick of the neighborhood. She was famous for her skill in preparing those infusions of herbs which country people still have so much faith in; and many a night she passed by a sick bed, when the patient was too poor to engage a hired nurse. Other and higher assistance she was also well able to afford, for, she herself a model of patience, submission, and confidence in God, was listened to with gratitude and hope by many a poor sufferer in need of learning to practise these virtues.

“I have now arrived at the period when the event occurred which is the point of my story.

“Marie was now eleven years old. For some months she had been under instruction, and now, in a week, she was to make her First Communion. I was on my way to call at the cottage, but passing the church, I went in. At a side altar, on which was the image of our Lady, I saw the child kneeling, quite absorbed in her prayers. A ray of sun shone full on her face, and I was so struck with the expression of ardent faith and the sweetest tenderness of devotion, that I could not help speaking of it to the old woman. Often I have given her a trifle of money to assist her in preparing some little signs of festivity on the great day of Marie’s First Communion. She became pensive, and with some hesitation, said:

“I promised to say nothing about it; but I must tell you, to whom I tell everything. Marie began yesterday a Novena to our Lady, Help of Christians, to obtain through her a miracle; the poor child is persuaded that she will be able to walk without crutches on the day of her First Communion!”

“This declaration, made in a broken voice, silenced me for a moment.

“The old woman sighed, called in Neptune, who was sleeping in the sun outside, shut the cottage door, and then, taking up her knitting, she went on with her story with more composure.

“Marie has been so enjoying the idea of your surprise, for I have not been able to persuade her that it is possible our good God may not see fit to grant her what she asks. This morning she begged me not to tell you anything about it until after her cure. Poor darling; yesterday, in play, she put the end of one of her crutches into the fire. I called out to her to take care lest it should be burnt. She said, ‘In a week I shall want it no more, but run about like other children.’

“Mrs. Lemaire turned her head away, and taking off her spectacles, wiped them. ‘I must get some new ones,’ she said; ‘I am growing old, and my sight is dim.’ Her sight, indeed, was dim, but it was with tears.

“‘We have all heard of many miraculous cures,’ I replied, with some hesitation. ‘How is it that Marie has not imparted to you some of her strong hopes, as it is from your pious example that she has learnt to indulge in them?’

“I can doubt neither the power nor the goodness of God,’ she answered. ‘I can only think of her own unworthiness, and, I fear, presumption, in asking for a miracle to be wrought in our favor; and I much fear that Marie, when no longer infirm, may lose her habits of devotion. In the midst of my toil I think of heaven, where I hope to go with my grandchild; and then all the troubles of this life appear as nothing compared with the glorious hope of the future. If I have lost my son and daughter, I know that I shall find them again; and this thought supported me to bear their departure. If you tell me that I am old, and Marie has not been well a single hour since she was born, and that we must bear with many privations, I only say, a little patience, and we shall both soon be in the world where there is neither pain nor want. My darling’s infirmity cost me at first bitter tears, but I have since discovered that this very infirmity drew her more closely to me, disposed her to more holy and Christian thoughts than we meet with in children free to do as they will with their young limbs; and I have often thought that, instead of wishing it otherwise, I ought rather to thank our good God for my paralysed child. In my mind, it is best for us poor blind creatures to pray to Him who sees and knows all—to do as He wills, not as we would wish.’

“She was here interrupted by the return of her grandchild. She entered joyfully, and seating herself on Neptune’s back, patted his great head. The dog rose gently, and carried her across the room, barking with delight. Marie threw to some distance one of the crutches, and then leaving her seat on Neptune, instead of supporting herself by the table and the wall, as she had always been forced to do, with the help of one crutch alone she succeeded in reaching the other, which by this time Neptune had got in his mouth. The grandmother made a gesture of astonishment. Marie then seated herself by the fire, without making any remark upon her having, for the first time in her life, walked with only one crutch. Before leaving, I pressed Mrs. Lemaire’s hands between mine.

“‘I will return to-morrow,’ I said, ‘and every day until the first Communion is made.’

“My heart beat so quick! I cannot describe to you the emotion I felt.

“The next day, and the next, the same scene took place, and I could no longer contain myself.

“‘Dear Marie,’ said I, ‘I know all! Let us try if you cannot walk down the street with one crutch. I will be close at hand, in case you should need assistance.’

“‘I will go to the church,’ said the child, with extraordinary firmness. ‘To-morrow I shall not want even one crutch.’

“‘We shall see,’ said the grandmother, pale with anxiety; and I echoed her words—‘We shall see! we shall see!’

"The trial then began. Marie went on in front, and I followed with the grandmother. I do not know whether those we met were surprised to see me walking with the poor old woman, but their looks troubled me little—I was too deeply interested to regard them. I saw nothing but the child walking before us, and every now and then turning her head, with a triumphant smile on her lips. We reached the church in safety, and all went to kneel at the altar of our Lady, Help of Christians. How earnestly I prayed!

"The grandmother, with her forehead on the pavement, was sobbing bitterly.

"The long looked for day was the next. The ceremony was to take place in the parish church, which was much farther off than the church of the convent which Mrs. Lemaire and Marie generally frequented; but notwithstanding the greater distance she had to walk, all happened as the child had predicted. She had no other support but her grandmother's arm, either in going or returning. The neighbors, from their windows, watched her with friendly interest and the most lively expressions of sympathy and pleasure. Neptune alone appeared anxious and uneasy at seeing his little mistress depart without the supports he believed essential to her. He seized the edge of Mrs. Lemaire's best gown, and endeavored to drag her back to the cottage, and making a hundred circles round Marie, seemed to try to remind her of what she had forgotten. Finally, the prudent Neptune was obliged to be locked up. As for me, I scarcely knew what I did for joy; and so great was my confidence, that the evening before I had written home a long account of the events of the last few days, of which I had been a witness.

"The child returned, after hearing a Mass of thanksgiving, so much fatigued, that she went to bed. A good night took away all feeling of weariness; but when she set off for school the next morning, she found it impossible to advance, even a few yards, without the help of one crutch at least. For three days this assistance was sufficient, and she then became weaker, and in much the same state as she had always been, until the last fortnight, and the other crutch was resumed. Marie wept almost without ceasing; her grandmother was not less afflicted; but her chief trouble was her fear lest the child's faith and confidence should be shaken by this sad termination to her hopes.

"I had just received an appointment as surgeon on board a vessel, and I was preparing for my first voyage, which was expected to last fourteen months. Mrs. Lemaire acknowledged to me that she could not speak to Marie upon her feelings, the state of which she so much desired to know; and, yielding to her importunities, I promised to try to fathom the depths of the child's innocent heart. This commission was most distressing to me. I have seen men who thought themselves the wisest of moralists, models of firmness and courage, because they bore with exemplary fortitude the misfortunes of their neighbors, so long as they suffered not by them; but this is not my nature, and I cannot help participating largely in the griefs of those I know and love. It was, then, with much pain, after giving the child a pretty agate rosary my sister had sent her, that I seated myself opposite to her by the fire. One of her little crutches was under her arm, and the other lying at her feet; and as I cast my eyes on it, they filled with tears.

"Not knowing how better to begin, I plunged at once into the subject.

"Marie," said I, "have you prayed to our Lady, Help of Christians, since your Mass of thanksgiving?"

"The child rested her head on her knees, and her sobs for some time prevented her from answering. I could not restrain my own tears, and they fell fast on her thin little hand, which I held in mine. Poor Marie saw my grief, and recovered herself sooner than I could.

"To-day I have wept for the last time; for I will not again grieve my dear grandmother nor you."

"The way not to grieve us," I replied, "is to pray constantly to our Blessed Lady with great fervor and confidence, and never to murmur against God's holy will."

"I was going on, but stopped short before the earnest look of the paralysed child.

"I murmur!" she cried. "I pray with less confidence! Oh no! never will I act thus, though I have committed a great fault."

"The child cast down her eyes, and a bright blush came over her sweet face, as I gently interrogated her.

"Before my cure," said she, "and while I was praying to the Holy Virgin to help me, I felt my heart all on fire. I was cured! Well, and then I returned thanks to her at the altar in the convent chapel. I was much distressed, and could not pray as I used to. Even while kneeling before her image, I was thinking, not of the goodness God had shown to me, but of going to the little island where I first saw you without the help of Neptune; and then I fancied myself in the little playground at school, running with the other girls, and playing at battle dore, instead of sitting alone in a corner. I was so happy that I forgot to be grateful. But our good God saw all. He knew that I should not give Him my heart if I recovered, so He sent back my infirmity, that I might be wholly His."

"I have preserved the exact sense of this explanation, so admirable in its Christian humility; but I regret that I cannot give it to you in Marie's own simple words. Was she right in her conjecture? We read in the Gospel, that of the ten lepers cleansed, nine departed without one word of gratitude and thanksgiving for the great benefit they had just received; but we are not told that the disease fell again on these men, in punishment for their neglect. Mrs. Lemaire had charged me to reprimand, if necessary, the dear, infirm child; and I, instead, had received from her a lesson of confidence and filial submission to our Lord's will, which I hope never to forget. When I told the grandmother of what had passed, she seemed relieved of a great burthen. For this old woman no misfortune was without its consolations, so full was her heart with the idea of the eternal justice of God.

"I was obliged next day to sail; and as I knew no one to correspond with in the town, a year passed without my hearing any news of my two friends. The recollection of their poor dwelling, and of the little island, came to me, however, as often as that of my old home, where my grandfather and sister were expecting me. When I purchased, at the ports we stopped at, little articles of the manufacture of different countries, I never forgot to set something aside for Marie; and I already fancied I heard her expressions of pleasure and gratitude, while the ship was entering the harbor, and I saw the familiar lighthouse on the cliff, at the foot of which stood the convent chapel and Mrs. Lemaire's cottage.

"I waited until evening before visiting them, for I had quite a large package of presents to carry. On drawing near, I saw a light in the well-known window, and I hastened on, full of pleasure and expectation. A dog was scratching at the closed door and howling; and I was astonished to find that poor Neptune was shut out and neglected. A sudden fear came over me; when the dog recognized me, and changed his howling into a low moan, like the sobbings of a child. I opened the door, and he crept in with me. Nobody was there but two aged women: one was sitting by the bed, reading with difficulty a chapter of the Imitation to her dying friend.

"Mrs. Lemaire raised herself at the sound of my voice, and fixed on me a look full of affection.

"Marie is gone first," said she—"a few days ago; in nursing her I took her sickness, and before to-morrow night I shall have rejoined my darling. If our child had been cured by a miracle, as we once thought she was,—if she were still living, what anxiety it would give me to have to leave her exposed to all the snares and perils of the world. Old as I was, I could not have expected to be able to protect her long. But what does our dear Lord do? Instead of granting us a grace full of danger, He calls the child to Himself, to crown her with His benefits, and to keep her safe with Himself forever. He even shortens her separation from me, whom she loved so well. Last night she came to summon me hence, and I felt her little hand pass across my forehead. There seemed to be a ray of sunshine all around me, and a sweet odor filled the poor room."

"The neighbor who was watching by Mrs. Lemaire's bedside, and who had stopped in her reading on my entrance, now beckoned me mysteriously to the hearth.

"It will be to-night," said she. "The death-watch is in the chimney; do you not hear it sound?"

"I hesitated, and heard distinctly the voice of a small bird, who at regular intervals uttered a little cry, very melancholy and sweet.

"You think it is the death-watch," said she; "but to me it is my darling's voice, telling me of the goodness and glory of God, and begging me to stay no longer here. Oh! it is indeed no bird—it is Marie. You know how often I used to call her my little dove!"

"There was nothing dreary or painful about this death-bed: all that we saw was a tranquil farewell to the troubles of this earth, and a foretaste of celestial joys, and a song of thanksgiving for trials patiently endured, and for promised happiness. Mrs. Lemaire died the following morning, just at dawn. I followed her coffin to the cemetery, amid a crowd of poor neighbors, whom she had so often succored, and who formed a deeply afflicted yet orderly little procession.

"I have now finished my story of Marie and her grandmother; and I can assure you when, unhappily, I sometimes hear men declaim against Providence, I always recollect, that a poor old market woman and her paralytic grandchild found no grounds for crying out against the judgments and mercy of God. In my hours of weariness and discouragement,—for all professions are liable to these occasionally,—the example of this old woman and child is most precious to me. If a temptation seems difficult to overcome, or if I have to deplore a fall, I repeat to myself the words of Marie, when she had given up all hope of a cure; and before inurmuring against Heaven, let all examine themselves well, to see what their gratitude has been for acknowledged graces."

Valentine having finished his story, I said:—

"However true your story may be, it will find many incredulous, that such virtue and elevating thoughts have been found in the poor cottage, and from the lips of its poverty-stricken inhabitants. However, will you allow me to write down for my friends the history of Mrs. Lemaire and her grandchild?"

"You may write for generous souls, for sincere Christians," said Valentine, "who are to be found in all ranks of society; for those who remember that the Mother of God could not afford a lamb for the ransom of her Divine Son, that the Apostles were laborers and fishermen, and that many a saint has been engaged in hard work to earn his daily bread. What says the sacred Scriptures, in the eleventh chapter of Ecclesiasticus: 'The wisdom of the humble shall exalt his head, and shall make him sit in the midst of great men. Praise not a man for his beauty; neither despise a man for his look. The bee is small among flying things: but her fruit hath the chiefest sweetness.'"

The Story of a Pair of Boots.

AN alms given with discretion is like a bill of exchange drawn upon heaven, and which is never protested. It is often, indeed, paid before the time, and usually with large interest. The hero of the present story will furnish us with an example.

There was once, in the year 1848, in the military hospital of a large town, which some reasons prevent my naming, a soldier called François, belonging to the — (the same reasons oblige me to be silent as to the number of the artillery regiment which was then garrisoned in that town). François, a native of a little village of Alsace, in the department of the Bas-Rhin, was lying sick in the hospital. The doctor who attended him maintained that the extreme pleasure he felt at the idea of returning to his village (for François had obtained his dismissal) was the cause of the serious attack with which he had been seized. Excess in anything is a fault. Be that as it may, François was as good a Christian as he was a brave soldier. During the seven years he had passed in his regiment he had never been seriously reprimanded but once; and that was for having given a sabre thrust to one of his comrades for speaking irreverently of sacred things. As for himself, he had long thought this blow, given in so good a cause, acceptable to God.

The evening before his departure, when François, now almost convalescent, was preparing to quit the hospital and return home, he perceived in one of the long corridors a stranger—a tall, robust young man, who, from fatigue in travelling, had been obliged to remain some days in the hospital. This stranger, named Thomassin, also intended leaving on the morrow, and his departure was at that moment the subject of conversation with the chaplain.

"Monsieur l'Abbé," said he to the priest, "I have recovered my health in this house; complete the work of mercy by giving me a pair of shoes, for the rough roads have worn mine out. These shoes, which you may be good enough to give or obtain for me, will, perhaps, conduct me on the road to fortune."

"I will willingly give you those that I wore in the confessional in the winter, to keep me from the cold," answered the abbé; "but they will not go on your feet; you are bigger than I am. But I will see—I will fetch them."

"Do not go, Monsieur l'Abbé!" cried François, approaching the speakers; "I have found what you want."

"Where?"

"In my bag."

"But do not you need them yourself?"

"I only want one pair, and I have two. It is true, they are boots; and if Monsieur, whose foot seems about my size, will permit me to offer them, they are now at his service."

The traveller willingly accepted so kind an offer; and, giving his name to the generous soldier, he asked for his, and that of his country and his village, saying, "Who gives to the poor lends to God."

"Which our Heavenly Father will return a hundredfold," said the abbé.

Early on the morrow the stranger and François, each with their bags at their back, sticks in their hands, and in complete travelling costume, met accidentally in the chapel of the hospital. Both were good Christians; and both, on the point of commencing a long journey, wished to put themselves under the protection of Him whose powerful hand could preserve them from danger.

Whilst François—his heart joyous and his purse light—journeys on, singing one of the songs of his childhood, let us follow the young traveller who is sadly leaving his country to push his fortune among the gold mines of California. The joyous child of Languedoc, Thomassin, still young, had lost, with the last member of his family, the modest heritage his dying father had left him. Carefully taught, by the care of the old curé of his village, the first elements of a religious education, he had learnt later at school the art of drawing, by which he would be aided in gaining an honest livelihood. Thomassin might have been an artist, if he had not been dazzled by the golden dreams which pointed to California as a land of promise. Behold him, then, launched on the road of enterprise, sad withal, but strong in health, well clothed, and above all, well shod.

One of his countrymen, a friend of his childhood, was mate in a ship at Havre ready to sail for the Californian El Dorado, and in this he purposed to embark. From the town where he was to Havre, it was more than a hundred leagues; and a hundred leagues seemed a long way to the poor traveller, who, with slender purse, had no carriage but his legs at his disposal. Thomassin, nothing frightened by so great a distance, marched bravely on, eating one day the piece of bread economized from the last, and moistening it with water from a brook; receiving at night a hospitality paid for the next morning by a rude drawing representing the portrait or caricature, as it happened, of the landlady. Travelling in this manner for fifteen days, our courageous youth arrived at Havre the evening before the vessel sailed. His friend received him cordially, and soon installed him as assistant in the cook's department. On the morrow they set sail, favored by a fine breeze; and Thomassin, standing on deck, piously uncovered his head before the cross of Notre Dame de Grâce,—the modest chapel, so dear to the mariner, that crowns the wooded hills of Honfleur. His eyes full of tears, but his heart beating hopefully, he now addressed a last adieu to the shores of France.

II.

Let us pass over the incidents of a long voyage—the squalls, the tempests, the dangers, and the grumbling of the ship's cook at his assistant;—let us pass over all that, and introduce our voyagers to the harbor where they arrived in the early part of September, 1848. Thomassin, strong vigorous and gifted with great courage and energy, soon set to work, and his undertakings, blessed by God, whom he never ceased to invoke night and morning, were crowned with success. Prudent, economical, avoiding the seductions which smiled on his path, and renouncing those pleasures on which so many of his unhappy companions made shipwreck, he saw himself, at the end of fifteen months, the possessor of a considerable sum realized in gold. He was, in fact, a rich man.

Thomassin, after offering fervent thanks to Him who had blessed his labors, set out on his return to France. While he voyaged under the mild rays of the star propitious to mariners—the stella matutina—let us return to the other traveler, whom we left singing on the road to Alsace.

III.

Happier than his companion at the hospital, François, the artillery-man, had returned to his village, his old father, and his affectionate mother. But three days before his arrival the paternal house had been devoured by flames, and his family at that moment were completely ruined. This sad event mingled a few bitter tears with those he shed on embracing his old parents; but strong in adversity, with the strength that comes from above, he found at the bottom of his heart words of hope and consolation.

"Re-assure yourselves," said he to the members of his family who were assembled around him; "God will not abandon you. Let us fervently pray to Him, and our house will be raised from its ashes; the hail will spare our harvest, and the sun will fertilize our vines. You will see."

Meantime, God sent to console him one of those sweet angels—a young and pious girl, whom he had called in former days his little sister, but was now to call his wife.

The first care of Marianne—now Madame François—was to raise from its ruins, with the money of her marriage portion, the desolate house of her new parents; and as the hail spared the harvests, whilst the sun fertilized the vines, the family had hopes of being again well off. They had not, indeed, twenty crowns; but they had paid all their debts, and Madame François had just given her husband a charming little girl, as pretty as her mother. She was to be baptized on Saturday morning, and called Marie in honor of the god-mother, François' young sister, and Joséphine in honor of the godfather, an old comrade of the child's father—an excellent man, lately retired from service in a neighboring village.

The god-father was to come on Friday to pass the night at the parents' house to be introduced to his god-daughter, and to be all ready for the time of the christening. Eight o'clock had struck on the village clock, and the brigadier had not yet arrived. The night was dark; the north wind blew amongst the large trees of the neighboring forest; and at intervals rain, mixed with hail, dashed against the windows of the house, where the happy family waited with an impatience, now amounting to uneasiness, as the church clock struck nine. François could not keep quiet; he bent time with his fingers on the lattice panes. His wife, seated in a large arm-chair, whose yellow stuff probably dated as far back as the reign of good King Dagobert, was devoutly reading a book of prayers. The grandfather, an old grenadier, was in the corner cleaning his gun; the old grandmother, on her side, was washing the face of the child, and covering it with kisses, saying, "Poor little angel! how it resembles its father!" All new-born babes resemble their father—that every one knows. Marie, the young sister of François, was contemplating with emotion the colored portrait of a dragoon, in full uniform, framed in walnut-wood.

"Decidedly Simon will not come this evening," said François, suddenly breaking the silence which for some moments had reigned in the room where the family were assembled; "the rain increases, the roads are frightful, and the sky black as an ink bottle. Let us go to bed."

"Yes, but it will soon be ten."

"Let us wait till then."

At that instant a bright flash of lightning lit up the sky, and peals of thunder shook the house. The three women crossed themselves.

"Come, let us go to bed," repeated François, "it has struck ten—Simon will not come;" and, wishing his mother and father good-night, he was preparing to retire, when, all of a sudden, the gallop of a horse was heard in the distance.

"It is Simon's horse," said the old man, "I recognize his pace."

"More rapid than usual, because he is late."

The noise, approaching nearer and nearer, soon stopped at the door. François hastened to open it, and cried out, "It is not he!"

Instead of Simon, it was a tall stranger, wrapped in a large blue mantle, his face encased in a thick black beard, and his head covered with a glazed hat.

"It is not he; that is true," said the stranger; "but it is his representative. I am charged with this letter for you."

"In that case you are welcome," replied François. "Pray alight and enter the house."

While the old man conducted Simon's horse to the stable, François rapidly read the letter, which was as follows:

"MY GOOD OLD COMRADE:—Pardon me if important reasons, that you will soon know, prevent my naming your child, and as it is necessary to have a godfather for your daughter, I send another, also called Joseph, so that you will not have to change an iota of the names you agreed on. In this manner the little one and everybody will gain by it; I alone shall lose the pleasure I promised myself in accepting one title more to your friendship.

Adieu, my old friend,

Always yours,

SIMON."

"Marianne," cried François after attentively reading this note, "Offer Monsieur something to drink;—the best, you understand." Then approaching the stranger, he took him by the hand, saying, "Once more welcome, since you come on the part of my old fellow comrade; and pardon me if the hospitality we poor peasants have to offer is not worthy of you." "Make yourself easy," answered the stranger; "I am not of high birth like yourself; I am the son of a simple husbandman, whose name to-day I am as proud to bear as I shall be to-morrow to give mine to your beloved child."

At eleven o'clock, the representative of brigadier Simon, well dried externally, by a large wood fire which had been re-lit on the hearth, and warmed internally by the contents of an old bottle of wine, asked permission to retire.

"Do as if you were at home," said François; and exchanging a second shake of the hand he conducted him to the chamber prepared for his friend Simon.

IV.

On the morrow, the storm had completely ceased; the sky was magnificent; not a cloud was to be seen; the countenance of the stranger, reflecting the happiness which illumined that of his new friends, was also serene. All was joy in the little village of —; the church had the appearance of a fête; and the bell sent forth its joyous notes. The baptism took place at ten, and was immediately followed by a repast, which, to the friends of the family, is always indispensable. M. le Curé, seated in the place of honor, presided on the occasion with much gaiety; the scene was an animated one; the well stocked cellar was not spared; happiness in a village is never miserly; the heart, they say, is always in the hand. François, whose fine voice every Sunday at the chorister's desk made the school-master, who was director in chief of the music, envious, was asked for a song.

At first he begged to be excused, at last he said, "I will give you a little romance, that a comrade, who was ill from a fall, taught me in the hospital of —"; and in a loud voice he sang one of those beautiful chansons of M. de Ségur.

The stranger, being invited in his turn, excused himself, saying he had no voice. "However," added he, "as I ought to pay my reckoning I will relate, if you like, between the fruit and the cheese a true history." As soon as the dessert had been placed on a tablecloth of snowy whiteness, Simon's representative spoke as follows:—

"My story commences nearly two years and a half ago. A poor traveler coming from a distance, exhausted by fatigue, and emaciated by hunger, not having a sou in his pocket or a sole to his foot, was obliged to stop at the hospital of the town o ——. As he was young and healthy, some days rest soon set him up again. He wished to continue his journey; but during his illness his purse had not re-filled, nor his shoes been re-soled; the road that he had to travel was long. What should he do? Should he leave it all to God? Yes, that's what the poor traveler did, and the blessing of God came to his aid and sent him one fine morning a pair of new boots. A brave soldier who was about to quit the hospital at the same time, to return home, was on this occasion the instrument of God's mercy. This man, named François, is to-day the father of my god-daughter."

"But how did you learn this story?" said François, his face as red as a Montmorency cherry; "the poor traveler is dead, no doubt from want in California, where he went to seek his fortune."

"I learnt it from himself, for he has not forgotten it," said the stranger.

"Is he still alive?"

"He is, and what is more is rich, for he found the fortune he went to seek."

"Where is he at this moment?"

"In your arms!" cried the stranger, pressing to his bosom him, whom he called his first benefactor.

The sensation produced by this affecting scene can be better understood than expressed.

"And this is why," said a new comer entering the festive chamber; "this is why the ex-brigadier Simon yielded his rights to your friend. Do you understand me now, old comrade?"

"You are come too late, Simon," said François, extending his hand to his old companion-in-arms.

"It is never too late," said Simon, "when we arrive in time to witness the happiness of our friends; and while there remains a glass of wine on the table to drink their health."

V.

"My history is not finished," resumed the rich stranger. "The last words I pronounced on taking leave of the generous François were these: 'Who gives to the poor, lends to God;' and the chaplain of the hospital added: 'Which our good God will repay a hundredfold,' and He has sent me to-day, my dear François, to pay His debts. Saying this, he took out of his portfolio a packet of bank notes, which he divided in the following manner:—

"Twenty notes of a thousand francs for François; twenty notes of a thousand francs for Madame François; and twenty notes of a thousand francs for my god-daughter."

The worthy people would have refused this recompense from their grateful friend, if the curé had not forced them to accept what he called the debt of the good God.

At that moment the village postman brought a letter to Made-moiselle Marie; it was dated from Rome. By turns pale and red with emotion, she hurriedly perused it; and uttering a joyful cry announced to the company that André, the cavalier of the 11th dragoons, had quitted Rome, and embarked at Civita Vecchia, to return home for good.

"Bravo my children!" said the curé; "all is indeed happiness to-day," and he added, whispering to Marie, "when shall the wedding be?"

"Ask my mother," said she, blushing like a rose in May.

"In a month," answered the good old woman.

"And I will pay the violins," said the rich stranger, throwing on the table twelve bank notes.

"If you go on in this manner," said François, "you will keep nothing for yourself."

"But the most precious treasure of all, look—" and opening with a small gold key suspended from his neck, a box of ebony, richly inlaid with mother of pearl and ivory, he took out a pair of old boots; "This," said he, "is the foundation of all; with these boots, I have made my fortune."

The following year, about the same day, brigadier Simon presented at the baptismal font of the little church of — a fine boy, the son of Madame François, and whom his god-father promised to teach the military exercise when he was six years old.

François, the best of sons, the happiest of husbands, and the most tender father, is now mayor of his commune. Whenever he meets a beggar on the road, he never fails to give him charity, and murmur in a low voice these words:

"Who gives to the poor lends to the Lord."

The Story of a Watch.

THE sad events which changed the destinies of France, destroyed many a larger fortune than that of the hero of this story; but it could not have reduced to destitution a more deserving family. At the time that Captain Gerbaut held an honorable rank in the army, Madame, his wife, kept the post-office in a provincial town. He was dismissed, and his wife lost her office. Whilst the fallen captain was uselessly seeking some humble employment, his family, in the meantime, economised as much as possible. More than a year had passed, and their resources were nearly exhausted. Gerbaut, overwhelmed by these misfortunes, and discouraged by want of success, fell ill; he would have died, had not his wife, with the courage of despair, devoted her days and nights to work as laborious as it was unprofitable. It was piteous to see such a feeble creature oppressed with so many cares, fatigues, and anxieties. Gerbaut suffered all the tortures of a sensitive mind, and only supported the burden of life in the hope of sustaining his poor companion, and finding means to provide for his family's subsistence.

Madame Gerbaut did all she could to hide their poverty from the eyes of the world. She imposed upon herself the most cruel privations to keep up a decent appearance. This was less from shame at an honorable poverty, than from personal dignity, and a desire not to afflict her husband and herself with the harrowing spectacle of their deep distress. Madame Gerbaut thought, too, and perhaps with reason, that pity is not a promoter of success, and that the more their misery was known, the less chance her husband would have of obtaining employment. Their dwelling, therefore, was modest rather than poor; a scrupulous attendance to neatness and order excluded the idea of extreme misery.

Though the captain was no longer young, he courageously resolved to undertake anything that came in his way. As he wrote a good hand, and was an excellent accountant, he occasionally obtained manuscripts to copy, or accounts to make up; but these resources were very uncertain. Nevertheless, this work raised some hope in his heart. He returned happy to his dwelling, when he brought the means of procuring his companion some days of repose. The children also had their fêtes, more delightful because they were so rare. With what happiness the poor father saw them jump and shout joyously around him! How affected he was in contemplating their little happy faces, when he could say on entering, "Julie, Aglaé, I have met with something good." Then he displayed to their charmed gaze beautiful fruit, pretty cakes, and sparkling bonbons; round which they merrily danced before eating.

But soon the future began to show itself under a more severe aspect, to these young daughters of Captain Gerbaut; they grew up and began to work, aiding their mother in making tapestry for the manufactory which furnished her with employment. All three carefully repaired the linen and clothes which still remained with them. Sad as was this occupation, it employed them, and gave them the satisfaction of having performed a duty. The captain was the most unhappy. His wife, knowing how accustomed he was to an active life, saw him with distress becoming a prey to inaction, and despair amounting almost to rage, at the idea of being not only useless, but a charge to his family. Every day she invented a new pretext for his leaving home; and to distract his thoughts, urged the necessity of some plan, some visits, giving him often a hope which she had not herself. But this man, so brave before the enemy, showed a want of courage in exposing himself to refusal or humiliation; he could not proclaim his poverty, and would solicit with too much delicacy and discretion to succeed; he was too proud to be importunate. Thus, he had kept up a friendship with some of his old companions in arms, particularly with a general, who was indebted to the empire for a splendid fortune. A cover was always laid for the captain, at his abundant table. On that day Madame Gerbaut assisted at her husband's poor toilet. The reverses of fortune were not then felt. The children were more joyful than usual when they saw their father thus apparelled, and all believed themselves less miserable.

However, each day made these miracles of economy more difficult. One Thursday, (it was the captain's fête day) Madame Gerbaut saw with inexpressible grief that the old black coat, so religiously preserved for great occasions, would soon refuse to serve its master. It would then be impossible to present himself at the house of the general. This little circumstance, which recalled a long series of misfortunes, the term of which it would be impossible to foresee, quite overcame the courageous wife. She could not avoid weeping, as she repaired the button-holes and decorations of this coat, the witness of better days and sweeter hopes. She endeavored to smarten it up with a little ribbon which had many times served the same purpose. At length the captain departed, and reached the abode of his entertainer.

The general always remembered that he been a soldier, and was not the man to measure his consideration by the value of a coat; he had, besides, a real esteem for Captain Gerbaut, whose honorable character was appreciated by all the officers of his corps. The general's party on this day consisted of a dozen choice companions. During dinner the conversation turned on industrial improvement. French activity had then begun to impart to the arts of peace some of the ardor it had lavished for fifteen years on the field of battle throughout Europe.

The general happened to have a valuable piece of mechanism. It was a very curious watch, of great price, on account of the multiplicity of its delicate wheelwork, and the subdivisions of time indicated on its several faces. The bijou was passed in turn to each of the guests; the conversation then changed, and after discussion on other topics, they returned to the drawing-room.

On entering, the general remembered his watch, and, ringing for his valet, ordered him to take it from the table where it was left, and place it in safety. After a few moments the man returned, quite frightened; he had not been able to find the watch. The general, much surprised, went with Baptiste to the dining-room, but was not more fortunate.

"Some one, M. le général, may perhaps have brought it by mistake to the drawing-room," said Baptiste.

"I do not think so; but it is easy to ascertain.

A new search was made, but with no better success.

"What I fear," said the general, "is that, through some carelessness, the watch may be injured or broken."

"We will not leave this room till it is found," said one of the guests in a serious tone.

"This decision is not fair," laughingly answered a young man who, perhaps, had some other engagement for the evening; "it seems to me somewhat hard on the general's part, and that it rather trespasses on our liberty. I propose a more certain and expeditious measure;—to let ourselves be searched."

A loud shout followed this proposition.

"Agreed! agreed!" they all cried; and the young man, giving himself up the first, insisted that the valet, in his office of douanier, should make a strict examination of his pockets.

The general, who at first opposed this pleasantry, ended by laughing at it. Each new search furnished fresh subject for amusement. The captain took little part in these jokes; he joined in them with a constrained and melancholy air, and kept himself in the background as much as possible, without being remarked. As the search proceeded, he seemed more disturbed; one would have thought he wished to elude his turn; and perhaps he flattered himself he would be able to do so, in the midst of this noise and confusion; but it was not to be so. On the contrary, after all his companions had submitted to this ordeal, they turned towards him with redoubled clamor, jokingly signalling him as the culprit, since he came last.

The captain, pale and uneasy, stammered forth some excuses, which were lost in the noise. They urged Baptiste to stricter severity in this last examination.

"Baptiste, this is the decisive moment!" cried one. "Baptiste, be on your guard—we have our eyes on you!" said another. "Expose the criminal. Courage, Baptiste, the last chance is the best!"

The valet advanced; but Gerbaut, crossing his arms on his chest, declared with trembling voice, that unless by violence, no man should lay hands on him.

A profound silence succeeded this declaration, when the general advanced, saying, "The captain is right; this childish play has lasted too long. I demand an exemption both for him and myself."

Gerbaut, unable to speak, scarcely to support himself, thanked his friend by a grateful look, and left the room to conceal the shame and embarrassment of his position.

The general, after his departure, made no further remark, and the guests imitated his reserve; but every face expressed curiosity, and their host himself seemed uneasy and thoughtful. Gerbaut walked some distance before returning home; he wished to be alone, and to calm the agitated feelings to which he was a prey. His mind was confused, and it was with great difficulty he could arrange his ideas and form at last some decided resolution. It was late when he returned home, and his wife, who was eagerly expecting him, could scarcely restrain a cry of alarm on seeing her husband enter pale and disordered.

"What has happened?" she exclaimed.

"Nothing, nothing," said Gerbaut, sinking upon a chair, exhausted with fatigue and emotion, and placing on the table a little parcel. "This has cost me very dear," he added.

In vain Madame Gerbaut, seeking to calm him, wished to know the particulars.

"To-morrow," answered he; "to-morrow we shall see; I will go out early. Leave me, and rest easy; to-morrow I will tell you all."

In the morning the captain took the road to the hotel where he had dined the evening before; and though he walked resolutely forward, an inexpressible sorrow agitated his poor mind. How should he present himself? How would he be received? Should he go alone? Would it be better to write? What might it not cost him to confess? It seemed impossible to support the weight which almost crushed him. He tried a hundred different ways of commencing his terrible confession. With what words should he accost the general, to prevent an accent, a look, that could never be pardoned or forgotten? The reception from the valet de chambre he cared nothing for; with him all explanation was impossible. Gerbaut was nearly mad when he arrived. It was not Baptiste he met, but another domestic, who went forward to announce him. He knows nothing, he thought. What anguish! Will the general receive me? Yes. He is ushered in. Gerbaut dared not raise his eyes. He assures himself that the door is closed; then, without hesitating, in a deep and rapid voice, like a man who is accomplishing a cruel sacrifice, he began:

"I cannot deceive myself, general," he said; "I well know how strange was my conduct yesterday evening, and the suspicions to which it gave birth; I can no longer support the idea, and cost me what it may, I am come to confess to you the extent of my misfortunes, and the humiliation to which I am reduced."

The general, who at first endeavored to interrupt, now let him proceed; and Gerbaut, becoming by degrees more excited, continued: "My misery is at its height; there lies all my excuse. I am a burthen to those whom I ought to support. A wife, an indefatigable mother, can scarcely, by incessant labor, obtain daily bread for our poor children. I only partake, with shuddering, of this bread of affliction."

"Captain!" interrupted the general, quite overcome.

But Gerbaut heard and saw nothing; if he had ceased he could not have finished, perhaps, and the most painful part still remained to be told. Hurried on by despair, he continued: "I reproached myself for having partaken of a better repast than those who share my cruel destiny. Seated at your table, where this heartrending picture pursued me, I yielded to the irresistible desire of carrying to my poor children some portions of what was offered me. That was my position yesterday evening, and I should have died of shame if your guests and household had been witnesses of the abasement to which poverty had caused me to descend; but in your eyes, general, I could not rest with the suspicion—" Gerbaut's voice faltered, and he spoke with less volubility. The general answered:

"Thirty honorable years, my excellent friend, have placed you above all suspicion. That answers for everything;" and he showed to the astonished eyes of Gerbaut the missing watch.

"It is for me to ask your pardon," continued the general. "I had, without thinking, placed it in my pocket, where I found it in the evening, in presence of the amazed Baptiste."

"If I had but known," murmured Gerbaut, petrified.

"Regret nothing you have said," answered the general, extending his hand to his friend; "I have now learnt what you ought never to have hidden from me; and it is fortunate that the fear of a disgraceful supposition has urged you to make known the misery you are enduring. It is a friend who has listened to you; you shall soon hear from me again."

Gerbaut went home less agitated, but still all in confusion. Some days after this incident, he received another invitation to dine at the general's table. The guests were those of the last visit. The veteran did not fail to relate his inexcusable absence of mind with regard to the watch; and the captain, placed near him at table, found in the folds of his napkin, a nomination to an honorable and easy post, which would henceforth secure to himself and his family, the means of a comfortable existence.

Brother Joseph.

SAINTE SIMON, in his Memoirs, mentions a M. Du Casse, commander of a vessel, vice-admiral, and at last lieutenant-general, who died at a very advanced age, much respected by the whole court, in 1715, the same year in which the death of Louis XIV. took place. The brave officer having amassed a large fortune during his promotion to these several grades, was enabled to render good service to the King of Spain, both with his sword and with considerable sums of money, for which he obtained the Collar of the Golden Fleece, "an honor which was scarcely ever awarded," adds Saint Simon, "to persons of his condition." Du Casse was the son of a dealer in hams, at Bayonne, and the history of the rise of this individual, carefully preserved in the family traditions, lacks neither interest nor instruction.

The father of Du Casse, a citizen of the town of Bayonne, was left a widower with two little sons, Joseph and Bruno. The latter, who afterwards became the sailor, was three years older than Joseph, and had consequently experienced more keenly the evil effects of the neglect of discipline, which had arisen from the old shop-keeper being entirely immersed in the affairs of his business. Among the inhabitants of this country there was a great liking for the naval service, and the town of Bayonne was full of that disorder and commotion which always follows in the train of sailors and soldiers. Bruno, who was left completely to himself, was forever running about the streets, and frequenting the taverns, under the pretext of transacting his father's business. At length old Du Casse opened his eyes to what was going on; but it was too late—the twig was bent; and remonstrances, reproaches, and even punishments, were alike vain.

There was but one human being for whom Bruno appeared to entertain any feeling of consideration, and that was his little brother Joseph. Being older and stronger, and more courageous than he, it often fell out that he was called upon to defend him against children of his own age, and most nobly did he acquit himself of this duty. This species of protection cemented their natural affection. It must be admitted that nothing could exceed the sweetness, and gentleness, and beauty of poor little Joseph. He was so thin, so fragile, so timid; he had such lovely golden hair, curling all over his head, that no one could see him without feeling an interest in him, and of this his brother was very proud.

But with what loving tenderness did not little Joseph repay his brother's care of him! When Bruno was driven home constantly with harsh and angry reproaches, followed up by a severe thrashing, the poor child sat crying in a corner; and, unfortunately, this at length became of daily occurrence.

Du Casse was alarmed at the bad turn his son had taken, and like many other fathers in his walk of life, could think of no other method to reclaim him than a harsh severity. Whenever Bruno was sent to his garret, as a punishment, without any supper, a meaning look would pass between the two brothers, and Joseph would adroitly manage to drop half of his portion into his pocket, and take it up to Bruno when he went to bed. But there was another less laudable feature in these children's attachment: Bruno very often took advantage of the innocence of Joseph, and of his devoted affection, to implicate him in some of his evil deeds. As he knew himself to be in his father's black-books, and that Joseph was the favorite, he trained him to accomplish many little pilfering feats, and made a complete "cat's-paw" of him; not from any treacherous motive, for they equally shared the profits arising from the transaction: Bruno merely sought to divert the channel of his father's wrath from himself, and that was all he cared about. And so it chanced that a whole string of potargos disappeared from the chimney-corner, one by one, cut away, in fact, by Master Joseph; and when, after a month, the misdemeanor was discovered, poor Bruno became the sole sufferer, and a whole shower of blows fell thick and fast upon his luckless head. They used to get up in the night to forestall their paternal inheritance, as represented by the hams in the shop; they devoured jars of gherkins, to which Joseph's tiny fingers could alone gain entrance through the narrow aperture; they treated the whole establishment as a conquered country; they levied taxes on their father's territory, and declared open war whithersoever they penetrated; they even went so far as to melt a pewter dish upon a shovel, for mere wanton amusement. Imagine to yourself, if you can, the devastation carried on by these two children, impelled as they were by ignorance and love of mischief.

Joseph, with his childish consciousness of right and wrong, would be frequently tormented with scruples; but when his brother had determined on a thing, he dared not resist him. Often the poor child had to suffer in consequence of their great inequality of strength, and often he became the victim of his brother's superior physical advantages. If they played together Joseph's blows were little more than caresses, whilst those of Bruno were wounds, from which the blood flowed, where the elder would lightly jump with his legs tied, Joseph would fall down flat on the ground. It is true that after any of these disasters, Bruno would run towards his brother, pale as death, and tearing his hair, on which poor Joseph would restrain his tears, unable to bear the sight of such passionate remorse and despair.

Old Du Casse became more and more perplexed as his sons grew older. Bruno's circle of evil acquaintances had increased; he no longer condescended to play with his younger brother, feeling it beneath his dignity to be seen amusing himself with such a child. His father had apprenticed him out two or three times, but he was always turned off in a great hurry, and thrown again on the old man's hands, who was utterly at a loss to know what to do with him.

At this juncture, an old canon, who lodged in Du Casse's house, took pity on Joseph; the good priest instructed him in Latin and in the Church chant, and gained him admission into a religious community. The child had very good natural parts; he soon showed himself to be studious, devout, and full of intelligence. But what result did all this produce between these brothers, so attached to one another?

Joseph became painfully conscious of the terrible disorders that reigned in the paternal abode, and his devoted affection for his eldest brother was an additional incentive to endeavor to arouse him by gentle remonstrances to a sense of his unworthy conduct. Bruno, however, repulsed them at first with a sort of rough brotherly bluntness. He defended himself, denied the accusation, and blamed his father. Joseph was in no way discouraged; he returned to the charge again and again, but his prayers and entreaties, as well as the most ingenious devices that his affection could suggest, proved utterly unavailing. If Bruno appeared touched for a moment, he speedily betook himself to his worthless companions, and returned apparently more hardened than before. At last Joseph gave him up in despair of being of any use.

Bruno was wounded to the heart. Believing himself to be deserted and betrayed by the only being in the world who had loved and cared for him, he fell into a dull and melancholy state; and one fine day, after having frequently threatened to leave home in his fits of passion, he put his threat into execution, and finally disappeared. It must be confessed that the old man did not experience any very lively sorrow at the departure of his son, for he had long despaired of his reformation and been prepared for the worst; but Joseph's anguish was sharp and poignant, and he felt it the more, inasmuch as his tender conscience reproached him, lest the unavailing efforts he had made to reclaim his brother might have been the very means of driving him from home.

His father and he inquired everywhere, and endeavored by every possible means to gain intelligence of Bruno's movements. It was reported at last that he had enlisted as a sailor—but in what service? He had sold himself to a captain of buccaneers, and had gone to join a most desperate and daring band of those sea pirates, bound for the West India Islands.

These reports were indeed but too true. Bruno embarked with the rest of the captain's crew, who were men of pillage and slaughter, in a crazy vessel, which arrived almost miraculously at the headquarters of those men, after a voyage of four months' duration.

These pirates commanded by the most daring and able captains, were, at that period, the terror of more than half the world. They had carried devastation into Spain, and laid waste North and South America, besides other ravages, which have filled many volumes of history.

Robust, courageous, and of dauntless resolution, Bruno Du Casse had nothing to fear or to lose; and in three months he became one of the most renowned members of the band. Though but slightly skilled in the practice of arms, he, with ten others, axe in hand, captured a Spanish frigate. Burning with a desire to distinguish himself by some brilliant exploit, he one day threw himself all alone into the midst of a huge vessel, and threatened to blow it up with an incendiary shell. The terrified crew surrendered, and Bruno made a signal to his comrades to come and join him.

In two years he accumulated five hundred thousand crowns, which he invested in the various banks of Europe, and which were but the first fruits of his immense fortune. We will not follow him through all his expeditions, which had already attracted the attention of the navy of Louis XIV., and made that monarch desirous of attaching such a man to the royal service. His name was but too well known in the New World, and an enormous reward had been offered to any one who would deliver him up alive or dead. The terror he inspired was so great, that it was only equalled by the desire of capturing him. But up to this time every pursuit and attack had but turned to his greater glory.

One day a small vessel, containing only six men, bore down suddenly, close to land, upon a pirate ship, richly laden, on board of which Bruno was. They had only time to pour one broadside into the pirate sloop, but it was done so effectually that it sank to the bottom. A long boat was then launched to pick up the pirates, whom it was in contemplation to hang up to the yard-arm. Bruno endeavored to knock out the brains of the chief officer, but they hoisted him up like a shark to the deck, where he underwent a strict examination. They found some important documents in his possession, and at length he gave up his name. Two only of his crew were hung. The captain of the vessel was but too happy to have the great luck of carrying the great buccaneer chief to Europe, and he carefully confined him in the hold of the ship, with heavy irons on his hands and feet.

When in sight of the coast of Portugal, a privateer belonging to Barbary, most formidably equipped with artillery, opened an attack upon them. The Christian crew, consisting of Spaniards and Portuguese, although greatly inferior in point of numbers, performed prodigies of valor. The disconsolate captain was prepared to die rather than yield, and the most precious part of his cargo, the object of all this bloody resistance, was the pirate, Bruno. But the cannonade of the Turks was battering the vessel to pieces; the deck was covered with the dead and the dying; all was lost; destruction seemed inevitable. The Spanish captain entered the hold where the brigand lay in chains, and offered him his liberty on condition that he would engage in defence of the vessel. "Indeed," said Bruno, "I shall have the greatest pleasure in helping you. I assure you I was getting very sick of being in the midst of all this uproar without being able to have a finger in it."

The Spaniard exacted from him a promise that he would not make his escape before they arrived in port. Bruno acceded; his chains were struck off, and the freebooter mounted the deck, sword in hand. But it was too late; the Turks had already boarded the vessel, and were crowding the decks. Bruno fought like a lion in the midst of these miscreants, and he piled up their corpses in the form of an entrenchment, behind which he resisted manfully, long after the rest of the crew were killed or taken prisoners. A moment after, and he too was carried down again to his place of confinement. "There are two of us to play at this game now," said Bruno.

The privateer reached Algiers in safety, and the captain and Bruno, who had struck up a great friendship, were sold to different masters. The pirate chief, when it came to be known who he was, fared very badly, and he suffered severely from ill-treatment and hard labor. Before a month was over he had three several times attempted to make his escape, at which the whole town was up in arms. He was wounded, recaptured, and thrown into a dungeon, heavily chained, where the bad air, the heat, and the want of food, soon reduced this strong, powerful man to the weakness of a child. The Turks regarded him as a refractory subject, and despairing of obtaining his ransom, they suffered no doctor to go near him, in hopes that death would soon put an end to his existence. But the strength of his constitution was so great, that it bore him up through a space of five months.

Just at this juncture, some Religious of the Order of Mercy for the Redemption of Captives arrived in the states of Barbary. The poor wretched prisoners were assembled together from all parts of the town of Algiers, and amongst them were the Spanish captain and the remainder of his crew. After all preparations had been made for their departure, and the ransom agreed upon they were in haste to depart; but the captain could nowhere discern amongst his unhappy companions the famous Bruno. He spoke of him at length to the good Religious, who applied to the Turks, but they appeared to know nothing of the matter, and supposed the man in question must be dead. They made further enquiry, and entered into communication with his master, who, at last, drew from a noisome dungeon, a kind of walking skeleton, whom he led shuddering to the sea-shore. Every care was lavished on this death-like object, who, however, revived with the fresh air and wholesome food, and, above all, with the hopes of liberty. The Spanish captain hastened to him, and watched beside his pillow night and day, together with the good Religious.

When Bruno had regained his health and strength, the captain proposed that he should accompany him to Spain, no longer as a prisoner, but as a partner in his gains, and offered to push him forward in the service. One day when he was talking to him on this subject, notwithstanding the prohibition of the Brother of Mercy, who was unwilling that the sick man's convalescence should be disturbed by considerations of this kind, he said:

"As you have no longer any relations, I presume that you have no inducements to return to France?"

"No relations?" said Bruno; "God only knows that."

"I thought you told me that you were unmarried, and that you were an orphan?"

"I do not remember my mother, but my father was living when I left home, and I had a brother. But do not speak to me of that. You know what it is to be a bad son. I am a wretch—and I have probably caused the death of—"

A big tear, which he vainly strove to repress, stole down the hollow cheek of the pirate, who, overcome by these memories of the past, cried out with choking sobs, "My brother, my poor little Joseph!"

The captain, much affected, raised his head.

The Religious, who was seized with a sudden trembling, became deadly pale; he staggered for a moment, and then, rushing towards the invalid, with arms extended, he cried out:

"Bruno! Bruno! I am he!"

The two brothers remained motionless for a length of time, wrapt in a close embrace, and no sounds escaped them save stifled groans and sobs, and inarticulate words. The Spanish captain wept like a child. Meanwhile Bruno passed his hands over the face and shoulders of Joseph, without being able to give vent to his feelings otherwise than by broken accents.

"It is indeed yourself—poor child—Joseph—I cannot speak—How is all this?—How was it that I did not recognize you?—And yet I loved you, although I knew not who it was.—The heart spoke.—But you yourself?"

"I did not recognize you at first sight—you were so changed—the ravages of disease had made such fearful havoc; but your name was on our lists, and when I came to examine your features while you were sleeping—"

"What? have you known this for a whole week? Why have you so long delayed?"

"You must ask the captain, who knows to what a state you were reduced; it would have been the death of you."

"Oh, no, it would have cured me."

The two brothers again threw themselves into each other's arms, and held out their hands to grasp those of the brave Spaniard.

"But how is this," said Bruno, "what habit do you wear? You have become a monk."

"You went away to become a pirate," said Joseph, with a sweet smile; "you were liable to be taken prisoner, and it behoved me to possess the means of ransoming you."

"Oh, my dear little Joseph!" cried the other, taking him in his arms, as if he had been a child. "I must have lost my sight not to have known you. You see, captain, I come of a good stock, and that there are some very worthy people amongst my family. But make your mind easy, my little brother, your example has had a very good effect upon me. I mean now to become an honest man, and to enter the king's service."

They then spoke of their father. The good man had died a few years after Bruno's departure, upon which Joseph had embraced the religious state, where his prayers had doubtless been answered by the restoration of his brother.

When the ship set sail Bruno was perfectly restored to health, and he was able to take part in the customary procession on the return of captives, walking by the side of his brother, with a large taper in his hand: and amongst the crowd who assembled to witness the ceremony, there was scarcely an individual who did not shed tears at sight of this spectacle, when their history became known.

Bruno Du Casse, who was still in the flower of his age, did not immediately enter into the maritime service of the king. He could not yet bring his mind to present his petition to the Court of Versailles. Even his brother failed to overcome his scruples upon that point; he dreaded a refusal, and affirmed that he had sunk so low, that it was necessary to stoop to lift him up again. He only obtained the command of a corsair ship of war at Marseilles, and the captures she effected greatly increased his fortune, which he had nearly recovered. Three years later he was presented with a captain's commission in the king's service; he then became vice-admiral, and finally lieutenant-general, and frequented the Court, where he was specially beloved by the sovereign, and respected by all.

It is hardly necessary to add, that after he had experienced the happiness of saving his brother, Joseph made several other voyages to the States of Barbary. He died there, indeed, of the plague, and it was not without the sweet consciousness that he had doubly ransomed his brother, for he left him leading a most pious and Christian life.

For the rest, we sum up in the words of the Duke De Saint Simon, who in speaking of Lieutenant-General Du Casse, in mentioning his death, which took place in 1715:

“Du Casse died at a very advanced age, worn out with hard service, and covered with honorable wounds. Neither the universal esteem which he had acquired, added to that of the king and his ministers, nor the great influence which his ability and his successes in the naval service had gained for him, had been able to spoil him. He was a tall, thin man, a Commander of Saint Louis, who combined with the air of a corsair, and with considerable fire and activity, a most gentle, polished, affable demeanor; he was never known to forget himself. He was very obliging, and possessed a large share of intellect, with a species of natural eloquence, and this extended beyond the range of his own profession. There was always something pleasing and profitable in his conversation. He loved the State, and whatsoever was good he valued for its intrinsic worth, which, alas! has become a thing of rare occurrence.”

THE END.

THE LAMP OF THE SANCTUARY.

CHAPTER I.

ITS BRIGHTNESS.

"Who will grant me that I might be according to the days in which God kept me, when His lamp shined over my head?" (Job, xxix. 2, 3.)

IN the recesses of the Pyrenees, not far from the Spanish border, there was (our tale is of the last century), a small rural chapel situated on a hill, known by the name of Mont-Marie. The chapel itself was simple and unpretending, solidly built, and of considerable antiquity. The inside was, however, richly adorned. The altar had silver furniture, and the walls round it were covered with votive tablets, and with silver donatives, hung in commemoration of favors piously believed to have been received through the intercession of the blessed Mother of God, to whom the chapel was dedicated. Indeed it was celebrated through the neighboring country for many miles round, as a place of great devotion, almost a pilgrimage. Over, but behind the altar, on which was a rich tabernacle, stood an image of the spotless Virgin, bearing in her arms her Divine Son. It was nearly as large as life, of white marble and of ancient workmanship. Every one who looked at it with a favorable light pronounced it a matchless piece of art, a work of highest inspiration. Nothing could be more benign, more sweet, than the expression of the Mother, nothing more winning, yet more majestic, than the countenance of the Child.

In the midst of the sanctuary, before the altar, was hung a silver lamp, as is usual in Catholic churches and oratories, burning day and night. Never, on the most tempestuous night, was it known to be extinguished; for it was abundantly supplied, by the piety of the people, with the purest oil from the olive-yards of the country. And this to many of them was a matter of great importance. For the lamp was a beacon and a sure guide to the traveller at night. It was, therefore, so hung that its bright radiance shone through a round window over the door, and could be seen to a great distance. The path which led from several hamlets to the main road in the valley, passed near this chapel; it was a narrow rugged track along the mountain's side, skirting a precipice; and the direction given to the traveller was to go boldly forward so long as the light of the chapel was visible before him; but so soon as it disappeared by a jutting of a rock, to turn sharp to the right and fearlessly descend, as the precipice was now exchanged for a gentle slope that led to the wider road. So certain was this rule, that no accident was remembered to have ever happened along that path. Thus did a beautiful symbolical rite of worship lend itself to a most beneficial purpose, and become the cause of great social good; thus did the altar of God send abroad its cheerful brightness to light up the dark and wearisome path, (alas! how like that of life)! and thus were the solitary traveller's thoughts attracted to the sphere where his guiding-star burnt clear before the mercy-throne of the Lamb, there to offer, in spirit, homage; or led to think on that wakeful Eye of Providence which darts its ray from a higher sanctuary upon our joyless way, to cheer and guide us thither.

The chapel was under the care of a hermit priest, who lived in an humble dwelling beside it, and ministered to the spiritual wants of the neighborhood, as the parish church was at some distance.

On the road which we have described, and about two miles from the chapel, was a poor small mountain hamlet, inhabited chiefly by woodmen who worked in the forests around. Among the cottages which composed it, one was remarkable for its neatness, though as poor as the rest; and the young couple that occupied it were no less distinguished as the most industrious, the most virtuous, and the happiest in the place. While Pierrot was sturdily working among the hills, his wife Annette was sitting at her wheel spinning incessantly, unless busied with domestic cares; while at her feet sat their only child, not yet three years old, but already giving tokens of great sense and virtue. Like every other child born under the tutelage of that chapel, she had been called at baptism Marie. The child was the delight of her parents, for with great liveliness of disposition and cheerfulness, she united sweetness of temper and gentleness of mind. It may be easily imagined how they watched her every look with the anxiety of fond affection.

It was with dismay, therefore, that about this time each parent observed a notable falling off in her good looks and in her spirits. For some days neither durst speak on the subject to the other; but at last it became manifestly necessary to call in medical advice, for the child was growing every day paler and thinner, and was losing strength. But every effort of human skill proved vain, and the physician declared that nothing short of a miracle could save the child. The parents were disconsolate, and seemed distracted with their grief, till, finding no comfort on earth, they turned their thoughts more fervently to heaven, where, however, they had all along sought help.

It was a fine autumn evening, when the heart-broken parents were seen slowly walking along the narrow path we have described, evidently directing their steps towards Mont-Marie. The mother bore a precious burthen in her arms, lighter indeed than the one she carried in her heart. It was her frail and sickly child carefully wrapped up, though the afternoon was warm.

When they reached the chapel it was still day, and many of the peasantry were there making their evening visit as they returned from their work. The door was open, and the western sun streamed in full glory through it, and steeped the interior of the place with a golden lustre, giving to the paintings and hangings, and the bright ornaments of the altar, a richness and magnificence truly royal. It seemed as if it was the hour of majesty, the time for urging great and noble suits at the throne of power; the presence-chamber of the King of kings seemed gorgeously arrayed to hear the song of the joyful heart, and to dispense the treasures of redundant blessings. And each and every one of those peasants, kneeling in scattered groups in fervent worship, scarcely able to bear the dazzling sparks of light which the sun-beams struck from the silver tabernacle, was at that moment ennobled and graced beyond the richest and proudest of earth's lords. Their rustic costume was embroidered by the golden pencil of heaven, their honest heads surrounded, and, in a manner, crowned by a flood of glory, and their countenances upturned with glowing features, and moistened eyes, towards that Presence, before which all earthly royalty is base. And now the organ pealed forth its powerful notes, and all united in a simple, but overpowering strain of evening thanksgiving.

It was at this moment that Pierrot and his wife reached the threshold of the door; and both instinctively paused as if unable to enter in. That sparkling light, that golden atmosphere, those joyful looks, those swelling notes, accorded not with their errand, sympathized not with their hearts, jarred, broken, fretted as they were. They were not coming to urge high and peculiar claims, but to seek pity, mercy and peace. In a moment, however, they both felt confused at their apparent want of confidence; and, assuming boldly the privilege ever granted by Catholic feeling to the distressed, advanced to the steps leading to the Sanctuary. On these the mother laid her helpless burthen; and both, kneeling down, covered their streaming eyes from the overpowering, though fading, splendor that oppressed them. Long, deep, and breathless was their prayer. During it the music had ceased, the peasants had one by one glided out, and the hermit having closed the door, and with it shut out the last dying reflection of the western sky, whispered to the afflicted father as he retired, "I have left the door unlocked, stay as long as you please. Have courage, and may God comfort you; and, through the intercession of His blessed Mother, hear your prayers." He was not like Heli that good hermit, who chid Anna in the temple because of her troubled supplication.

At these words, both uncovered their faces and raised their eyes. They were alone with their child: a perfect silence reigned around them. There was no light but what was shed by the lamp of the Sanctuary, between them and the altar. Hanging in mid-air, this seemed as a fountain of mildest radiance, not shot forth in rays, not scattered abroad in fiery sparks, not playing wantonly in unsteady flame, but, softly and equably diffused from its source on every side, filling the centre of the holy place with a halo of serenest, purest light, and thence overflowing in a more subdued and blander stream, into the remoter parts and angles of the roof and walls. It was a light that appeared to exert a stilling, hushing power on nature; one could not conceive noise or disturbance going on under it; a laugh, a harsh word, an angry murmur would have sounded sacrilegious, if they could have been possibly attempted. It created an atmosphere of its own; as though that soft tempered light diffused a corresponding warmth through the air, which the frost without could not chill; for no one could feel cold beneath its genial glow. It gave a softness and beauty to the commonest objects; the rude memorials of benefits received that hung around, and the poor paintings which adorned the upper parts of the walls, had their imperfect details concealed, and their more prominent features brought out in a subdued tone, that made them look like masterpieces of art; and countenances which by day looked stern, by this mild light, were gentle and engaging. But it was on the inward feelings that its kindest influence was shed. It seemed to kindle in the breast a holy light like unto itself, beaming, serene and soothing, over its disturbed affections, subduing pride and loftiness of spirit, calming anger, engentling austerity, and smoothening the folds of the crafty thought. It unruined, it softened, it melted the soul, and fitted it for tender and gentle emotions.

And when, thus feeling all without them in perfect harmony with their own thoughts, the unhappy parents raised their eyes towards the image of their Redeemer and His Mother, the full radiance of that lamp upon it revealed features so full of love and compassion, that never did this representation of them appear so lovely, or so truly a portrait of what in their hearts they now wished to find them both. For they felt that this was the hour for appeals for mercy and pity on distress; here was the inner audience-chamber, where the petition of the poor would be kindly received face to face, whispered into the ear.

Long and fervently did the parents pray over their child under the solemn inspiration of the place and hour. There was more of depth in the father's fervor, more of tenderness in the mother's; but both made together a joint petition, they offered up a common vow. If the child recovered, she was for the next seven years to be clothed in white, as an emblem of dedication to the purest of maids, brought up ever in piety and devotion; and her parents would fast once a week during the same period.

"Yes," exclaimed Pierrot, in the simple poetry of nature, "she shall be white and pure as the lily, whose root has been fed by the mountain snow; she shall be as a flower before the altar of God. She shall shine in His sanctuary as the lamp that now hangs over her; her virtues shall shed a mild lustre through the holy place, as she kneels in conscious gratitude, where now she lies. Extinguish not the light of our eyes! and let not death presume to touch her now consecrated to Thee, any more than a sacrilegious hand will ever dare to quench this holy flame that burns before Thine altar!"

While the parents were engaged in prayer their child seemed to be enjoying a slumber calmer and healthier than she had for several weeks; and in this they saw the first symptom of recovery. It was late when they returned home, but the child still slept; and next morning she was evidently better. In a few more days she was at her usual place by her mother's knee. She was now what is called in France vouée au blanc, clothed entirely, according to vow, in virgin white. And as she grew from day to day in sense and virtue, so was she looked upon by all the good people in the neighborhood, as one dedicated to God, and privileged by grace. Hence, by common accord, the place of honor seemed granted to her in church, the spot in the centre on which she had been laid in her sickness.

There, as she grew older, she would kneel immovable for hours, and when at dusk the crowd of peasants who filled the oratory, in the dark costume of the country, formed a confused mass, her form, arrayed in dazzling white, in the full radiance of the mystic lamp, shone bright and clear as if fulfilling her father's prayer, and seemed itself to shed a light upon the darker objects around. In silent meditation and fervent prayer, in the soft glow of that sacred lamp, her heart, too, found delight. The glories of the evening sun, the clear splendor of the summer noon, had no charms for her, like to its softened ray. It seemed to her to shed around a light so chaste and pure as could brook thoughts none but the holiest and most angelic; nor could words, save the most warm and tender, bear to be breathed therein. Heavenly spirits seemed to bask in it, and the cherubs were playing on the cloud of glory that hung around the flame. Nor was it to the eyes alone that this mysterious and symbolical light appeared so beautiful. With it there seemed to come music to her ears, voices whispering prayer in accordance with hers, songs subdued and tender, as of spirits striking softly upon golden harps. And it seemed to scatter ever the sweetest fragrance, a balm, an incense pure from every gross and earthly particle. In fine, no place to her appeared more closely allied to heaven, and no situation raised her on wings of holy desire so gently from earth, as did that lonely sanctuary, enjoyed in the light of its own dear star.

It has been observed that persons living much together come to contract a certain resemblance to one another, so as to be often taken for near relations; and so did many think, that by frequent and long kneeling before that beautiful image of the spotless Virgin Mother, with gaze intent upon it in that mild light, her features gradually moulded themselves into the same meek and modest expression, as though she were the living, as that was the lifeless portrait, of the same original.

CHAPTER II.

ITS DARKENING.

"May the counsel of the wicked be far from me. How often shall the lamp of the wicked be put out, and a deluge come upon them, and He shall distribute the sorrows of His wrath." (Job, xxi. 17.)

Nearly six years had now passed over since the vow was spoken; and they had been years all of joy and happiness, when a change came over the household of Pierrot, which blighted it sadly, and brought with it sorrow and woe.

A little before this time, two strange men came with their families to settle in the neighborhood. They were a rough set, and no one knew anything about them. They took a piece of land at some distance from any other dwelling and built themselves large huts of timber, much like those of others; but while they were working at them they seemed jealous of any one's coming to look at them; and when they were finished they never invited any one inside. The men did not seem to have any particular occupation, and the women were idle and slovenly; yet they always seemed to be better off than their neighbors, and on Sundays made a very dashing appearance. Nobody knew what to think of them, but it was clear there was some mystery about them.

A few months after they had settled there, a sensible alteration in the character of Pierrot was observable by his wife and daughter. He went to his work with less cheerfulness, and got apparently through with much less of it, for his earnings clearly fell off. He was thoughtful and reserved, almost moody, and for the first time had evidently a painful secret which he concealed from his family. Instead of returning home as soon as his work was done to enjoy their society, they would have to wait for some hours in silent grief, and when he came in, he was cold and silent, and made some poor excuse for his lateness. At length one day when he went to work, he said to his wife; "Annette, I shall probably not return till very late to-night—so don't sit up for me. I have important business which may even detain me all night." He gave no time for remonstrance, but hurried forth. Oh! what a sorrowful day was that for mother and daughter! they scarcely spoke all day, and each tried to hide her tears from the other: for the child, though eight years of age, had sense enough to know that things were going fearfully wrong. Towards evening, therefore, both, guided by the same impulse, took the road towards Mont-Marie, to pour forth their grief and seek consolation at the foot of the altar. There Marie knelt in her usual place behind the lamp; she raised her eyes and her heart, and was soon absorbed in meditation. And her meditation was this:

She thought of the desolate home which awaited the blessed Mother of our Lord as she descended from Calvary; the joyless chamber, the restless couch, prepared for her after a day of anguish and of blight. There, comparing sorrow with sorrow, how trifling appeared her own affliction beside hers! There, eyes that fall on garments sprinkled from the wine-press, trodden that day, of God's justice; there, ears that yet ring with the clang of the hammer, forcing nails through the quivering flesh; there, a heart pierced through with a sword of grief panting to its core with the keenest of material sorrows; there, body and soul staggering under a weight of anguish that would have crushed a frame of iron and a mind of adamant, but can be borne up by her unresisting patience. And in the thought of such an ocean of sorrows, how small a drop did those appear to that child of grace, which the heavenly Father had allotted her! And now, after each kind friend that has accompanied this sovereign Lady to her humble home has departed, she sees her left at last alone in the silence of night, with the lamp (fed perhaps from the garden of Gethsemani), beaming upon her pale countenance; on which that day has written more of woe than years had traced before, glittering in tear after tear, as it trickles from her dimmed celestial eye, watching alone beside her, sole thing that cheers and sheds a ray of comfort through the dreary chamber and the drearier heart. And, in her childish thoughts, she blessed that pale and trembling light which then gave Mary comfort; and felt as though the little flame above her, shining now upon her and upon the sacred representation of that Queen of Sorrows before her, were the faithful representative and descendant of that which then lighted up and cheered her sanctuary at home. Its calm twilight thus exercised its soothing influence on the innocent child's spirit, and associated her afflictions with the holiest that earth had ever witnessed. She felt as though she suffered in company with the noblest and blessedest among women; and the total darkness which had before overspread her soul, was lighted up by a cheering ray, mild, serene, and pure as that which tempered the shadows of night within that sanctuary. She felt that she could return to her desolate home, with resignation at least, after what she had contemplated.

But before she rose from prayer, she had made an offering to the Almighty, through the hands of the Blessed Virgin, which she did not tell to her mother for some time after. She felt as though it was accepted, and she was comforted.

Let it not be thought that we have described conduct or feelings beyond the age of such a child. In the world we ordinarily have no idea of the maturity of grace to which children brought up under the Church's wings, are sometimes brought by Him who "out of the mouths of babes and sucklings bringeth forth perfect praise." We hear often amongst us of precocious talent, seldom of precocious virtue; yet one is as natural in its own order as the other. But not only do the lives of Saints, as those of St. Rose of Lima, St. Mary Magdalen de' Pazzi, St. Catharine of Siena, present us with instances of intelligence and spiritual illumination in even an earlier age, but at this day are yet such examples to be found, and that within the compass of our own knowledge. And if parents, mothers in particular, knew how to train their children from the cradle for God; if instead of fondling their infant humors, and caressing their very passions and caprices, they turned the first dawn of their reason to the knowledge and consideration of the Divine goodness; and shaped their lips to utter as first sounds the two sweetest names in human speech, many who now have to weep over the follies and vices of their offspring, might be thanking God instead, for having blessed their family with a Saint.

But to proceed: when the mother and daughter returned home, they were far better able to encounter the melancholy of their cottage than when they left it; nor did its gloom appear so deep, especially to the latter. She seemed almost cheerful, as she bade her mother put her trust in God and in the intercession of His Blessed Mother. It was late next morning, when Pierrot suddenly entered, with a pale and haggard look; cast a purse upon the table at which his wife and daughter were sitting, and hurried without uttering a word into his bed-room. They both gazed long in silent amazement at the unwonted sight; and when Pierrot after a few hours' troubled rest came back, he was surprised and mortified at finding his purse lying untouched where he had thrown it.

"What is the meaning of this?" he asked with some bitterness. "Do you take that purse for some venomous animal, that you have been afraid to touch it?"

"Pierrot," answered his wife, "how is it come by?"

"Honestly I assure you" he replied. "You do not, I hope, think me capable of theft or robbery?"

"God forbid!" rejoined his wife, "but you have done very little work of late; and it would take long in your craft, even with great industry, to amass such a sum. A successful like that, got in one night, looks, you will own, to say the least, suspicious."

"Then make yourselves easy," said Pierrot, "it is honestly come by. I have fallen in with acquaintances, who have put me into the way of a successful commercial speculation; and these I hope are only its first fruits."

The poor woman was glad to receive the comfort of his words. But though she looked contented and put up the purse, she could not bring herself to use its contents. She redoubled her industry, and wore herself to death at her wheel, to keep up appearances and ward off famine; but neither she nor her daughter would touch the suspicious gold. And often would Pierrot bring more, after having been out a night, and sometimes two and the intervening day; and yet the store remained untouched. For one sign was in their eyes decisive; Pierrot was no longer the same. He neglected every religious duty, was seldom at church except on the Sunday, and then seemed to have no pleasure in its duties.

Once it happened, that his little daughter enticed him in the afternoon to Mont-Marie, where taking her usual place she prayed earnestly for him, and renewed the offering of herself before alluded to; she prolonged her prayer beyond dusk, by the favorite light of the Sanctuary lamp; but on rising from her knees, she found her father gone. He was waiting outside, and on her affectionately remonstrating with him on his impatience in leaving the church, he replied:

"For my part, I wonder how you can stay so long, and pray by that dim and dismal light. By it the church looked to me like a dark sepulchral vault, so gloomy and oppressive. The pictures on the walls stared at me like so many ghosts, or appeared to frown upon me. It made even the image of the Blessed Virgin look cold and stern. I could not stand it, and came out to breathe a mouthful of fresh air."

The child sighed, and said, "Ah! dearest father, you used not to speak so. There must be something amiss in that breast that loves not, or dares not, to pray by the still light of the Sanctuary's lamp!"

Pierrot walked home in silence, and for some weeks was more steady at his work. But he soon relapsed into his former habits, and even extended his absence from home to longer periods; to weeks instead of days. It is time, however, that we explain the cause of his unhappy change. The new comers to his neighborhood, whom we have mentioned, belonged to a rough and unprincipled class, that hang (especially in mountain districts) about the frontiers of foreign countries. They were contrabandists or smugglers, who contracted for a certain profit, to carry French goods over the Spanish border without paying duty; and this was often done by large parties on a great scale, in spite of the vigilance of revenue officers, whom they did not scruple to attack and fight in case of surprise. These two men and their families were old offenders and experienced hands. Being too well known at their former station, and having observed, in the neighborhood of Mont-Marie, passes comparatively but slightly guarded, in consequence of the honesty of the peasantry, they had determined to turn the circumstance to their advantage, and came to settle in that neighborhood. But to succeed, they saw it was necessary to get some one to join them who was well acquainted with every nook and track among the crags and mountains; and having taken some time to pick up acquaintance with the characters of their neighbors, they fixed upon poor Pierrot as their victim, not only as he was an expert mountaineer, but because his very gentleness of character, the result of his virtue, would enable them, could they but once corrupt him, to keep him more completely under their power, than one of a rougher and sterner cast.

They began, therefore, artfully to insinuate themselves into his familiarity and friendship, by expressing an interest in him and his family, and their pity at seeing him toiling all day for a paltry pittance, when by commercial undertakings, sure of success, he could put himself in far better circumstances. Pierrot listened at first with indifference, and then with curiosity, which soon grew up into eagerness, to their tempting suggestions. At length they unfolded their schemes more openly, and he was startled. But for this they were prepared; and after the first shock was over, they began to remove his scruples. They told him speciously that they were French subjects, and consequently not bound by the Spanish laws, which alone forbade the introduction of goods across the boundary; that, consequently, with them this could not be wrong, but was merely a commercial speculation, attended with risk of seizure, just like a venture in time of war, or a ship's freight sent through the boisterous ocean in winter.

Pierrot was at last engaged to join in one of their expeditions; they took care that it should be a safe, easy, and pleasant one; and he received as his share of the profit the purse which he threw on the table of his cottage. Although his conscience was ill at ease, the love of money had now struck deep root in his heart; and he was soon so surrounded with the toils of his artful seducers, that he had no longer strength to disentangle himself or to break through them. Such is the history of many a weak but good mind, that has but listened to the arts of a deceiver. Its very goodness makes it an unequal match for well-trained cunning and daring profligacy. After its first fall its powers are broken, and it allows itself to be led by the will of the ensnarer.

After Pierrot's visit, described above, to the Sanctuary of Mont-Marie, his companions, afraid of his escape from them, and of his betraying them, determined to involve him still deeper in crime. First, when they had again prevailed on him to join them, they took him upon a more venturesome expedition, which, as they had foreseen, led to an encounter with the revenue-guard; shots were fired, blows were struck, and the pass was forced by sheer violence. A few days after, placards were posted in all the neighboring villages, offering rewards for the discovery of the offenders, with free pardon to accomplices who should betray them. Pierrot's tyrants next showed him these, and threatened, on his first attempt to dispute their will, to carry him over the frontier, and deliver him to the authorities.

He was now their victim, their tool in any wicked enterprise. He had no longer a will of his own; he seemed to have delivered his very soul into their hands, and there was no extent of crime, short of murder, to which they did not lead him, at their pleasure. They had at length ventured to unveil to him their real characters, as outlaws and banditti. They made him join them in their midnight robberies; but he sickened at the very thoughts of polluting his once happy dwelling with the fruit of his villainies; he refused a share in the spoils, and whenever he returned home, it was only with more haggard looks, more tortured conscience, and an empty purse.

He loathed his very life, he gnawed his very heart in sorrow, and the most desperate thoughts, even of self-destruction, began to haunt his mind. His companions saw him sometimes looking over the edge of a precipice, as if deliberating whether to throw himself head-long, or feeling the point of a dagger, as if meditating a self-aimed blow. But a cold shudder would creep over his frame; he would draw suddenly back, or cast the weapon away; while his companions would break into a coarse peal of laughter, and dare him to accomplish his thought. Yes! thanks to Heaven, Pierrot had not yet lost his belief in eternity; he remembered that there was a bottomless gulf below the depths of the precipice, and that there was a sword of divine justice, keener than the dagger's point.

But his companions saw that they would soon lose their hold on him, that his desperation would drive him to some deed that would betray them. They, therefore, with artful villainy changed their course. They assured him of their willingness to release him from his painful life. One, only one more enterprise did they require him to join, it was an easy and safe one: and after that they would quit the neighborhood, and he should be left at peace. At peace! little did they know or care, how effectually they had driven this from his heart, how they had banished it from his life! Still, to him there was comfort in their words; and he almost longed to commit the crime which was to be his last. A day was fixed for it, yet a month off, and this seemed like an age to Pierrot. Nor could any entreaties prevail on them to communicate to him the nature of their intention. Only he clearly saw preparations making at their houses, for a complete and sudden flight; and in this he felt he had the best pledge and security for the truth of their promises.

Let us in the mean time, return to consider his poor wife and child. Every month of the period, over which we have traced Pierrot's evil course, had sunk them deeper in misery and in sorrow. Of the character of his crimes they had no evidence; for as he never brought home his share of plunder, and as he kept a moody silence and reserve, they had no ground on which to suspect farther, than that he was engaged in something very wrong. Even when at home, he could get but little work, for now no one cared to employ him; and so his once neat and happy dwelling bore marks of poverty, neglect, and decay. And within, too, all was sorrow and distress; no cheerful conversation, no smile, no confidence. The mother and the daughter, indeed, understood one another, but it was more by silent sympathy, than by exchange of sentiment; for each feared ever to swell the other's grief, and generally stifled her inward feelings, and repressed the gushing tear, or wept alone. And let this be added to the praises of the poor, that none better than they have the inborn delicacy to honor virtue in distress, and refrain from sarcasm and reproach against those whom bitter trials oppress. Never was the conduct of Pierrot, though now notorious and a public scandal, cast into the face of these two forlorn ones, morally indeed a widow and an orphan. But rather it seemed as if a tacit honor was paid to their suffering innocence; every one made way for them; every one seemed to soften his voice as he addressed them; many a little present, artfully conveyed, so as to repress all sense of obligation, made its way to their cottage to soothe their distress; and many a kind hope that God would console them, was whispered at the church door in their ear.

And He did, in truth console them: for without His Presence, His Grace, His Light, His Food, their hearts would long since have been broken by despairing sorrow. Again and again did they kneel at evening before the altar, and there ever found they the calm and peace which resignation to the Divine Will alone can give. It was on one of these occasions that a new association of ideas led our little contemplative to consoling thoughts, akin to those which we have seen the Sanctuary's Lamp had before suggested; only from the sorrows of the Mother, it guided her to those of the Son. She had been reading in her little rude picture-bible, and had there seen illustrated the vision of Zacharias (chap. iv.) in which is described the golden candlestick before the altar, on either side whereof stands an olive tree, the over-hanging branches of which, through golden funnels, feed the sacred lamps, with an unfailing light and unction, (verse 12). To this her thoughts reverted as the soothing light of the lamp fell upon her; and wearied much with sorrow, she fell into one of those calm moods of meditation, in which the thoughts arise spontaneously, and pass, as on a mirror, before the mind, seeming but the reflection of objects presented by an external, but invisible, power. It appeared to her as though the lamp before the altar were enlarged in its dimensions, and became a golden font, in the midst of which burnt a flame, celestial in its purity and brightness; while over its edge flowed on every side, a rich amber wave of purest oil, some of which was caught up by unseen hands in golden phials, and borne away as a precious treasure into the Church's stores; whence dispensed, in a triple stream, it hallowed the child, consecrated the high priests of God, and anointed the dying wrestler against the powers of hell; while some fell in drops like balm upon her and others, and where it fell closed a wound, or healed a sore, or soothed a pain, or stilled a throb. It dropped upon her lips, and it was bitter with the bitterness of myrrh, but withal savory, and as a cordial to her breast. Then as she wondered whence came this marvellous overflow of abundance (like the filling of the widow of Sarepta's vessels), she saw above a branch of a dark and gloomy olive, which over hung it, and distilled into it, from its purple fruit, thick, clammy drops of healing juice. And when again she wondered whence this chosen plant derived its sacred sap, she looked naturally down towards its twisted roots, and there beheld One prostrate as in anguish and prayer. His face could not be seen, for His pale forehead touched the ground; but His dark robe seemed as studded with princely gems, rubies, or carbuncles, of sparkling brightness. And by degrees these increased in size and began to flow, trickling, as a dew, upon that consecrated ground. For they were the first life-drops, earnest of a fuller flow, which burst through those pores, whence virtue went out to heal all. By these was fed and enriched, while it was hallowed, that tree which first, after the deluge, put forth branches of promise, of peace, and of hope, and sent by the dove the first tidings of reconciliation to the world baptised. And hence the fruit of that tree was made third in order of the earth's most precious produce, joined ever to the "corn and the wine" in the threats and in the promises of prophecy,* and forming with them the triple power, whereby men are multiplied and strengthened in sacramental life.†

To that thoughtful child's heart there seemed as clear connection between this consecration and its fruits, as there was between our Lord's descending into the waters of Jordan, and the mystical sanctification of that cleansing element. The olive consecrated by the holy unction of our Redeemer's first blood, became to the Church a sacred tree, whose juice can soften, nourish, heal, render at once supple and strong, the soul sacramentally, as the body naturally, and alone is fit, with the produce of the industry of the virgin bee, to light up the Sanctuary of God.‡ These musings of the sorrowful child brought their consolation, by leading her thoughts to that scene of sorrow, in which even agony of mind may learn resignation. And this thought struck her. If in the courts of the heavenly Jerusalem it shall be said to holy virgins, spouses of the Lamb, "God, thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness," shall it not be said that here below there is an oil of affliction too, with which the servants of God are anointed, and rendered thereby no less pleasing? And happy the virgin who, waiting for her Bridegroom, has her lamp trimmed with this holy oil, aye, and plenty of it in her vessel too, lest it be extinguished. And if it fail her, oh! let her hasten in time thither, where best it can be found and procured, to the Mount of Olives, the hill of unction and of light.

While the youthful contemplative was enjoying these thoughts, and praying that her lamp might be found burning whenever the summons should come, her mother touched her shoulder, and admonished her that it was time to return home. The visions of her childish imagination melted away, and she found herself once more, basking in the mild lustre of the Sanctuary's lamp.

CHAPTER III.

ITS EXTINCTION.

"The light shall be dark in his tabernacle, and the lamp that is over him shall be put out." Job xviii.

It is a trite remark, that as a lamp will shine the more brightly in proportion to the darkness which surrounds it, so will virtue appear more brilliant when the gloom of adversity has closed around it. Or, still drawing our illustration from our subject, we may say, that as the lamps of Gideon's soldiers *Deut. xi. : 14; and xxviii. : 51. Jer. xxxi. : 12. Os. ii. : 8.

†Ps. iv. : 8. "By the fruit of their corn, wine, and oil, they have been multiplied."

‡To burn gas (as the lamp) before the altar, or upon it, is not only in contradiction to every mystical feeling and symbolical principle, but seems positively unbecoming. With what can it associate the mind except with the bituminous and sulphurous classes of natural productions, and with the exhalations of the depths of the earth—things and places more akin to the awful, than to the consoling, dealings of God with man?

did not show their dazzling brilliancy, till the vessels of clay in which they were inclosed had been bruised, broken, and utterly crushed, so did the virtues of Pierrot's wife and daughter break forth with increased lustre, the more their poor humanity was bowed down, the more their bodies were wasted with want, and their hearts broken with affliction. Upon that of the daughter a new grief seemed now to have come; but though it passed occasionally like a cloud over her brow, sufficiently distinct not to escape her watchful mother's eye, yet was it always succeeded immediately by a bright serenity, which clearly came not from earthly consolation. While they were sitting together at their work in silence, a sigh would escape her, a tear would steal down; but the next instant her hands would drop upon her knees, her eyes and countenance be upturned toward heaven, a bright smile would beam upon her features, and her lips would move as if addressing some one near. In those moments her mother ventured not to address her, but would gaze on her in admiration and awe, believing her to be in close communion with better spirits.

At length, one day she asked her what now so much occupied her thoughts. "I will conceal nothing from you, my dearest mother," replied the child; "the truth is, I can hardly bear to think that in a few days my term of consecration, under your vow, will expire, and that I must put off my white garment, and resume that of the world."

"And yet, my child," her mother answered, "it is better for us all that it should be so. You are now getting strong enough to go to work in the fields, and this is impossible in your present attire. Nor can I go and leave you alone at home. It is indeed necessary that we should exert ourselves more and more; for"—she paused, for what she was going to say would have been a reproach to her husband, and that she would not utter. But her tears expressed her meaning. Her daughter replied:

"It is not that I grudge toil, or shrink from being what I in truth am, a poor peasant girl; but I feel as though, in putting off this religious attire, I shall be exposing myself more completely to the dangers and temptations of the world; and, perhaps losing some claim to that protection of the Queen of Heaven, as whose child I have been till now brought up.

"But it is time, my dear mother, that I should tell you of an offering which I made on that night when, for the first time, he absented himself from home, and have often since repeated before the altar. There I have again and again prayed that I may never be allowed to put off my white garments, but may be allowed to bear them down into my grave unstained, and farther"—she hesitated and faltered as she added, "I have begged of God to take my life in exchange for my dear father's conversion and return to virtue. I cannot help hoping that my prayer and offering have been accepted."

Her mother was greatly troubled on hearing this, and hastily answered: "Beware, my child, lest you tempt Heaven. May God hear your prayer on behalf of your poor father, but not on that condition. Indeed," she added, after a moment's reflection. "I do not see what reason there can be to fear it; for never, in spite of our sufferings, did you seem to me stronger or in better health."

It was now, notwithstanding, finally arranged between mother and daughter, that on the morning of the anniversary of the vow they should proceed very early to the church, so to enjoy a few hours' silent prayer, by the light of the sacred lamp, which the child loved so much, before receiving Communion in thanksgiving; after which, she would change her white dress for the ordinary peasant's cloak and so return home. And these preliminaries arranged, and the priest's consent obtained, who was to leave the church door open for them, they both forbore to revert again to the subject. Only Marie seemed ever intent on it, in her thoughts, now occupied in preparing the dress in which she would make her last appearance, as one consecrated to God, that its whiteness and purity might be perfect; and in weaving a garland of choicest flowers, as her last offering, to crown the image of her Lady and Patroness.

But once again, we must withdraw our reader's attention from the contemplation of the virtues of mother and daughter, to trace the ruinous course of the unfortunate Pierrot, and see him plunged, at last, into the lowest abyss of guilt and degradation. The month was expired, which had been agreed on before the commission of the crime, promised to be his last. The day in fact was come, on the night of which it had to be perpetrated, and still an impenetrable secret was preserved by all around him as to what it was to be. By this time, every thing worth moving in the house of the two accomplices, was packed up for instant flight, and mules were in readiness to carry their baggage and families over the frontiers. As to himself, he had not taken any measures, to fly or to secure himself against the pursuit of justice; not merely because he was in such ignorance about the crime, that he knew not how he could best shape his course, especially with his family on his hands; but also, because he was almost reckless as to consequences, and hardly cared what the result might be. A prey to remorse, to shame, and to bitter grief, he would have preferred a prison, the galleys, or the scaffold, to his present state; and forgot all consequences and risks in the assurance that, after this one crime he should be freed from his present thralldom. During that last day of his partnership in guilt, his companions strove to occupy his thoughts and divert him from unpleasant anticipations by their wild discourse; and after their meal they plied him with drink, which, if it did not actually intoxicate him, dulled his faculties, and heated his blood. He was ready for anything, and he seemed to have made up his mind for any crime, in a desperate mood of excitement, almost amounting to frenzy. And still he shuddered within himself at thinking that possibly murder might be demanded from him; no other wicked deed now seemed to him terrible or impossible. And yet, when the proposed crime was unveiled to him, it was as much beyond his thoughts as this, and appeared to him no less frightful; and he shrank from it with a trembling horror that staggered his very companions.

It was not till late that night, when on the point of starting from their house, that the object of their expedition was revealed to Pierrot. It was no less than to plunder the church of Mont-Marie, to strip it of its silver donatives, its rich altar-plate, the ornaments of its image and its tabernacle, and carry the whole over the frontier into Spain. They had made all necessary arrangements for concealing or melting down their rich booty, so as to escape detection.

Had a thunderbolt struck the head of the unfortunate Pierrot, he could hardly have been more stunned than he was on hearing this. The moment he was a little recovered from his first amazement he began to storm and protest that no consideration on earth should ever prevail on him to commit so horrible and so ungrateful a sacrilege. But his companions now knew their power, and dealt with him as a skilful angler does with a fish that feels the first smart of the hook; they gave him play, and allowed him to vent his feelings; and then, when he had exhausted his first burst of passion, began to draw him into the full gripe of their wicked might. For this purpose, they represented to him that it was too late to draw back—for if he attempted it, they would immediately fulfil their threats of delivering him up. They told him that it was mere folly to shrink from the commission of one crime more, which they had promised him should be his last; that if ever he repented, it would be as easy to repent of this as of its predecessors; if not, that he was fully lost by what he had already done, and could not make his case worse. Many other wicked arguments and persuasions they employed, and when at last all else had failed, they savagely threatened to wreak their vengeance upon his family, and to proceed at once to murder his wife and daughter.

They had two motives for this cruel earnestness, in wishing to have him as their accomplice. First, from his conversations they had ascertained that he knew accurately what was of real and what of apparent value among the ornaments of the church; what was really of silver and what only of baser metal.

as he had often assisted as voluntary sacristan there in his better days. They, on the contrary, had never taken more than a cursory glance at the riches accumulated in the sanctuary—enough to inflame their desires but not to guide them in the selection of spoil. But, farther, they had a still baser and blacker motive; they had only valued Pierrot as a tool, and having no farther use for his active services after that night, it was their intention to make him serviceable as a victim, by flying themselves, and leaving him behind to be seized on by public justice, so themselves to elude its pursuit. His connection with them, who would, of course, be suspected, and the weakness of his character, which would make him at once own his guilt, would bring down upon him the vengeance of the law, which would thus be less eager in its search after them. Such were the fiendish feelings of his companions for him; such, in other words, is the friendship of the wicked!

The terrible menace of the ruffians was uttered with such rage, and yet in so determined a tone, that, with Pierrot's experience of their character, he saw it was made in earnest, and would be unscrupulously carried into execution. His resolution failed him; the thought of all his past neglect and cruel abandonment of those whom in his secret heart he still loved and actually revered rushed upon him. Must he in the end prove their death, their murderer in some sort? He could not bear to think it, and in an agony of contending feelings, and with a protest to heaven, he chose what he thought the lesser curse, and consented to accompany his tyrants.

Time urged, for they had lost much of the night in this contention; but still it wanted some hours to day, and the robbers durst not now put off their enterprise. Silent and sullen they reached the church-door, and it was agreed that one should stay outside with the mule, and keep watch, while the leader with Pierrot should enter, and bring out the spoil.

They found the door unlocked; but this did not surprise them; for no one in the neighborhood ever dreamt of the possibility of sacrilege. Cautiously and silently they opened it, and entered in. Both paused upon the threshold, as if overawed; even the hardened robber seemed afraid to advance. So deeply still and silent was that lonely sanctuary, that Pierrot could actually hear his heart beat against his side, as it throbbed in remorse and fear. The flame of the lamp was burning bright and clear, and the entire holy place basked in its tempered radiance. Never, in his days of virtue, had it looked to him more sacred, more venerable, or more lovely, than it did on this night of his basest treachery! Never did the silver and jewels of the altar beam more joyously, never did the saints from the walls look down upon him more softly, never did the image over the altar seem to gaze upon him with a sweeter, blander smile, than now that his mind was bent on sacrilege! "Ah, Judas!" they all seemed to say to him in words of soft reproof, "wilt thou betray the spouse of the Son of Man with a kiss?" He could not bear the sight, and he cast his eyes upon the ground; and there he thought he saw his infant child, as she lay seven years before on the steps before him, slumbering once more the sleep of health, and himself kneeling in quiet gratitude beside her. Yes, every thing around him looked to him now just as it did then—all except his own breast; alas! how changed was that! He flung his vision, by a forcible effort, from his imagination, and raised his eyes; and in doing so, encountered the steady gaze of the lamp, which shed all this beauty and mysterious charm on every object. What the eye of a man—"the light of his body"—is to his other features, even that did the pure solitary flame of the sanctuary's lamp appear to Pierrot's mind: it was its eye, through which it looked keenly, yet mildly upon him; as if to see whether or no he would have heart to do his wicked deed. Whatever spell there is in the human eye to arrest the murderer's stroke, or the savage beast's assault; that same power did this eye of the Sanctuary exercise over his soul; it charmed and fixed him immovable to the spot; not all the promises or threats of earth would have influenced him to attempt a crime so long as it beamed upon him. Nay, to his sight, it was a superhuman intelligence that darted from it; they were rays that penetrated into his bosom and pried into his heart, that came towards him from it; they had a voice that spoke, they had a point that pierced, though tenderly. However the beams might play around objects beyond and around, and dance and linger on their way, to him they came direct and rigid, and swift as arrows from a bow, cutting through the darkness between, and not enlightening it, but leaving it darkness still. Yes, it seemed to him as an angel's gaze; the look of the heavenly Watchman deputed to keep ward, and pay homage there, during the silent hours of night; the Guardian of the sacred treasure, but whose power was only to milden, to soften, but not to strike or to destroy. And even thus did that light more subdue him and make him coward. Sooner would he have faced, it seemed to him, a seraph brandishing a sword of fire, or angels with scourges in their hands, than this noiseless and harmless protector of the Sanctuary and its treasures. Is not grace about to triumph in him?

This succession of thoughts and feelings in Pierrot's mind, occupied in reality but a few moments; but these were quite enough to tire the patience of his companion, who, though clearly overawed, had not the same associations to work, nor the same heart to be worked on, as Pierrot. He soon broke in on the reverie which held him entranced, and shaking him by the arm, said in a whisper—yes, the ruffian durst not speak, in that light, in a higher tone:

"Come, come, comrade, we are losing time; let us begin."

"I cannot," said Pierrot, in the same voice; "I dare not."

"Nonsense!" gruffly urged the robber; "are you a child? Remember your promise. To work, then, at once."

"I will not," replied his poor victim. "Not for the world will I rob her who here gave me back my daughter, on a night like this."

"And do you wish to murder her on such a night, too?" growled the savage, with set teeth, and the look of a tiger.

"If you will not remember your promise, remember my threat. Ten minutes will take us to your house, and five more will finish our work there. Refuse, and in a quarter of an hour you will be a childless widower."

Pierrot's heart quailed, his heart shuddered and quivered at the thought. The moment of grace was over; the demon had again triumphed, and in the recklessness of despair, he exclaimed:

"Be it so, then; let me accomplish my doom! To work; but not by this light: no, grant me this at least—not by this light."

"Why not?" asked the other. "Is it not enough?"

"Never mind," said Pierrot; "but not by this light. Let it be in total darkness, if you please: that would be better. But rather uncover your dark lantern, that will be best." And as he spoke, he shaded his eyes with his hand, that he might not see the lamp.

The robber, muttering something to the effect, that he too did not like that light much, uncovered his lantern. Its lurid red gleam streaming through the coarse smoked glass appeared at once to contaminate the chaste light that before illuminated the holy place. It was like a stream of blood defiling, on a sudden, a crystal fountain; or the glare of a burning cottage breaking into the summer moonlight. Yet it was comforting to Pierrot, and seemed to dispel his fears. His companion saw it, and cheered him on, saying:

"Come on, we must make up for lost time. I see you do not like that lamp. Ha! ha! we will get rid of it at once. It is silver, I have heard you say; so pull it down, and untie it, while I take down the candlesticks from the altar."

Pierrot had just the same thought. So with desperate resolution, and still shrouding his eyes, he advanced to the lamp, pulled it violently down, and, with one powerful breath, extinguished it.

In the same instant, a shriek rent his ears, so sudden, so sharp, and so full of agony, that it did not seem to proceed from human utterance, but to come from some being of another world. Whether it came from afar or from near, from the sky above, or from the ground below, or from the country around, neither he nor his companion could tell. For it was instantaneous, and was neither prolonged nor repeated. But so immediately did it follow, or rather accompany, the extinction of the lamp, that both Pierrot and his companion naturally connected the two occurrences together, as cause and effect.

CHAPTER IV.

ITS RE-KINDLING.

"Accende lumen sensibus, Infunde amorem cordibus."

"Restore Thy light to the fading sight,
And Thy love impart to the fainting heart."

Hymn.

"Her lamp shall not be put out in the night." Prov. xxxi. 18.

The fearful cry which we described at the close of the last chapter, struck terror into the breasts of the sacrilegious robbers. The ruffian leader shook, with affright, from head to foot, his teeth chattered, and the lantern fell from his trembling hand, and was extinguished. Both he and Pierrot rushed to the door and hurried out. There they found their companion equally terrified with themselves.

"Did you hear that?" they both exclaimed.

"Hear it?" said he, with a trembling voice. "Aye, and do not wish, or intend, ever to hear it again. Let us be gone; I will have nothing more to do with robbing churches. I never liked the job much from the beginning."

Both the robbers were now thoroughly alarmed, and fled as quickly as possible towards their homes, leaving Pierrot to shift for himself. His first impulse should have been, to give thanks to God for his own escape from the actual commission of a dreadful crime, and for that of his wife and daughter from the vengeance of his brutal comrades. But fear, as yet froze up every other, and every better feeling, and he only thought of running away from the scene of his wickedness, and finding shelter from the terrible cry which rung in his imagination. Instinctively he took the road towards home, and hurried along it in the dark, as quickly as his trembling knees would allow him. His remorse gave him no peace, and he fancied himself pursued; every howl of the wind in the deep ravine, sounded to him as the voice of an angry multitude in chase of him, every waving branch and quivering bough looked to him as a sword or staff shaken over his head. Yet, still he halted not; but on, on he ran in breathless haste.

He came to the place we have before described, where a gentle slope led up from the wider road to the narrow path skirting the precipice. He ran up it in breathless haste; the grey twilight was just beginning to appear, when by it he saw, standing on the narrow path before him, a wild-looking figure, whose hair and garments streamed to the wind, immovable as the rock that overhung it. He paused and staggered. The words of Scripture which had once terrified him in an eloquent preacher's mouth came to his thoughts. "Fiat via illorum tenebræ et lubricum, et Angelus Domini coarctans eos."* He thought of Balaam stopped by an avenging angel in the narrow path. It seemed to him, as if the same judgment had overtaken him in the most perilous pass. And yet the terror he had left behind him urged him on, and he determined, at all risks, to face any danger before him, so that he might reach his home. He rushed forward at once to the object of his terror, but still it moved not; he stood close to it, and it stirred not. He gazed with mingled terror and anxiety—it was his wife!

There she stood as if bereft of sense and speech, on the very brink of the precipice, looking intently down into its depth. She saw him not, she heeded him not; and even when he had grasped her arm and addressed her by her name, and told her who he was, she started not, and turned not towards him, but still kept her eyes fixed in the same direction.

"Annette!" he exclaimed, almost distracted with this new sorrow, "what are you looking at? what is there below there, that so rivets your sight and mind?"

She replied not, but only pointed at a white object below.

"What is that?" he again asked: "a white stone? some sheep in the valley?"

"Yes," she replied, and they were her first words: "our own lamb—Marie."

"How?" cried out the wretched man, "what is she doing there?"

At these words her sense seemed to return to the unhappy mother, and turning round, and calmly confronting her husband, she said to him:

"Pierrot you have no doubt forgotten that this night is the seventh anniversary of our dear child's miraculous recovery. This morning we were going to our Sanctuary to pray a while in silence, by the dear light of its lamp, before she put off her white robes. She was tripping lightly and securely before me, when suddenly we lost sight of the light from the lamp; and she naturally thinking (as I should have done had I been first) that it was time to turn, did so, and fell over the precipice. I gave but one shriek, and fell down senseless."

Pierrot felt as if a sword was driven through his heart. In a tone of agony he exclaimed: "I have, then, this night murdered my child! it was I who put out the lamp!" and before his wife could stop him, he had flung himself over the edge of the precipice; and seizing hold of the weak shrubs which grew from its clefts, he let himself down from crag to crag, by a path which the most daring hunter would not have ventured to try. Fragments of rock crumbled from under his feet and rolled down with terrible roar, the bushes cracked and crashed as he tore through them, regardless of bruise or tear; and in a few moments he stood or rather kneeled, by the object at which his wife had pointed.

It was the body of his daughter, lying placid as if asleep, in a soft brake. Not a limb was broken, not a feature discomposed, not a scratch or rent inflicted on her or her garments; the very garland she had borne as an offering was still in her hand, and her white cloak was gathered gracefully around her. The body of St. Catharine, carried by angels to Mount Sinai, could not have been more gently laid down by their hands. For so light and brisk had been her step, that she did not stumble or slip over the perilous edge, but flew over clear of its surface; and life must have been extinct without pain, long before she reached ground below.

Pierrot knelt by her side, for some time, in deep anguish, but in earnest prayer; then taking her in his arms, as reverently as he would have handled a sacred relic, proceeded along the valley, till he came to the same slope which he had ascended, with very different feelings, a few moments before, and returned along the path to the place where he had left his wife. He found her still riveted, as if entranced, to the spot. When he brought his precious burden near her, she shed not a tear, she gave not way to a single expression of womanly grief—her mind seemed absorbed in the consideration of what had occurred, which seemed to her something more mysterious than a mere accident or human event.

She pressed her lips with deep devotion, on the pale, but yet warm, brow of her child, and addressed her husband in these words:

"Pierrot, the words which you just now spoke, are buried forever in the faithful bosom of your wife. But, they have recalled to my mind the words of your prayer just seven years ago, when you begged for your child's life, until some sacrilegious hand extinguished the lamp before the altar. Do you remember?" Pierrot's frame quivered, as he made a sign of assent. She continued: "Then your prayer was heard to the letter; and you have no right to complain.

"But she, too, hath prayed long and earnestly for two favors, and one at least has been granted. She had entreated, not to be permitted to put off the white garments which conseerated her to God and His Blessed Mother, but to be laid in them on her bier. I thought but a few hours ago, that there was no danger of this being granted. But in the hearing of your prayer, hers has received its boon. She made another, too, but I know not yet its result."

"What was it?" eagerly asked Pierrot. She replied:

"She offered up the life which she prized so little, as a sacrifice, to obtain your return to grace and virtue."

"Then she has been heard," answered with broken sobs, the unhappy Pierrot.

He had scarcely uttered these words, when a bright light darted to the eyes of each, as if a bright star had on a sudden arisen. They looked around in amazement; it was the light of the lamp rekindled in the Sanctuary, and again shining on the narrow and slippery path. Both hailed the omen, or rather the emblem and token of returning grace.

The good priest had been awakened by the cry that had startled the robbers, and had arisen to ascertain its cause. He went first to his chapel, and to his astonishment found it dark. It was some time before he procured a light, and had in that moment relighted the lamp. On finding it drawn down, and still more on perceiving that the door was open, and discovering the lantern on the ground, he saw at once that he had had a narrow escape from sacrilege. How this had been prevented he could not conceive, and he remained examining every place, and pondering on the strange circumstance, when he perceived footsteps approaching. His alarm was changed into grief, when he saw that it was Pierrot and his wife, the former bearing in his arms the dead body of his daughter.

It was long before his sympathising sorrow allowed him to listen to the mother's tale of affliction. She told it at last without mentioning her husband's name, except where she described him as madly rushing down the precipice to recover his child. But the good old man now saw his own, and a no less beautiful, solution of the mysteries of that night than that of the parents, as he said:

"Now I understand it all. Not only has her wish been gratified, of never returning to a worldly garb, but she has proved the guardian and protecting spirit of this her favorite Sanctuary, which she so much adorned. But for that fatal accident to her and the pang it caused her mother the robbers, whoever they were, would have accomplished their work. For, no doubt, the cry which awoke me, scared them. By her death she has saved this holy place from pillage. She was herself as a second Lamp of the Sanctuary; how natural that putting out of one should cause the extinction of the other."

Their plans were soon arranged. A bier was placed in the middle of the church, on the very spot where she loved to kneel, and covered with a black velvet pall. Upon it, facing the altar, the corpse was placed, in its snow-white spotless dress, the hands with her crucifix placed between them, and her beads twined around them, were joined on the breast; her long silken tresses floated on her shoulders, and the wreath which she herself had twined was placed upon her head.

On either side knelt one of her now broken-hearted parents; but Pierrot soon passed to the knees of the venerable pastor, where he poured forth with deep contrition and burning tears the history of his past crimes, and exchanged the stinging worm of a remorseful conscience, for the tender consolation of loving repentance, and assurance of pardon by the absolution of Christ's minister.

He was again at his former post, kneeling by the body of his child. But now her spirit seemed to him to hover in the soft radiance above him, and to smile upon him in the rays of the sacred lamp. He could imagine it mingling with angelic choirs descending to rejoice over the sinner brought to repentance, and flitting around him, hand in hand with that guardian spirit who had never abandoned him in all his wanderings. And as he looked, to assure himself of the reality of his state, to the bier beside him, it seemed to him as if a new smile had played upon her features, and a tinge of life had returned to her countenance.

Morning was come, and the well-known death-bell sounded from the little turret of the chapel. The neighbors started at its voice, for they had heard of no illness near them, and crowded in kind anxiety to the Sanctuary. They faltered as they entered, in astonishment and sorrow. The tale was soon whispered from one to another; the flight of those naturally suspected of the attempted sacrilege, confirmed all their conjectures, while Pierrot's being with his wife and daughter screened him from suspicion.

Many tears of unaffected sorrow graced that funeral, but shed more in sympathy for the survivors, than from grief over her whom all now envied. Mothers held up their little ones to look upon that corpse; and instead of shrinking from it in terror, they stretched out their arms to ask to embrace it.

There was long in the cemetery of Mont-Marie a grave greener than all the rest, and decked each day by children's hands with the fairest flowers; and if you had asked any of the little laborers whose it was he would have told you with wondering eyes that it was Marie's—as if no one else had ever been called there by that name.

After some years there were two other graves near the favorite spot; they were those of her parents, honored by all for virtue and venerable old age. Pierrot left it to be told after his death how his virtue and his happiness, his crimes, his punishment, his repentance, and his forgiveness, had been wonderfully connected with the Lamp of the Sanctuary.

GRANDFATHER KEROUAN.

I NEVER had the happiness of knowing my mother; she died a few hours after my birth. My relatives were all very poor, and my father owed his honorable position in the world entirely to his own talents and industry. After distinguishing himself at the bar by his eloquence, he was, in 1816, elected Attorney-General. Being a widower, and constantly occupied in the duties of his office, he was obliged to entrust me to the care of strangers; but his affection made him wary in the choice of instructors, and the school which sheltered my infancy proved his tender solicitude.

At the age of fourteen I was removed to an establishment for more advanced students, where the sciences were taught and youths prepared for the learned professions.

This house, situated in one of the most beautiful suburbs of Paris, was deservedly celebrated. The terms were high, on account of the first-rate masters who attended, and the domestic arrangements, which were far superior in point of comfort.

to the generality of schools. It was rather extraordinary that one so poor as myself should be placed in such an establishment, but in this respect my father might, perhaps, have done more than his circumstances warranted, and his love for me was so great that he would, if necessary, have deprived himself of every comfort to give me a complete education. On my arrival I was kindly received and welcomed by a youth of my own age, who frankly offered me his friendship. His countenance was mild and prepossessing, his manners cordial and elegant; and sad as I was at the separation from my father, whom I had been visiting a month, and depressed at the idea of being thrown amongst so many boys so much older than myself, I gratefully and eagerly met his advances. In our youthful years, before distrust chills our affections, a few days intimacy is often sufficient to form a friendship, and Henri, for that was the name of my young companion, soon became very dear to me. My friend had however a fault trifling, perhaps, in the eyes of some, but in reality one of great importance, since it invariably more or less corrupts the heart of those infected by it.

Henri's besetting sin was vanity, and unfortunately he enjoyed many advantages, which greatly contributed to foster and encourage this fault, nor did he make the slightest effort either to conceal or subdue it. His father was said to be immensely rich, and Henri was more favored than the other pupils.

In addition to the lessons which we shared, he received others from first-class masters, and his purse, always well filled, testified the generosity of his father, as well as the prosperous state of his finances. It must, however, be owned that Henri spent his money nobly. He was always ready to assist the poor of the neighborhood, and to oblige his school-fellows.

In our various conversations, Henri often spoke to me of his prospects; he was astonished, he said, to see his father persist in continuing his trade; and he was still more surprised that he should purchase good farms at high prices rather than some old estate, which would have raised his position in life, and given him importance in society.

Mr. Georges, however, completely disregarded these vain ideas of his son; he was a worthy man, his countenance was intelligent and benevolent, but his figure was extremely vulgar; he was very short, prodigiously stout, and his dress was invariably negligent and badly chosen.

These latter were certainly not the characteristics of a noble chatelain, such as poor Henri would have wished to depict him to our imaginations. Generally, when he visited the school, he was first subjected to the impertinent criticisms of his son, whose attention was invariably directed to the dress of his father, and Henri would often exhaust, in impertinent and foolish remarks, that time which ought to have been delightfully spent in the interchange of mutual affection. The good man would listen to his son with patience, then, with an expression of reproachful pity, he would slightly shrug his shoulders, and abruptly change the conversation.

This improper conduct, on the part of Henri, was so often repeated, that at length it aroused the malicious curiosity of the pupils, and there was a daily deluge of jokes on the unknown trade of Mr. Georges, a trade which all agreed in pronouncing very lucrative, but of which no one could discover the nature; for Henri would endure no raillery on the subject, and roughly silenced every question relative to this delicate point.

Mr. Georges was in the habit of giving an annual fête champêtre, to which he invited all the pupils, without exception, and a happy day it was for us.

Early in the morning our kind host would send carriages to take us to his country house, at Belleville, where a magnificent breakfast awaited our arrival; after a part of the day spent in various games, we had a splendid dinner; the evening concluded with a concert and ball, and the whole was arranged with so much taste and kindness that, for a month at least, the most malicious and discontented could not find the least cause for censure.

For nearly two years I had been the constant companion of Henri, and our friendship had never once been disturbed; for, without the fault I have mentioned, my friend would have been perfect; and yet I did not appreciate him as he deserved.

I had still a long course of study before me, and I was anticipating the enjoyment of my friend's society for at least eighteen months longer, when, one morning, the principal called me into his study; he held in his hand a letter, sealed with black—My father was dead! and I had not been summoned to receive his last blessing, or hear his last wishes!—I had only some poor relatives, who resided at a distance, and my father had died insolvent; I was a beggar.

I must leave the college before having finished my education; I must renounce all hope of an honorable profession, and endure the misery of a life of poverty, and I was but sixteen!

Overwhelmed with grief, I flew to Henri for consolation.

"Oh! do not weep thus," said he; "depend upon my friendship—your tears break my heart."

At this moment the ringing of the bell announced a visitor. Mr. Georges was in the parlor, and Henri went to him.

A quarter of an hour had scarcely elapsed when I was summoned. On my entrance, Mr. Georges came forward to meet me, and, affectionately embracing me, said: "Young man, I am rich; you shall share as a brother with my son, until you can, yourself, provide for your necessities," and as tears choked my utterance, he again tenderly embraced me, repeating, "I will be your father."

Oh! how noble and beautiful I now thought the countenance which I had so often deemed coarse and vulgar. Kind and worthy man! May God reward him for all the benefits he showered on me; to him I owe a profession which I fondly love; a profession which enables me to defend the widow and protect the orphan.

I remained the brother and intimate friend of my good Henri, but I soon perceived that his unfortunate defect increased with his years, and I was incessantly obliged to remonstrate with him, calling to my aid his reason, and especially his heart, which was still excellent.

For a long period good Mr. Georges seldom came; his manner towards his son became reserved, and occasionally he seemed to have a difficulty in checking expressions of evident disapproval of that odious vanity, which, with all its hideous results, at length became so evident to his eyes; but an entreating look from Henri would make him pause, and the affectionate father seemed to shrink from inflicting humiliation on his son.

One day, as he was bidding Henri farewell, after they had been walking in the college garden, an ignorant and conceited youth, newly arrived at school, inquired who that vulgar old man could possibly be.

Feeling more wounded in his vanity than grieved at this insult to the best of parents, and, yielding to his wicked fault, Henri blushing replied that the man was his father's steward.

In his confusion and anxiety Henri had spoken loudly enough to be heard; good Mr. Georges went away grieved and dejected, and for a whole month he never visited us, but after the expiration of that time all the pupils received an invitation to Bellville.

As usual, there was to be a dinner and ball, and in addition an illumination, to celebrate, as the note expressed, an extraordinary event.

On this occasion our generous host even exceeded his previous kindness and liberality. The whole of his house was placed at our disposal, and every conceivable amusement was procured for us. Henri's vanity was perfectly satisfied with the luxury displayed by his father; twenty times he endeavored to thank him, but Mr. Georges always silently and quickly turned away from him.

After dinner we all assembled in the drawing-room; in the middle was a small table, on which was placed a magnificent ebony box inlaid with silver. Every eye was immediately attracted towards this beautiful object. It had evidently been placed where it was to serve some especial purpose, and our curiosity was greatly excited when Mr. Georges, taking his son's hand, placed him by his side, and spoke as follows:

"You know, my dear young friends, that I have always great pleasure in welcoming you here; you are the companions of my Henri, and this alone would give you a claim to my attention, for you know how I love him.

"On this day he completes his seventeenth year; he is no longer a child, and he ought to be able to make a worthy use of the fortune and title bequeathed to him by his ancestors. This box contains the title deeds of our family, and I wish to deliver them to Henri in your presence. May these precious relics be respected by him, as by myself; and may the banner of our ancestors incite him to imitate their honor and their virtues.

"And now, my dear guests, allow me to relate a short history, which is both instructive and amusing.

"On a cold, gloomy December morning, a poor man left the village of Glomel, in Bretagne, and, pursuing the pathway leading to the mountains, he slowly toiled up the rocky road. Although the cold was excessive, and his clothes were covered with hoar frost, yet the poor man often stopped to wipe his heated brow. It was poor Kerouan, a brave and worthy soldier, who had lost one of his legs in the service of the first republic.

"When the old veteran had reached the mountain top, he rapped with his crutch at the door of a poor cottage. The door was immediately opened, and three boys, of whom the eldest might be about fourteen, threw themselves into the old man's arms.

"'Good morning, grandfather!' they exclaimed in one voice.

"'Good morning, children, good morning.'

"Saying this, Kerouan took the heavy wallet from his back.

"'Alas!' said he in a low voice, 'I am getting very lame, I cannot walk as I used.'

"The old soldier had lived a long time in this cottage with his son Simon, who was a fisherman, his wife and his three children. One sad day poor Simon was lost in a storm at sea, and his wife died of grief.

"The poor children had now no one to provide for them but old Kerouan, and he was without the least resource. The villagers were, however, very kind, and Kerouan accepted their alms for a time, not for himself, but for his poor grandchildren.

"But, as he was very industrious, he was soon able to do without the assistance of others; he brought up the boys honestly, sent them to school, and they soon learned to read and write very nicely.

"When Kerouan was seated, he took off his large round hat, shook the frost from his long white hair, put on an old woollen cap, and dividing into equal portions the bread for breakfast, he spoke thus to his grandsons:

"'My dear children, you are now old enough to gain your livelihood; remember that it is disgraceful to beg, and God only allows it when it is absolutely impossible to do otherwise, for if we beg unnecessarily, we deprive those of bread who are poorer than ourselves.

"'Peter, you are now fourteen, you are strong and healthy, you must work. Charles, you are twelve, you are active, and your eyes are good, you must use them. As for you, my little George, you are only eleven, but you have famous strong legs, you must exercise them.'

"'But what are we to do?' exclaimed the three boys, 'we do not know any one, and we have not been taught any trade.'

"'Listen, my boys; there are many occupations of the poor which interfere with no one; I have hitherto supported you, but I can do so no longer, for I am old and infirm. There are many things lost in the world, because no one thinks of making them useful; but with industry we can derive benefit from all, and I will show you how it is. Thus, I have been enabled to bring you up, and I think you have no reason to complain of me.'

"The boys embraced him tenderly.

"'You shall now see,' added Kerouan, 'what may be accomplished by strict economy; if you can succeed in saving fifteen centimes daily, at the end of the year you will each have amassed thirty-four francs, and in ten years that will amount to five hundred and forty francs.'

"'We will follow your advice, dear grandfather,' said the boys.

"As soon as the severity of the season had passed, Grandfather Kerouan commenced his journey with Peter, Charles and George. He first directed their attention to all the old bones, which had been thrown away as useless. 'Pick them up,' said he, 'for with the whitest of these bones cutlers and turners make all kinds of articles for their trade, and they are often mistaken for ivory. The discolored bones are sold to gardeners, who use them to fasten their trees to the walls, bone pegs being better than wooden ones. The refuse is sold to be burnt; and the ashes are used in various arts, and also for manuring land, and it is called animal black.

"'Oh, this is good for nothing,' said Peter, throwing away the broken neck of a bottle, which had nearly cut him.

"'But, pick it up my boy,' said Kerouan, 'pieces of glass are melted, and are bought to mix with new glass, for glass, heated to a certain degree, becomes liquid, like water; it is then put into moulds, or blown, and acquires any desired form.'

"In crossing a wood, they saw some wild cherries and mushrooms. The old soldier taught them to distinguish the good mushrooms from the poisonous ones. 'Never keep those,' said he, 'which change their color when broken, and have an acrid, disagreeable smell. All good mushrooms smell like meal newly ground; one may say that nature, like a good mother, tells us which to take or reject.'

"Peter, Charles and George were soon accustomed to this distinction, and carried to a neighboring market all the mushrooms they had gathered; they also often took thither moss, bouquets of roses, and various herbs useful in medicine. The apothecaries at length employed them to procure the roots they needed, and paid them for their trouble; and the boys carried on their trade with so much industry and honesty, that everyone was anxious to employ them.

"In the winter, they gathered into one large heap dead leaves and withered plants, and sold it for manure to the neighboring farmers.

"Wool left on the hedges by sheep rubbing against the thorns; the hair of cows or oxen, which they chanced to see, was picked up, carefully put on one side, and sold to carpet and mattress makers. They bespoke horse-hair from the neighboring farmers, who, wishing to encourage their industry, frequently gave it to them without charge, and they were enabled to dispose of it very profitably to coach-makers and saddlers. Pigs' bristles were collected and sold to brush-makers; pieces of leather to collar-makers; woollen and linen rags were readily bought by paper-makers. They gathered old horse-shoes, pieces of iron and broken nails, and carried them to the iron founders, who gladly purchased them at their full value. In short, nothing escaped their attention, not even a feather fallen from the wing of a goose, that might serve for a pen, or a morsel of down for a cushion.

"It is easy to see that, in this manner, their profits would increase. Sometimes they chanced to find valuable things that had been lost, then Grandfather Kerouan would employ the town crier, and restore them to their owner.

"Thus the well-known honesty of the whole family gained general esteem.

"When the autumn approached our three boys were very busy collecting wild fruits, with which to make vinegar and other things. Along the roads they gathered brambles and nuts, taking care not to injure the hedges; in the woods they collected roots and acorns, which they sold to feed pigs and turkeys; they filled sacks with horse chestnuts, and took them to the mill to be ground, much to the amusement of the country people, who fancied they were going to eat this bitter and nauseous flour; but our youths let them enjoy their jokes, and sold their chestnut meal to bookbinders and other workmen, who used it in their trade.

"In the winter they employed themselves in destroying injurious animals, such as martens, foxes and wolves, selling the skins to furriers; they also made nets, and caught wild game, and sold it to the neighboring towns.

"With all these various occupations, Kerouan found time to teach them how to make willow baskets and chairs, straw mattresses, and hats, etc.

"The labor of the three boys soon produced more than sufficient for the support of the whole family; their good grandfather could remain at home, and their little cottage could scarcely contain all the various articles they collected and brought there, like little birds when building their nests. By degrees they became well known to persons who purchased from them, and understood the value of their merchandize.

"A little portable shop was then bought and hawked by Peter. His stock consisted of laces, combs, needles, pins, tapes, etc., for the neighboring villages, and this also added to their savings. At the end of the year Grandfather Kerouan opened the money-box, and found that, after all expenses were paid, there would remain 235 francs, 15 centimes. He immediately carried this sum to a merchant in the town, who willingly consented to take the money and give interest for it.

"Imagine the joy of our youths; never had they seen such a sum.

"During the following year they succeeded still better; old Kerouan attended to the household concerns, and sold the merchandize collected by his grandsons. At the end of four years they found themselves possessed of 1,200 francs, gained by their industry and labor alone.

"But human nature is weak and frail, and as the three brothers increased in prosperity, so did latent seeds of selfishness spring up in their breasts, causing frequent quarrels, much to the grief of poor Kerouan.

"My children," said he to them one day, as they were sitting round the fire, "you have now reached the age of manhood; you have gained industrious habits, and enjoy good health, for which you are indebted to temperance and a regular life. Let each of you take two hundred francs, and seek your livelihood in the way most agreeable to you. The remainder of the money shall remain with the banker to whom it is entrusted until we need it, and the interest will every year increase the capital. You have already experienced that, with industry, youth and health, you could support yourselves, even without any money to begin with."

"The next day the brothers embraced and separated. Peter directed his steps to the East, Charles towards the West, and George to the South.

"Many years passed, and Kerouan heard nothing of his grandsons; he often regretted having sent them from him, but like a good father, he would not touch his children's money. Being, however, attacked by severe illness, he wrote thus to the banker: 'I am very ill; for several years I have not received any tidings of my grandsons; they are, doubtless, dead, and I feel that I shall follow them.'

"The banker replied: 'I return you your money, you are rich, for your capital has increased by degrees, and now exceeds 4,500 francs.'

"But the old soldier was sad and dejected; every day he wished for death. 'Alas!' said he, 'I shall have no one to close my eyes. Oh! that I had my little George with me, he would support and console my old age!' But Kerouan did not die.

"On a lovely Sunday evening in summer, the old soldier was seated under a tree, chatting sorrowfully to some neighbors about his children, when a servant in handsome livery approached, and inquired whether Baptiste Kerouan lived in the village.

"He is here!" exclaimed several voices, and on looking round they perceived a carriage stopping before the door of the old man's cottage; three young men stepped out, and, hastening to the old soldier, embraced him tenderly.

"My father! my father! do you not know us again," said they.

"I am Peter, your eldest son; I have a large silk factory at Lyons."

"And I," said the second, "am Charles, I am a corn merchant at Corbeil."

"And I," said the youngest, "am George, your cherished child, I am richer than my brothers, and have gained great wealth in Paris as a wholesale rag merchant. I have come to fetch you, my dear father, and I have a dear wife who will take care of you. We will both love you."

"The poor old soldier burst into tears of joy. He raised his hands and blessed his grandchildren.

"It is to you alone," exclaimed they, "we owe all our happiness. If you had not taught us to pick up and turn to profit, wild fruit, feathers, and rags, we should now be beggars."

After this recital Mr. Georges paused.

"And now," continued he, after some minutes' silence, "my dear Henri, open this box and look."

Henry slowly advanced to the ebony box, opened it with trembling hands, and drew out—a greasy and worn linen wallet.

"Behold," said Mr. Georges, with a mischievous smile, "the banner of your ancestor, the good man Kerouan, for I am his youngest grandson, George, the rag merchant."

Poor Henri's brow crimsoned with confusion, and his father added:

"Remember, my son, that vanity is the appendage of folly; no one ought to blush at any condition of fortune or birth which he cannot control. He who is rich ought to consider himself the debtor of the poor and assist them whenever an opportunity presents itself; that alone is true superiority.

Henri, with tears in his eyes and repentance in his heart, threw himself into the arms of Mr. Georges.

"This lesson has been severe, my father," said he, "but I have deserved it; be sure it shall never be forgotten."

I can assure my readers that Henri kept his promise. Retired from business, he and his father live upon the most affectionate terms, and their house is the rendezvous of artists and men of letters. Henri pursued the surest method of correcting the vanity which his wealth might have fostered, and that was frequently to repeat during desert the history of Grandfather Kerouan.

THE GOLDEN PHEASANT.

ON the Eve of Saint Lawrence, in the year 1719, there was held high festival in the ancient Hall of Montbard, a small village in Burgundy.

This beautiful residence was the country seat of Counsellor Leclerc, who had, for a few weeks, withdrawn from his parliamentary duties at Dijon, that he might spend, at his favorite Montbard, the feast of his patron, Saint Lawrence, and also enjoy the mirth of a large party of young guests, whom he had invited thither, to welcome home his only son George from school.

The old Hall rung with the sound of twenty merry voices; nothing was heard from the top of the house to the bottom, from one end of the garden to the other, but jokes and joyous laughter. The relatives of the party, bewildered with the uproar, were occasionally displeased; but they soon forgave the merry offenders, and the joyous tumult was redoubled.

Yet in the midst of this turbulent excitement, the happiness of George was of a calmer character; he appeared grave, and even thoughtful, and with an absent air would frequently wander away from his companions, to the most distant extremity of the garden. There, screened from the grounds by a thick yew tree hedge, was a large flower bed.

The air was redolent with a thousand sweet odors, and plants of every hue and species were flourishing in rich luxuriance. Arrived at this enchanting spot, George soon became absorbed in attentions to the brilliant colony.

If he perceived a poor plant hanging its head to the earth, as if confiding its sufferings to the common mother of vegetation, he gently raised it, gave it water, or freed it from injurious insects. Sometimes, with much apparent wisdom and gravity, our hero would select some plant, perhaps the youngest and most beautiful of all, and with a sudden blow, cut it down, by the side of its blooming companions, who had, but a moment before, surrounded it and incensed it as a queen; then picking it up, and tearing it slowly to pieces, he appeared as though he sought to discover some interesting secret under each cicatrice and membrane.

The frequent absence of George at length aroused the attention of his young friends. The most inquisitive proposed to follow and discover the indefatigable deserter.

This proposal was received with general assent, and each executed his part of the plot so cleverly, that George suddenly saw himself surrounded, questioned, and even ridiculed, just at the moment when, kneeling before a rose tree, he was gazing intently at a notch he had made with his knife in one of its branches.

"Oh, George!" exclaimed a pretty little girl, "are there any bonbons hid in these trees? If you find any, do give me some."

"Perhaps it is a magic lantern you are looking at through that large hole," said a young boy.

"Have you seen the sun, do you see the moon?" shouted a third.

And bursts of merry laughter resounded from the group. George, humbled but for a moment, arose, and replying to their raillery, in a short and contemptuous tone said:

"I shall not tell you what I have been looking for here, nor what I have found, because you could not understand me. You, young ladies, eat your bonbons; and you young gentlemen, admire your magic lantern."

"Flowers," replied the orator of the band, "are certainly very pretty, and smell sweetly, but their society is rather stupid."

George's face flushed with anger, and he hastily exclaimed, "Stupid! Dare not to speak thus of benevolent and industrious nature, the admirable servant of God—to whom you are indebted for that long fair hair that shelters you from cold, and of which you are so proud. He who has given you

"Oh! of course, I thank God for his gifts, and admire the wonders of his Providence, but in regard to these plants——"

"Well! is not every living, breathing thing under His control?"

"What!" exclaimed a young girl, in the greatest astonishment, "do plants breathe; and are they fed like us?"

"Yes, my dear Emma, they have a food which is proper for them, and suitable organs to receive it."

"Have you seen them eat?"

"No; but I read in a beautiful book, that gives the history of flowers and animals, that it was so; I doubted it, but I tried it and found it out."

"But," continued the incredulous girl, "how did you find it out that the book was true?"

"Ah! that cost me much thought," replied George, proudly. "I reflected on it for more than a fortnight, and now I hope to receive the fruit of my——"

Here the boy was at a loss to find a word sufficiently sonorous, to increase his importance by brilliancy of language.

"Meditations," suggested a poet in embryo, who had gained the first prize in orthography.

"Meditations—yes."

"Oh, tell us how you found it out."

"Yes! do, do!" exclaimed the children in chorus.

"No, no," replied George, "it would not amuse you like the magic lantern, and my experiment is not so good as a box of bonbons."

It was very evident that George was wounded by the raillery of his companions. Alas! that superiority should be so often sullied by pride! It is the thorn on the rose, the smoke that obscures the brilliant flame. Remember, my dear readers, should you, in future years, attain an elevated rank in science, art, or literature; remember that a modest great man is doubly great. This may be said without casting the slightest slur on the character displayed, later in life, by the man of genius, whom we have chosen for the hero of our tale. Let us now return to our young friends.

George was entreated, praised, caressed, and he at length consented to reveal the secret, which he had been burning with a desire to impart. Commencing in a dictatorial tone, he said:

"I have told you that plants are fed. You will say that, in such case, they must have mouths, and that you have never seen them."

"No, indeed, never."

"And you will not make us believe they have any."

"I will do more, my dear friends; I will show them to you."

"What! will you pretend to show that this rose tree, you just now cut, has a mouth?"

"Perhaps he will, next Easter or Trinity," said the poet.

"This very moment," replied George, "I will show you that this rose tree has not one mouth, but a thousand."

"Well, we are impatient to see the wonder," said a little girl, in a sneering tone.

Young Leclere tore up the little rose tree, and pointing to that part of the stem which had been in the ground, continued:

"You see this sort of tuft, composed of filaments or threads; each of these acts like a pump, and supplies the plant with necessary nourishment; and these I call the mouths of plants."

A murmur of admiration ran through the circle surrounding George.

"But still," said a young logician, "you must prove this."

"Certainly," continued George, "and now I come to the experiment, which has cost me so much—meditation; you shall all judge whether I have succeeded."

Every head was bent forward in an attitude of the deepest attention, as George raised his voice, and continued:

"The water which is poured on plants mixes with substances immediately surrounding them, and is absorbed by the roots. I selected two plants exactly alike, but placed at a sufficient distance. Around one I poured a red liquid, the remainder of which you see in this bottle; around the other plant I poured pure water. We will now open the two stems, and if we see any difference between them, or any sign revealing the presence of the red liquid in one, I shall have reason to be satisfied, and you also."

Then George, with great gravity and trembling hands, took the first plant and broke it; two or three limpid, transparent drops oozed from the stem.* The second plant shared the same fate, but this time George's fingers were slightly stained. He pressed the two extremities of the stem, and from each dropped a rosy pearl.

A frenzied hurrah rewarded this discovery.

It was proved that plants take their meals.

George turned pale, emotion choked his utterance, but had his power to speak been equal to his desire, all attempts to obtain a hearing would have been in vain. The questions, exclamations, and cries of admiration of his friends would have drowned even the long-wished-for sound of the large dinner-bell, had not a little incident occurred which at once changed the course of their young imaginations, attracted, as they had been for a moment by the irresistible spell of science.

Mr. Leclere's gamekeeper was seen at this moment passing the hedge, which we have before said screened the flower-bed. He was carrying something under his blouse, which he appeared most anxious to conceal; his attempt, however, was unsuccessful, for beneath his vestment was seen a magnificent plume of feathers, in which appeared red and gold mingled with bright blue.

In an instant the old man was surrounded by the children, and George himself was led on by the general impulse.

* THE SAP.—In order that plants may be nourished, food is required. This food, in a crude state, enters the roots by a process of absorption or imbibition; it is then transmitted from one part of the plant to another; by means of the circulation or progressive movement of the sap, it reaches the leaves, and is there submitted to the action of light and air, which constitutes the function of respiration; and thus the fluids are finally fitted for the process of assimilation, and form various vegetable products and excretions.—BALFOUR'S BOTANY.

"Dear Gerald, show us what you have got there.—Look! look at the beautiful plume.—No, it is the tale of a bird.—Oh! how large and handsome it must be!" Such were the exclamations on all sides.

The poor man, stupefied with the noise, vainly sought to stop both his ears with one hand, the other being occupied with the burden that caused such excitement.

"Silence! don't clatter like so many magpies," said he; "it is a surprise I have contrived for my master. So let me go on my way."

"No, indeed, no one passes thus over our ground without paying a fine.—We sentence you to show us your treasure. The fine! the fine! or you shall not pass here."

And twenty little hands, like crab-claws, seized the legs and arms of the unfortunate keeper, who saw at once that he was caught in a trap, from which there would be no release but by concession.

"Well, children, since you will have it so," replied he, "if you will promise to restrain your tongues until supper, for there my present will shine, I will gratify your curiosity."

"We all promise, good Gerald—you may be satisfied—we will swear it, if you like—on your head."

The keeper drew from beneath his blouse a bird nearly as large as a cock, the magnificent plumage of which elicited loud bursts of admiration. Its head, of a shining ash color, was surmounted by a little helmet of feathers, its neck was covered with beautiful green feathers, and the rest of the body with silky brown. The tail of the bird shone like a water-spout gilded by the sun.

"What a beautiful parrot!" exclaimed the little girl, who had before displayed her simplicity.

"Foolish child," replied a little boy, who, quite as ignorant, had better have remained silent; "it is a peacock."

"You don't know what you are talking about," added a third, "I have seen one before in the Duke's park."

"Well, then, what is the name of the bird?"

Every eye turned instinctively towards George.

The latter went to the keeper with affected indifference, took the bird, and examined it for some time with great attention; at length he said:—

"If the engravings in my book are correct, this bird is a golden pheasant. It was first seen on the banks of the Phasis,* from whence it derives its name."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Gerald, "my young master has at once told you the right name of the bird. I don't, however, know whether the first pheasant was found on a vase; I never heard so before. However, be this as it may, I have killed this bird with my own hands to surprise my master: game is scarce here, and to-morrow is the feast of St. Lawrence, so I shall take it to Martha, who will, I hope, make a beautiful roast of it."

The children followed him into the kitchen, that they might continue to admire the beautiful bird, so mercilessly condemned to the spit."

Great was the joy of Martha at the sight of such a delicate morsel. It was a delightful opportunity for her to practise all the secrets of the culinary art, secrets which she flattered herself she thoroughly possessed. In her joy she embraced old Gerald, and even the pheasant, who was utterly unconscious of the honor.

"Well," said the keeper, delighted at his first success, "I killed the bird at the first shot; you must now cook it in your best style, and our master will be satisfied. But I say, Martha, do you remember the pike last year?"

"Ah! my poor pike," sighed Martha. "I have regretted it ever since. I should have made a capital dish of it. Only imagine, children, to keep it fresh I put it in ice. When I wanted to cook it, I found the ice broken—"

"And the pike also," said Gerald, laughing.

The children joined in his merriment.

"Yes," replied Martha, "broken, gone, anything you like, and I have never heard anything of it to this day."

And the poor cook mournfully took an enormous pinch of snuff.

"Well, take good care this time," said the keeper, "that my pheasant does not fly away. Ha! ha!"

"Be quite easy, Gerald, the devil is very sly and malicious, but he shan't trick me to-day. This lock will answer for your game, and the key shall never leave my pocket."

After laughing heartily at the adventure, the children resumed their games.

The day appeared as if it would terminate without any other incident, when, towards the end of the afternoon, Martha made a sudden irruption into the room, where all were assembled.

Exclamations of surprise welcomed this apparition, and truly the appearance of the good woman justified the universal astonishment.

Her cap only covered one side of her head, over which it was entirely flattened. Her eyes rolled like billiard balls, and her long chin shook like the pendulum of a clock. In one hand she held a basting spoon, and in the other her empty snuff-box.

"Madam," said she, in an agitated voice, to the mistress of the house, "I am come to take my leave of you."

"What! leave us, Martha, after being with us fifteen years? What has happened?"

"Ah! Madam, during the whole fifteen years I have lived in your house, I have never seen such a thing."

"Well, what have you seen?"

"I have seen—why, I have seen nothing at all! so that makes the thing so frightful, so incredible, I can't understand it."

This scene, although so ridiculous, excited pity; everyone thought poor Martha deranged.

"Come, come, my poor Martha," said Madame Leclerc, "try to recollect yourself, and tell me clearly what has happened."

"Nothing has happened to me, Madam, but something happens to everything that comes into my kitchen, and I warn you that your house is bewitched."

"What nonsense you are talking."

"Madam, was the disappearance of the pike last year nonsense?"

"Well! has it come back again?"

"No, but the pheasant has gone to join it."

"The pheasant!"

"Yes, Madam, a pheasant which old Gerald shot; and as the bird was intended to be sent to table, in honor of Saint Lawrence, I prudently shut it up in the large closet. When I wanted to cook the bird, I unlocked the door, and—it was gone."

"Oh, is that all?" said Madame Leclerc, "what a noise about a trifle! A dog has carried off the game; there is the end of the mystery."

"But to do that," said Martha, drawing an imaginary pinch from her empty box, "the dog must have got through the key-hole, for the closet was locked, the key has been in my pocket, and I have never left the kitchen."

If the children had not seen Martha lock up the bird and take the key, no one would have believed her tale; but as it was, everyone went to look at the mysterious closet.

The door was opened and shut twenty times, the lock carefully examined, every corner of the kitchen rigidly investigated, all the dogs summoned, but without the slightest sign or trace of the truth being discovered.

"It must be the devil," said Martha, "God protect us!"

Madame Leclerc had great difficulty in reassuring her old cook; everyone explained the matter according to his own idea; no one believed the opinion of his neighbor, and all separated in the evening completely puzzled.

The mystery was not explained until thirty years had elapsed. During that time George had seen the doors of the French Academy unfold before his genius. The oration which he pronounced on his entrance has been, and ever will be, remarkable amongst academical harangues.

*Or Eux, a river in Asia, running through Minorella.

When we speak of George Leclerc as being the author of the most beautiful work on natural history which we possess, as the founder of the Jardin des Plantes, our reader will at once recognize him as the Count de Buffon, a name deservedly celebrated throughout Europe.

Thirty years after the loss of the pheasant, the learned academician owned himself the guilty cause of poor Martha's grief and terror, for, anxious to observe, at his leisure, the beauties and form of the bird, he had profited by the moment when the cook was taking her daily nap before the fire to steal her key and run off with the golden pheasant.

He said nothing of the pike, but we are quite willing to believe that little George was equally desirous to possess himself of it.

MATTHEW SCHINNER.

CHAPTER I.

A SCHOLAR OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

TOWARDS the end of the month of December, 1484, a little country boy, about fourteen years of age, entered the city of Berne, in Switzerland. His clothes were covered with snow, his naked feet were stained with blood; cold, fatigue, and hunger had left their traces on his pale face.

But although his clothes were ragged, his carriage was dignified, his figure was neat and well-made, and his eyes were full of vivacity and intelligence. After having wandered some time in the streets, he perceived the cathedral, which he immediately entered, and was soon absorbed in prayer.

It was dark when he left the ancient and stately church, and the few passers-by were hastening to their homes.

Seeing himself alone, without home or friends, without money, in the deserted streets, the poor boy began to weep; his courage abandoned him. To protect himself from the north-east wind and blinding snow, he took refuge in the angle of a door-way, and there, weakened by hunger, shivering under a freezing sky, he crouched down, murmuring a prayer, and would have died a miserable death, if a poor woman who lived in the house had not opened the door on hearing his moans.

"Holy Virgin!" exclaimed she, "it is a child, and a pretty one too!"

She assisted him to rise, and taking his arm, led him into her humble dwelling. The boy, benumbed and half stupefied with cold, had not strength to thank his benefactress, and she felt unwilling to question him in that condition. To stir up the fire, seat the young boy near the chimney, and give him some food, which he ate with avidity, was for the good woman the work of a moment. But when her little protégé, revived by the warmth, and refreshed by food, looked at her with eyes full of tears of joy and gratitude,

"God be praised," said she, "he is saved!"

Then, embracing him with all the tenderness of a mother, she said:

"Now tell me how it happened I found you deserted in the streets. You are certainly not of this country. Have you no relatives? Have you no one to take care of you?"

"Alas! no, good and kind mother. My name is Matthew Schinner, and I was born at Sions, in Haut Calais, twenty leagues from hence. After the death of my parents, (poor and worthy people, may they rest in peace,) I was taken care of and educated by the curé of our parish. And now, as I have been fortunate enough to profit by his lessons, I have come to complete my studies at Berne. I have heard that there are at this university celebrated professors, and, perhaps, by ceaseless labor, I also may become learned."

"Hum! hum! These scholars have fine ideas! Our soldiers, who have performed their duty so well at Granson and Murat, did not know their alphabet, and yet the powerful Duke of Burgundy was obliged to fly before them. But no one now knows what he would invent. It appears that the Germans have discovered at Mayence the Art of Printing, as they call it; I hope it may not be an invention of the devil!" The good woman made the sign of the cross, then taking the hand of her young guest—

"How did you travel so far as this, my poor little one?"

"On foot and asking alms, my good mother. The shepherds on the mountains allowed me to sleep in their huts, and no one ever refused me a bowl of milk and a piece of bread; but I am very much afraid,"—added the boy, sighing deeply, "that the inhabitants of large towns—"

"Come, come, little ungrateful one, be silent, there are good people everywhere. I am not rich, so much the worse; but I will never abandon any of God's creatures who have need of me. Remain here, then, my child, until you can find a better home; we will share our daily bread."

This proposal was accepted with the greatest gratitude.

The joy of Jane (that was the name of Matthew's protectress) was almost as great as his own. This poor woman, so isolated, without either family or friends, living by her labor from day to day, was glad to attach herself to an orphan. It is amongst those who suffer that misfortune most frequently finds cordial and spontaneous assistance. Jane became the adopted mother of the little wanderer, and lavished on him all her long-restrained affection. On his part, Matthew was not ungrateful; indeed no gratitude could be more ardent, more attentive, or more delicate. On Sundays he accompanied Jane to divine service, and afterwards in her walks on the banks of the Aar; on other days he never went out except to the university; and as soon as his studies were finished he returned home. Reading and writing, day and night, he still found time to assist his adopted mother in her household labors. In the evening, seated by the fireside, he talked to her enthusiastically of science, the mistress of the world, and related to her his ambitious dreams for the future.

The good woman sometimes shook her head, saying that the Holy Scriptures ought to be sufficient for a Christian; but Matthew read to her such beautiful histories, translated from the Latin and Italian, that she at length became reconciled to profane authors. She embraced her dear son, and encouraged him with a sweet smile to persevere in his labors.

This peaceful and laborious life was, however, sometimes clouded by misery. Jane's spinning wheel supported both herself and the student; but when work failed, the bread chest became empty. Then Matthew, at the close of his day's study, would go to beg in the streets, and frequently returned with his purse well supplied. His appearance was so neat and gentle, that no one refused his modest petition.

At the period of time of which we are writing, there was nothing disgraceful in this kind of mendicity. For a long time, knowledge could only be obtained by great industry and privations, and the poor students who had not a fellowship in a college were obliged to have recourse to public benevolence, in order to continue their studies, and procure a subsistence.

After studying four years in the university of Berne, Matthew, whose desire for knowledge was insatiable, determined, notwithstanding his great affection for his adopted mother, to go to Italy, where the arts and belles-lettres had received new encouragement and cultivation since the arrival there of the Greek savants, who had been driven from Constantinople by Mohammed II.

Great was the grief of Jane on learning this resolution; what would become of her without her little Matthew? He also hesitated to separate himself from his benefactress, but his affection for her was conquered by his love of knowledge.

"Adieu, my dear mother," said the young student, tenderly wiping the tears from her cheeks; "I shall never forget you, and if God grants me life, I will soon see you again; but then I hope to be rich and powerful."

"Be always a good man, dear child," replied Jane, "that is my ambition."

She accompanied Matthew some distance from the town, and when at length he left her, she watched his receding figure until distance hid him from her sight; then, weeping bitterly, she returned home, and for many days her cottage appeared her more dreary, and her poverty harder to endure.

CHAPTER II.

THE CARDINAL OF SION'S DINNER.

Several years after, on a beautiful spring day, the good city of Berne presented a noisy and animated spectacle, which contrasted singularly with its usual calm. The streets were filled with an immense crowd; countrymen and citizens, laborers and noble lords, were all clothed in their holiday garb.

The cause of this unaccustomed agitation was the arrival of the celebrated Cardinal of Sion, who had been sent, by Pope Julius the Second, as legate extraordinary into Switzerland.

This high dignity of the Church enjoyed great influence at Rome, and actively seconded the policy of the Sovereign Pontiff. The Bernese, therefore, offered him a reception, worthy, not only of himself, but of the Holy See, which he represented. The clergy, the senate, the university, and the corporation, went in great pomp to meet the prelate, and conducted him, with great respect, to the palace, which had been splendidly decorated for his reception.

The first magistrate of Berne would not yield to anyone the honor of entertaining such an illustrious guest, and invited the principal inhabitants of the city to dine at his mansion with the legate. The Cardinal, in order to show his gratitude for the kind welcome he had received, invited all the nobles who were then present to a grand banquet on the following day.

At daybreak on the morrow, the major-domo of his Eminence was seen to pass hastily down a narrow street, which the prelate had pointed out to him, and rap at the door of a very poor house. Workmen of all kinds accompanied him.

An old woman opened the door, complaining bitterly that she had been disturbed so early.

"What do you desire, sir?" said she, greatly confused at speaking to a person so richly dressed.

"His Eminence, the illustrious Cardinal of Sion," replied the steward, "intends to dine at your house to-day, with all the nobles and magistrates of the city. It is a great honor for you, my good woman; but you must understand that so many noble lords cannot be entertained in such a humble dwelling. I have orders, therefore, to prepare for their proper reception. Come men," added he, "to your work, time presses."

Immediately, disregarding the cries, complaints, and exclamations of the old woman, who could not comprehend this extraordinary caprice of the Cardinal, the workmen began their labor. They knocked down the partitions, removed the furniture to a neighboring granary, and formed in a few hours the whole of the house into one large hall, which they hung with beautiful tapestry, and then prepared the banquet.

About noon, (for in the sixteenth century, people dined at that hour) the Cardinal of Sion left his palace, followed by his gentlemen, the magistrates, and the nobles of Berne. The preparations for the banquet, executed by the major-domo in so unusual a manner, had excited the public curiosity to the highest pitch. The streets were crowded with people, and regardless of the respect due to the ambassador of the Pope, more than one citizen had not hesitated to say, that his Eminence did not appear in the perfect enjoyment of his senses. The astonishment of the noble cortege was extreme when they saw the Cardinal direct his steps towards the poorest quarter of the town. Every one thought him mistaken, and the Mayor ventured to address to him a very humble remonstrance; but the Cardinal interrupted him, saying, with a smile:—

"I know the city as well as you do, and I beg you will believe that I also know whither I am leading my guests."

Having arrived at the little cottage, from which his steward had expelled the poor woman in such an expeditious manner, the Cardinal stopped, and deep emotion was depicted on his countenance. Unbroken silence reigned in the crowd; they awaited some unexpected occurrence; they were at last to learn the great secret, the object of so many comments!

The legate, who appeared to seek some one, and whose emotion momentarily increased, invited his guests by a gesture to follow him into this novel banquet hall, when a cry of joy and astonishment was heard, and the old woman of the house, rushing from the midst of a group standing near the door, flew towards the Cardinal, exclaiming:

"My little Matthew! My Matthew Schinner! I shall become mad with joy."

Great was the astonishment of the crowd, when this great dignity of the Church, after embracing the poor woman, turned with tearful eyes to his noble guests, and said:

"Noble lords, this is my mother, you will dine with her to-day."

Jane (our reader will have recognised the adopted mother of the little student of Berne), confused at her audacity, threw herself at his feet; but the Cardinal kindly raised her, and offering his arm, led her, amongst the acclamations of the crowd, into that house where so much of his youth had been spent.

At table he placed her at his right hand, called her mother, and begged that she would as formerly give him the simple name of Matthew. At length, to satisfy the curiosity of his guests, the illustrious prelate related to them how the good old woman had received him, when a poor child wandering in the streets of Berne. He added that he had never forgotten her maternal care, and that constant labor had prevented him visiting her before. But being made Cardinal of Sion (it was as we know his birth-place), and sent into Switzerland as legate of the Pope, he had hastened to Berne to see his adopted mother.

* * * * *
"And now, Jane," said the Cardinal, embracing her tenderly, "was I not right when I told you that with education nothing is impossible to man?"

On his departure he left her his furniture and the plate which had been used at the feast, and settled on her an annual pension of fifty ducats, which was a large fortune at that period.

Jane lived many years happy and respected, relating to strangers how she had the honor of dining in her own house with the Cardinal of Sion.

AN INTERESTING TALE OF THE SECOND CENTURY.

PREFACE.

How beautiful to behold the silent dawn of morning, lighting up the solitary summits of the Gletchers. Height after height begins to wear the first beams of the rising sun. While the bases of these mighty mountains are hidden from the view, by a thick veil of blue mist, naught appears but their lofty heads peeping, as it were, from amongst the clouds. A similar spectacle discloses itself to the eye of Faith, when it casts a glance into the golden morning of Christianity, and discovers those gigantic heads surrounded by the brilliancy of the Sun of Justice. An invigorating air wafts across from them to us, upon our remote point of view; we are astonished at the characters, firm as a rock, which raised them above their cotemporaries, and imagine we hear the blood gushing from their hearts, and falling into the stream of the general martyrdom. This stream flowed on for three hundred years, and formed the boundaries between the heathen and the Christian world. Such a look as this, did the writer of these pages cast into that golden age. But as the succession of these great men stretches out, like a lengthened chain of precious gems, he drew for his purpose a more confined perspective, and chose that period, in which the Emperor Marcus Aurelius wielded the sceptre. This period embraces about twenty years—from A. D. 161 to 180; the most renowned heroes of the Faith, which occur in this time, are St. Polycarp of Smyrna, the Philosopher Justin of Rome, and the Apostle of the south of Gaul, Bishop Pothinus.

The martyrologies that mention these men are, above all others that have come under our notice, the most to be relied on. The untiring Irenæus is a connecting link between the Eastern and Western Churches. Pope Soter in Rome, Dionysius of Corinth, and the learned Athenagoras, who, from a follower of the Grecian philosophy became a disciple of Christ, lived also in the time of Marcus Aurelius. But in order to bring these professors of the Faith, who with respect to place, are so widely separated from each other, into the same compass, it requires the personality of one, whose trials were cotemporary with the above mentioned men, like the veil of mist that obscures the depths of the valley, and scatters itself round the foot of the mountain. This person is Lydia, an Eastern slave. Some difficulty occurred at the question, in which of the numerous cities of the then kingdom of the world, the connecting points of the tale should lie.

Rome, the chief city of the immeasurable empire, would have been above all others, the one most suited, and it dares not be forgotten. But, the seat of refinement and the asylum of worldly wisdom, were to be found at that time, neither in Rome nor in Italy, but in that once great city of Greece, Athens.

In the time of the Anthonys, the imperial court at Rome so highly appreciated the Hellenish refinement, that the best teachers were called from Greece to instruct the heirs to the throne, and the higher schools. Everything that laid claim to refinement was from Greece, just as with us, the French language has become the mother-tongue of high life. Marcus Aurelius was himself a disciple of the Grecian school of philosophy, and wrote his "Maxims" in Greek. Herodes, Atticus, Demonax, Athenagoras, Aristides, Lucien, Pausanias, and other illustrious writers, we find in Athens at this time. For the propagation of Christianity, Greece was looked upon with as much importance as Italy: in the latter, politics had their seat, in the former, spiritual power; and for this reason, the princes of the Apostles chose both these countries for their missionary labors. The courageous Peter ventured to remain in the imperial city, but the learned Paul journeyed to Greece. Therefore is Athens chosen as the scene of the incidents.

The Hellenish worship may excite some interest, as it explains itself in a heathen sense. There is a great chasm between Roman and Grecian paganism, and incomparably nobler were the religious views of the new Platonic schools, than the coarse faith of the Romans. The researches of the Greek sages were not fruitless; various as were their systems, they were at least all united in the same opinion, that the perception, which the people of the earth then had of the Divinity, was unworthy of it. In addition to this, the Grecian Mysteries, which could be traced as far back as to the primitive history of the people, preserved their ancient faith; and perhaps after this, it was the Eleusian Mysteries that saved those remnants of past knowledge which may be looked upon with justice, as a divine revelation. But apart from those most important mysteries, into which almost all those who had any pretensions to refinement were initiated, there flowed in the principal Greek towns, another source which assisted in altering the ideas of inferior paganism, and in showing in purity the image of the Divinity. There were not only communities of Jews at that time in Delos, Kos, Milet, and other islands, but their religion was practised in the great Corinth, also; and St. Paul found a synagogue even in Athena.* Who would therefore doubt, that just the most renowned Grecian thinkers and teachers of the people, have not drawn from this source?

All this philosophy then, this Judaism, and those mysteries, had worked together, in cutting off, piece by piece, this Anacanda of paganism, which bound up the Roman world, until that "Sun-clad Woman," stepped forth from the house of David, and for ever crushed the serpent's head.

The most remarkable events of Marcus Aurelius' time have not been passed over, particularly the war against the people of the Danube, which for each descendant of the ancient Germans, is of no small importance, and is circumstantially described; whereby much of their ancient manners and customs, according to Tacitus, have been made known to us.

It is now some years since Lydia began to tread the insecure path of publicity. In her wanderings she has been nowhere received with coldness; in many places, greeted most warmly, and in all, treated with that consideration due to her sex.

Unhappy, persecuted Poland gladly availed herself of her consoling presence, and looked upon her as a suffering sister in the Faith. The maid, the wife, the mother and the widow, have been alike instructed by her good example. The desolate and afflicted have found in her all they could desire; for while her generous hand dispensed a temporal blessing, it was ever accompanied by a word of consolation and advice.

Thus Lydia ventures, with timidity, 'tis true, to place her foot on foreign soil. Do not discourage her by a cold reception. She comes not in the train of Discord but of Peace.

CHAPTER I.

THE YOUTHFUL CAPTIVE.

A. D. 165.

The confused cries and clamors of a thronging multitude fill the slave market of ancient Smyrna. In one part an overseer screams himself hoarse upon the superior qualities of his merchandise, whilst another of his caste beats poor children most unmercifully, and the sobs and whinings of these unhappy ones mingle with the imprecations of their castigator.

Each one set up for sale has a placard suspended from his neck, on which all his qualities are written. On many of these can be seen the words "Calligraphos" or "Pedagogos," because the wearer possesses the necessary acquirements for either a Tutor or a Teacher. The upper end of the market is occupied chiefly by Africans, from burning Lybia, with dark skin and woolly hair; deplorable creatures! their ears pierced, and their feet chalked—a sign that they have crossed the sea. Close to these, cooped up in laths and cords are young Negresses, from the interior of Ethiopia—black as ebony. They seat themselves on a checkered carpet, crouching closely and anxiously together. Bread, fruit and wine are placed before them, but few partake thereof, as they were told that those good things are merely given them for a time, to make them robust, that they may afford the gormandizing Romans a dainty meal. At the lower end the eye falls upon entire herds of white slaves, from every known country under the sun. Amongst these are the emaciated Isaurians, formerly pirates in the Mediterranean, looking most piteously. In striking contrast stands the athletic Cappadocian, proud of his race and stature; frivolous and faithless 'tis true, but as his placard jestingly remarks: as the bearer of a litter, most useful, and as well beloved as the horses of his country. In the midst of this multitude of slaves, of Greeks richly apparelled, and of Romans eager for purchase, might be seen passing on, a modestly attired female, of noble bearing, but whose dress, that of a widow, bespeaks her of the middle class. Her scrutinizing gaze lingers long upon the youthful forms of the captive Christians—but she finds not whom she seeks, and wanders on by the nearest way to the public prisons. "Shall I rejoice, or shall I complain," sighed the afflicted one, "that I found her not amongst them, or whether, after six months, is she still in prison, or have they reserved her for the coming festival?" Merciful God! suffer not my child to be torn to pieces by wild beasts, amidst the jeers and scoffs of an applauding multitude! Agonized with such thoughts, Charitana reached the gates of the prison, knocked with trembling hand, and craved admittance. She informed the jailer, that she was in search of a daughter, named Seraphica, who, immediately after the execution of Polycarp, had been cast into prison: and that for several months she had heard nothing of her fate.

"Seraphica!—the daughter of a purple-dye merchant?"—growled the jailer, "and one of the Christian Religion, and but seventeen years old? Yes, you can see her in a few days: She will then celebrate her wedding on the feast of Mercury, with a young and beautiful panther; the most cheerful Ethiopian that can be found."

Pale as marble and trembling with horror, Charitana stood before the savage jailer, from whose scornful lips she had just heard the probable fate of her only child.

"I see you have some fruit," continued he, "I'll place it before her at the feast already mentioned."

"Unfeeling man, you mock me! Has icy death never torn from thee a beloved child? Have you never stood by the death-bed of one dear to you? If not, you can never understand what I now suffer. Oh! I conjure you to grant me this solitary consolation!—Allow me to speak to Seraphica before she leaves the prison for the festival!"

"Where is your purse?" asked the jailer. "If it be well filled, matters can be favorably managed."

"No, heartless man! gold and silver have but sparingly fallen to my lot, but the laws of Rome, which grant to the condemned a feast before death, are not so severe as to refuse a mother a last interview with her beloved child.—Were I to offer you the little money I possess, you would not be contented—But I remember now, I have a treasure—a great treasure—one I have inherited and which can be divided between you and me, without decreasing. I can give you as much of it as your heart desires, as soon as you grant my petition."

"Extraordinary promise," replied he. "What is the value of that treasure?"

"Of more value than this terrestrial orb, even were it of Diamond." The jailer's countenance brightened up. "In any case a great exaggeration," said he to himself.—"Still it can reach to a diamond ring."—Then turning round, he seized upon his keys, and gave Charitana a sign to follow.

They passed through long and vaulted corridors, where nothing broke the silence that reigned around, save the hollow echoes of their footsteps. At length they stood before a low and narrow door—unlocked—the bolts withdrawn—and Charitana is in the presence of her daughter.

O, happy moment!—a sweeter in this place of sorrows none had ever known! But silence! Yonder sits the youthful captive—not suspecting who is near. Her right arm is chained—the left supports her head, and she is in a deep slumber. "Ah perhaps," murmured Charitana in a low voice, "thou already knowest what awaits thee in a few days! Perhaps fearful visions are even now passing before thy weary eyes!—Yet, no, those features speak not of fear: that countenance is as a mirror reflecting interior peace and holy resignation."—In her fettered hand, she loosely holds a girdle; upon which she had evidently been ruminating; and so had sunk to sleep.—She drops the hand, and the girdle falls from her listless fingers. She moves—smiles and holds converse with herself.—"Yes—yes, never to be forgotten Polycarp!—Not on parchment, but on far nobler material have I written all thy words!—Polycarp! shall we meet again? Soon?—O it will be some time yet! "Until then let us have hope ever before us, and never lose the pledge of our righteousness."*

Charitana having placed the fruit upon the ground, stood immovable before her dreaming child.—But as soon as she heard the words "Oh it will be some time yet," she could no longer refrain from shedding a flood of tears.

At length in a subdued voice, she pronounced her daughter's name, "Seraphica! do you know who is here?"

The young girl answered dreamingly and slowly, as though she felt obliged to reflect on every word.—"Here?—Here are peace and solitude."

"Seraphica, thy mother!"—"Mother? No she has fled!" and sighing heavily, she dashes a tear from her pale cheek, and casts her half closed eyes on the girdle at her feet. Suddenly she perceives a form before her, she shudders—and quick as lightning raises herself from the ground, and exclaiming: "God of all goodness!" casts herself into her mother's arms. "Do I dream, or art thou really she, or art thou an angel who visitest me? Wondrous!—through closed doors in this gloomy dungeon!"

"Yes, dearest child, it is thy mother! Life without thee seemed more painful than death itself. Six anxious months have I wandered through the mountains, where I found true and loving hearts; one alone was wanting—and that was thine. But now I will not leave thee until I know thy fate.

"Since that dreadful day, thou hast been ever present to my mind. When I heard that thou wast seen in the Amphitheatre, Oh, what anguish did I not endure! Hour after hour passed on.—My worst fears were verified.—I heard that thou wast taken prisoner." "Yes mother," replied Seraphica, "though most unworthy, I have been chosen to suffer imprisonment and chains for the sake of my Redeemer. It was a dreadful day, yet one replete with blessings.

"O hadst thou seen our venerable and saintly Polycarp! Couldst thou but have gazed on those features of a hundred years, glowing with charity, peace and simplicity!

"Many feared that his great age would have rendered him unable to reach the place of martyrdom, with that heroic fortitude expected from one who had led a life so holy. But how groundless was that fear! O, mother! hadst thou but seen that Saint in death!"

*These were the words of St. Polycarp to the Philippians.

"Still, my child, I had the happiness to meet our holy Bishop in the suburbs of the city, a short time before.

"He was driving in the chariot of Herodius, and Nicetas, his father sat near him. Both were trying to induce him to call the Emperor the most high God, and to offer incense before his statue. But finding their entreaties vain, with savage fury they dashed the venerable old man from the chariot, and his face coming in violent contact with the pavement, was deeply wounded. He arose covered with blood, but proceeded on his way as joyous, as if he had suffered nothing. This was the last time I beheld him.

"The sanctity of his life is ever present to my mind. I think I hear him still, relating the conversation he had had with St. John and others, who had seen our Lord, and all they had told him of His doctrine and miracles."

"But dearest mother, thou wast not witness of his last hours, of his farewell discourse.—Thou didst not see him as he passed the bodies of young Germanicus and his companions, who were the first that suffered, and stood before Quadratus who, in a voice of thunder, said to him, 'Swear by the fortune of the Emperor, despise Christ and I promise thee thy freedom! Swear!' At this command the spectators pressed forward, in breathless expectation of his answer. Polycarp replied with a slow and solemn voice:

"Already six and eighty years have I served my Lord, and He has never yet done injury to me, but on the contrary, He is always heaping favors on me. How can I curse my King—Him Who has redeemed me? But knowest thou not of the future judgment—and of that unquenchable fire, lighted by eternal justice, to torture the wicked?" The people burned with the desire of seeing the judicatory inquiry at an end.

"They had already looked on blood, and drunk from it a new desire for murder. At this moment a voice was heard from one of the principal seats of the Amphitheatre, 'Let wood be conveyed hither!' This was echoed by a thousand voices. 'Wood! Let wood be conveyed hither!' In a few moments a huge pile was erected: Quadratus gave the signal: and Polycarp, turning to his faithful followers, bestowed on them his last Benediction, unloosed his sandals, removed his girdle, and with a firm step ascended the pile; a living testimony of the words of St. Paul:

'Who then, shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or famine, or nakedness, or danger, or persecution, or the sword? As it is written: 'For thy sake we are put to death all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter. But in all things we overcome, because of Him that hath loved us. For I am sure that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, neither things present, nor things to come; nor might, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Jesus Christ our Lord.

"As the executioner was in the act of binding him to the stake, he said in a low voice: 'This precaution is unnecessary. He who gives me strength to bear these flames, will also give me strength to bear them patiently.

"He then commenced his dying prayer: 'Almighty God, Father of Thy dearly beloved Son, Thou God of angels and the Powers, Thou God of all creatures! I thank Thee, that I have the happiness to partake of the Chalice of Thy anointed One. Accept me into the number of Thy martyrs, receive me as an agreeable offering. I praise Thee for all things, and glorify and magnify Thee through the High Priest, Jesus Christ. To whom with Thee and the Holy Ghost be all honor now and in eternity.'

"While many of the faithful, who were present," continued Seraphica, "were offering up their prayers with him in silence, there arose suddenly a clear, bright flame on high, which caused a death-like stillness in the multitude, and behold the miracle! The roaring element arched round the saint, like a mighty sail swelling with the wind. A deep sound of horror echoed through the crowd, as they perceived this visible and miraculous interposition of the God of the Christians,

"When Quadratus saw that Polycarp was untouched by the fire, he made a sign to one of the executioners. All waited anxiously for the fresh commands, and in an instant one of the executioners, appointed by the Proconsul, sprang upon the pile like a tiger upon his prey, and plunged a dagger in the old man's breast. Polycarp stood motionless, but as his breathing became quicker, the blood flowed profusely from his wound into the flames beneath. He sank at length upon his knees, closed his eyes, rendered his mighty soul to Him who gave it, and his body to the flames."

Here Seraphica was silent; the strongest emotion for some minutes overpowered her. She leaned her head upon her mother's shoulder, and her raven hair fell upon her pale face, like a veil of mourning. "Let us be comforted," sobbed forth Charitana, "Polycarp has won the crown of life. He was an unwearied champion, and now his eternal sabbath has begun. He fought the good fight, and went to receive his reward on the very day, on which the Eastern Church commemorates the death of our Redeemer."

Charitana, thinking it possible, that in a few days more Seraphica would follow in the footsteps of the holy Bishop, continued: "The life of every good Christian is a martyrdom, which ends but in death." Seraphica, whose mind was wholly occupied with the last hours of the holy Polycarp, heard but little; her mother's words died on her ear, and she continued uninterruptedly: "The sanguinary deed was scarcely completed, when the people cried aloud. 'Long live the Proconsul and Roman justice!' The multitude applauded, but we Christians wept in silence.

"His sacred relics were scattered to the winds by the excited people. We still lingered on, and felt as though Polycarp phoenix-like, had risen from his holy ashes, and overshadowed his orphan children with his protecting wings. The sandals, staff and girdle of the saint, lay untouched before us. We hastened to secure these precious mementos. Some had already possessed themselves of the sandals and staff, whilst I, endeavoring to seize the girdle felt, in the same moment, a hand upon my shoulder, and a rough voice spoke aloud: 'Behold this is one of the poisonous plants that spring up from such seed!'—and in the twinkling of an eye, the girdle was twisted round my arm—I was bound, led across the Arena, and cast into one of the dark cells of the Amphitheatre. This then dearest mother, is the girdle of which I speak; and these are the spots of his holy blood." Charitana took the sacred relic and pressed it to her lips. Tears fell from her eyes, but they were not, so much for Polycarp, as for her noble-minded daughter, who seemed to suspect nothing of the probable fate that in a few days awaited her. "Well Seraphica," said the mother, on returning the girdle "when shall we meet again?" "When our Heavenly Father wills it!" she answered, and resumed her former discourse: "As I was being led from the Amphitheatre to prison, one of our friends, Irenæus, the priest, who was Polycarp's beloved disciple, met me. He recognized me, drew closer, and admonished me in Latin as follows: "Hold firmly the doctrines of your Saviour, which the Holy Ghost hath imprinted in thy heart." "Yes, I will preserve it—Yes, to my last breath."

"When shall we meet again?" repeated Charitana, "which of us shall be first called hence—Thou or I?"

Seraphica perceived the anguish with which the question was accompanied, and seizing her mother's hand replied: "We shall die in that very hour that God wills, and not when man conjectures. On my account cease to be anxious. I shall not die yet. I have besought our Lord not yet to call me to my eternal home. I wish to suffer, but not to die; I burn with the desire of showing to the world, in the mirror of a pure life, the doctrines of our Redeemer, and to relate to many of the unbelievers, what the Son of God has done for man? and not till I have fulfilled that mission, shall I be called hence. It may be long till then! God has heard my prayer, and my Guardian Angel has revealed it to me." Suddenly loud knocks were heard at the door.—The jailer commands Charitana to depart, and does not even give her time to take leave of her beloved child, Seraphica was again alone; she reflected on the words: "Which of us shall first be taken hence?" but the answer gave her no anxiety. Casting her eyes on the lovely fruit which her mother had brought, she took a pomegranate, and on dividing it, she discovered in the center some pieces of gold: they were evidently secreted there for Seraphica, that she might therewith soften the heart of her savage jailer. She tasted the fruit but could not eat, for she was unable to swallow.

The jailer detained Charitana at the door of the prison. "Well, it seems you have forgotten the promise you made before I allowed you to enter. Did you not speak of a magnificent diamond that you were to give me? Come, where is the precious stone?"

"You are right," replied Charitana, "I promised you a gift of more value than this terrestrial globe, were it composed of diamond. This treasure is the mystery of Faith, and those who possess it, become a free people—yes, become kings and princes. I will impart to thee those mysteries."

"How, fool? Will you take upon you the part of Apollo who once stuck upon the Phrygian king a pair of long ears? You want to make a Midas of me!—No—no, you must be the cheated one, not I. Do you hear the noises coming from the slave Market? those are the cries of the Christians undergoing the lash. Thou, fool, art also a Christian, and one of the worst. I overheard distinctly your conversation in the dungeon, and this very evening I shall hear the gold and silver I shall receive for your detection jingling in my pocket." He then thrust the unhappy one into a cell, and slammed the door with such violence, that the noise echoed like thunder along the corridors.

CHAPTER II.

THE EARTHQUAKE.

AFTER the conquest of Asia Minor by the Romans, Smyrna, one of her most celebrated cities, was obliged to pay her share of the yearly tribute imposed on the province, in wool, carpets, mohair, tapestry, nut-galls, and above all, gold dust from the rivers Hermos and Paktolos, and whatever luxuries the extravagant Romans could desire, in Asiatic perfumes and cosmetics, which were brought to the harbor, and shipped for Rome, as were also slaves in great numbers.

Notwithstanding this heavy tax upon the people, trade flourished, and the population became so numerous, that the shady gardens and capacious quays, which surrounded the lovely bay, could scarcely accommodate the various classes of the inhabitants, who thronged there, for their evening promenade, to enjoy the cool sea-breezes.

Here also might be seen the Roman Proconsul, Statius Quadratus, attended by his body-guard. It was to him the merit was due, that the tribute flowed in so freely.

Quadratus turned aside from the crowd, and walked towards the shore, when he met Asmenes, a priest of Isis, who had been educated in Egypt, for the service of that goddess. He bowed to the Proconsul, who said to him: "Well, Egyptian naturalist, tell me whence comes this oppressive heat, at this unusual season of the year?"

"A difficult question, replied Asmenes, "although in the calends of November, we have a heat, which seldom occurs in the height of summer. I did suppose the evening would have become cool, but it seems just as if the heat increases in the same degree as the sun recedes. I wonder whether the Christians, who fare but badly in the market, have not used some mysterious means against the sun!"

"What do you mean?" said Quadratus.

"It is said," replied Asmenes, "that the Thessalonians are masters in necromancy, and that there are more soothsayers and magicians amongst them, than amongst any other people. But for my own part, I think that the greatest are to be found amongst the Christians. It is beyond doubt, that at the death of their great Prophet, the sun withdrew his light for three hours; and it is also related that in by-gone times, the sun stood still in the heavens for three days. It was only this Spring, when Polycarp was before your tribunal, a mysterious voice spoke to him, which was distinctly heard by all present.* But thanks, a thousand thanks to you noble Proconsul, who have granted our petitions, and well rid Smyrna of that sorry scoundrel. Ha! look at them bound in the ship yonder! O may Isis grant thee for this, health, happiness, and prosperity!" Both advanced a little further up the walk, which led to the shore. Several caravans returning from Arabia, and laden with its treasures, passed them on their way to the city, there to deliver them on the coming market-day, and to reload with other wares, to sell again in their own country.

Quadratus was a man of mean education, and very superstitious; he continued to dwell upon the witchcraft, which according to the priest of Isis, lay in the hands of the Christians; and as the heat increased, his anxiety became the more intense. At last he stood still, and looking towards the West said: "Do you see that strange appearance?" convulsively seizing the priest's arm. "Look at that unusual red, covering the heavens! It cannot possibly be the reflection of the setting sun, which appears yonder on Argos. What are the gods about to send us?" Asmenes looked in silence on the spectacle. Deeper still became the glowing red, the higher it rose in the heavens, till it ended in a deep violet hue.

On the extreme verge of the horizon, a pale yellow gleam extended along the North, West and South, until it approached the East, where it was scarcely visible; and little bluish vapors rose from the sea, which became larger as they ascended. The temperature then changed into that of a rough, sharp harvest season; small clouds danced, spectre-like, here and there, upon the surface of the water, and rising in the air passed over the city, and spread themselves on the neighboring hills.

"Do I deceive myself," said the Proconsul, "or are we actually in a thick fog? I feel fearfully cold too. Let us hasten home, I fear the worst, either pestilence, or war, or a general devastation." "It is the departure of the Christians," said Asmenes, "they are preparing all this for us; I have expected nothing less, than that their departure would be connected with some such display. Thus, when in old times, they fled out of Egypt from King Pharaoh, they did similar things, and even divided the Red Sea, so that they passed through, as if on dry land; while Pharaoh and his whole army found death in attempting to follow them. And it is very possible that their departure now, will also be accompanied with bad consequences."

With this apprehension, they separated, the priest to his dwelling, and the Proconsul to the palace, for consolation from Herod, the Irenarch.

A number of dark Smyrnians were passing along the streets, some seeking the open air, others the harbor; for the oldest inhabitants understood the signs, and remembered that they were always followed by a greater or lesser convulsion of the earth.

Quadratus, accompanied by his body-guard, then hastened home. His palace formed a wing of the citadel, which was so elevated, that one could scarcely fear any danger. He durst not trust himself in the open air, for he dreaded the unusual excitement called forth amongst the greater portion of the inhabitants, by his cruel persecution of the Christians. No sooner had he arrived at the citadel, than he ran anxiously through all the apartments, and looked out at the starry heavens, first through one window, and then through another. He, who has so often proudly rocked himself in his Sella, and laughed as he looked on, while the combatants in the Arena are torn to pieces by lions, or the condemned Christians cast to wild beasts, has now become a trembling coward, as soon as he sees his own life in jeopardy.

Herod showed more courage. He preferred to watch the operations of nature. When all was silent and motionless, he mounted his steed, and rode with some friends to a beautiful valley outside the city, which to the present day is called the "Valley of Paradise."

* As Polycarp entered the Amphitheatre, a voice was heard from Heaven "Take courage Polycarp!"

Midnight was approaching; the heavens were beautifully clear, and a solemn stillness reigned around. All listened with breathless attention, yet no sound could be heard of that hollow, subterraneous rumbling, which usually precedes a convulsion of the earth. Even one amongst the party, who laid his ear close to the ground, could not discover anything to cause alarm.

Herod suddenly thought that he heard, not far distant, something he could not define. His friends were divided in their opinions, till it was soon discovered to be the reiterated barks of a watch-dog, on the roof of an adjacent villa. The barking echoed along the valley, and became gradually stronger and quicker, till it broke out into a loud, tremulous howl, which was soon taken up by several other dogs in the neighborhood. "A remarkable omen," said Herod, as he shook his head thoughtfully. On a sudden, the horses, with manes erect pawed the ground, reared, plunged, and dashed with their riders, foaming on.

Close to the city, the greater part of the inhabitants, weary of watching and exhausted with anxiety, returned to their dwellings. While some wondered that the appearances were so much dreaded, others were enquiring if the same signs had ever been observed before, without having been followed by evil consequences. The more cautious took balls of stone or metal, and suspended them by threads or long hairs from the ceiling of their rooms, in order to detect the first motion, and save themselves by immediate flight. Watches were placed on nearly all the houses; but the silence was unbroken save, from time to time, by a foot-fall, or the anxious whisperings of human voices. Although the guards were numerous, still they were insufficient to protect the property of the inhabitants from plunder. Thieves were lurking in all directions, hoping to profit by the general consternation.

Asmenes, the priest of Isis, on his return home, discovered that a great robbery had been committed in his absence. Occupied with the things that were then passing, he had forgotten to lock up his effects carefully, and behold! he found himself robbed of his new golden Sistrum, or "Isis-rattle." Complaining to his goddess, that she did not protect her own property, and burning with rage, he armed himself with a sharp knife, and ran down to the vestibule, thinking probably, that a second attempt would be made on his house. He waited there a long time. The cheerfulness, wherewith a little company of captive Christians were wending their way through the Hercules Street, towards the sea, formed a striking contrast to his fury. The slave-masters, fearing the worst, wished for greater security to put them aboard the ships, and send them out to sea when the signs became sufficiently alarming.

The procession approached an arch, with two torch-bearers in advance. The captives were intoning one of the beautiful canticles of their persecuted church, as they passed along. Asmenes stole behind a pillar, and as the words: "Laudate Dominum omnes gentes," fell upon his ear, he muttered to himself: "These are the blasphemers, the robbers, the cannibals, who are bringing so much misery on Smyrna! Now they approach! Nemesis will deliver them up to my vengeance:—an agreeable sacrifice to the Shade of Hades!" Seizing his knife, he darted forward, exclaiming: "Thieves! give me back my Sistrum—my golden Sistrum!"—and—crash!—a terrific rumbling like thunder, rolls beneath.—The earth no longer able to restrain the pent-up element, bursts asunder at the very feet of the heathen priest—He totters—falls, and in an instant finds his grave. The fiery element, just liberated, rushes with ungovernable fury along the street.—Another shock:—house after house heaves:—towers totter:—Castles are rent asunder, and street after street are heaps of ruins.

But what of the wretched inhabitants? They run to and fro in wild despair: they call on the gods to help them:—"Help! help! ye gods, or we are lost!" Some, in frantic haste, hurrying to the shipping; whilst others seek refuge in the mountains, or in the adjacent fields. The darkness increases the horrors of the awful scene.

The upper part of the city remained still undisturbed. The massive edifices and principal temples, had as yet withstood the fury of the element. Many of the people fled on the wings of terror to the temples of their gods; particularly to the great sanctuary of Homer, which was soon densely crowded. The confusion reached its height; flight was impossible, on account of the innumerable piles of smoking ruins, that everywhere impeded the steps of the unhappy fugitives. Men, women and children of every class, whom terror had deprived of their senses, might be seen, here and there lying among their fallen dwellings. The dead were carried into the open places by hundreds, still greater was the number of wounded, bruised, and maimed: and heart-rending were the agonizing shrieks of those, who were lying half buried beneath the scorching ruins, unable to afford themselves the slightest assistance.

The increasing darkness suggested the necessity of seeking the aid of torches; and he who was fortunate enough to pick up one, hoped by its means to find his way out of the city. But the endless heaps of rubbish, the rising exhalations, and the clouds of dust, rendered escape impossible. Even where a free passage was left, the red flickering light of the torches served only to make the 'darkness visible.' In several parts of the city, the fire burst forth again with redoubled fury, and destroyed, with incredible rapidity, everything within its reach. Some maintained that it proceeded from the earth, whilst others thought it was caused by the fires of the forges and of the dwelling houses buried beneath the ruins. Each one had something terrific to relate and many were of opinion that the end of all things was at hand, and that the world was about to be destroyed by fire. Suddenly cries were heard from the quarter, where stood the palace and citadel: a fresh chasm in the earth was issuing forth another destructive fire.

Staius Quadratus hoped to save himself by taking refuge on the highest terrace of the citadel. But he hoped in vain; for whilst on bended knees, he was imploring the protection of the gods, a roaring flame issued from the foundations, and forced its way through the palace till it reached the terrace, where he was. Terrified at the sight he drew back so far, that he had no other choice but to cast himself down from the height, or to succumb to the devouring fire. "Ten thousand sesterces to him who helps me!" But the flames had already claimed their victim. A scream, a faint moan, and Staius Quadratus has finished his wicked career.

Up to this time, by the fall of the above mentioned masses of dwellings, no less than the tenth part of the inhabitants lost their lives. Those who had sought refuge in the Temple of Homer, were nearly all crushed to death by the falling of the roof and pillars; but what appeared most strange was, that the bronze statue of the poet himself, was split from head to foot. More fortunate was the lot of those, who, like the Christians, sought in the first instance, to save themselves by sea. The unusual calmness of the waters formed a striking contrast with the destruction and devastation which raged on the shore.

Two hours after the tremendous shocks on land, the sea began to heave and swell at the mouths of the Hermos. Although the tide was then at the ebb, it rose, with the greatest rapidity, far above the highest flood-mark. On a sudden, a volcanic force beneath, raised the foaming waters mountain-high, and bearing the richly-laden vessels on their convulsed bosom, swept them as if triumphantly across the stone pier and cast them into the city. Then gaining a height of more than eighty feet, they passed over the highest buildings still standing, and, in their course, quenched the volumes of flames, which were issuing from all parts of the city. As if the sea were charged to complete the work of desolation, its waters receded slowly, leaving the shattered vessels mingled with the smoking ruins;* and in its return bore back in thousands, the dead bodies of the inhabitants. In such horrors the night passed on.

At last, impenetrable darkness, gave place to the morning-dawn. The earth was at rest, and the sea had resumed its wonted calm. The survivors, although they had lost all, looked upon themselves as enviable mortals. Strangers embraced each other, as though they had been dear friends meeting after a long separation.—It was a sad mingling of joy and sorrow.

*One large-sized vessel was found in the centre of the ruined Theatre.

On one side could be seen fathers and mothers weeping over the dead bodies of their children, on the other, children inconsolable for the loss of their beloved parents. The morning sun rose in splendor, and the sparkling waters danced in his beams, as if rejoicing to meet again.

What form is moving yonder on the heights? pale and slender, robed in white, enriched with the golden hues of the rising sun; bearing a broken chain on one arm, and a girdle on the other. It seems as though it were the guardian spirit of this once great city, mourning o'er its fall. Slowly and thoughtfully she passes on, till she reaches the still smoking ruins of the citadel. She pauses, and casting down her soft dark eyes, surveys the desolation that lies before her. The spectacle surprises her, but her mien betrays neither fear nor horror. Her expression is that of silent resignation to the will of Him, who makes the earth His footstool. She was roused from reverie by a voice exclaiming: "Seraphica here! The captive at liberty! The victim of death, standing over the tombs of her persecutors."

Seraphica answered with a gentle gravity: "Yes, Irenæus," for it was he, "the captive is free. After one had opened the door of my prison to announce my approaching death, another mightier than he, rent its strong walls asunder, and I was liberated. I now stand gazing on a city, whose splendor has vanished from the earth. Even whilst I am now speaking, I see several buildings falling into ruins. Irenæus, is not that my mother's dwelling? Oh what of her, revered master? Is she amongst the living or the dead?"

"You could scarcely wonder," replied Irenæus, "if she had shared the fate of so many. But no, Seraphica, she is saved, but saved by slavery. She and some of her companions in the faith, were, last night, shipped for Rome. But delay not to save yourself; your chains show that you are a captive."

An hour later, Seraphica was seen standing on the deck of the only sailable vessel to be found in the harbor. She was on her way for Greece. One look—as the vessel receded from the shore, and it was the last, upon the ruins of a city, where she had spent her few and momentous years.

She could discern her mother's half destroyed dwelling on the projection of a hill; but the palm trees and little garden had disappeared. And behold! while she was still gazing, the walls gave way, the roof fell in, and nothing remained of her once loved home.

CHAPTER III.

METELLA.

WE will now conduct our readers to charming Attica, so often celebrated in the poet's song,—to the land of great generals and lawgivers, to the cradle of philosophy, to the seat of the Muses, and to the place of refuge for the Faith.

The fame of Athens had, at this time out-grown itself, and began to tend towards her ruin. But even then she was in possession of all the intellectual acquirements of the past ages, and enjoyed the results of the thoughts, actions and labors of her forefathers. For this reason, it is the ripest and most beautiful period in her history. As the sun increases in beauty, whilst sinking in the West, so did Athens when verging on her downfall.

The Emperor, Adrian, loved Athens more than any other city in his vast dominions; and all the magnificent edifices and new regular streets on the other side of Adrian's Arch, extending wide, and forming, as it were, a second city,—were the work of this great Emperor. After this vast addition, Athens could accommodate 180,000 inhabitants. Adrian's Arch which thus connected the old city with the new, and which to this day is in good preservation, proclaims the later history of Greece in that degree of development, in which the Roman life was bound up with that of the ancient Greek, and which had blended both nationalities into one.

Outside the old city, to the north-east, was a pyramidal mountain called Lycabett; at the present time it is over-grown with thorns and brushwood. As tradition runs, Pallas, the tutelard goddess of Athens, was at one time fully occupied in ordering materials for building the Acropolis, which was dedicated to her. She was carrying even the Lycabett in her arms, when a crow fluttered round, and announced to her the birth of Erichthonius. Seized with terror, she let the mountain fall, close by Athens, where it now stands.

At the foot of this mountain, from the summit of which, the traveler has a charming view of Athens towards the citadel, and of the blue sea, were the palaces of the Greek and Roman nobles, who had settled there; and one which occupied the first place amongst them, was that of a Greek matron, named Metella. It stood not far from the principal entrance to the famous aqueduct, built by Adrian, and a little higher than the magnificent royal citadel outside Athens, which strangers still admire.

Like all the edifices of Adrian's time, Metella's palace was of Roman architecture: still the better taste of the Grecian was not wanting in the lightness and elegance with which the design was carried out. Inserted on the front of the vestibule, was a marble slab, on which might be read the name of the owner. Over the door of the principal entrance, stood a brazen statue, representing Hope, with the inscription, "Dum spiro spero," "As long as I breathe I shall hope."

Guarding the porch or entrance hall, was a slave, beautifully attired. He bore handsomely wrought fetters, which he rattled from time to time, thereby to give himself the appearance of a door-keeper. His walk, and the ease with which he swung his chain, proved that pride knows how to govern all classes of society, down to an ignorant door-keeper.

Metella tarries on the Pergula, a name given to a pavilion on the roof, and which is supported by gilt pillars. The lady, in all her natural elegance, reclines on a couch; and near her stands a marble table, on which lies an unfolded book-roll. It is the work of a Roman poet, her darling Virgil, whose eclogues she is reading. She raises herself, and taking her pen, writes down one of the most beautiful passages, on the reperusal of which her eye, and the movement of her head, show plainly, that the depth of some of the poet's words are not clear to her. But some of the verses please her so much, that she reads them aloud.

"Sicilian Muse, begin a loftier strain!
Tho' lonely shrubs and trees that shade the plain Delight not all. * * *

The last great age, foretold by sacred rhymes,
Renews its finish'd course; Saturnian times
Roll round again, and mighty years, begun
From their first orb, in radiant circles run.
The base degenerate iron offspring ends;
A golden progeny from heav'n descends: * * *
The lovely boy, with his ambitious face,
Shall Pollio's consulship and triumph grace;
Majestic months set out with him to their appointed race.
The father banish'd virtue shall restore,
And crimes shall threat the guilty world no more.
The son shall lead the life of gods, and be
By gods and heroes seen, and gods and Leroes see.
The jarring nations he in peace shall bind,
And with paternal virtues rule mankind.

* * * * *
Mature in years, to ready honors move,
O of celestial seed! O foster son of Jove!
See lab'ring Nature calls thee to sustain
The nodding frame of Heav'n, and earth, and main;
See, to their base restor'd, earth, seas, and air,
And joyful ages from behind, in crowding ranks appear,
To sing thy praise, would heav'n my breath prolong,
Infusing spirits worthy such a song;
Not Thracian Orpheus should transcend my lays;
Nor Luana crown'd with never fading bays;
Though each his heav'nly parent should inspire;
The Muse instruct the voice, and Phoebus tune the lyre." * * *

"Virgil, thou speakest beautifully," says Metella, "but I cannot understand thee. Nearly fifty Olympiads have passed since thy death, and I know nothing of that child of the gods who is to expiate guilt, and to redeem the world. There are a people in Asia, who believe that a god has lived amongst them, but he came to an evil end.

"When will the human mind find truth upon earth? It will ever stand before an enigma, and never solve it, for that enigma is itself."

She takes up a book, in Greek, an old work on history, which relates the misfortunes of Cyrus, king of Persia. She has scarcely read a few pages, when she seeks another chapter, nor does that content her. "Always the same," murmured she, "Cyrus broke up and advanced: here he commenced; Cyrus liked this, and wished that you also might partake of the enjoyment."

"No Xenophon," she exclaims, "thou art ever bread without salt, tasteless and unpalatable."—

She seizes the scrolls and casts them down on the polished Mosaic floor, so that they roll against the marble balustrades of the balcony.

"O time! O time!" she continues, "how unjust thou art sometimes with the works of the human mind! How often dost thou break to pieces in thy iron mortar the best and most beautiful, and scatterest it to the winds, scarcely leaving a remnant for us, whilst thou carefully preservest in thy sanctuary, the insipid and wearisome works, presenting them anew from one generation to another!

"But what want we with a book in this city!

"Athens lies open at my feet—a book of which Cecrops, seventeen hundred years ago, wrote the title page, and Theseus, the first chapter—A work, each leaf of which tells of wisdom, of power and of character. O let me read in thy pages, thou great, thou lovely city!—

"ATHENS THOU FEAREST THE GODS, and carriest the traces of thy piety written on thy marble forehead—on that Acropolis, rich in temples.

"Countless statues hide the sanctuary of Pallas from my view. Through gratitude to the gods, under whom Ægides fought and conquered, our forefathers erected the Parthenon,* and its founder, the immortal Pericles, speaks from every column, an earnest assurance to future ages, that a nation is never so strong nor so powerful abroad, as when its religion is strictly observed at home.

"Behold in the centre of the Parthenon, the colossal of the Athenian Promachos. Her gigantic form, towers above terrace, dome, and cupola; and her brazen plumed helmet and shining spear, announce to the distant lonely fisherman of Sunium, that thou, lovely Athens! art under the protection of Pallas.†

"ATHENS THOU ART JUST! and whoever doubts this; let him look at the Areopagus on yonder hill, in whose hall of justice the Archons, during the solemn silence of night, assembled in council, to pass judgment on the crimes, committed against religion and the state.

"ATHENS THOU ART BRAVE! and if a barbarian knew nothing of thy fame, that statue of Apollo yonder, would break the silence, and relate to him, how the youths leaped and wrestled there, and how they are to this day, a subject of astonishment to the Romans.

"ATHENS THOU ART THE SEAT OF SCIENCE, AND OF WISDOM! Thy Theatre, thy Lyceum, thy Sculpture-Halls, thy Academies, thy Colonnades proclaim it.

"Truly all thy monuments are leaves in this wondrous book, which thy sons have written, to declare to future ages, of what greatness of mind mortals are capable."

Whilst Metella was in this excitement, the sun had moved nearer to the olive groves, that lay between Athens and the sea, casting a rosy hue upon the thousand statues of the Acropolis, as if they were blushing at the praises Metella had just bestowed upon them.

At this moment, Metella's blooming son and future heir, entered the pavilion. He saluted his mother and informed her, that her slave-master, Bogus, had just returned from Smyrna; but that he had brought nothing she had ordered, except an Asiatic slave. He added that Bogus had related wonderful things of Smyrna, which was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake.

Metella, full of thought and astonishment, rose from her couch, and leaving the pavilion sought Bogus, for further news of Smyrna's fate; with whom we shall now leave her, till we relate some features of her life.

Metella was by birth a Greek, and before her marriage, bore the name of Chrysophora. She was acquainted from her youth with all the works of the ancient writers. Her father was Atticus, who was born at Marathon, one hundred and four years after the birth of Christ, and was one of the greatest men of Greece, a famous orator, a Roman consul, then tutor to Marcus Aurelius, and at last, Prefect of Greece. Although this celebrated man was such a favorite at the court of Rome, and could boast of the personal friendship of the two Anthonys, he still remained thoroughly Greek and prided himself on his noble birth, which he traced as far back as Miltiades, who conquered the Persians on the plains of Marathon.

Like a true Greek, he strove to keep up the renowned sports of his country. The spectators assembled for the Olympic games, were often parched for want of water, and he caused an aqueduct to be built for their convenience, at Olympia, by which he won the applause of all Greece. In beautifying Athens, Atticus gained great merit, but little thanks: the famous Odcon at the entrance of the Acropolis, the ruins of which are still standing, have immortalized his name. He had also the merit of erecting an hospital, and of beautifying the Stadium,* which accommodated 20,000 people.

In Adrian's time, there lived in Athens an estates Roman, named Metellus, a man of noble descent, who could trace his origin to that Metellus, who in the year 147 B. C. gave the death-blow to the freedom of Greece. He had reached a middle age, and retired into private life, where he first found time to think of marriage. Whilst in Rome, he had told Atticus, the then consul, of his desire to espouse his daughter, Chrysophora. She was an only child, for her brother died young, and her mother, Regilla, soon followed him. The negotiations in this business, were attended with obstacles which could not be removed by the suitor. The young and rich heiress, according to her father's desire, was to give the preference to a son of Greece, to which choice she evinced but little inclination, and Atticus was obliged to take the petition of the suitor into consideration. In addition to this, both Metellus and Chrysophora had attained that age, recommended by Aristotle for a prudent marriage.†

Chrysophora had been seldom in Athens, while her father, whom she always accompanied, was generally in active service. Metellus having for some time sojourned chiefly in Greece, had not seen her since her childhood.

The circumstance of the betrothed, not knowing each other, although they were shortly to be united, is frequently met with amongst the ancients.‡

As soon as the aged Atticus had signed the contract for his daughter's marriage, Metellus, journeyed at once to Peloponnesus, where Atticus so frequently resided towards the close of his life, to go through the ceremony of the betrothal. It was early in the morning, when he reached Elis, the longed-for house; and he impatiently entreated his future father-in-law to let him have a sight of his bride. Atticus excused her, as she was still occupied with her toilet. In fact, she had just ended her morning dream, as she was aroused by her slave, who announced to her the unexpected arrival. Chrysophora, wishing to appear in full holiday charms, ordered her slaves to bring forth her

* The Parthenon suffered the greatest devastation, in 1687, when the Venetians, at the taking of Athens, threw a bomb-shell into the powder magazine of the Acropolis, by which the roof of the temple was blown into the air. Still, at the present day, a forest of magnificent columns stands: a splendid edifice over which 2300 years have passed without entirely destroying it.

† Promachos and Pallas are other names for Minerva. This famous statue was still standing in the fourth century, after the departure of Alcibiades.

* Stadium, where the bull fights were held.

† Aristotle says Vol. vii. 18, that the woman should marry at 18, and the man at 37.

costliest robes, and to seek from her caskets the richest pearls. While one was occupied in preparing the rouge, another was powdering richly with gold dust, according to the fashion of the times, her raven hair, until it had attained a reddish hue. A slave passed even Atticus without a token of respect, so great was her haste in carrying to her mistress, sandals embroidered with the finest pearls—a sign that the toilet duties would soon terminate. But as the blooming girl, desired to please still more by her natural charms, than by her ornaments, she left on the renowned cosmetic of bread and milk, with which she covered her face every night before retiring to rest, until her toilet was completed, contrary to the usual custom. Atticus concluded, when he saw the slave carrying his daughter's sandals, that the important task was finished. He then thought of complying with the earnest entreaties of Metellus, and led him to his daughter's chamber.

Conceive her terror, when she heard loud steps upon the stairs! A slave hurried to the door, to stop the entrance of the guest, but he, driven on by exhausted patience, to see his long chosen one, forced the slave aside, and stood before the horror-stricken Chrysophora. The terrified slaves, instead of gathering round their mistress to screen her from his view, concealed themselves in the remotest corners of the room. There stood the vain Chrysophora—gorgeously attired, with the fatal paste hanging in fragments from her lovely countenance, showing here and there a strange contrast, between the delicacy of her complexion, and the grey hue of the cracked and dried-up cosmetic, which stubbornly adhered to the right cheek, to the forehead, and round the left eye.

Her heaving bosom betrayed the passion that raged within. Her eyes, or rather eye, for the left was half concealed behind its casement of dried bread and milk, flashed with rage. At length her tongue found utterance, and her wounded pride sought consolation in declaring, that she would recall her promise, and break the contract.

We see that even in this hour of dire humiliation, her woman's tact did not wholly desert her. She feared that this discovery would lessen the esteem of Metellus, and furnish a plea for breaking the contract. So she took care, in the midst of her confusion, to threaten the dismissal of her lover, when she thought he was likely to dismiss her, and it required all the flowery eloquence of an Atticus, to make clear to her, the folly of her resolution.

Metellus' cool deliberating character took advantage of the confusion. He enjoyed a privilege which any Roman would have envied, that of seeing his bride before marriage, and seeing her too in an unguarded moment. Her majestic form was his beau-ideal of perfection, and the visible portions of her charming countenance, exceeded his most sanguine expectations; so that, making every allowance for the little ebullition of temper he had just witnessed, he concluded that he had the greatest reasons to congratulate himself on the choice he had made. Having now fully satisfied his curiosity, he put on an embarrassed air, and making an humble apology for the intrusion, left his affianced lady to finish her toilet, and to distribute due castigations amongst her trembling slaves.

After this dilemma, the ceremony of the betrothal was completed by Metellus placing a ring on the third finger of his future bride's left hand; for the ancients believed that a nerve passed from that finger to the heart.

A day in the coming June was decided on for the nuptials, as that month was regarded as the most fortunate of all the year.

The haughty bride attired herself on that day, commensurate with her youth and rank and the solemnity of the occasion. She wore, according to the custom of the Greeks, a long white robe that fell in rich folds, confined at the waist with a woolen girdle. Her feet were provided with sandals brought from Morocco. Her hair parted into six long curls, was beautifully interwoven with wreaths of flowers, and her entire dress was completed by a rose-tinted veil, which fell gracefully over her majestic form.

The marriage ceremony was performed in her father's house, at Elis.

Sacrifices were offered to the goddess Hera, and the gall of the victims was thrown away, as a sign that all bitterness was to be banished from this union.

The marriage was confirmed in the presence of several witnesses, after which the guests partook of the wedding feast. There was one sad heart amongst them,—that of the aged Atticus. To the left of the table where he sat, was a cover for one, which remained untouched during the feast: it was that of his departed son, whose place at table, although he had been many years dead, remained unoccupied. There is so much that is touching in this trait of Atticus' character, that even the historian Lucius, who loved to dip his arrows into the sour dregs of Attica Sarcasm, here would have refrained from it. A custom was still observed amongst the Romans, which descended from the ancients who, as it is known, robbed the Sabines of their daughters. Therefore in imitation of this, the bride was taken off during the feast. In some cities this custom is still practiced. Young girls accompanied the bride to her chariot, one of whom carried a distaff, to remind her that spinning and household affairs are the proper portion of a matron.

The festivities commenced the following day, at the house of Metellus, in Athens. The bride herself received presents from her friends, and began to enter on her duties as mistress of the house. The old Hellenic principle was also to be observed by her: that it was for the man to speak and have authority, while the woman's duty was to devote herself to her husband and children, and to superintend the domestic arrangements.

The bride now took the name of Chrysophora Attica Metella, or for brevity, Metella. But with her name she did not lose her desire for knowledge, which she had sought after from her childhood. She knew how to unite it, in a fitting manner, with the duties of her state.

Time spared Metella's youthful charms, but for a few years. Her beauty faded, and various misfortunes told her but too soon, that man's life is ephemeral, and that he cannot with certainty, count on the morrow. Still her desire to please was nearly as ardent as before; but she sought to gratify it in another form. As she could no longer boast of her personal advantages, she endeavored, by the depth of her knowledge, and by the greatness of mind, to attract admiration; and as riches came to her assistance, she soon had numerous friends, who enjoyed the luxuries of her table, and bestowed in return, what to her was more agreeable, their unqualified eulogies. There was scarcely a lady in Athens so much renowned for learning. She not only read the works of all the poets and philosophers of Greece, but also studied them under the careful guidance of the best masters, and above all of her renowned father. Later on, many troubles crossed her path; first, she lost her beloved parent, who had passed the remnant of his days partly in Kephisia, where he possessed a magnificent estate, and partly in his birth-place, Marathon. Her husband quickly followed.

Lucius, a very talented and excellent youth, was the only fruit of this marriage. He had attained his fifteenth year, when he was called on, according to custom, to perform the most melancholy of all filial duties—to hold, with averted face, the funeral torch, and set fire to the pile on which his father's remains were to be consumed. His mother deeply felt the loss of her husband, for although he had little taste for learning, still it never disturbed the harmony that existed between them. Scarcely a week passed that the faithful wife did not go to the "Sacred Street," or "Cemetery" to adorn a tomb, on which was an inscription beginning with the words: "Pause, O Traveler!"—and which covered the urn that contained the ashes of her lamented husband.

These bitter blows of fortune, proved fruitful towards the development of her soul. From this time, her former longing to shine in learned conversations and disputes, considerably lessened; and a strong desire awoke within her, to ornament her future life, through noble works of virtue, which somehow seemed to her, brighter and higher in value, than learning. This great desire had only lately inspired her soul. We find here in Metella three developments of character, and who does not often discover these changes through life?—First there was the love of exterior natural gifts;—then followed the love of the endowments of the mind and lastly came love of the adornment of the soul.

Now let us glance at the newly arrived travelers. We have been informed that there was a young Asiatic slave, just come from Smyrna. It is no other than Seraphica. In the consternation that reigned in the harbor of her native city, it was not difficult for the Merchant of the vessel in which she sought refuge, to claim her as his own property; and as he had large dealings with Metella, he made a present of the young stranger to his rich customer.

Metella had scarcely looked on Seraphica's youthful and attractive form, than she gave an approving nod to the slave-master and asked him her birth-place. As she was born in Lydia, she was to be called in future after her province,—“Lydia.” The last that Seraphica held as her own, was her Christian name and that too, must vanish. She stood a stranger amongst strangers far from her native land, from her kindred, and from her companions in the Faith—She who now commands her is a heathen. Nothing more then, remained for her, than a look towards the blue heavens—common to all, and to place her trust in Him whose throne is beyond the stars. For His sake she has given up all, therefore her trust in Him was boundless. For He who could speak naught but truth, gave her the holy assurance, that she should receive a hundred fold in this life, and life everlasting. (Matthew xix.)

CHAPTER IV.

THE TIROCINIUM.

IN the magnificent square near Adrian's Stoa, the people of Athens might be seen crowding about a porphyry pillar, on which hung a decree, beginning with the words “Bonum Factum.” Those who stood near the placard, could scarcely be induced to leave it; whilst others did their utmost to copy the contents, and those at a distance, though they stood on tip-toe, still could not see to read more than the two words, “Bonum Factum.” “A good deed.” At last, some who stood nearest to the pillar turned round to those at a distance, and called out. “War is publicly proclaimed against the barbarians!”

Almost at the same instant, a herald passed through the square, and in a voice of thunder, announced the Emperor's declaration of war, against the people of the Danube; and that both Emperors,—Marcus Aurelius, and Lucius Verus, were to head the armies in person. Scarcely had the herald ceased to speak, when the people expressed their unqualified approbation, by loud and continued applause.

Amongst those who were thirsting for war, was the youthful Lucius, who still wore the long Toga Prætexta, striped with purple. With glowing cheeks, he hastened to some companions of his own age, to relate the news, and to consult on what part they were to take in the matter.

At this time, Metella was completely ignorant of what was passing in the city. She was at home, and for pastime, according to the singular custom of noble ladies of that day, had a tame serpent coiled round her neck; and was feeding it with crumbs of bread, whilst with her foot she beat time to distant music.

At this moment her copyist approached with a sheet of news he had just finished, and laid it on her richly chased silver table. While she was reading it, Lucius rushed in with flying Toga: “Mother, Mother! have you heard the great news? War against the Marcomanni and the two Emperors are themselves to be in action and to accompany the army to Aquileia. And all the youths capable of wielding a sword, are called on to make preparation.”

“Quietly my son” replied Metella, “you storm as if you were Mars himself. Do you not know that the sages never repeated anything so often to youth, as: ‘Not so fiery!’ you have left your Toga behind you. pick it up.”

“Oh how stupid!” replied Lucius, “but no wonder! I have lost my head as well as my Toga, but the loss of the latter is a favorable omen.” He lifted up his Toga and again approached his mother. “This is exactly what I would beg that you will allow me to doff altogether this Toga of the boy and to put on that of the man.” And looking big with importance he drew himself up to his full height, and with head erect marched up and down the room followed by the eyes of his mother who, with maternal pride, thought there was only one Lucius in the world. He stopped suddenly before her; “dear mother,” said he, “I should like to be a soldier, and join the campaign, young Quintus, the Proconsul's son, is not older than I am, and he has just told me that he has leave to go.”

“Quintus' father has other children—but should Metella lose her darling Lucius,” she said, placing her hand upon his head, “she has no one on earth to love. Say, my dear child, can you cause me so much anguish?”

Lucius, a little daunted, answered in a subdued tone: “Ah mother, must then all be killed who go to the war?”

“Perhaps,” said he, taking courage from her silence, “I may never meet with such a chance again in my whole life as to go to war with an Emperor—Two Emperors—think only—two Emperors, mother!” Lucius saw that he was gaining ground, and continued: “Do you remember how as a school-boy instead of writing on my tablet the names of great men, I used to draw little soldiers? Don't you see then that the military propensity was born with me.” Metella shook her head with a sorrowful smile.

“Dear mother, you do not expect me to become a Stoic, an Academic, Peripatetic, or even an Epicurean?—No! by the sacred oak of Dodona,” shaking his head jocosely, and with a hearty laugh, “I have no vocation for any of these! I think I see myself reflecting on the works of nature; staring at the heavens, with mouth half open, and head thrown back at the risk of injuring my spine, and measuring distances between the stars!—No!—no such tame occupation for me: that I will leave with pleasure to the philosophers and astronomers. I never see the tombs of the heroes at Kerameikos without envying their immortal fame. For the future, I shall be like Themistocles, who could not sleep at night, for thinking of the fame of Miltiades. My grandfather, Atticus often related how he was descended from the great Miltiades; and you, dear mother, have assured me of the same, a hundred times. Do you remember what my father said to me on his death-bed: ‘When thou becomest a man, be faithful to the Emperor till death.’”

“O yes! but he quickly added; ‘and obey your mother.’”

“But, mother, you know the campaign will not start this Autumn—not till the coming Spring. By that time, you will be able to reconcile yourself with your son gaining a few leaves from the Laurels of his immortal ancestor Miltiades. But if I am to join in the Spring, I must certainly get my white Toga now, and go through the exercises, the whole Winter, in the field of Mars. Therefore, dear—dear mother, the Toga Virilis! I beseech you to say, yes! Yes, mother, the man's Toga! Think only—I'm seventeen!”

“Patience, patience, my son, you shall have your man's Toga at the proper time.”

“But now, dear mother, not when the others are gone?”

“No, no:—”

“Therefore, may I go to the wars? May I, dear mother?”

“Well then, if you believe that this will secure your happiness, my dear son, let it be so. Go! and may the gods protect you!”—

At these words, the afflicted mother tenderly embraced her son, saying: “Remain always my child, as long as I remain thy mother, and I trust thou wilt ever be a good one, and well-pleasing to the gods.”

The joy of Lucius knew no bounds. He saw himself in spirit a Freeman of Athens, and one of its bravest warriors; and could scarcely await the day, on which he was to stand before the Proconsul, and receive from his hand the manly Toga.

“Mother,” said he, “don't you think that, in eight days, it will be time to change the Toga? Until then I'll conduct myself right well."

Metella laughed at this acknowledgment, and ordered a calendar to be brought, that she might see what festival was to be expected in Autumn. She found that the festival of the siege of Troy would be celebrated on the 15th of October. "That is for a second Achilles, just the very day," added the mother jestingly. "On that day you shall become a recruit."

"On the 15th of October," exclaimed Lucius "that will be an important day! True, there are several weeks till then, but the 15th of October will be a magnificent day!—That will be a day of rejoicing!" So said the fiery youth. "Now I must hasten to Quintus.—Farewell, my own dear mother, farewell," and in a moment he was out of sight.

Metella studied how she could make this festival, called Tirocinium, sufficiently important, that it would leave an indelible impression on the mind of her son; and she resolved on asking the Proconsul to make his address of exhortation for the occasion, most impressive and affecting. She next remembered—all the friends she would have to invite, not one of whom she dared to forget.

The Tirocinium of the ancients, was a festival which made a deep impression on every youth. It was intended to celebrate the transition from youth to manhood. In a solemn public address, they were exhorted to fulfil the duties of thoroughly good citizens. The great deeds of their ancestors were set before them; and if their forefathers were not renowned, they were reminded of the virtues of their nation. When it happened that some citizen was brought to justice on account of a misdemeanor, the judge took care to remind him forcibly of the resolutions and promises he had made at his Tirocinium.

We shall now see how the young Lucius celebrated this feast. A number of the noblest youths of Athens were summoned to appear before the Proconsul. All Metella's friends and relations were already assembled in the palace, but the lady of the house and her son, for whom the feast was given, were not yet visible, for they were still in the Lararium or temple of the household gods; where Lucius might be seen standing with outstretched arms, in fervent supplication, imploring a blessing on his future life. During a solemn prayer dictated to him by a priest, he vowed to the gods to treasure virtue above all things, and to hate vice. Then full of awe, he touched the knees of the statue, turned himself round to the right, and remained again standing before the divinity. His mother prayed by his side in silence. She wrote down on a waxen tablet, a promise to the divinity, that if her son lived to return from the wars, she would offer to the gods the spring produce of all the herds on her estates. Her prayer ended, the wine offerings commenced.—The fire burned on the small marble altar; the youth seized a golden cup, and filling it with wine from the sacrificial vessel, cast a portion into the flames, the remainder he poured at the feet of the divinity. He then placed a cake upon the altar, and whilst it was burning, he strewed the choicest incense from Arabia on the flames, which diffused a delightful perfume through the whole sanctuary.

The mother then advanced towards her son, and took from his neck the golden amulet, placed there by his father at his birth, and which was meant to keep him in constant remembrance of filial obedience, and to serve as a preventive against danger and certain diseases.—Metella placed it as an offering at the feet of the divinity. Lucius still dressed in his Prætexta with a cheerful countenance, left the Temple, and joined his friends, who were anxiously awaiting him. After having received congratulations on all sides, and covered with a thousand blessings, he was numerously attended on his way to the Proconsul's.

At this period the Athenians no longer held their usual assemblies, as at the time of the Republic, outside on the Pnyxhill, rich in historical memories, and which was celebrated by the renowned orators, but in the theatre of Dionysius,* where many youths were now assembled awaiting the Proconsul, to receive the Toga Virilis. At last he appeared and seated himself, when one youth after another accompanied by his friends, advanced towards him, laid down his Prætexta, and received from his hands the Toga Virilis, which was of white, bordered with purple.

* To this day the high and beautifully finished orators' stone, upon which men like Demosthenes stood, as well as a great number of Amphitheatrical stone seats, are yet to be seen on the Pnyxhill. The Forum in Rome scarcely affords more interest, than this place of assembly of the people of Athens.

The Proconsul exhorted each one separately on the significance of donning the Toga. "The purple stripes of the boy's Toga, said he to them, have always reminded you, during your boyhood, that you were to lead such a life, that when you became men, you might deserve to wear the purple bordered Toga, as a sign of higher service in the state. You must also never forget that you are the descendants of those renowned Greeks, who delivered their native country from the hands of the Persians." After the duties of a citizen had been impressed on the minds of the youths by a most eloquent address, they were then surrounded by their friends, who vied with each other in offering them their congratulations. Lucius with his friends, ascended the heights of the Acropolis, there to recommend himself to the protection of Pallas. The Cella of the Temple was open, and they devoutly approached the Prosthyon, the so-called Sanctorum, the vaulted roof of which was painted blue, and studded with stars; this was a portion of the temple set apart for the most solemn rites of their worship. Here stood in all her imposing splendor, and elevated to a considerable height, the ancient and renowned statue of Pallas, covered with immeasurable quantities of gold and ivory. The devoutly inclined, prayed before her with great fervor, while the less devout feasted their eyes on the magnificent statue, the master-piece of the celebrated Phidias, and then on the elaborately chased golden lamp, that hung before the goddess.*

Lucius on his way home, looked every now and then with particular complacency on his Toga Virilis, and smiled upon his friends for approbation, who gravely assured him, that he had already quite the appearance of a citizen, which he was too modest to acknowledge, but did really think so.

"A beautiful feast" said he to them, as he descended the superb marble steps of the Temple, "but there is one thing I felt keenly as I invoked the goddess, protectress of Greece. The Greek youths must submit to be invested by a Roman magistrate, fight under the Nobles of Rome, and accept an Emperor, who looks upon Greece as a province, and calls her Acacia."

"It was otherwise in former times! O that it were still so. If my grandfather were now living, he would speak to-day at table, of nothing but the Field Generals of ancient Hellene. How would my mother rejoice, if she were to see the ancient Hellenes arise! That was the reason, without doubt, that she looked so sorrowful to-day, when we parted with her, previous to our entering the theatre of Dionysius."

But these serious thoughts quickly vanished, for Metella met and welcomed them cheerfully; and after a repeated exhortation to the son of her heart, she ordered the attendants to announce that the feast was prepared. The guests presented Lucius with many rich gifts, after which they sat down to table, where nothing failed in either delicacies or amusement. There were jesters, jugglers, and musicians, each contributing his mite to the general hilarity. Here might be seen the difference between Grecian and Roman enjoyment. The Greeks found the noise and jesting incompatible with the customs of their nation; whilst the Romans, poorer in their intellect than in their sensual appetite, found in this amusement, and in feasting the highest entertainment. Many of them would have been perfectly contented, to use Lucian's words, to eat undisturbed a sucking pig and sweet cakes, and in place of learned conversation, sink their head heavy with wine, upon the cup they were holding.

From this time forward Lucius attached himself to distinguished men, who were well versed in the art of war, and who exerted themselves in training their client as a first rate soldier. He performed his military exercises every day in the field of Mars, full of burning desire to face the enemy, and to tread in the renowned footsteps of the great Miltiades.

CHAPTER V.

THE HAIR BODKIN.

SOME months had now passed, since Lydia had entered Metella's service as a poor slave. Slavery was to her as a wilderness, that stretched its parched surface under the scorching rays of the sun, far beyond where the eye can reach. But as once in olden times, the pious Ruth wandered alone over the stubble fields of Booz, gleaning after the harvest, so Lydia wanders over her wilderness, carefully endeavoring to garner up the fruits of good works. The character of Metella was just one that gave her sufficient opportunity to practice self-denial. For those who appear so amiable and courteous to guests and friends, are often severe and cruel tyrants towards their dependents. We shall soon be acquainted with Metella's private character.

Lucius had just been called to the field of Mars, to take part in a greater display than usual of military tactics. In passing by his mother he greets her affectionately, and begs of her to witness the field exercises from a neighboring building. He had scarcely left the house, when an invitation arrived from the Proconsul, inviting Metella to join some guests who were to meet the generals at his house, after the exercises of the day.

Metella called a domestic, and as no one heard her, she whistled* for a slave outside to enter. She then gave orders to have fitting attire prepared for her, and to arrange her best jewels: for the Proconsul according to Lucian, was a man that paid great attention to exterior ornaments.

With flying steps, Arpis, the head mistress of Metella's personal attendants, hastened to her lady's dressing-room, and brought forth a white tunic of the finest Milesian wool. The first had short sleeves, which merely covered the upper part of the arm, and were slit up the middle and fastened with golden clasps, according to the old Doric style. The neck and skirt of the shorter tunic were trimmed with a stripe of double dyed Sidonian purple; a distinction allowed only to matrons of noble birth. The part of the under tunic which appeared below the knee, fell to the ground in ample folds, and was terminated by a rich fringe. Arpis was at great pains in providing her lady's dress; and with wonderful dexterity she raised it on a stand and fastening the white girdle round the waist, saw that the tunic hung over the cincture in graceful folds.

A second slave exerted herself in arranging the head dress, and fastening the diadem, under which the hair was to fall in light ringlets on the temples. A magnificent bodkin of chased gold, adorned with a figure of Iris in carved ivory, completed the head-dress; but it was not added till the toilet was completed. The bodkin was a much admired piece of workmanship of an ancient sculptor. The figure measured four inches, and was finished in all its parts with the choicest and most elaborate carving; it could be screwed off, and replaced by another, according to fancy. With a reverential awe she placed the precious bodkin on the toilet table. She had good reason for doing it with all possible care; for on one of the gold chains called Cathedra, which ran round the upper part of the dressing chair, was a whip of plaited wire, which, when occasion required was quickly brought into action. It was just as though Juvenal had Metella in his eye when he wrote on the cruelty of Matrons to their slaves.

"Poor Psecas decks her head,† herself in tears,
And her own locks all dang'ling round her ears,
Her neck uncovered and her shoulders bare;
Not saved from vengeance by her utmost care.
"Why is this lock," the mistress storms, "too high?"
"Poor girl she riles the crime: one half's awry!"
What's Psecas' fault? Is she to feel your blows,
If 'tis your will to quarrel with your nose?"

—Juvenal, Sat. vi.

Lydia brought the shoes, and then arranged some of the folds of her mistress's dress. Metella, according to the fashion of the day, used paints, and ordered an oval mirror to be placed before her, so that she might improve and soften off with a hair pencil, what her maid had begun in rouging as well as in the shading of her eyebrows. It suddenly occurred to her that she had a still deeper black which could be used with a greater effect; and as there was not much time to be lost, she called Lydia hastily to bring it. The order was scarcely given, when the unhappy slave, in turning suddenly round to fulfill the command knocked against the toilet table, and the bodkin rolled, fell and lay on the floor in pieces. The unfortunate slave had no time to utter a word, before her mistress, inflamed with anger, springs from her chair, and in a state of frenzy, pounced, like a beast of prey, on the terrified Lydia, and stuck her long pointed nails into her arm. She then with abusive words seized the whip, and swinging the metal knots in the air to give her blows greater force, struck the poor slave lying at her feet most unmercifully, till she was covered with blood. Her groans excited no pity, and she was carried insensible from the apartment. The lady continued to storm, and even the slaves who were present could not find sufficient words to express the full extent of the offence. But to appease their infuriated mistress, they out-vied each other in bestowing a volume of praises on the magnificence of her attire, and the gracefulness of her slender form. Such flattery never failed to pacify her.

The toilet finished nothing more remained to be done but to throw around her the light white mantle, which hung in graceful folds over her left arm, and reached the ground.

All this time, six powerful Syrian slaves were waiting for her in the vestibule, with a long and easy sedan.

The ancients found it more agreeable to have themselves carried in a litter on men's shoulders, than to be drawn by horses through clouds of dust. In addition to this, the streets of all the cities in the South were so narrow, that carriages were nearly useless. Those narrow streets were, notwithstanding, most advantageous, as they afforded a cool shelter from the sun, nearly the entire day.

Metella's sedan was made of finely polished Citron wood; on the upper part of which were two poles drawn through, for the convenience of bearers. The interior lined with costly stuff, was sufficiently large for reclining, and was provided with rich cushions and a footstool.

The lady descended from her toilet to the sedan, and on her way through the vestibule, her roguish parrot in his ivory cage greeted her with his well-conned speech of flattery.

A boy placed a footstool before the sedan, while the waiting-maids, arranged in a double row, with their arms crossed on their breast, bowed her off, with all reverence and with no small pleasure. Metella folded her highly perfumed mantle round her, motioned for her little Maltese dog to be brought to her, which she half covered with her mantle, remarking with a smile that her little favorite has a cold, and sneezes often. Metella petted her little darling, and tantalized him with her golden bracelet. She reclined in the sedan, so that she could remain unseen by those whom she wished to avoid saluting.

The lady has taken her departure, and it is now time to inquire after poor Lydia. She was in her little room resting on a cushion. Ophne, her assistant in the shoe department, hastened to wash the wounds of her maltreated friend, and to give her all the comfort in her power. She expressed the greatest pity, and assured her, that she had herself often been made to feel the effects of the whip. She then began to relate Metella's cruelty in former times, and seemed to find a consolation in doing so. Lydia listened for a few minutes, and interrupted her saying: "This time, dear sister, our good lady had cause to be displeased. Think only of my awkwardness, whereby this disaster happened, and then of the loss she has sustained. We must be just, Ophne, and keep in mind the good qualities of our mistress. Think of the discipline and order she observes in her house: the many blessings she bestows on the poor; and the religious duties she performs so conscientiously every day." Ophne was astounded at hearing such words from Lydia, and at such a moment. "Those are praises," said she "that we never bestow on our mistress, unless in her presence. When she is absent, we relate to each other her bad qualities. But I have remarked that you never flatter her; on the contrary, what you say sounds more like blame. But one thing you must acknowledge sincerely: Is it not true, that you feel rather stormy within, whenever you think of her cruelty, and that you will never forgive it." "In a certain sense, dear Ophne, you are right. I have never to forgive anything, because I never feel myself offended." Ophne reflected for a moment, and repeated the words to herself, 'I have nothing to forgive, because I never feel myself offended.' She could not understand how a poor ill-treated servant, who dares have no other revenge than that of the heart, could resign that also. She was far from suspecting that the man who bears patiently, in faith and hope, suffers also with a holy love. But she resolved that she would, while on her way to the currier's shop, where she was just going, reflect on the sentiments she had heard. Turning to her fellow slave, she gave her a hearty kiss on the cheek, and said: "You gentle lamb, give me some remedies that will help me to conquer my anger, I should wish to be like you exactly in this respect."

* A custom in those days. Origen greatly disapproved of it for Christians.

† Her mistress' R. P.

"For a Christian there are many remedies: first the clear knowledge of one's own imperfections; secondly, meditation on the sufferings of our Redeemer; and thirdly, forbearance and indulgence towards the errors of our neighbor."

"No my dear, I do not want remedies for a Christian, but for a heathen, such as I am."

"I heard once" replied Lydia, with a smile, "that a certain philosopher, who was much given to anger, determined on carrying about him a mirror, so that when anger darkened and distorted his features, he might behold in it their ugliness, and thereby conclude upon the far greater deformity of the interior."

"One word more Ophne, does not the currier to whom you are now going, sell sheets of parchment? Pray be kind enough to bring me a few."

"What has a sandal-maid to do with parchment," said Ophne, "and where shall I get the money to purchase it?"

"What I want with the parchment, dear child, I cannot tell you, but in any case I can give you the money for it. I have a few pieces of gold, which my mother gave me when I was a captive in Smyrna, probably thinking that thereby I might be able to purchase a little civility from the jailer. I did not avail myself of it, but kept the money secreted in my dress, and brought it with me to Athens." Lydia placed it in Ophne's hand.

"But you must tell me," said Ophne, "what are you going to do with the parchment. If you don't, I assure you I'll come back empty handed. I always looked upon you, as my dearest companion in misery, and to a prudent friend you may say anything."

"Well then," said Lydia, "if it must be so, I'll tell you. Our mistress asked me lately, when I told her that I was a Christian, if I could not procure for her the famous defence, written by the Christian philosopher Justin, and delivered to the Emperor Antoninus Pius. I have in the mean time, through the kindness of our bishop, Quadratus, received the writing. And now I should like to copy it, and surprise Metella with it on her approaching birth-day. She does not know that I am a calligraphist, and her joy will perhaps be the greater, when she finds the roll in her library. And now, child, you know all, go and bring me the parchment." Ophne stood before her fellow slave, as if transfixed by enchantment. With a gentle pressure of the hand, she gave her to understand on leaving the room, how clearly she had seen into the depths of her heart.

But a sweet feeling of heavenly enjoyment, such as the good alone experience, when they have performed a generous deed, flowed through Lydia's soul. It appeared to her as though a divine voice whispered to her: "This time thou hast acted well, for when I was fastened to the cross, I prayed for my executioners. I commanded my disciples to love their enemies, to do good to them that hated them, and to pray for those who persecuted and calumniated them."

Lydia had often heard this very exhortation from the lips of the holy bishop, St. Polycarp, who wrote the same in a letter to the Philippians: "We cannot rise with Christ if we do not avoid rendering evil for evil: on the contrary we must show mercy that God may show mercy unto us."

Ophne has returned and brought the parchment with her. Lydia commences to arrange the sheets, draws the line for writing, takes the instrument in her practised hand and copies the address, "Sent to the Emperor Adrian." She hoped to be able to bring in Justin's defence on a few rolls and was lost in admiration, as she proceeded at the beauty of thought and the clearness with which the mysteries of the Christian doctrine were explained. She rejoiced at the favorable impression which the writing was likely to produce on the mind of her mistress. She found herself unable to write more than the superscription, as her hand trembled violently at every letter and in addition the night was far advanced.

Laying down her iron style,* her mind reverted to the actions of the day just at an end. Now and then she cast her eyes upon the simple cross which hung in her room, and was tastefully encircled with the girdle of St. Polycarp, with which her hands had been bound, when she was taken captive in the Amphitheatre of Smyrna. She knelt down before the sign of her crucified Redeemer; for she had much to say to Him, ere she completed the duties of the day. With what delight did she fulfil the mandate of our Lord; to pray for those through whom she had become one merit the richer! "Accept, O God! the little affliction of this day, as if my dear mistress had suffered it for the love of Thee. If my patience were agreeable to Thee, do not ascribe this little merit to me, but to her. And should she ever deserve Thy anger, then, O Lord! punish not her but me! I offer up myself for her. One grace grant unto her, O Lord! The grace of knowing and loving Thee, our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ."

While she was thus praying, she did not perceive that a hand had drawn aside the curtain which concealed the door of her room—a few minutes, and it was again closed softly and unheard by Lydia, and Metella passed noiselessly along the corridor.

During the entire time of the military exercises, and the evening entertainment, Metella was greatly discontented with herself. The remembrance of her cruelty towards her poor slave pressed heavily on her soul; and it appeared impossible for her to retire to rest without finding some excuse to say a friendly word to the ill-treated one.

But as she found Lydia on her knees pouring out her griefs to her God, she was seized with a holy awe, and departed without uttering a sound. She withdrew into her private sanctuary, there to be reconciled to her offended deity for her conduct, and lighting some frankincense, she strewed it at the feet of a statue, and intermingled the action with penitential prayers. She pressed her forehead glowing with shame to the feet of the statue; but the cold goddess seemed to recede from her: the sculptured form had neither heart nor consolation for the oppressed supplicant. The poor heathen, with a heart full of contrition, resolved on performing an especial act expressing the deepest compunction. Such an act which we never meet with in succeeding centuries, and which had something in it most humiliating. She bent her head and spat three times into her bosom. Then she arose, and retired to her chamber.†

This was a penance amongst the heathens which had its foundation in the idea of showing themselves before the divinity in the deepest degradation, after having committed a wicked deed. In the Christian religion we have some such custom in the striking of the breast three times to express thereby, that as the heart is the seat of our injustice, so it deserves to be punished.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SACRIFICES IN THE TEMPLE OF JUPITER

THE warlike exercises already mentioned, were carried on throughout the entire Winter and Lucius applied himself to the duties of his vocation with such zeal that he had already gained the reputation of being a well disciplined soldier

The Spring of the year 167 in which the imperial troops from the north of the Adriatic were to meet on the Alps, had commenced Orders were issued from Aquileia, near to where the two emperors had passed their Winter that the people should use all the means in their power to invoke the favor of the gods The greatest importance was attached to this campaign. It had to carry the banner of the Romans to the eastern banks of the Danube, and to announce the fame of the victorious arms to the surrounding barbarians as far down as the land of the Jazygan, now called Hungary, and the woody shores of the Theiss. The enemy was known to them; and the renown of Ariovist, the general of the Marcomanni, and of Armin's victory, were well remembered by them; and could they have forgotten the bravery of the Germans, they had a memento of it, in the annual procession of the Capitoline geese, which by their cackling once saved Rome from a nightly attack of those barbarians. Countless sacrifices bled on the altars of Aquileia, as well as at Athens. All the purifications customary since the time of Numa, were performed. There was also a Lektisternium of seven days celebrated, which consisted of meats being offered to the gods on small tables, before which the statues were left lying, but those of the goddesses were placed sitting.* To the east of the Acropolis not far from Adrian's Arch, where to this day, sixteen gigantic pillars of Corinthian architecture stand, was the magnificent temple of Jupiter Olympus. This edifice was supported by a forest of pillars, one hundred and twenty in number, and was two thousand three hundred feet in circumference. It was Adrian who completed this ancient building. A countless number of statues ornamented the whole, but the one which held the first place, was the famous colossal statue of Jupiter Olympus, in gold and ivory, finished by Phidias. In addition to this was the stupendous memorial to the Emperor Adrian, which had just been erected by the grateful city. This colossal structure could be looked upon as one of the seven wonders of the world, although not counted as one, and the ruins, to this day, make an astonishing impression on the traveler; which can only be exceeded by viewing the remnant of the Acropolis—a city of gods reduced to fragments!—

A clear morning smiled from the heavens, the sun had scarcely appeared above the horizon, when the men of Athens fit to bear arms, assembled together in their coats of mail and brazen helmets, glittering in the morning sun. Lucius was also ready, and whispered mysteriously in his mother's ear, that the Augurs complained; the day previous, that the sacred chickens would not feed, and that at the last augury, neither a raven nor crow had appeared. "Obstinate ravens," added he, "at other times they will croak all the day long."

"Therefore, we must pray the more for the assistance of the gods," replied Metella, who was just having a parsley wreath twined through her hair. "An unfortunate augury," said she, "is a serious matter, for thereby people lose courage. Have you not heard what the oracle at Delphi has proclaimed?"

"O, the oracle," said Lucius, "that knows no longer whether Cæsus is boiling a lamb or a tortoise.† The golden treasures of Delphi would be more acceptable to us now than its leathern oracles, and a Pythaulus is more thought of in those days than a Pythius."‡

* Stolberg's History d. R. I. viii. 8. 73.

† A jest on the famous words of the Oracle in the time of Cæsus, who sent a messenger to Delphi to ask what he was doing at home at that moment. The Oracle gave a correct answer: "That the king was standing before a cauldron boiling a lamb and a tortoise."

‡ There were at this time, according to Pausanias, ten books, great treasures in Delphi: Pythaulus the combatant with the Dragon. (Phyton was called Pythaulus.) The Oracle gave its last answer about the year of our Lord 360, to Julian the Apostate: "Say to your kins that Phoebus has no longer a shelter."

Metella now began to reflect seriously on the approaching war, on the unfavorable account of the Augurs, the probable fate of her only child, and on the sad farewell that awaited her in a few days. While she was buried in these melancholy thoughts Duranus, the boy whose business it was to strike the hours on the Clepsydra, slipped between the rich Indian curtains hanging before the entrance of her apartment and announced the hour to her so that she might hold herself in readiness to attend the sacrifice.

What a magnificent and exhilarating sight it was to see the thousands crossing the plains outside Athens, on their way to the Temple! The vivid flashes from the steel helmets and naked swords, the shields, glittering in the rising sun—the helmet plumes floating gracefully on the breeze—and above the heads of the warriors, could be seen in thousands, halberts, lances and standards, and banners of golden-winged eagles, waving and fluttering in the morning air. The legions arriving at the Temple, ranged themselves in order before the altars erected outside, which were richly decorated with wreaths and flowers. A herald stepped forward, and with a stentorian voice commanded profound silence. After the cry, "Javele linguss," the priest of Jupiter, robed in a purple mantle, appeared before the entrance of the sanctuary, and the sacrifice began, which, this time, was to be all the more solemn, as Jupiter had not inhaled the vapor of sacrifice from Olympia for a long time. The incense was already burning on a hundred altars, and the smoke ascended from countless thuribles. Then the priest, with a loud voice and raising his hands to heaven, addressed a prayer to Jupiter imploring the defeat of the enemy, and the triumph of the imperial arms. He promised that a portion of the booty, if the Romans conquered, should be appropriated to Father Jupiter and his Temple. Those who stood near the altars, touched them in sign of consent; others embraced the statues of the gods, multitudes of which were to be found amongst the pillars of the temple, whilst many made a circle several times round keeping their fingers on their lips in sign of their devotion.

When this was at an end, a number of magnificently attired servants, whose duty it was to attend to the sacrifice, walked in procession up through the centre, which was lined on each side by the warriors. Amongst them was Popis, with tucked up garments, who led a white, gilt-horned bull, which was without blemish, and was so gorgeously decorated with precious stuffs and rich ribbons, that he could hardly be seen. Whilst the animal was standing opposite the magnificent statue, which represented Jupiter grasping the thunderbolt, and seated on a throne of ivory, incense was again thrown up and cast upon the fires which burned on the altars. The smoke was so dense that the pillars became invisible, and the rich vestments of those who officiated, shone through the clouds of incense like sparkling gossamer. The priest of Jupiter advanced, sprinkled the animal with lustral water, scattered meal mixed with salt upon his head, then took some finely powdered incense, and threw it on the forehead of the bull, between the gilded horns. He then tasted the wine, and gave some of it to the other priests, who were standing round him dressed in white robes. After the bull had partaken of a libation of this wine, some of the hairs above his forehead were plucked out, and cast into the flames.

During this ceremony, Popis stood with his well-sharpened knife, awaiting the commands of the high priest. On each side of the bull stood the firm-handed assistants of Popis, who partly had to lay hold of the animal at the moment of killing, and partly to catch the blood in the sacred vessels, and to pour it on the altars. Popis then asked the high priest, "Shall I do it?" who answered: "Do it." At this command, he plunged, with a powerful hand, the sharp knife into the neck of the animal, and during the bellowing, the warm blood of the victim was caught in vessels and sprinkled on the altars

As soon as the beast had bled to death, the office of Augurs commenced. They began to examine the entrails and took out the heart and liver, but they examined the latter with the greatest exactness, as being the seat of numerous signs.* With a serious mten, they divided it into two parts, and repeatedly complained, that this time, it failed entirely in a certain fleshy protuberance. But the heart of the animal and the well-arranged entrails gave more hope for a happy termination of the war.

* More advanced Physiology can give a reason why the liver was looked upon as the seat of mysterious signs or omens.

The future was ascertained in this manner, and those parts of the victim which belonged to the gods, were sprinkled with flour, wine and incense, and placed upon the flickering embers. Upon this, the people approached and laid down their gifts, which were also burnt in honor of the gods; amongst these offerings were the most costly gold and silver ornaments.

But as this day's sacrifice was too important for only one bull to serve, so the heathens sent Jupiter a countless number of heifers, the principal of which were to be offered to the gods, others for the priests, and the remainder for the people, who sat down round the temple waiting for the feast, with the music of pipes, cornets and flutes. The feast at an end, prayers were said aloud, the wine was handed round, and then the people were dismissed with the words, "You are allowed to depart in peace." We have now in a few lines, placed before our reader a pagan sacrifice; and we leave it to him, to judge of the religious element of the action.

Only one remark we wish to add upon the fundamental thought of the action. Sacrifice is the centre, not only of the Christian but also of the Mosaic and even of pagan worship. He who makes the offering acknowledges that he is unworthy of the gifts of the divinity, and that he has forfeited them by sin. Therefore he places on the altars, the most beautiful substitute of the gifts of the deity, fruits, animals and treasures, in humble acknowledgment that he is unworthy of such blessings. The anger of God, according to the ancient faith, was to be entirely appeased only by a sacrifice of life, and hence came human sacrifices—the blood of man was looked on as the bearer of life, and poured upon the altar. Later on, the blood of animals was offered instead of human blood, therefore the offerings of animals, according to the ideas of the ancients, and also of the Israelites, were a substitute for many human offerings.

The religious ceremony we have just described in the Temple was intended to conciliate Jupiter, father of the gods, with mankind, and thereby to make them worthy of his assistance in the coming war. For the same reason, we see the people of Athens, one day after the other, making their offerings, at one time in the citadel of Pallas, at another in the massively built temple of Mars,* and in numerous other temples of the city.

At length the day dawned in which the soldiers were to take shipping in the harbor of Piræus. It was the day of separation from family, friends and country. Fathers reminded their sons of the old saying of the Spartan, "either to return with, or on the shield."

With blessings Lucius extricated himself from the tender embraces of a mother, who loved no one on earth more ardently than the fiery youth, who now, for the first time, took the field. He knew how to comfort his mother, by placing before her, the glorious future, and the high honors which the present war would secure. We shall soon see how he found, that youthful enthusiasm resembles a glittering soap-bubble, which only too soon sinks into a drop of muddy water.

CHAPTER VII.

CHARACTERISTIC SKETCHES OF THE SLAVES, AND THEIR MODE OF LIFE.

WHEN Lucius departed, his mother gave way to excessive grief. She now felt, for the first time, how tenderly she loved her son. While we leave her in solitude, retired from the world, with an ear for nothing else but the language of a mother's afflicted heart, we will take our gentle readers through the domestic portion of * The beautiful Doric temple on the west side of Athens is considered to be one of the best preserved ruins of antiquity, and is usually called the temple of Theseus. Professor Doctor Rosse mentions that this temple was dedicated to the god of war.

this lady's immense establishment, and give them a little idea of the characters and mode of life, of its principal inmates

To commence then In those buildings surrounding the courtyard, were an unusual number of cooks, all of whom were well experienced in preparing delicacies. They spared no pains, this very day, in serving up favorite dishes for their afflicted mistress; yet they had not the satisfaction of seeing her enjoy them. The duty of carrying them to table devolved upon youths of the finest form, purchased from the distant North, with their much admired blue eyes and flaxen hair. Next was a capacious hall, the occupants of which remind us of our own unhappy factory people. Maids were sitting behind a long row of looms, weaving stuffs, partly for their mistress, and partly for the numerous domestics of the house. In the garden were a still greater number of slaves, some planting vegetables, others weeding flower-beds and looking after the fruit trees. But in Metella's olive-gardens, vineyard, and in her country houses, both at Kephissia and Eleusis, one could only form a perfect idea of the number and occupations of her dependents.

After this general survey, we will now place some of the above mentioned beings individually before the reader. We will first introduce him to our favorite, who is just now standing in penance in the corner of the front impluvium, the fair-haired Duranus, whose duty it is to stand near the Clepsydra, or water-clock. When he perceived that strangers were coming, he hung down his head in confusion upon the little board, suspended from his neck, upon which was written the fault he had been guilty of. As it had gone well with him for some weeks, he took down the whip that usually hung on the balusters, and mischievously secreted it in one of the arbors of the garden. At length his conduct required it, and it was no where to be found, till the severe Bogus discovered it, and deeply impressed it on the shoulders of the youth. In addition to this, a log was fastened to his foot, and he had been already standing half the day in a corner of the colonnade. Although he then looked downcast, still his usual aspect was cheerful. He bore a strong resemblance to the playful squirrel, which is happiest, when climbing trees. His gentle disposition often expressed itself in the soft plaintive tones. he drew from his Tibia.*

When mischievously inclined, he would take his tambourine, and drum upon it with all his might, till Bogus gave him a sen-sible hint, that it was time to strike the hour on the Clepsydra.

This Bogus was a rough, hard-hearted man. He had spent some years in the army, of which he was not a little proud, as could easily be seen by the care with which he kept up his military department. He is Metella's slave master, and carries a staff in his hand as the sign of his office, and has the superintendence and power of punishing the slave. A cap firmly pressed down on his head, and tightened round his full bloated face, gives one to understand that he is no longer a slave. Formerly he was one, having been taken prisoner of war, with other soldiers, and made to pass under the yoke, in the market-place of Athens. He was sold as a slave to Metellus, from whom he had afterwards received his freedom. A scourge would have suited him better than a staff, for nothing gave him greater pleasure than to tie a slave up to a pillar, and fasten a heavy weight to his feet, in order that he might have him in a straight immovable position, to receive an uncertain number of lashes. His cruel disposition resembled Caligula's. This Emperor one day, ordered several youths of the best families of Rome, to be lashed, and then put to the torture, and this merely for pastime. His severity to his inferiors, was only equalled by his cringing servility, and uncomfortable politeness to his superiors.

A similar situation to that which Bogus had once enjoyed with Metellus, his deceased master, an old female slave, nearly sixty years of age, named Selina, enjoyed with his mistress. She was an African by birth, and had passed more than half her life with her present mistress. She had known Metella as a child, and was purchased by Atticus in the slave market of Rome, to nurse his little Chrysophora. Her dark brown African countenance formed a humorous contrast with the fair delicate complexion of her youthful charge; and Atticus never thought that his little daughter looked lovelier than when she was reclining in the arms of her ugly nurse. Selina, therefore knew the whole life of her mistress, and had so great an affection for her, that she preferred living as a slave with her, than to accept the freedom proffered her. But this affection was almost her only good quality, for in consequence of her evil dispositions, which increased with her years, she made herself perfectly insupportable to her fellow slaves, and was so uncharitable, that she could not have a servant near her, to whom she did not speak in confidence against every other person in the house. In spite of this, it was to her a matter of the first importance, that she should bear a high character in the eyes of all. On the other hand, she was such a hypocrite, that she poured forth her flatteries, not only on her mistress, but on the very meanest of the slaves. This cringing character is a quality in the Africans. Though so old, she daily used a number of superstitious means to preserve her dark beauty, and being ashamed of her short woolly hair, she concealed it with a handsomely folded turban. As she had been so long in service, she was able to put by a considerable sum, for she received monthly wages, in six measures of corn and five florins in money. With her savings she had her own peculiar way of speculating, and resembled the Indian ant, which, it is said, collects gold out of the earth. She bought, from time to time, a cheap slave, made some profit by his labors, and then disposed of him at a great gain. Her last purchase was a first-rate gold embroiderer, who cost her but forty florins. She knew so well how to save her money, that she never, without absolute necessity parted with a farthing. Nevertheless all this hoarding could secure her, in this life, no further distinction from her fellow slaves, and none after death, save the solitary privilege of having her body consumed on the pile. But in order that our gentle readers may not imagine that all Metella's slaves were like the grey-bearded Bogus or the swarthy Selina, we will now say a few words of the gentle Ophne, of whom we have already spoken, and of Thrax, the dwarf.

Ophne, during the few years she had spent in the service of Metella, had passed through a series of difficulties. At first, she was employed in the lowest manual labor, then she was raised to the dignity of dusting her lady's sandals. Her next step in the advancement, was that she learned to work in leather, so that she could finish off sandals to the perfect satisfaction of her mistress. With extraordinary facility, she could imitate the pattern of everything she saw in the way of needlework, and complete it equal to the original; and one had only to give her a sign, and she brought exactly what was required.

It was irresistibly droll to see her, when chosen to accompany Metella on a walk. Fearing that her numerous friends would not observe her in company with her mistress, she bustled along, fanning her most attentively, then nodding to her friends, first to the right, then to the left, so that her perpetual motion would lead one to suppose that quicksilver ran through her veins.

Thrax, the dwarf, stood in direct opposition to the lively Ophne. At the age of five, he was purchased by a Greek slave merchant, and his being extremely small for his years proved his greatest misfortune. His diminutive size suggested to his master the idea of training him for a dwarf. For this purpose, he was put in a dwarf-case, as Phinius expresses it, that by constant pressing and a sparing diet of fruit, he might not exceed the required height—three feet. After having been trained, he was offered for sale in the public market place of Athens, where the good Metella purchased him at a high price, but much more through pity, than for a household fool. Thrax not being a dwarf by nature, had not their usual qualities of wit and sarcasm, but was, on the contrary, a gentle, harmless little fellow. A smile played round his lips, which kept up a medrum between laughing and crying. In the goodness of his heart, he willingly allowed each one to make merry at his expense; but at the same time, although he answered in a friendly manner the questions put to him, one could see by the tears starting in his eyes, that his feelings had not been stunted with his growth. Metella, as well as her son, had always treated him with great kindness, and any one who required his departure, had only to say something of the absent Lucius, whom he tenderly loved, and he would instantly disappear and hide either in a corner of the garden, or somewhere in the house, to give vent to his feelings.

It was useless to talk of freedom, either during the ancient Republic, or during the time Rome was an empire; but when we know that this freedom was built upon the servitude of the two-thirds of the population, we begin to change our opinion. To give an instance: Athens in the time of the governor, Demetrius Phalereus, 300 n. c., had about 21,000 freemen, 10,000 half-freemen, and 400,000 slaves. Therefore there was a glaring disparity between freemen and slaves. The following is another historical example, which casts a blemish on the highly-lauded freedom of ancient Rome. It was a law, that, when a master was murdered in his own house by one of his slaves, and that the murderer could not be discovered, all the slaves of the house had to die. The rich Podanius Secundus of Rome was thus murdered by one of his slaves, and four hundred were according to law, put to death. The people objected to its being carried out, and sought to save the unhappy creatures; but the Emperor Nero, to whom the shedding of human blood was a pastime, had the way by which the condemned were to be led to death, lined with soldiers; and the cruel sentence was fully enforced. A record is still extant, from which we may infer how great the number of slaves was, which one master could possess. The law strictly forbade that a master, in his last testament, should grant freedom to more than one hundred of his slaves, if he had twenty thousand! "He is a poor man," cries Seneca, "who can find pleasure in a service of slaves more numerous than the army of a warlike nation, and in private edifices the circumference of which exceeds great cities, and when he compares what he already possesses, with what he still desires to have, he is in comparison a beggar!"

With so immense a number of the oppressed, we need not be surprised, when the Roman history informs us, that from time to time they rebelled. For example, the insurrection of the slaves Eunus and his sixty thousand followers, and later on that of Spartacus, who met the Romans in the field with forty thousand. They were conquered, and put to death by the sword, or crucified by thousands.

Some hundred years later, we hear the rattling chains fall from the hands of the slave; but who, many will ask, helped them to war and to freedom—Eunus, or Spartacus, or One who stands higher than all Roman Emperors—God?

CHAPTER VIII.

JUSTIN'S APOLOGIA.

It was Metella's birth-day, and all vied with each other in presenting marks of affection to their good mistress. Graceful garlands were twined tastefully round the colonnades leading to the palace. The most beautiful fruits and flowers that field and garden produced, were brought in ornamental baskets, and placed in rich profusion. Some were occupied in strewing leaves and flowers, while others were mixing perfumed artificials, procured from the Egyptian florist, with the green garlands.

The newest and best works were exhibited; garments, girdles, sandal-ties, and fans, all of which were received by the lady, with great condescension and acknowledgment of the industry displayed.

But a present that she found the evening before in her book-case, surprised her more than all the rest. It was a roll of parchment, on which the following inscription was beautifully written.

To the Emperor Titus Ælius Adrianus Antoninus Pius Augustus Cæsar; and to Verissimus his son, the philosopher, and to Lucius the philosopher, son of Cæsar by nature, of Pius by adoption, a lover of learning; also to the Sacred Senate; and the whole Roman People: in behalf of those, who of all nations, are now unjustly hated and aspersed. I, Justin, son of Priscus, grandson of Bacchius, of Flavia Neapolis, in Syria of Palestine, one of their number, presents this volume and address.

When Metella read this long title, she immediately guessed from whom the present came. But she was still more astonished to find that it was written by Lydia herself. Her Christian slave had already made a deep impression on her mind, since the time she discovered her on her knees before her cross, in her little room praying for one, who had just treated her so cruelly. She then formed a high opinion of her exalted virtue, and this opinion was not lessened, when she received this last proof of her noble revenge.

"If the Christians thus reward injuries done them," said she to herself, "they cannot possibly be guilty of those crimes, which are attributed to them."

Metella then ordered the writer to be called into her presence, and assured her that she admired more the motive whence the gift proceeded, than the gift itself.

"This writing," said she, "I have long wished for, but never could procure it till now. We must read it together in a quiet-hour: I value Justin so much, because he had the courage to proclaim his convictions. Although Plato stands higher in my estimation than all the other philosophers, still there is one thing in which he is blameworthy, and that is that, notwithstanding his belief in the great Creator of the world, he sought in a speech delivered to the Athenians, to inculcate the popular belief in the plurality of gods, fearing that like Socrates he might lose his life.*

"Would you like to know the doctrine we hold? Perhaps it approaches nearer to yours than you suspect. We believe that Jupiter is the Beginning and the End, and that all things proceed from him.† Our school accepts also that Jupiter has subordinate gods, like messengers, who execute his commands. We therefore, are widely separated from the doctrines of the lower classes, and from the flighty Romans. Their folly cannot stand

The poets have no right to make new gods, to embellish the history of their lives, and to force them on the people as truths. Homer and Hesiod ought to have been branded as impostors and sent into exile. Each one after, according to them, invented new gods, so that now we have trouble enough to remember even their names. There is no such thing as a god with goat's feet."

After a short pause, she said: "With respect to this, do you know that very important oracle of the dead Pan?"

"Certainly," replied Lydia.

"What do you know about it?"

"In the reign of the Emperor Tiberius Epitherses, the father of the orator Aurelian, together with many others, found himself on board a merchant's ship, in the vicinity of the islands called the Echinades. The sun had gone down, when not far from the island of Paxos, a voice was suddenly heard which called to Thamus the helmsman, who was an Egyptian, and whose name was scarcely known on board. A general astonishment seized all present, and the helmsman remained silent to the first and second call; the third time he answered, whereupon the voice swept loudly along the surface of the waters, and said: 'When you arrive at Palodes announce that the great Pan is dead.'

"Not far from Palodes, Thamus turning his face towards the land, called out from the far end of the ship: 'Great Pan is dead!' Scarcely had he uttered these words, when a general lamentation issued from a multitude of voices on shore.‡ It is remarkable," added Lydia, "that this extraordinary circumstance took place, just at the time of Christ's death."

Metella listened to her slave with pleasure. After a few words of praise, she said: "It would be more in conformity with your attainments, if for the future you attend to my head rather than my feet. I have therefore, resolved from this day forward, to make you my reader." This advancement filled Lydia with anxiety, being convinced that every preference excites envy, and that this would also draw down discontent. She, therefore determined, from that moment, to be more obliging and friendly than ever, towards her fellow slaves, well knowing, that an obliging manner blunts the arrows of envy.

"I know, also," continued Metella, "that I have to make reparation in some way for my unkindness towards you, a little time back. But to show you that I am not insensible to fine traits of character, accept this silver mirror, as your own property and dispose of it as you please." Lydia was too sensitive not to feel receiving payment for the trifling pleasure she had afforded her mistress in the parchment roll. To refuse the valuable present would offend Metella, therefore she accepted it with humble thanks, and gave her mistress to understand that she knew how to value the gift.

Selina witnessed this interview from an adjoining apartment, and could scarcely refrain, when she saw Lydia leave the room, with her present, from recalling her late awkwardness again to the mind of her mistress, and from adding her charitable remarks.

The next day, Lydia entered upon her new office, and commenced by reading the Apologia.

"Is it not true," said Metella, "that the philosopher, Justin, was a follower of Epicurus?"

"Justin," replied Lydia, "is a philosopher, and if I do not err, he wears, at the present moment in Rome, his philosopher's cloak, and gives instruction in the Christian doctrine. He is a native of Neapolis in Samaria, and formerly gave himself to the study of Plato: but as it did not content him, he became a convert to the Christian religion. As such, he wrote his Apologia for the Christians, to the Emperor Antoninus Pius and the Senate."

"We'll now read. But first of all impart to me Justin's Christian ideas of God."

She commenced:*

"We acknowledge the true God, the Father of Justice and of all virtues, in whom there is no mixture of evil. We reverence and worship Him and His Son, who came down to instruct us, and also the Holy Spirit."

"This faith," interrupted Metella, "is without doubt, very different from ours. But still more unlike, and it is said even immoral, are the customs of the disciples of Jesus Christ."

Lydia read in answer, the following passage:

"Now let us relate in what manner we have dedicated ourselves to God, having been created anew by Christ. Those who promise to live according to the precepts of Jesus Christ are taught to pray and to fast, and to entreat from God the remission of their past sins, we praying and fasting with them.

Then they are conducted by us to a place where there is water, and are regenerated, being washed in that water, in the name of God, the Father and Lord of the universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Ghost. We there pray earnestly for them in common; and salute one another with a kiss; after which, to him who presides over the brethren, bread is brought, and a cup of wine mixed with water. And he having taken them sends up praise and glory to the Father of all things, through the name of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, and employs much time in offering up thanks for having been deemed worthy of these things by Him: when he hath ended the prayers and the thanksgiving, all the people present express their assent by saying, Amen, which in the Hebrew tongue, signifies so be it. Then they who are called among us Deacons, give to each of those present, a portion of the bread and wine mixed with water over which the thanksgiving has been made, and carry away a portion to those who are absent. This food is called amongst us, Eucharist, of which no one is allowed to partake, but he who believes that what we teach is true, and has been washed in the laver (of baptism), which is for remission of sins and unto regeneration, and who lives as Christ has delivered.

* Justin calls this a punishable denial of Plato's better convictions. Virgil J. Exhortations to the Greeks."

† Doctrine of Orphiger.

‡ Ptolemy upon the fall of the Oracle.

* What follow are but fragments from St. Justin's renowned Apologia.

For we do not receive these things as common bread and common drink; but as both flesh and blood of that same incarnate Jesus."

"According to this," remarked Lydia, "we are taught, that as soon as the thanksgiving is pronounced over the bread, it becomes the flesh and blood of Jesus Christ, and passes over into our flesh and blood, to nourish our souls." "The Apostles," she read on, "in the memoirs composed by them, which are called Gospels, have delivered, that Jesus gave them this injunction: that, having taken bread and given thanks, He said: This do in remembrance of me; this is my body, and that, in like manner, having taken the cup and given thanks, He said: This is my blood."

"We have also, on that day, which is called after the sun, an assembly in one place, of all who dwell in the cities or country, and the memoirs of the Apostles, or the writings of the prophets are read. Then, when the reader has ceased, the president delivers a discourse, in which he reminds and exhorts to the imitation of these good things. We then all rise together and pray; and when we have ceased from prayer, bread is brought, and wine and water; and the president in like manner, offers up prayers and thanksgiving with his utmost power, and the people assent by saying, Amen. Those who are able, give money, according to their means. The president takes charge of the collection, and distributes it to the orphans, the widows, the sick, to those in prison, and to strangers: in short, he is the guardian of the oppressed.

This meeting is held on Sunday, because this is the day on which Jesus Christ, our Redeemer rose from the dead.

"So far as this appears to you truthful and reasonable, so give it due esteem. If it appears to you only empty talk, despise it. But do not condemn harmless men to death as enemies. But we tell you beforehand that as long as you persevere in injustice, you will not be able to escape the judgment of God. But we exclaim let it be done as it pleaseth God."

The learned Grecian listened to the Apologia with attention. She knew well the impression it had made on the noble Antoninus Pius, and that the Emperor had sent out orders to Athens, Larissa, Thessalonica, and other great cities, forbidding them to persecute the Christians. As soon as the Apologia was finished, the young Christian was obliged to answer numerous questions put to her by her mistress. For example, she required information on the life and miracles of Jesus Christ, and on his family. Above all, she admired the Founder of Christianity, on account of the calmness and greatness of soul, He exhibited in His agonizing death. "Formerly," added she, "such a death seemed more fitting for a malefactor, than for a great man. But Plato, who has also described the Just One, has taught me: 'Virtuous till death, he will be looked upon as perverse and unjust, and as such scourged, tormented and fastened to a cross.' *Since, I have made myself more familiar with this view of Plato, I am more reconciled with the sort of death that your God suffered." Though she had not the most distant idea of becoming a Christian, still the Apologia, which held the highest place amongst writings of that description, was a means by which she became more intimately acquainted with the Christian doctrine.

Lydia recommended her mistress to speak on the religion with the most learned men, and named for that purpose, the then Bishop of Athens, the pious Quadratus, whom the Church now reckons in the number of her Saints. She offered to make the humble Bishop acquainted with this wish, but said, if she preferred a conversation with a Christian philosopher, Aristides was one, and he also had composed an Apologia which, according to Eusebius, the writer of Church History, was to be found in the hands of many. There was also the renowned philosopher of Athens, Athenagoras, who had written a book on the resurrection of the dead.

Metella promised to think further on the matter, and for that day, put an end to the conversation.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SILVER MIRROR.

It is well known that the ancients were strangers to the luxury of glass mirrors, for the Phœnicians, afterwards called Tyrians, who first discovered the art of making glass, kept it a secret amongst themselves; and it could only be purchased from them, for its weight in gold. It is recorded that even so late as the time of Nero, it was so expensive, that this Emperor paid £50,000 for two small drinking cups of transparent glass.

The mirrors of those days were made of burnished gold or silver for the nobles; while the lower classes had to content themselves with highly polished baser metals, or by looking at their reflection in a vessel of water. Later on, as the love of splendor became the order of the day, mirrors were made as large as the human form, and were at last set in precious stones. A single mirror cost a lady more than a dowry, and the daughters of poor generals were provided with this commodity at the expense of the city.*

The mirror which Lydia had received as a present from her mistress, was of an oval form, and although it did not sparkle with precious stones, still it was one of great value. Looking in it one day, affected her with more than ordinary melancholy for her own features recalled forcibly to her mind, the calm but suffering countenance of her mother. Lost in thought, her imagination carried her to distant Rome, and placed her in a narrow cell, wrapt in the embraces of her captive parent. Returning to her sad reality, she exclaimed: "O, could I but know whether slavery or prison separates us, how gladly would this precious mirror be parted with, for thy ransom." At this moment she was interrupted by the friendly Ophne, who entered with a large parcel of ribbons, which she had just purchased.

"You look melancholy, dear Lydia," said she, "but I'll tell you something that will cheer you. The man, from whom we purchase our leather, has a grown-up daughter, named Aspasia; she is as light in her character, as she is handsome, and on this account she is known throughout Athens. Only think, Lydia, she inquired most particularly after you. She would like to know you, and if agreeable, would bring you into much company. But remember, she belongs to those of light character, or as others say, she is one of the noted persons of Athens, and if I had not a solemn dread of your morality, I could tell you much more about her." Lydia was silent, and the other continued: "I have heard of her for the last two years. Latterly she thinks of entering the married state, but she must first have a good sum, and as she cannot get this, she must go on in the old way." Lydia still preserved a dead silence, and Ophne receiving no encouragement said: "Now I must go to my mistress and show her these beautiful ribbons, and give her back the remainder of her money." †

An opportunity offers itself here to speak a few words upon the moral state of Athens, at this time. Still it is an ungracious task, to call up mouldering bodies to the light of day, and where would you come to an end? Therefore let this alone be understood, that the Athenians, immediately after the Persian war, put up a painting of Venus, under which was represented a procession of the Athenians, and below, the following inscription, written by the poet Simonides: "These called on the goddess Venus, and for the love of them, she saved Greece." Solon, himself, the Stoic Law-giver, caused a temple to be built to the shameless goddess; and in a short time, the entire of Greece was a scene of abominations. In Athens, honorable marriage no longer found a sanctuary. Vice was thus raised into a religion, and therein lay the worst and most horrible of all errors, of which the heart is capable.

From the time that our young Christian had received information of Aspasia, she made a firm resolution not to oppose the wished-for acquaintance. But how different were the motives which drew them together. The one had the intention to destroy—the other to save. A few evenings later, Lydia and Aspasia were actually seen at the corner of a street engaged in deep conversation. Lydia was not a severe judge of morals, for she knew that the human heart, even if under the pestilence of temptation, it has lost blossom after blossom, still receives an impulse from God to bud anew, and like the barren fig-tree, which stood by the wayside, was not to be cut down immediately. She quickly discovered the untainted and redeeming qualities of the erring girl, and joined the better she advised, to the good already there. Several times she expressed a wish to hasten as much as possible, the marriage she had in view. Aspasia was touched with such rare kindness, and although she had no idea of becoming better, this language, which she heard for the first time, was to her heart, as refreshing as the nightly dew to a scorched heath.

During this conversation, one of Metella's slaves passed by without their observing her, and she could scarcely believe her eyes when she saw the young Christian speaking with a votary of Aphrodite. It was old Selina.

Her astonishment was still more increased on meeting the same party, some days later close to the Charon gate.* Aspasia's position, had so touched the heart of the zealous Lydia, that she turned over in her mind, day and night, how she could in any way assist the strayed sheep, and snatch her from the errors of her ways, or at least help to the sum necessary for her marriage. It occurred to her that the silver mirror was of more value than her pay for three years' servitude, and that at that moment, she could not dispose of it better than for the salvation of an immortal soul. Then she thought of her absent mother, and of the possibility, that the mirror might release her from her chains. But the trust she placed in Divine Providence, gave her confidence for the future, and decided her on parting with her mirror for the present emergency. Religion also suggested to her, that her love for an unhappy erring soul must not be inferior to that which she bore for her own mother. According to her resolution, the following evening, she carried her valuable mirror concealed under her cloak—one Eye alone witnessed the act, an Eye that knew and appreciated her intention. What a touching impression did not this present make! How expressively, and with what child-like simplicity did not the donor assure the receiver, that the mirror was not stolen, and how often did she entreat her to say nothing of the matter! Aspasia had not wept for years till then. She gave the promise to have her present converted into money, and to change her way of life immediately. There was now a sort of friendship cultivated between two souls, who, in word and work were without doubt widely different, but still resembled each other in tenderness of feeling.

After this act, a heavenly cheerfulness played in Lydia's eyes, and an interior happiness, the cause of which she imparted to none. In this silent enjoyment of her heart, she performed the daily duties of her state, at one time writing, and at another reading for her mistress, but while these occupations were going on she knew little of the judgment that was passing on in the house.

Selina had been long waiting for a favorable opportunity, to impart to her mistress in secret, an affair which as she said herself, not only threatened the reputation of the domestics, but also that of her mistress.—This opportunity at length presented itself.

"Not many days ago, noble lady," so began Selina, "I was an eye-witness to a detestable affair. Your wisdom will scarcely believe it possible, that one of your domestics has rewarded your goodness with the most shameful ingratitude. Others have labored for nearly half a century, to gain your favor, and have scarcely once received a present, while that black-eyed Asiatic, who is scarcely two years in your service, has the most valuable articles from your gracious hand. Young Lydia is just what we always suspected her to be. She had the courage to attach herself to a doctrine, which not only permits vice, but commands it. These broods of hungry Christians assemble together in the holes of the rocks, they seat themselves on the bones of their slaughtered children, and devour their flesh. That the magpies sometimes steal money is well known, and I'll not enquire what money purchased the sheets of parchment, which were written on not long since for a birth-day gift. Her secret depravity of life, I have at last discovered, thanks to the gods!—Not long since. I saw her with a certain Aspasia, who is well known in Athens as the finest berry on the Upas-tree of vice—and later on, in the evening I met them again speaking confidentially with each other in the open square. What she whispered in that girl's ear, who is not ashamed to go through the market laughing and dressed in her suspicious-looking gay costume, is easily to be guessed at. Night increases the suspicion, and to this most suspicious person, by whom we shall all lose our reputation you make presents, and distinguish her above all your other slaves."

Metella at once perceived Selina's malice, and calmly replied: "Sophocles says: 'Silence is the ornament of woman.' —

"Where did you see Lydia?"

"At the end of the Hermos street, noble lady, at that place near Stoa's pillars, where stands Lucian's magnificent dwelling."

"Do you really believe," said Metella, "that Christians commit the worst crimes, like our Œdipus?"

"O yes! but with this difference, that Œdipus did not know what he was doing, while the Christians premeditatedly commit all sorts of crimes, and are forced to it by their priests. Before you, Lydia knows very well how to conduct herself. but let her have the ring of Gyges, which is known to make one invisible, and then, she will give herself up to all sorts of wickedness."

"One solitary cause of suspicion, is not sufficient. Selina, to punish the accused. If she be really guilty, it will quickly be discovered, then she can be scourged, and if that does not do, she can be put to death."

The last expression pleased Selina so much, that she ended this conversation by a lengthened encomium on Metella's severe sense of justice. As Selina herself was doubtful whether she should be able to detect Lydia again in the company of Aspasia, she ordered every slave in the house to have a sharp eye upon her. For this purpose, she related to them, all that she saw with her own eyes at Adrian's Stoa, and begged them to tell at the moment, if they ever discovered her with Aspasia. The good Ophne was zealously occupied in trying to persuade Selina, that there was not an atom of injustice or wrong in the matter. But in order that Lydia should be able to defend herself, she informed her of the reports that were in circulation about her. When Lydia received the information, she expressed herself in gentle terms, as follows: "I must remind Selina not to spread false reports concerning me; but for the rest she remained as quiet as before, and gave all to understand, that she did not bear the slightest revengeful feeling nor even a dislike towards her. "Sensitiveness," she used to say, "belongs only to little minds. A good sword and a pliable heart, will bear bending without breaking, but an untempered blade snaps when used in battle. To me the saying is as precious as gold: 'Act well, and suffer blame.'" "It is possible," she added to herself, "that it was a ridiculous notion of mine to loosen the bands of a sinner; if Polycarp had met this sinner, she would scarcely have deceived him.* Possibly he would have called her in his short way, the first-born of Satan. Perhaps she is so, and that I have greatly deceived myself. But there are errors which tend more to the honor of man than to his shame; Yes—'more precious than wisdom and honor is a little foolishness for a short time.† Therefore I shall be able to bear my error in this case."

Nevertheless she began sometimes to think the language of despondency—"You have lost your country, your mother, your master, your freedom," would she say—"One thing only remained of your temporal goods—your reputation—and this seems also to have vanished." But she would quickly reproach herself for this language, and call to mind how much the disciples of our Lord had suffered. She would cast a look through her open window at the Areopagus, where St. Paul once stood and preached to the Athenians the "Unknown God," and say to herself: "What did not St. Paul suffer? Four times he suffered stripes, three times he was whipped with rods, once he was stoned, and at last ended his life by the sword: and shall I feel oppressed, when I receive an injurious word? Ought I not to tread joyfully in the blood-stained footsteps of my Redeemer, who was condemned by the Jews as a blasphemer, and by the Romans as a rebel against the authority of the State? Therefore, poor heart, seek thy consolation, not from the lips of thy fellow creatures, but from the sufferings of thy Creator and Redeemer!" In this reflection she found continued peace. Thus has the sight of our crucified Lord through centuries, comforted the oppressed and raised their courage: and as the dove, when chased by the eagle, saves herself in the crevice of a rock, so the persecuted heart flies from the calumny of the world, and seeks peace and comfort in the sacred wounds of her dear Redeemer.

Months had passed away, and Metella could discover no fault in Lydia, not even that she had become less friendly. When the old Selina, one day sought again to rouse the suspicion of her mistress against Lydia, by saying that her silence was a proof of her guilt. Metella lost all patience: "I know," said she "your venomous sting, and know also what to think of you. Gullt tries to defend itself, but innocence prefers to be silent."

Metella was perfectly convinced, from that moment, that there was no truth in the vile accusations against Lydia, and came to the conclusion, that just as her Christian slave was calumniated in her own house, so Christianity was calumniated in the world; and as she bore all these accusations with equanimity, nay even with cheerfulness, she won the increased affection of her mistress, who thought that Christianity was best known by the life of a good Christian; and the pagan esteemed it so much the more, the more beautiful the virtues were, that she saw practiced by her Lydian slave.

A few weeks later, Metella visited one of her friends, and saw, to her great astonishment, the silver mirror she had given as a present to her slave, lying on a small table. With an impatient curiosity, she sought to discover how her friend had obtained it. She said that it was brought to her by a certain person called Aspasia, and offered for sale.

So, thought she angrily to herself, my slave is really then in connection with this wretch! "O, I beg of you let the girl be sent for who sold it you! She will tell us how the mirror came into her possession." A slave returned in a few minutes with Aspasia, who related that a Christian girl made her a present of the mirror, on the condition that she would, without delay, enter upon a previously intended marriage. "This, and the petition of a Christian maiden quite unknown to me, that I would change my course of life, not a little surprised me, and I shed a flood of tears. Then I vowed to the gods to reform my life, and what I have vowed, that I will conscientiously keep."

Metella listened to this declaration, and felt abashed that even for a moment, she had suspected her virtuous attendant, who had borne so much in silence. She returned home, firmly resolved never to utter a sentence of what she had just heard. She acknowledged herself conquered by the virtues of a slave, for she could not believe herself capable of practising such greatness of soul. Yes, she even doubted if in all the heathen philosophy, a solitary example could be brought forward, to compete with the modest virtue of her Lydia, and was at a loss to know which most to admire, the delicate purity and patience, or the strength of character displayed in observing a profound silence in the midst of her persecutions. The last quality, bearing wrongs patiently, appeared to her without doubt, the pearl of Lydia's virtues.

How beautiful is chastity, when she lifts her clear eye to Heaven and feeds on the contemplation of her God! How admirable is meekness, that rewards hatred and contempt with prayers and charity. But it is not to be denied, that doubly to be appreciated, as the queen of virtues, is silent innocence crowned with the thorns of calumny.

A few weeks after, while Lydia was reading, one evening, to her mistress, the sounds of music reached their ears; they found that it proceeded from the bridal party, which was just passing under the window where they were sitting. Both stood up to see it more distinctly, Metella leaning on the shoulder of her slave. The bride suddenly stopped and drew aside her veil:—it was Aspasia, who cast a look at Metella's palace, and perceiving her benefactress, waved her hand; then dashing a tear of gratitude from her eye, she covered her face again with her veil, and passed on.

Metella thought she recognized in the features of the bride, the girl for whom Lydia had so nobly suffered, and turning, quickly perceived by her slave's countenance, that she had conjectured rightly. Fearing to be questioned, and unable to disguise the joy of an approving conscience, Lydia asked permission to retire. She sought the solitude of her chamber, and kneeling before her cross, offered up a fervent prayer for Aspasia's perseverance in a virtuous life, and in gratitude to God, for having made her the humble instrument of drawing a soul from vice.

CHAPTER X.

NEWS FROM THE SEAT OF WAR.

The termination of the war with the Parthians, A. D. 166, brought with it a lamentable evil. The soldiers returning from the East, carried with them the plague, and infected all the provinces through which they passed. Even distant Gaul suffered under this pestilential devastation, and it was so dreadful in Italy; that in several parts, as contemporary writers relate, agriculture was abandoned, and famine had set in. In Rome, the dead bodies were conveyed out of the city in immense numbers, and interred at the public expense. Athens also, and the whole of Greece experienced the horrors of this evil, in greater or lesser visitations which returned for several years together.

The cases of death this summer, were so numerous, that Metella determined at once to remove from Athens to one of her estates in the country.

Previous to her departure, letters from the seat of war were brought by carrier-pigeons to Aquileia, where they were detained and copied, as the delivery was doubtful. The originals were kept, and the copies attached to the pinions of these peaceful messengers, which were allowed to continue their journey to Rome or Athens, laden with the tidings of war.

By this means, Metella received intelligence from Lucius. Sitting one calm evening at her open window, occupied only with the thoughts of her absent son, she heard a gentle fluttering, and raising her eyes, she beheld the faithful little courier waiting to be relieved of its burden. With the letter in her possession, she retired to her apartment, to enjoy it undisturbed, where we shall leave her for a time.

The sun had sunk to rest; and night was closing in, as Lydia in her little chamber finished her task of writing. While the leaves were drying, she advanced towards her lightly-curtained window, opened it, and gave herself up to meditation.

All around is still, save the slight rustling caused by the waving of the palms, with their long and graceful branches, bending till they kissed the earth, and bounding back again upon the bosom of the jealous breeze. In the court-vestibule are heard the soft murmurs of the gurgling fountain. High in the wide expanse of Heaven, Night, the silent widow of the Day, is seated on her throne. Her face is hidden by a veil of stars, and her sable mantle hangs in graceful folds upon her darling universe. She illumines softly with her lamp, the moon, her plague-infected client, and bedews her with her widow's tears.

To return to Metella, who having finished her letter, leaned her head carelessly on a cushion and began to reflect on the contents. At length she closed her weary eyes, and sank into a gentle slumber. The letter which lay beside her, commenced with the words: "From the camp;—Lucius to his beloved mother, health and happiness."

"Many months have passed since I have crossed the Alps and gazed the clouds of heaven so near at hand. But, dear mother, believe me, that not a day passed without my thinking of you. I remembered you particularly, when first I beheld the Danube from Noricum.* You once read to me, as a boy, from a Roman Historian, that towards the end of the world, this river will no longer flow at the foot of the mountain, but will swell to the summit, tear up rocks, and carry with it chains of mountains. You can imagine with what ideas I reached this renowned river, yet notwithstanding its great breadth, I was still disappointed when I saw, that it was no wider than our flower garden at Kephissia. You have already heard how matters stood in our tedious war, before we reached Aquileia, and that the Marcomanni had gained a victory over the Prefect Vindex, who with twenty thousand Romans, was killed, and the retreating army pursued as far as the Adriatic Sea. This had all occurred previous to our leaving Athens, It is now nearly five years since the Emperor entered Pannonia,† and we have been waiting week after week, expecting to come to a decided engagement, which is to conclude the campaign. Our conquest over the Jazygan was accomplished in a droll manner. The barbarians held us at bay on the frozen Danube, trusting that they could fight famously on the masses of ice, their horses being much better accustomed to slippery ground than ours, but we threw our shields upon the ice, stood on them, and then drew over to us our horses and riders at once, and we fought a magnificent battle. Also in the two succeeding battles the Marcomanni and Jazygan were well humbled. Another time, when the Danube was free of ice, we wished to frighten the barbarians, and sent amongst them some lions we had just received from Rome. The animals crossed the stream, and attacked the enemy, who bravely met their antagonists, and killed them with their clubs, and stood laughing and exulting over their newly acquired booty.

You can scarcely believe, dear mother, how difficult it is to finish with such an enemy. The trumpets of war are to them an agreeable music; they entrench themselves behind their fortifications, and wait courageously for the attack. To fear, they are strangers. They tie up deserters to the enemy, but cowards, and those who take to flight, are suffocated without mercy in the swamps and morasses. But incomparably worse than all this, is their climate, which is so cold and damp, that we have a fog nearly every day. At home in Athens, months pass on, and the heavens cheer us with their clear blue, whilst in Germany, we find even in the midst of summer, scarcely a cloudless day. O how I now prize our clear Grecian climate! The fur cloak you have sent me by Bogus, is of the greatest service to me, particularly when we sleep in the cold damp. We fought our battles best in the hot summer days, for though the Germans bear hunger and cold with heroic patience, they succumb to thirst and heat much quicker than we do. Their food would not suit our Athenian epicures. Many of them are satisfied with crab-apples and thick milk. But if they had as much beer to drink, as they can take, we could vanquish them better by their drunkenness than by our arms. In their time of peace, they give themselves up to idleness or to the chase. The principal difference existing between the Romans and Germans, is that the former are masters in eating and the latter in drinking. Not long since, we discovered in a field a large mound, and on a nearer approach, we curiously examined it, and found beneath, huge stores of apples, pears and corn. Suddenly the ground gave way, and some of the soldiers fell into a subterraneous cave, whence alas! they never more came out. We were obliged to leave them behind us, and discovered, when too late, that the Germans, with wives, children and cattle, frequently dwell in such caves, to protect themselves from the inclemency of Winter. Dear mother, would you could see these gigantic hardy men, one like the other! Their clothing, and the effects of the climate, render them unsusceptible of sickness. They generally die of old age. They are trained up in such endurance and hardihood, that for the most part, they never spend a thought on either their clothing or their food. May those souls and bodies which know nothing of effeminacy, riches or debauchery, receive wisdom and well ordered armies. Perhaps, dear mother, you would like to hear a little about the religion of these barbarians? I regret, that up to the present time, I have been able to learn but very little on the subject. They have ancient poetry from time immemorial, and this is the only trace of knowledge they possess. They sing of a god, Tuisko, who sprung from the earth, and that he had a son, called Mannus, and these they style their ancestors. Also Mercury is held by them in great veneration, and they bring into their dark forests and sacred groves, all those taken in war, to offer them to him in sacrifice. The reputation they have gained for morality is well founded. A female may be as beautiful and rich as you please, but if her reputation be once sullied, she falls into general contempt. There are tribes amongst them that only marry virgins, and the widows after the death of their husbands remain single. Should a married woman injure her husband's honor by incontinency, the husband cuts off her hair, and whips her with rods out of his dwelling in the presence of her relations. This morality of the barbarians, dear mother, we do not find amongst our cultivated people. But I can assure you, that in our legion, in which there are many Cappadocian Christians, quite as great a morality reigns as with the barbarians. They are very industrious, they neither drink or swear, nor make what are called soldiers' jests. They believe in only one God, and pray to Him daily. Nothing is more interesting than to live amongst them.

"I suppose you have heard that Verus is no more? He was sitting in the chariot with Marcus Aurelius, when he was struck with apoplexy, sank on his shoulder, and expired. His body was not embalmed, but buried in the land of the barbarians. The day previous to his death, I had the honor, with some Greek nobles, of being invited to dine with him. I acknowledge, that I was not a little rejoiced at the invitation, after having been nearly five years without tasting a morsel of wholesome food, leaving delicacies out of the question. The banquet far exceeded our expectations; and not one amongst us could comprehend how it was possible in this country, to keep so luxurious a table. The Emperor was very gay and jested with me, asking me, as each dish was placed on the table, if I knew its name; to my answers in the affirmative, he always replied, "Ah! missed the mark!" and then gave the dish its German name: so that we always doubted what we were eating. Still more choice were the wines. Verus had three cups beside him, one was of Alexandrian crystal, the second of oriental Myrrha, a material unknown to any of us, the third was of gold, and set with precious stones. When we drank the health of the Emperor, he gave us a sign to keep our cups.* After wine, we played at dice till the morning dawned. Claudius Pompeanus, son of a Roman knight, was my companion at table. He was astonished when he heard my name, and assured me, that he had known you in Rome. That must certainly have been a long time ago, and when I told him that I intended to send you, my dear mother, a present of my valuable cup, he begged that I would afford him the pleasure of having some verses engraved on it.

"Bogus, who arrived here, two months since, and offered himself as volunteer in the cavalry, could relate to you what beasts there are in the dark forests. Not long since, he was dreadfully beaten through mistake. Being very cold he sought to bring down a bear for the sake of the skin. On our arrival at the camp one evening, after an engagement, Bogus, with some others, returned again to the hills, where we had left some dead bodies. To entice the bears out of the adjacent forest, he cut the head off a German, and seizing it by the hair, threw it down the hill, and it rolled to the edge of the forest, he repeated the experiment and at length he succeeded, for a hungry bear made his appearance. As soon as he attacked the heads, Bogus laid him low with an arrow. He stripped off the skin and clothed himself with it at once. So muffled up, he arrived at the camp towards dusk. The soldiers were taking their evening meal which consists of bread and cheese, and beer, a beverage, which the Germans prepare from barley and corn. Suddenly seeing something approach that had the appearance of a bear, they started up, rushed out upon him, and did not discover their mistake till he had been severely beaten. He was dreadfully injured and I doubt much if he will ever recover.

"But now, my dear mother, I must conclude; the cold prevents me from writing more. What should lie nearer to my heart, than to assure thee of my unbounded filial love! O how great is the distance between thee and me?—yet my mind, that travels without the aid of bark or wing, is ever near thee. You are in the south, and I, in all probability, am on the northern boundaries of the globe. The human race has only extended itself as far as here. It may be possible, that after a few hundred years, these forests may be cleared away, and cities be reflected in the waters of the Danube; and that civilization will extend from one end of the world to the other. For the present, I believe with our poets, that Delphi is the central point of the earth, and that there mankind thinks and works longer and therefore they are more cultivated. What a secret, dear mother, lies in this growth of nations, and what an answer our mind receives, when it returns to the cradle of our origin, and asks itself as to the beginning and end of the world's history. But where am I?

"I hope a few months will see me return rich in years, in experience and in the deeds of a brave soldier, to give a lasting proof of my filial gratitude to thy loving heart. Farewell!"

Such were the contents of the letter that Metella had lying before her on the table. She is dreaming, she starts, and shrinks as it were from an invisible hand. She raises herself from her couch and quickly gives a sign for Lydia to enter.

"Have you not just heard the angry screaming of an owl?" said she, as Lydia approached. Lydia answered in the negative, and added that she had been standing at the open casement of her little apartment, listening to the playing waters of the fountain, admiring the majestic silence and beauty of the night.

"I must have dreamed then that I heard an owl cry—Do you understand the interpretation of dreams? Perhaps as a Christian you can explain to me the meaning of mine. Listen to me: After having finished reading my son's letter, I sank into a soft slumber. It appeared as if everything were dark around me. I wished to go forward, but I was without a light, and I could not find a road, because of the darkness. You were near me, and were my only guide. Over my head I observed a light, which gradually increased in brightness. This light proceeded from a mountain, at its foot was a flight of marble steps, which appeared to reach to the summit. I perceived at a great height a magnificent garden, in which were an immense number of female forms, clothed in white, and they appeared to be in constant motion. Far beyond these, I saw a most dignified being clothed as a shepherd, and seated on a magnificent throne. His appearance though imposing, had nothing in it to terrify. His throne was so high, that the white-robed multitude appeared far beneath him, while they with uplifted eyes gazed unceasingly on his loving countenance. His garment changed suddenly to that of a dazzling white, his heart was visible, round which were rays far brighter than the sun, which cast streams of light upon the worshipping multitude, who sank ever and anon upon their knees before him, and looked like little lambs round their shepherd. But what was most strange, at his feet I saw a youth who resembled my son Lucius, and who beckoned me to join him, a naked sword lay by his side, and he was reclining on his shield. Then a longing desire seized me to climb the marble steps. I pressed forward, but I felt as though my feet were bound to the earth. You then conducted me to the steps; but as I approached, a dragon, with eyes flashing fire and licking a deep wound on his left side, prevented my ascending. Retreating with horror, I perceived an owl perched on the protruding branch of a decayed tree; it flapped its wings and screamed angrily at me; my strength failed, I lay prostrate on the earth, and awoke with the screaming of the owl still ringing in my ears."

"Now tell me what is the meaning of that magnificent being and the heart surrounded with rays; and why did I see my Lucius reclining at the foot of that shepherd?"

Lydia did not dare to trust herself, in giving the significance of this dream, and therefore answered. "My good mistress pardon me if I do not feel myself capable of interpreting your dream. I beg of you to request the explanation of it from those who are more capable than I am. According to your description, it was, perhaps, the Son of God Himself, who has revealed to His magnificence. He was designated while on earth as the 'Good Shepherd' and his followers flocked round Him like lambs. Once they beheld Him on the summit of a mountain ascending like the sun. But I am quite unable to explain the entire vision. We have in Athens holy men, true disciples of their Master, who know their Lord, and can tell you much of Him. They will also be able to explain your dream correctly.

"Do you believe Lydia," said Metella, "that the philosopher Athenagoras, who became a Christian, and who formerly visited me, would still consent to hold converse with, and advise heathen?"

"Dear mistress, as a Christian he is more at your service than ever."

"Then if you think so, send to-morrow early and invite him. He is certain to be found in Plato's Academy; I meet him there sometimes, standing at the tomb of the immortal philosopher."

CHAPTER XI.

ATHENAGORAS.

Lydia was only too happy to convey Metella's desire for an interview, to the renowned philosopher, who cheerfully and promptly accepted the invitation, and at the appointed hour he found himself seated by the side of the illustrious matron. This learned man was as well read in polite literature, as in the Eastern and Grecian philosophy. He hung so ardently on Christianity, that some years later, he advocated the cause of the Christians with the Emperor Marcus Aurelius. A philosopher of the Eclectic School, he collected from all systems what agreed most with his ideas. He besought the Emperor to observe the same clemency towards the Christians, he exercised towards the religions of so many other nations under his sway. Metella commenced the conversation by assuring Athenagoras, that she did not belong to those who despised Christians, for she had often heard from her deceased father, that the Christian doctrine made those who lived according to its dictates, moral and happy;* and that lately she had an opportunity of becoming better acquainted with it, and her esteem for it was increased. She said that one of her slaves was a Christian, and she had often related to him about the Founder of her religion. "But yesterday, having had an extraordinary dream, which my slave would not undertake to interpret, I availed myself of an assurance she made me, that you would solve its meaning. It appeared to me as though I saw a shepherd, who was at the same time a king, in the midst of a host of beings clothed in white. I felt a holy awe before this shepherd, worshipped him in the distance, and felt that I loved him. O teach me to know him!" After having related to him her entire dream, she begged the philosopher to explain to her its meaning. After a moment's reflection he told her that he considered her dream as a favor from God and one which in every respect would carry that good with it, that from the present time forward, she would entertain a new interest for Christianity. From the details of her dream he took occasion to speak to her about Christ, who is truly the Shepherd of His flocks, and to describe to her the happiness of the life to come.

"Do you know," said he, "that that king is the only Son of * Atticus was obliged to declare in writing to the Emperor Antoninus Pius his approbation of Christianity.

God, and of the same nature with the Father and the Holy Ghost. Are you acquainted with the doctrine of the unity of God in the Trinity?" Metella replied, "I know the Platonic doctrine of original existence; and I know also that Plato commanded us to swear by God, the disposer of all present and future things. I am aware also, that the Christians consider that the statue of Jupiter at Elis, with its three heads, has some signification. But allow me to say what I think of such doctrines. I think that no mortal is capable of comprehending the existence of the Divinity. Is not that a beautiful inscription that the Egyptians have written over the statue of the God at Sais,"* "I am the All that has been, that is, and that is to be, and no mortal has yet raised my veil."

"You ask me if I know the Christian doctrine of the Triune Deity. It could not have been explained to me in fewer words, than I heard it not long since, by a comparison from my Christian slave. 'God' said she, 'is one in His nature just like the tree; the roots, stem and branches of which are penetrated with the same existence. As the stem proceeds from the roots, so is the Son generated by the Father, and as the branches of the tree proceed from the stem and roots, so does the Holy Spirit proceed alike from the Father and the Son.' But Athenagoras, how many things can be made clear to us by comparisons. Allow me to expatiate a little longer on my comprehension of the Divinity. Man is the world in miniature, his body is the picture of the earth, and his soul the reflection of the Divinity. Whoever has formed the human body has taken the earth for his model. We have a proof of this in our own members—our bones and flesh are of earth, our veins are the streams, the waters of which are called blood. The air is converted into breath, and in order that the sun and moon may enlighten all this, and be reflected in the human body, he has given us eyes. But one remark more, Athenagoras, and then I conclude. Of this magnificent body, this masterpiece of visible nature, an invisible spirit takes possession; governs it and penetrates it in all its parts, and this spirit is one. And so it may be one, and only one, who created this visible world, and this one we call Jupiter—Jupiter with his divine spirit and divine understanding. So you have another comparison, or if I may say so, more than a comparison—a proof of the unity of God."

"You are right," said Athenagoras, "and I participate in your views. We Christians, say also there is only one God, as the soul of man is one; but have you forgotten that this soul of man is a three in one?" "How so?" asked the heathen. "One" replied Athenagoras, "is the memory, another the understanding, and the third the will of man; and yet our thinking, understanding and willing though three, are only one."

Metella reflected—"O yes, I remember Plutarch also defended the three powers in man. If the soul be created after the image of God, so also can the Trinity be already in the Soul, an ordering, willing and loving God. Possible also that our own hearts are a reflection of the heart of that loving Son, who out of pity for sinful man, as you say, took our nature upon Him, and became the Shepherd of the people. But let us return to this shepherd whom I saw in my dream. O He looked so mild upon those who stood round Him! and so lovingly on my son, who clung to His feet! Tell me how did my Lucius obtain admittance into this divine company?"

"Perhaps," replied Athenagoras, "that your son, during this campaign, has made himself acquainted with Christianity, and has united himself with confidence to its Founder by which he enjoys undoubted peace and feels himself supremely happy."

"But what does this mean?" said she, "I saw him raise his hand and beckon to me so earnestly as if he would say. 'Come to me.' Durst then a heathen enter where those blessed beings are crowding round their King?" When he beckoned, he thereby expressed his happiness and a wish for you to participate. To attain the height on which Christ had His throne, two things deter you; and it appears to me that now I come nearer to the meaning of the vision. By the dragon that you perceived on one side, and the owl on the other; the first signified, according to our books of revelation, no other than the origin of all evil, from the beginning of the world, whom we call Satan.* He tries to hold man down to the earth, leads him to sin, and tempts him to it, and those who give themselves to his service, he brings at last altogether in one place, where they are perpetually tormented like your Tantalus.† He also seeks to deter you, he does not wish that you gain Christ and the happiness of Heaven. The Redeemer has weakened the power of Satan, but has not entirely destroyed it; and therefore Satan resembles a wounded dragon, as you describe. But it is not he alone that separates you from Christ, there is also another hinderance which makes your union with Him difficult, and this is signified by the owl. Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, and the guardian of this our city, which is acknowledged to be the asylum of the intellectual, is represented by the owl. It signifies human wisdom, which is folly before God. Philosophy endeavors to acknowledge this contest, and would like to attain through its own strength, the altitude of truth. But for this its wings are too weak. Oh how modestly Plato expresses himself when he says: 'One must bring together the best of human proofs, and then venture upon them as on a raft through the tide of life, but still he thinks one can sail more securely, and with less danger in a stronger ship on a Divine Word'‡ This divine word, Christ has spoken, and this firm ship is the Church."

"You must pardon me, Athenagoras, if just like an ignorant child, I ask you many things about your system. What did you mean when you spoke of a bad principle and of a Tantalus, tormented prepared for the wicked?"

"As the good," answered he, "will be one with God, the source of good, for all eternity, so must the wicked be with the father of wickedness, for all eternity, and for ever separated from God. As the reward of the good will be without end, so will punishment of the wicked be everlasting; and this is one of the most important dogmas of Christianity."

"In this respect," replied Metella, "Christ and Plato quite agree; both teach, that the good will be happy, and the wicked unhappy. Plato says: 'Those who have led a pure and well-ordered life, receive the gods as friends and guides, and dwell with them; while those, who on account of their greatness of crimes remain impenitent, sink their fate in the well merited Tartarus, whence they never more return.' But Plato mentions another place, Acheron, whither all the imperfect were sent. 'Those who are there' said he, 'will do penance for their faults, and when they are purified will be liberated'§ If then there are those different places, do you not believe that according to my dream, my son will one day be counted among the blessed? for you know I saw him near your God." "No doubt," replied Athenagoras. "And I," said Metella, "if I attend to the advice of Plato where he wills that no one shall change the religion of his ancestors, and remain a heathen, do you believe that I shall one day be received into the Kingdom of Light where my son feels himself so happy?"

"When you have once learned what Christianity is, and by the means of grace have acknowledged it as the one truth, then Metella, the Divinity and your own understanding will require from you to proclaim this truth openly, and not till this happens can you hope to attain this heavenly enjoyment; but if after this, you persevere in error through a vain fear of man, you will never be one of that company, in which you beheld your son."

"What, Athenagoras, do you think it possible, that a son could feel himself happy, if he thought that his mother were in eternal misery? Oh what a sorrowful happiness would that be for my Lucius, to know that his mother was in a place of torment!"

"As the rain falling into the ocean, partakes of the quality of the water with which it mingles, so do the souls of the just partake so much of the qualities or the Divinity, and consequently of the love of justice, that they hate what He hates, and love what He loves, and it would displease them as much as God himself, if the wicked were to be rewarded with eternal happiness."

"I do not understand this exactly, but I think I can guess what you mean: that there is in the other life merely a relationship, either with the good or the wicked. But how could I avoid drawing down upon me the hatred of some one or other of the divinities, were I to worship the God of the Christians and thereby fall in my fidelity, to the religion of my ancestors?" "You speak now, Metella, of several divinities, which you confidently look upon as servants of the great Jupiter: there are no gods—therefore no hatred amongst the gods. You are still unable to attain the conviction that all power, in Heaven and on earth streams forth not from a plurality of gods, but from one God alone, and just in that respect is the difference between the faith of the Christian and that of the heathen. According to the views of the heathen, Heaven has its Jupiter, the sun his Helios, the sea its Posidon, the mountains their Naiades, the tree its Dryas, and even the reed its Syriax. On the contrary, according to Christian doctrine, there reigns in Heaven and on earth but one Almighty God, and the spirit of this same God shines forth in the sun, and moves upon the face of the waters. He has care for the tree and the flower, and forgets not in His fatherly protection, the smallest blade of grass. The thoughts of God are shed in millions of beams on all creatures, He is the center whence all proceeds. Yes, Metella, God is only one, and this one God requires from you, that you acknowledge Him with your whole heart."

"Beautiful and dignified as the doctrine is, Athenagoras, and though it agrees so much with my spirit, I feel myself as yet too weak to acknowledge it openly."

"Faith," continued Athenagoras, "is a gift of Divine Mercy: but to obtain this gift of Faith it is necessary that you should withdraw yourself from the pleasures and distractions of the world, and give yourself up to prayer in silence and solitude. Thus have all those done who strove after the Truth; yes, even the disciples of our own great sages. The voice of God allows itself only to be heard in the soul of man, when all is still; but if God has once commenced to speak, His voice is as loud and audible as the rolling of the thunder in a spacious and desolate mountain valley."

"Athenagoras can you answer me one question more? I see, that those who call themselves Christians are ready to sacrifice their lives for their Faith. With the cool blood of the Spartan, and the tranquility of a Socrates, they undergo martyrdom and death for Christ. Whence comes this resolution, this living conviction?"

"You put questions, Metella, which convince me that this is not the first time you have spoken on Christianity. All those who seal their Faith with their blood, are fully convinced that Christ is truly the Son of God. Christ gave proof of His mission, as clear as the sun, often during life and particularly in the last days before His death. He told the Jews publicly that He was the Son of God, He said to them beforehand that He should be put to death, and that on the third day He would rise again. Yes, and He was brought before Pilate, and conjured by the living God, to say if He were really the Son of God* He maintained it, although He knew that His death would follow the declaration. After his death His side was pierced with a lance, and His body laid in the grave and that grave was guarded by soldiers. But on the third day, as He had, already said, He rose again by His own power, appeared to His disciples, and showed Himself on many occasions to several hundreds of His followers. All those who saw Him believed in Him, and they preached Him to the world; and not alone those proclaimed His doctrine, but all whom He had strengthened, previous to His death, by the numerous miracles He had worked. Therefore, as Quadratus the former Bishop of Athens<sup>a</sup> declares in one of his writings, the sick whom Jesus healed, and the dead He brought to life were not a passing vision, for those very persons remained with Him upon earth, and some, added the same Bishop, lived not only after the ascension of our Lord, but even up to his own time. We all acknowledge this belief with joyful hearts, and it affords us comfort in this life, and a happy assurance of a better."

"Not so fast, Athenagoras, but so far you may rest assured, that I will follow your advice with regard to retirement, to help me in reflecting diligently on the dignified doctrine of Christianity, and daily beg of the unknown God, to whom you have drawn me nearer, that He will make Himself known to me."

CHAPTER XII.

THE COUNTRY SEAT AT ELEUSIS.

BEFORE the rich Domina arrives at her country seat, which bears the simple appellation "Theratron," or "Summer-Seat," we will invite our gentle readers to visit this magnificent Villa, situated at a short distance from Eleusis. It is only half a day's journey from Athens, and can be as easily attained across the Piræus and the sea, as by the so-called "Holy Street" or "Sacred Way." Outside Eleusis is a rich and well watered plain called the "Thiriasische Field;" and although not a drop of rain has fallen for some months over this land, still the corn, refreshed by the night dews, stands in all its rich beauty, and the country has not yet exhibited that weary, desolate appearance, which in Greece returns every year, with the beginning of the second harvest. Upon this plain, stand various-sized statues of Pan,† twined with the Acanthus and wild flowers, which the artistic taste of the Greeks knew so well how to arrange, and which thereby diversified the otherwise monotonous appearance of this flat country. Countless numbers of sunburnt hands are everywhere occupied in collecting the gifts of Ceres, to store them up for the Winter. Here we meet beasts of burden, watering in the cisterns, and drawing their heavily-laden wagons. In the distance are to be seen herds of goats, feeding on the rich pasture; while the goatherds are playing cheerfully on their reed pipes. On the sides of yonder little green undulating mounds, long terraces are erected, for the cultivation of the vine, of that peculiar sort, which grows in Corinth, and the fruit of which is exported to different countries under the name of currants. On the top, are dirty little fellows, dressed in goat's skin, lying lazily about, under the shade of the elm-trees, and refreshing themselves occasionally with the first fruits of the vine. The higher hills towards the North, are covered with palms and other forest trees; and in the background, the scene is completed by the "Hoenzug of the Katharon" uniting itself to the rugged and light blue Parnassus with its cloud-capped summit.

Metella's charming Villa was situated on a gradually sloping hill; at the foot flowed the silvery waters of the Saramanta, on whose fertile banks flourished in abundance, the laurel and the dark myrtle and the slopes were studded with clumps of the Tamarisk and box-trees. The Villa was surrounded on every side, except that facing Eleusis, with groves of palms. From the centre of the building, rose a high turret, whence a charming view of the surrounding country could be obtained. On one side, the level plain opened to the sea, on whose shores, stood the rich trading town of Eleusis, in the centre of which rose, in imposing grandeur, the renowned temple of Demetrius, famed for the so-called "Eleusian Mysteries." Every year at the commencement of October, a great procession was formed at Eleusis: and four days previously, the festival of Demeter was celebrated at Athens. On the sixth day, the child of the goddess was, in the midst of rejoicing, carried out through the sacred gate in a wicker basket. Priests and officials accompanied the statue, and those in the procession bore agricultural implements and ears of corn.

* The High Priest said to Him: "I conjure Thee by the living God that you tell us if you are the Son of God." Jesus answered him: "Thou hast said it." Matt. xxvi.

<sup>a</sup> This Bishop Quadratus is not to be understood as the Quadratus of a later period. The above was the successor of St. Pablinus, and was appointed to the Episcopacy of Athens 125 years after the birth of Christ.

On the seventh night of the festival, the form of consecration took place, and the vows of those about to be initiated into the Eleusian Mysteries were received. The charm of this worship lay in the mystery of it, in the lively dramatical representations, in the co-operation of all the arts and artistical enjoyments of music, song and dance, in the dazzling illuminations, in the effective decorations, in the most refined enjoyment of the senses, and above all in the promises of a happy future after death. If you ask in what these mysteries consisted, antiquity gives no satisfactory answer. It was strictly forbidden to reveal them and whoever did so, had every reason to dread the punishment of death. Plato was suspected of guessing the mysteries, whereby we may infer, that the doctrine of his philosophy resembled that of the Eleusian. So far, it is certain, that the foundation of this ancient worship, which existed as far back, as the time in which the Ionians moved from Attica to Asia Minor, rested on a certain belief in a future state. "In the Eleusian," says Cicero, "one learns not only to live happily and holily, but to die with a cheerful hope." "Thrice happy," says Sophocles, "are those mortals, who have seen these consecrations, before they descend to Hades. For them alone is life in the next world, for others, only sorrow and afflictions." The more noble and refined were of opinion, that their happiness would consist in being constantly occupied in sweet devotion: but the greater number thought with Plato, that they would have a continual enjoyment of the senses, and endless intoxication. But we cannot be very far wrong in concluding, that those mysteries took their origin from the ancient Patriarchs, and that corrupt actions and doctrines mingled later, with the original true worship. No wonder then, if the ambitious Romans, such as Octavius, Adrian, Antoninus, and Marcus Aurelius, had themselves initiated into these mysteries. In Athens, according to Lucian, A. D. 176, there was but one man at that time, who did not belong to this worship.*

Westerly from Eleusis, expanding wide, are fields of rice, with its dark red blossoms, which add to the beauty of this flower-enameled plain. Like a sheet of silver in the distance, shine the smooth waters of the lovely bay of Salamis, and the blue mountains of this charming island rise in majestic beauty, thinly veiled with the vapors of the sea.

To the East, is the "Sacred Way," that leads from Athens, and winds itself, serpent-like along the shore. Where it once lay, are now, in many parts impassible swamps. Here and there, at prominent points of view, could be seen magnificent monuments containing the ashes of renowned Greeks. Those tombs in the "Sacred Way," extend as far as Kerameikos, interrupted now and then by little oratories to Jupiter, Phœbus, Aphrodite, and to some of the great heroes; so that this scene transported the traveler to the "Via Appia," in Rome, so great was the resemblance.

How deceptive is the sea! It smiles at times as friendly as a lake. There was a day, on which the waters of Salamis ran red with the blood of the Persians. Thousands of them found their death in this bay—their iron, their gold, and the Eastern decorations of their generals, lie buried in its depths, whence no hand can draw forth the sunken treasures.†

To the present day the Greeks look down proudly from the heights of Salamis, when they think of the conquests of the ancient Hellenes, without which the entire history of Europe

* As the Christian Emperor Valentinian, A. D. 376, forbid the heathens to hold their nocturnal solemnities. Prætextas, Proconsul of Greece, petitioned that the Eleusian Mysteries, might be an exception. The reasons he gave were, first that without these mysteries, the people would lead a comfortless life, a life that would be no life, because it would be deprived of those ceremonies which were a symbol of a future and everlasting life. Second, that to separate the life of man from the comforting belief of a future, was only to be compared to a living death.

† On the last day before the final battle, Themistocles took three captives, the phews of Xerxes king of Persia. At a sacrifice not long after, he drank a quantity of Oxen blood to which Plutarch ascribed his death.

would have had quite another aspect. And yonder, where now the light-hearted fisherman tunes his song, thoughtless of the past, once flourished on the shores of Corinth, the two cities Helice and Buris, which in one eventful day, vanished from the earth, and sank beneath that blue sea, leaving not a trace behind.*

To observe some order on our entrance to the Villa, let us first visit the Urbana or Castle, then the Rustica or Stabling, and lastly, the Fructuaria or Granaries.

The entire front of the villa, presented to the view a princely palace, built in the form of a hollow square, and bore a strong resemblance to Metella's mansion in Athens. The windows were of a transparent material, † and sheltered from the sun by framed blinds.

The gate-keeper was standing near the Corinthian pillars, which were twenty feet in length, supporting the vestibule, and beside him was a majestic watch-dog of the favorite Eperean race. The dog appeared to be a vigilant guard. Over the entrance was his likeness in Mosaic, and under it the following inscription: "Protect yourself against the Protector."

The entrance hall was profusely ornamented on each side, with numerous busts. To the right, were the ancestors of Atticus, on the left, those of Metellus. Those in Parian marble, and particularly the ones of more recent date, were finished in a style worthy of a Scopas or a Praxiteles. Peeping from behind the statues, were the laughing faces of lovely little boys, painted on the Lotus flower, with the finger on the lip, and with an expression of caution on the countenance, which clearly conveyed to the visitor, the idea, that the statues of those great men must be approached in silence. In another part of the Hall were copies of Polygnots, from the Stoa Poikile in Athens, amongst which stood the Philosopher Zeno, who, when living, might have been seen in that gallery of paintings.

Alabaster statues, crystal vases, large candelabra of white marble, numerous smaller figures in transparent stone, or the famous Corinthian bronze, stood here and there in this richly decorated hall. After having passed this hall, which ran right through the front portion of the palace, we enter the square court-yard which was enclosed on every side by the wings of the building, and with a treble pillared colonnade all round. What a mass of curiosities here present themselves!

Inside the fluted pillars, were to be seen a little forest of the choicest shrubs, varieties of grasses, cool mossy turfs and rustic seats. The centre of this square was occupied by a fountain, whose playing waters rose to an immense height, and falling again into an expansive basin, refreshed all around. In smaller basins, supplied by water from the fountain, were sparkling gold fish, sailing about in the cooling fluid, and turning to the sun in playful gamboling their fiery scales. Birds without number, warbling in the shrubs, and bathing in the cool waters of the fountain, completed the charms of this little paradise.

Over the grand hall which projected from the house, was a spacious dining-room furnished with slanting lounges, upon which those at dinner could recline at full length, leaning their elbows on a high cushion, and supporting the head on the hand, according to the ancient custom. Together with this dining-room the entire story was called "cenaculum." The third story, except the Sacrarium, in which a light was kept constantly burning, was occupied by the slaves. It consisted of a number of little rooms, the front windows of which looked out upon the open country, and the back upon the court-yard already mentioned. Those looking towards the court-yard reached the floor and opened on a terrace which ran the whole length of the wing.

Independently of this court-yard, the edifice boasted of a second one, of the same size and somewhat further back, separated from the first, by an intermediate building, called the woman's department. In this second court-yard was an elaborately finished marble bath, sheltered from the sun by an awning. The pavement round the bath, was Mosaic, and represented animals, fruit and flowers. Generally speaking, the principal floors of this Villa, particularly of the reception rooms, were of Mosaic workmanship which had the advantage of keeping the apartments cool.

* This event took place A. D. 370.

† A mineral called moonstone was used by the ancients for windows, previously to the invention of Glass.

We next visit the out-offices, adjoining the palace. What most attracts our attention in those, are the numerous rows of windows. This portion was occupied by Metella's male slaves, who had the charge of the flower gardens, meadows, olive gardens, and flax fields. Under this dwelling were the stables, the doors of which we only open hastily here and there. They were filled with an abundance of horned cattle, horses and a sort of black swine, with soft shiny skins, such as can be seen at the present day, lying about in the streets of the Grecian cities. Then again there were vaults for hares and rabbits, and others for geese, turkeys, and all sorts of poultry.

After this, follows the "Villa Fructuaria" which excites in many respects greater interest, for it contained large and various wine cellars. In the back cellar were several goat skins filled with the wine, so much valued by the Greeks, called Lesbos, these were sealed with pitch. Rhodian and Lydian and also the beloved Falarian were not forgotten. Other cellars of the Fructuaria contained stores from Metella's olive gardens, which were partly delivered to the great merchant ships, and partly sold at the new Market of Athens. The store-rooms for corn, hay and garden fruits, occupied a large space in the Fructuaria and enclosed off this part of the Villa. Lastly one look at Metella's garden. It may appear strange that two hundred years after the birth of Christ one met with the same artistic ornaments, which are to be seen in the nineteenth century particularly in France and Holland, where the tasteless custom prevails of cutting one tree like a pyramid, another like a Lion, and a third like a crowing cock, so that one imagines he is entering a menagerie rather than a pleasure ground. The peacock the favorite bird of the ancients, struts about here in an his pomp, and proudly swings his tail on high and spreads it out in the form of a fan. The villas of the rich are a clear proof of the extravagance of Greece, which with sculpture and all works of art, gave occupation to the greater number of the half-freemen.

Every flower-bed had its peculiar attendant, a white or colored statue. The flowers change according to their species, and their quantity and variety would have embarrassed a Greek of ordinary education, to name only one of these children of Flora, so foreign were these plants to that country. The ever blooming gardens of Egypt provided nearly all the country villas of Greece, with bulbs, seeds, and cuttings. Italy also sent her charms here—a soft breeze waves its balmy perfume from the flower-beds of Sicily, and Metella's garden offers you a bouquet of Spikenard, Myrrh, and the lovely Acanthus.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE POTTER AND HIS CHILD.

In a magnificently gilt chariot, drawn by white horses, Metella drove up to the entrance of her Villa. Could we then have seen the number of her attendants, standing on the marble steps, and the majestic form and haughty look of this noble dame, as she gracefully ascended, recognizing neither to the right nor to the left, a single slave amongst those who stood in crouching servility, with arms crossed on the breast, to welcome her arrival, a doubt would have passed through our minds, whether this proud lady would ever tread the thorny path of our Faith.

But Divine Providence has always means at hand to humble our pride. As the autumnal winds strip the trees of their withering foliage, and mingle it—aye that of the mighty oak, with that of the meanest shrub, and leave them bare and desolate till the coming Spring, so, the Providence of God is wont to blow away with the winds of affliction, all the vanities of man, and level his proud heart to the dust, leaving it for a time, empty, desolate, and bereft of all consolation.

We see here but slight grounds for supposing that Metella will ever become a disciple of Christ, or a lover of self-denial. Yet a few days later, she made a slight beginning, by a sort of condescending benevolence of which we shall give an example.

On the following morning, after her arrival, as she was walking in the court-yard, and fanned by her maid with an artistically woven peacock's tail, she saw, at the end of the interior court, which was somewhat hidden by an ornamental shrubbery, a poor, but very cheerful old man, sitting near the kitchen door. His flowing hair, and peculiar woolen mantle bespoke him to be a sort of artisan.

He is a potter by trade, and his name is Hyllos. While sitting on the cool Mosaic pavement, and leaning against a pillar, he little thinks that a stranger is observing him closely.

Poor Hyllos had just brought to the palace, some kitchen utensils from his work-shop, and had ardently hoped, that he would have received payment for them on delivery. But it was not so, and after his long walk, he had only received a piece of dry bread from one of the cooks. A little annoyed, as he had not had anything to eat that day, he seated himself down close to the kitchen, and commenced talking to himself. "Well Hyllos! but you are a poor, pitiful old blockhead! you have overworked yourself the whole week, and now you have nothing more for your trouble, than a bit of dry bread. Oh, hunger bites! but stop! you growling old fellow! don't you smell an amazingly good odor from the kitchen? what more do you want?" and, taking a long sniff, "oh! 'tis bits, roasted or steamed! ah! if you were not a discontented rascal, you would be satisfied with your share of the feast!" So saying, he took his bread from his bag, and with a long draw, sniffed up the good smell, and then ate his morsel of bread, and after a pause, as if to test the quality of taste and smell, said: "Of course you've had a good dinner!—You old fool, to be grumbling for nothing! Why the bread dipped in the smell from the kitchen is quite another thing. Ah! we have only to sop it in the delicious broth of a healthy imagination, to enjoy it with an understanding." He repeated the bite and sniff several times, and by the help of his imagination, began to feel himself not only satisfied, but satiated—so much so, that he seemed to fear it was amounting to gluttony, and rising from the ground began to admonish himself.—"Come, Hyllos, don't gormandize, you have had more than enough for this day," and throwing his bag over his shoulder, commenced his journey home with a cheerful countenance.

Metella was forcibly struck by the piteous scene she had just witnessed. This poor man thought she, is contented with the odor that proceeds from the food preparing for my table. What wealth lies in contentment! and yet what wealth can purchase it?—She firmly resolved to visit the poor man without delay in his own humble dwelling.

It was on one of those hot dry harvest days, such as are often experienced in Greece, when the heat of the sun, the wind, and the sandy dust, vie with each other which shall conquer, when Metella gave orders for her favorite slave to hold herself in readiness for an evening walk. Ophne brings with her a long handled sun-shade which with the ancients played so important a part, and which has been handed down to the Greeks of the present day in a smaller form. She cannot help feeling anxious whether she will be able to move it about with the necessary agility, in order to protect her mistress as well from the rays of the sun, as from the thick clouds of harvest dust. She consoled herself with the reflection, that latterly her mistress had become far less sensitive, and that very day, during the entire walk, she did not hear from her a single complaint.

"Ophne," said Metella, as they had been walking for some time in the hot valley. "do you know the house of poor Hyllos, the potter of Corinth, to whom I sent Lydia not long since?"

"He has a little sick boy and if I do not err, yonder is his poor clay-built dwelling. I should like to visit the old man and give him a little present."

Ophne was not a little astonished to hear from her gracious Domina, that she was going to the house of a poor potter, and to bestow a charity with her own hands. "Undoubtedly," said Ophne, "Hyllos dwells there on the other side of the moor. He was once well off, and used to provide the potter market at Athens with his goods. But since he has become old, his strength and activity fail him, and he finds great difficulty in supporting himself. In addition to his poverty he has a child to provide for, whom he also instructs in his trade, and in the rudiments of reading and writing."

Hyllos, who was just then in the work-shop finishing flower-pots, saw the gracious lady with her slave, while they were still at a good distance, and hastened to thank her as she was passing by, for the many blessings she had sent him lately. But how great was his surprise, on seeing her approach his humble dwelling. She entered smilingly and enquired after himself and his son. The little Askanus, who was scarcely six years old, sat in a corner on a broken flower pot, and held in his arms a young rabbit, which he was sleeking down with his hand.

"Are you contented Hyllos?" asked Metella, and before the potter could give an answer, Askanus frightened his little rabbit away by whispering in his ear. Are you contented she asks. Then the child ran behind the wooden pillar or support of the house and every now and then stole a glance at the lady, when he thought he was unobserved.

"What have you had for dinner to-day Hyllos?" asked Metella. "A cake of bread madam, onions and watercresses, a little salt and a drink from the wind-pipe fountain in the pine forest."

"You have a sick boy I heard lately, how is he?"

While the potter commenced to relate all the particulars of his child's illness, the little fellow sought to conceal his face behind his bound up arm. Metella then called the little boy from his hiding place. He approached the strange lady bashfully, and endeavored by retreating slowly to hide himself behind his father.

Metella drew from her girdle pocket, a piece of gold, and held it up before the boy. At the sight of the gold all embarrassment vanished, and calling his healthy arm into action, he eagerly seized the offered gift. The tears of the potter showed Metella the joy she had afforded a poor old man. He continued to relate how his little son's malady had fallen into his hand and arm, and that the doctor declared amputation was indispensable.

At these words, Metella showed a decided repugnance to the operation. "Yes, yes," said little Askanus, "the horrid man said that, and went away, but shortly after the good Lydia came and brought me a large sweet almondcake." Metella laughed at the childish prattle, which brought to her mind that of her darling Lucius at the same age.

"And then," continued Askanus, "the good Lydia said to me that cutting off my hand would not be so dreadful, and that she would come herself to me, that it might not pain me so much."

"And then did the good Lydia really come to help you?" asked Metella. The boy nodded silently and began to cry.

The old father answered for him, dried his tears, and said: "O, of course, gracious lady, or we could not have gone on with the operation, if your servant had not helped us. To us poor people, such a help comes seldom. I am a poor, ailing old man, and I could not possibly have held the boy, when he put his hands imploringly together, begging that we would not hurt him. How also could a father look on at a sharp knife passing through the arm of his dear child? I still tremble at the remembrance of it. O no! your Lydia kept her word, and came at the stated time, and was here before the doctor arrived."

"Yes," added Askanus, "and brought father a couple of red herrings, and some grapes and sweet seed cake."

"But still sweeter were the words of comfort," continued the old man, "that she brought to the sorrowful father and his child. Ah! poverty seldom finds a friend! but the few friends it does find, are as true as gold for they do not love us for the sake of gold or honor, but for one's own sake. Such a friend your servant had been to us. When the doctor began his work, she told the boy to be firm, and held him during the entire operation, with a heroic courage. How affectionately she wiped the perspiration from his brow, and how piously she prayed to the highest God! For she had other gods as well as we, and called the highest God—not Father Jupiter, but God the Father, and his attendant gods—not gods, but angels. Then she repeated so often to the little fellow, 'patience, only another moment's patience, we have just finished!'"

Metella felt herself touched by this description, and a sensation passed over her cheeks like a cool breeze, but as old Hyllos was about to show her the arm, that she might see how nicely it was healing, she quickly gave him a sign not to remove the bandage. "No, no, Hyllos, let it be, we must go now."

Askanus stood quite close to the strange lady, and his little rabbit jumping about at his feet. The boy looked embarrassed, first at his little pet, and then at Metella, and on his blushing cheeks could be read that he had something else to say. He cast an enquiring glance at his father, and twisted his fingers in his nut-brown locks.

"Well little one, what is the matter, now?" enquired Metella in a most amiable tone. With increasing confusion, the boy stooped down, took his dear little rabbit on his arm, and thinking the lady would be pleased with a present of his favorite, offered it to her. She accepted the little animal, gave it to Ophne to carry, patted the boy on the head, and hoped that Heaven would always preserve to him his good heart.

Had Ophne been told that Thrax had become a giant, she would have believed it sooner than that Metella had become condescending, but seeing was believing and her own eyes were witness to the fact. At the commencement of the scene, she was seized with convulsions of laughter, which she concealed with difficulty from her haughty mistress. This was soon changed into silent admiration, and ended with veneration and love. Metella on her way home was lost in thought, which allowed her lively little slave to indulge in her own reflections also. The tongue not being called into action, left the thoughts a double duty. The interview she had just witnessed filled her with admiration and astonishment. The self that twines round her best thoughts and actions intruded here. Dear Lydia is so perfect, thought she to herself, that everything I did contrary to her notions of right and wrong, I was snubbed for often enough in the day, but mercy on me, what is to become of me now, when my Domina begins the same sort of life! It will be, Ophne don't be too curious—Ophne, keep your temper—Ophne, a silent tongue is an ornament in a woman, till at last, poor Ophne might as well be one of the statues in the pleasure ground, looking at every thing and saying nothing. Well, I think one Mentor is enough for any poor slave, and I am quite satisfied with Lydia. However too much thought injures the health, and I shall have plenty of time to think of the troubles when they come; so casting off care, she began to fan her mistress with redoubled zeal. But to return to Metella—This evening her respect for Lydia, whom she usually called the bee of Hymett, on account of her many acts of virtue, rose higher and higher. She felt an ardent desire, not only to be esteemed by such a soul, but to be ardently and sincerely loved. Though she believed her slave was attached to her, still she thought that she was not tenderly beloved by her. In any case the love that she received from her was not of that enthusiastic expression which she looked upon as true friendship. She then reflected on the two sorts of benevolence, which the poor potter had received through her and her servant—I gave him gold, said she to herself, a small gift, which has made me nothing poorer, Lydia on the contrary, had no gold to offer, but she gave what was more valuable, her personal services. I would rather have given the unhappy father ten pieces of gold, than do for him what she did, and therefore her acts of benevolence are far greater than mine, and certainly before God her work has by far a greater merit. O, if I were so ardently and sincerely beloved by her as that child of Hyllos! The old man was right; friendship to the poor is without self-seeking, but the more riches and earthly greatness raise us, the more reason we have to mistrust the love of man. The higher those lofty mountains raise their heads, the more densely are they enveloped in fog and vapor, while the darting rays of the genial sun, pass them by unheeded, to reflect themselves in the modest valley. What signifies this bowing and cringing servility bestowed on us by mortals like ourselves, when we don't possess either a true friend or a single heart to love us? Such reflections rendered her melancholy and dejected, for when she looked back on her past life, she found that all her good works grew on no other soil than that of her wealth, and because those riches were not her own merits, but at the most, the mere possessions of her ancestors, it appeared to her as though she had passed a useless life. She therefore saw herself in effect poor in good deeds, and a feeling of shame and sadness took possession of her. It appeared to her that great souls must think little of her as she had nothing else to offer for another life, but fleeting treasures. Then she understood for the first time that there could be that man who would look upon riches as an imperfection, and that the Gospel was right in connecting perfection with a renunciation of temporal goods. Even a Roman noble, Minutius Felix, expressed the same sentiments. Whence all at once would such an honor come to the poor, that the greatest among the inhabitants would visit them, and try to comfort them?

The rich matron does this merely because she begins to experience a pleasure in a doctrine, that commands us without distinction to love every one as we love ourselves, still more willingly would she hasten to the poor, if she knew who He is that says: "What you do to the least of these my brethren, you have done to me."

So poverty in the Christian world, has quite another position, than that which it had in the pagan. Poverty gives virtue a patent for nobility, love, vassals, and in the naked God-Man on the cross, she beholds her oldest and most renowned Ancestor. The poor themselves have at all times acknowledged this privilege through the Redeemer, and have therefore been from one century to another, the most affectionate and faithful children of Christ and His holy Church.

CHAPTER XIV.

SAD INTELLIGENCE.

In a shady part of the extensive garden, is a bower formed of majestic palm trees, and their projecting branches fall in graceful profusion over the arched roof, and mingle in pleasing contrast with the lighter green of the Acacia, and the blooming roses of Pæstum, which with their full buds insinuate themselves through the dark foliage of the interior.

In this lovely spot, surrounded by a wilderness of beauties, was Metella, reclining on a soft couch, and taking her morning repast. Close to the sofa, sat Lydia, reading to her mistress. She held a portion of the Gospel of St. John in her hand. Although the early Christians carefully preserved the Gospels from the heathens, still Bishop Quadratus allowed Metella to read all their religious writings. At her feet, on the skirt of her robe, lay her little Maltese dog. It had its little brown paws stretched out at a full length, on which it rested its tiny black nose, and settled itself snugly to sleep. Selma is seen approaching up the shady walk accompanied by a sweet looking boy. She carries in her hand a perforated silver fruit basket, in which are beautiful peaches arranged on fresh vine leaves, and surrounded with blue and yellow figs, and Arabian dates. The boy carried a fine towel of Pelusium linen on his arm, he held in his right hand a tankard, and in the left, a massive golden cup. Behind Duranus stood little Thrax, bearing a muscle-shaped dish of rose colored Sardonyx, filled with clear ice. All were laid on the black marble table; the slaves bowed themselves backwards with arms crossed on the breast, and retired.

"My Lucius is a good son," said Metella taking the golden cup in her hand. "He sent me this cup lately—the present of the Emperor Verus, and he begged me to use it daily until his return. Also Pompeianus, whom I knew in Rome, and who now fights on the Danube with Lucius, guessed what would please me. He has had some words of comfort, touching the death of my beloved husband, engraved on it. Before you pour in the beverage, you may recall the verses to my mind."

Amidst the busy hours of life's routine,
Oft hast thou joyful raised the veil, and seen
Laborious Tyke, graud in her glided plough
With tollsome pain, thine acres furrow through.
Thus sufferings mix with state, and through the mind
Wall in sad accents, like the moaning wind.
Death forc'd thy noble spouse from thee to part,
And in the dark tomb sleeps his faithful heart.
Metella still thom'st joy amidst thy grief,
Bloom to thy cheek, and to thy heart relief:
Ah! may not that joy thou'st gained be brief,
May Lucius' face thine eyes delight, for there
Strength, courage, virtue, in bright traits appear,— Proud ornaments of that afflicting bier.

After Lydia had repeated them, she poured the red wine into the cup, and dropped in a few crumbs of ice to give it an agreeable coolness.

Lydia related as an introduction to the paragraph, that she was to read that morning, that Jesus returned willingly to His friend Lazarus, who lived at a short distance from Jerusalem. Lazarus was at one time dangerously ill, and his afflicted sisters, Martha and Mary sent a special message to Jesus, to obtain His divine assistance for their sick brother. After this introduction she began to read the touching account of the raising of Lazarus, and added that this resuscitation stood in close connection with the imprisonment of our Lord.

This wonder, and the solemn reception of Jesus into Jerusalem, roused the envy of the High Priest, and the death of our Redeemer was the result. But just as Lazarus was only a few days in the grave, so our Lord was but part of three days in the tomb, when by His own power He rose from the dead. So will our souls be united to our bodies, never to be separated. The hope of meeting again is a consolation to us, when standing by the side of those graves that contain all we loved on earth. While Metella interrupted her frequently with questions, she perceived that in front of the garden, coming towards her with hasty steps, was a man of rank. As he approached, she recognized him as her old domestic friend Pausanias and her father's most grateful disciple. He commenced with an agitated voice to say, that the Proconsul in Athens had just received news from the seat of war, and that the conquest of the barbarians was at last completed; which conquest was particularly attributed to the bravery of the "Legio Fulminatrix," which many Greeks had joined. The wonderful assistance of the Divinity was everywhere spoken of, without which, the whole army must have succumbed to the savage force of the barbarians. Also news of Lucius, who fought bravely was contained in the accounts to the Proconsul. He had scarcely said these words, when with extraordinary haste, he drew forth a note, and laying it on the little table, took his immediate departure.

"News of my son?" asked Metella and cast an anxious look upon Lydia.

"Probably joyful news," replied she, "for he fought bravely. I scarcely dare break open the note; Pausanias departed so quickly, what can it signify? I tremble! O withdraw to the shady walk and pray to your God for me. In the meantime I will occupy myself in a few minutes with my darling Lucius." Lydia obeyed. "The opening of that little missive can give me unbounded joy or plunge me into the deepest grief!—There it lies in prophetic silence, bearing in its simple folds, a secret to me, yet, the knowledge of which may for ever dash from my lips the cup of joy—It still says nothing, and yet contains what?—perhaps more than I shall live to bear."

The longer she delayed opening the missive, the greater became her anxiety. Pausanias stood ever before her;—his mien, his confused look, his hasty departure, were all doubtful omens. She seemed incapable of thought, not even one to Him on high, to grant a gracious termination to her melancholy fears. "My darling son, what shall I know of thee now?" and with one desperate struggle, she broke the seal.

A considerable time had passed, and Lydia heard no sound, she began to look impatiently towards the arbor. She heard the little dog barking piteously as if he had been hurt. Whining, and with sunken head and soft steps, the little animal ran along the walk, and scarcely had he joined Lydia, when he began to retrace his steps, drag his tail along the ground, and now and then looked back to see if Lydia were following. Lydia concluded that the dog's howling signified something, and she resolved to return, though uncalled, and drawing aside the branches, looked into the arbor, and uttering a cry of horror, exclaimed:—"My dear, dear mistress!" She entered, and called her again and again by name, but received no answer. She then raised her head gently, but her eyes were still closed, and she held in her half open hand, the little missive. Lydia now guessed all. The deadly paleness of Metella's countenance told her the contents of the letter. Lucius was slain! At this moment a feeling pervaded her entire frame, to which she had hitherto been a stranger, since her painful separation from her dear mother.

Placing Metella's head upon her arm, she took the napkin from the table, poured on it a little wine, and with it chafed her lady's temples. The little dog sprang anxiously upon his mistress, and dragging with his paws endeavored to arouse her. Lydia knew that a cry for help would be useless at this moment, she therefore remained supporting the head of the afflicted mother, awaiting the return of her senses.

The good slave continued long in this position, anxiously looking for a change. She pressed Metella's head to her heart with tender affection, that she might once in her life have the happiness of being near her. At last she observed her breathing softly, and her eyes gradually opened.

Metella cast a vacant look around, and knew nothing of the past, but inquired if she had been dreaming. Lydia answered: "No, dear mistress, it is only a little weakness that will quickly vanish." She then offered her the golden cup, and begged of her to drink. The lady sipped a little, and looked inquiringly in Lydia's eyes.

"My child, I believe you are crying? Say, has anything happened to you? Ah! I feel as if I should cry with thee! O let me rest a little on thy arm!"—"Has not some one been here with us?"—She asked, after a long pause;—"Was there not a stranger here, and I imagine he said something about Lucius? O yes—I remember now—he said that all was well with him."—Lydia turned aside to conceal the bitter tears that flowed without ceasing.

"Child," said Metella, "why are you silent? Why do you not help me to remember what is passing?"

"Lucius fought bravely—of course he fought bravely, or he would have been an unworthy scion of a noble stem! But—there is a something more.—Some one spoke of defeat. Lydia, why are you silent?—again this letter! Lydia, am I in my senses, or does this letter speak of my son?"

Lydia dares not trust herself with one look, but supporting her dear mistress still on her arm, remains motionless. Metella again seized the note, and with a fixed gaze reads on. "My child fallen? Lucius slain? The desolate widow without a son! The hope, the joy of her widowed life, to come no more! Is she then never more to hear that voice again? that buoyant step that spoke the gladness of the heart, that honest tongue, its truth speaking from his flashing eye! that docile will bending always in obedience! and does that loving filial heart beat now no more? Alas poor Mother, thy only hope is slain! Thou hast nothing more to love! All, all is desolation here," placing her hand convulsively on her beating heart. "The link that bound me to this fleeting world is broken! I have nothing now to care for!" Metella was roused from her anguish by a voice outside the arbor weeping like a child. A little form sought to get a glimpse between the foliage, it was the Thracian dwarf, the most faithful follower of the fallen Lucius—little Thrax—Then came Ophne, and cast herself at the feet of her afflicted mistress, pressed her robe to her face and sobbed aloud. Thrax hid himself behind her, and took the letter from the table. He appeared by his imploring countenance to ask if he might read it. Metella by a slight inclination of the head gave assent, and he and Ophne were motioned to leave the arbor. In a few moments loud lamentations were heard through the villa, for Pausanias had informed the gate-keeper of the news he had brought. The letter that the dwarf took from the arbor, passed from hand to hand, but no one ventured to approach Metella, who had just been carried to her apartment by her sympathizing slaves.

After the violent grief had a little subsided, Lydia sought to stammer out a word of consolation, but as often as she tried to speak, her voice failed her. Metella saw that her affectionate servant wished to console her, and she discovered in the midst of her sorrow, that her wish to be loved by Lydia as a dear friend was more than fulfilled. It was difficult for Lydia to utter a word; "dearest lady," said she, "your suffering is great, but you do not bear it alone—those who know the secrets of thy noble soul suffer with thee, and share this pain with an intensity that you would scarcely credit." By her affectionate attention she changed her mistress' pain into sorrow, and the tears began to flow."

"My eyes," said she, "will become a dried-up spring."

"Till the God of comfort," added the Christian slave, "makes the eye clear again to see the dear departed one. Between the present and that moment, there is only a little space, then the mother will be united to her child: what a treasure of comfort, my dear mistress, lies in this truth?"

"Did I not believe this," replied she, "my grief would annihilate me—I am fully convinced of the immortality of the soul. O, it is a melancholy Religion that places in the hand of a sorrowing mother, the shroud of her son, and in it buries her last consolation. The belief of again seeing the lost one"—and suddenly starting up, she continued, "Lydia, Lydia, my dream! perhaps Lucius was then dead."

"And at that time already happy," replied Lydia, "for he was reclining near Christ, the Son of God, and that same Christ that gave back to Martha her brother, who had been four days dead, can also heal thy wounds and give thee back thy son."

"I wished to go to Christ when I saw Him, but I was not able, you sought to help me, you were also too weak. Who will lead me?"

"O if I never could approach my son, how hard—how dreadful would it be! I should be the most miserable of mortals: I should wander about lamenting through all parts of the heavens, and the lower world. I should sob and call for the child of my heart, never tire calling for him, if even for an eternity O, dear child, do you lead me to my son!" "My arm," replied Lydia, "is too weak, but grace, when it enlightens you, can send you a strong angel from Heaven who will drive away all hindrance, and lead you to the happiness of your son."

Up to this time, the Christian slave shared the sufferings of her mistress, not like a servant, but like a faithful friend. For without knowing it, she was no longer the servant, but the comforter of Metella.

CHAPTER XV.

DIONYSIUS OF CORINTH.

METELLA was too well known in Athens, not to excite the deepest sympathy amongst her friends, at the melancholy tidings from the seat of war. Some of them started for the villa, to express in person the share they took in her afflictions. Amongst these was the venerable philosopher Athenagoras, whose condolence fell on the withered heart of the noble sufferer, like a mild sunbeam. Although Athens, where she had her numerous friends was not far distant, still she did not carry her sorrows there for in misfortune, the heart of man prefers solitude, and finds but few friends to keep it company. Athens was the last place she would wish to visit, as there were preparations making there, to celebrate the conquest over the barbarians, and these would have opened her wounds anew.

Athenagoras promised to introduce her to a man, who was honored by the faithful of Greece, as a worker of miracles. He lived in Corinth, and therefore was not very far from the Villa.

Metella accepted this intention with gratitude.

The Legends introduce to us two Bishops of Greece, who bore the name of Dionysius. The oldest is the well known Dionysius, the Areopagite, who through the address that St. Paul made A. D. 51, before the Areopagites, was converted to the Faith, and became his disciple. He was the first Bishop of Athens, and died A. D. 117. Centuries later, a church was built to his memory on the Areopagus, but it is now in ruins.

The Dionysius of whom Athenagoras spoke, flourished in the reign of Marcus Aurelius at Corinth, and distinguished himself by his great zeal and brilliant oratory. He was not contented to live solely for his church, but wrote several epistles to distant congregations, the most renowned of which were those to the Lacedemonians and the Athenians. Those to the churches of Nicomedia, Gortyna, Amastris, Gnosus and Rome, letters full of Apostolic zeal, wherein were frequently exposed the errors and heresies of that century, are for the greater part no longer extant. Eusebius has only saved some remnants of them in his Church History. Dionysius encouraged the Athenians in his epistles, to a firmer faith and to an evangelical life; he mentions their former Bishop Publius, who was martyred, and his successor Quadratus, and of the latter he gave testimony, that he had again lighted up the sinking faith of the Athenians. This holy Bishop opposed those heresies which arose in the first and second centuries, and was renowned for inquiring into every particular of each sect that started up, from what writings their founders drew them, and in what they consisted.

Some of his writings were wilfully misrepresented by his opponents, of which he complained: "I wrote some letters," said he, "at the petition of my brothers, but they have been falsified by the messengers of Satan, who found it their interest to make additions and omissions. If they cannot pass unimportant works without injuring them, it may not be much wondered at, if from the same source the text of Holy Scripture becomes hacked and maimed."

With just this view, to fix the Faith and plant Hope in a soul weighed down with grief, the saint found himself urged on to suspend his widely spread activity for some days, and visit Metella. Detached as he was from earth, this visit was to perform no earthly duty. Nothing but an immortal soul found value in his eyes, and little did it trouble him, whether he had to seek it in a palace, or in a wretched hovel. Let us follow the holy man, bent with the burden of age and heavy duties, wending his way slowly towards Theredron.

In his aged countenance shines forth a soul inflamed with the love of God. With a magnetic power, he draws all to Him, and gains the esteem and love of those with whom he converses.

As much as Metella had been accustomed from her earliest years, to mix with those of the highest rank and deepest learning, she had never met one who had made so great an impression upon her, or who had inspired her with so much awe, as this venerable man.

It appeared to her, as if a more than ordinary spirit was concealed within his breast.

She expressed her gratitude that her affliction was shared in so sincerely from the side of the Christians. "My mind," said she to him, "is in the same wrecked condition as my body. It appears to me as if the God of the Christians, whom I saw in a vision, was drawing me up to His glory of streaming light. But scarcely have I raised my thoughts to Him, when I seem to behold the gods of Greece looking angrily at me, and that Jupiter on that account, has allowed this lightning of misfortune to strike me, for having forsaken him, and turned to the God of the Christians.

"I totter like a child, who is just learning to walk, first leaning to one side, and then to the other.

"And yet there can be but one true God—either the God of the Christians or the god of the heathens. For the truth has this peculiarity—that no second truth stands near it.

"Revered master, unloose this knot, and give my mind a rest, after which it has so longed sighed! Give me the true faith."

"It would be a vain thought," said he, "if a Christian were to believe that it is he who gives the Faith. Faith comes from God alone, and is the greatest gift He can bestow on mortals. To some, He gives it in a greater degree, to others in a lesser. Faith is a light that illuminates the spiritual darkness, yet in each, it is but a weak lamp till lighted up in the great Luminary,—Jesus Christ Himself.

"For some, the oil is scarcely sufficient for their own necessities, to pass through the dark labyrinth of life; they can scarcely see a few steps before them on their pilgrimage to the other world, much less to light themselves with it into the glory of Heaven. Should the fuel of this heavenly light fail, and the lamp threaten to extinguish, we must not lose courage, even the Apostles experienced this, as they once expressed it: 'Lord increase our faith!'

"Concerning the question of whether misfortune comes from the God of the Christians, or from the highest god of the heathens. Suppose that Jupiter sends the misfortune—is it not incomprehensible why he does not punish all the Hellenes that do not believe in him, in so much that many of the learned have forsaken the religion of their forefathers? But above all, Jupiter would have to punish the Christians, who intend to annihilate his altars and temple. If your misfortune be sent you by the God of the Christians, it is easily explained." "How! Does your God then who is called the source of all good, send misfortune and affliction to them?" asked the heathen. "God is a vine-dresser," said Dionysius, "who lays the knife to the vine, and cuts off its withered branches, that it may bring forth stronger fruit.

"We feel the wounds he inflicts 'tis true, and they press out most bitter tears, like the drop that falls from the pruned vine. But we must bear in mind, that this Vine-dresser cuts off that only, which is hurtful and unfruitful.

"If you will raise the veil of your conscience, you will discover that the divine love has seen also something in you that must be pruned, to make you truly fruitful."

"What do you mean, revered master?"

"Perhaps it was the love of the world, or the love of riches, or the love of the creature, that held thee enchained, so that the thought of eternity was stupified by that of time. Perhaps, since this trial has happened to you, that you think much oftener on the God of Heaven, on your last end, and on your son, who has found peace by the side of his God."

"O how truly have you spoken! Does then the Divinity send sorrow to lead us to truth and happiness?—That is an act worthy of the highest Being.

"But Plato did not suppose that, when he said that the human mind stands still, when it reflects on wickedness. Am I right, Dionysius, to believe that the Divinity in thus afflicting me, loves me more than ever?"

"Without doubt, Metella—whom God punishes, He also loves."

"O, how willingly would I bear each punishment, were I certain that the Divinity would thereby lead me to the happy plains!

"But do you believe, revered master, that God sees through the immeasurable extent of my anguish? No language on earth is capable of expressing the misery of a mother's sorrow, at the loss of her only child."

Dionysius now drew forth a scroll, upon which he had written some words, with the intention of giving them to the afflicted matron.

They were taken from the Gospel of St. Luke, and were on the touching sympathy our Lord expressed towards an afflicted widow. He read aloud:

"As Jesus came nigh to the gates of the city of Naim, behold a dead man was carried out, the only son of his mother; and she was a widow; and a great multitude of the city was with her. Whom when the Lord had seen, being moved with mercy towards her, he said to her: 'Weep not!' and He came near and touched the bier. And they that carried it stood still, and He said: 'Young man, I say unto thee arise,' and he that was dead, sat up, and began to speak. And He gave him to his mother."

"That same Lord," said Dionysius, "who felt pity for the afflicted widow of Naim, feels also for thee, and the moment will come, in which He will say to thee: 'Weep not,' and He will restore to thee thy beloved son.

Metella felt herself gaining new strength, as she heard of this wonderful event: and with the saint's explanation. "You give me also the same hope that Athenagoras did; he said that I should yet be united to the blessed in Heaven."

"Certainly, if you fulfill the conditions on which God grants the crown of happiness."

Faith and virtue unite themselves to our Lord, like the two sisters, Martha and Mary, while one sits at His feet, the other is anxiously occupied about Him. Whoever is acquainted with the one sister, will most certainly be introduced to the other. Form a friendship with Christian virtue, and that virtue will soon lead you to faith. 'Will you know if my doctrine is from God' said Christ, 'so observe it.' It is something beautiful to occupy one's self with study, and to refresh one's self in the treasures of knowledge as in a cooling spring. There is something dignified in reflecting on the things we have read, that we may come nearer and nearer to the truth. But virtue leads you higher than wisdom. Worldly wisdom is a deep sea, many draw from it the pearl of truth, but many, death."

"But what virtues do you recommend to me in particular, in order that I may secure for myself the happiness of Heaven?"

"A holy pope," said he, "sent a letter once to our Church in Corinth, which we still read on Sundays. It commences thus:

'The all-wise Creator of the world knows the multitude and beauty of the Heavenly enjoyments. Let us strive to be found amongst the number of those who wait to partake of His promised gifts. How shall we attain thereto? If we in the faith hold fast on God, if we reflect upon what is pleasing and agreeable to God, that we may accomplish His holy will. Let us walk in the path of truth, and cast aside all injustice, covetousness, discord, wickedness, lust, loquacity, hatred, arrogance, pride, vain-glory, and self-sufficiency.*

Metella listened with profound attention, and on the venerable man rising to depart, she promised him to practice zealously all the virtues he had just dictated.

Report soon circulated amongst her friends and acquaintances, that she was about to adopt a religion which was nothing short of folly. They used their utmost endeavors to dissuade her from such a step. Her ancient nobility, her dazzling wealth, the fame of her learning, the displeasure of the Emperor—all these, they said, should deter her from becoming a Christian.

She was placed in the most agonizing position. Doubts gnawed again upon the freshness of the soul, and it appeared to her as though she must sink under the combat that was passing within.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE CONVERSION.

MONTHS had passed, since the Greek matron had received the melancholy intelligence of her son's death. Harvest and Winter had come and gone, and she was still at her Villa. Pale and reduced to a shadow, she wandered through her costly apartments clad in deep mourning. Nothing could charm her now. She often sat in the court-yard for hours, gazing listlessly on the waters of the fountain, or wandered by moonlight seeking consolation in the soothing and melancholy strains of the nightingale. Dionysius endeavored to raise her depressed spirits by retiers but his pious sister Chrysophora, as he called Metella, could not be comforted. What he built up, Metella's friends would pull down again, and particularly the intellectual Lucian, just returned from Egypt, did not fail to set up Christianity to ridicule. He compared the Christians with the inhabitants of Aldera, who, by listening to a single Grecian declaimer, became so insane, that they spoke ever after in the spirit of Sophocles, and even in the streets, talked only in Iambic measure. Such derision had a paralyzing effect on Metella's soul, and she lounged for nothing so much as death, and then she knew not whether she should die as a Christian or as a heathen. So far, doubt had brought her to the brink of despair.

The human mind has a natural desire for truth, and as long as it finds it not, it has no rest, and feels only melancholy and a death-like anxiety. The mind of man strives after truth as his heart does after love; but when a doubt is in the case, two elements mingle together, error and truth, which form such a miserable state in the mind, that it can only be compared to the chaotic mixture of earth and water. Metella's corporal strength sunk under such sufferings. She scarcely touched food, and medical aid was resorted to in vain. She wasted away, and was no longer able to leave her apartment without the assistance of her attendants.

"I feel it," said she one day, "that surly Charon is pushing off his bark and waits for me at the sea of Acheron. Do not forget to put the Obolus (penny) under my tongue. The light of my eyes, the flash of which has made hundreds of slaves tremble, will soon be extinguished. Existence here below has no charm for me. Sorrow has one advantage, it frees us from the fear of death."

In this state she had but one wish left—to see Dionysius. He also had an intense desire to see Metella converted before he died, and he was convinced that she would be a pattern for the Christians of Greece; and therefore, he petitioned God to spare her life, for the honor of His Son, and to grant to the much-ried one her health, as well as a believing heart. On his way to Eleusis, he continued his fervent prayer and ascended the steps of Metella's Villa absorbed in meditation. On entering her apartment he found her lying on a sofa apparently at the point of death, and the slaves sobbing round their dying mistress. There was not the grief of hirelings, for she had lately won their tenderest love. Amongst them stood Lydia, a monument of silent resignation.

No one could discover whether Metella was in a swoon or sleep. She lay there like a fallen oak, that once stood proudly on the hill, till the storms came and laid it low.

Dionysius wept as he beheld this fading hope of the Church. Casting himself on his knees, he continued long in prayer, and all the slaves knelt with him. At last he rose as if he had received a command from above. He raised his eyes to Heaven and passed his aged hands noiselessly over the sick bed. The bystanders felt a holy awe, as they saw the trembling hands and uplifted eyes of the saintly man. He then uttered aloud "In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." At these words Metella's eyes opened and a delicate blush suffused her cheeks. She sat up, seized the hand of the Bishop and kissed it. "Oh, I have much to say to you, my venerable friend before I pass away! Faith in the Divinity of Jesus Christ is the broad chasm over which I can find no bridge. Human wisdom has its limits. She can imagine the Divinity, but cannot prove it, because she is human. Oh Dionysius! who will cast this bridge across, if God Himself will not in a wonderful manner let me know Him. Yes, show me the Divine power of miracles of which you have so often spoken, and I will believe—believe as no heart has ever yet believed."

Dionysius replied with a heavenly calm, "God has just given you a proof."

Metella looked round, and could not describe how she felt. All present were trembling, for they saw the wonderful effect of God's power with their own eyes.

She gazed around as if about to ask how she was cured; the saintly man quickly answered her inquiring look. "Not by human, but by Divine aid you have been restored to health." Metella now perceived for the first time, that she had risen as if from the grave, and that a new life had diffused itself through her entire frame. She arose and walked without any assistance.

The astonishment of all present was a pledge to her that she did not dream. She confessed that her lost strength had been restored to her in the name of the Redeemer, and she began to praise and glorify Him. This is the signification of a miracle: that it is performed in the name of Jesus Christ, a proof to man that He fulfils His own promises, and that whatsoever is asked of the Eternal Father in His name shall be granted.

"From this moment I believe!" exclaimed Metella; "yes, I believe that Christ is more than man, and I will preserve this belief to the end of my days." Dionysius made the sign of the cross upon her forehead, she knelt down, and that once proud head bent humbly, and petitioned to be numbered amongst the followers of Jesus Christ, and to receive baptism. It was the custom in the Church from the very commencement, that those who wished to receive baptism, were obliged beforehand, as Tertullian says: to prepare themselves by diligent prayer, fasting, nightly watching, and the confessing of their sins.* Dionysius decided that the Neophyte should be formally received into the Church on the coming Easter eve, and ordered her to prepare for the solemn occasion by religious practices. Every day enriched her in works of perfection, clearer and clearer rose the heavenly truth out of the chaos of her former ideas. God created the world and man through love, and through that same love, He sent His only begotten Son for man's redemption. To allow God to love us, and to love Him in return, form the Heavenly bond on earth, which we call Religion. Love is all the issue, means and aim of all things.

A few days before Easter, Metella assembled her entire household of slaves, and presented them with their freedom; that treasure so much prized by man, and after which many of them had sighed for years, but never had hope of obtaining it in this life. Many of Metella's inferiors had already enjoyed these first fruits springing from the soil of a believing mind. Some returned to their longed for homes, and to their families, but the greater number having no homes, offered their services anew for the same wages as before. As soon as Lydia heard of this gracious act, she was not a moment in doubt as to what she would do. She had already been many years in slavery, and had saved as much of her wages as would have purchased her freedom. With this money she now intended to seek after her mother in distant Rome. Then she resolved, that if her money were insufficient, to offer herself as a substitute for her mother, thereby to release her, and secure to her a quiet evening of life.

Metella asked her one day what her views were for the future, and she answered with an embarrassed air: "It will cost me much to leave my present home, but the duty I owe my mother, requires this sacrifice, and therefore I am resolved on journeying to Rome."

Concealing the indescribable agony that this separation was causing her, Metella, although it appeared to her to be the greatest she could offer, was still willing to lay this sacrifice on the altar of her God. Placing her hand on Lydia's shoulder, she said "Do not let us think of anything sorrowful during these days of peace. I never supposed that so many ties of gratitude and friendship could ever bind me to a single mortal.

"What was I before the grace of God brought you into my house? A foolish creature shining like a gilded statue of the gods, and worshipped by many fools. Indeed I resembled that colossal statue in the Temple of Jupiter at Athens. From without, it appears to be composed of nothing but gold and ivory, and before which each one stands in astonishment and awe, but bend yourself and look into the interior, and what do you there behold? Nothing but wooden rafters, nuts, wedges and clumps, pitch and clay, and a quantity of such stuff, not to say anything of the rats and mice that take up their abode in the vacuum. Such was I, my very dear child, in the hidden depths of my soul. If I am otherwise now, the merit is thine." She broke off the discourse, and hastened to her apartment, deeply affected with gratitude and sorrow.

*Tertullian on Baptism Chapter ix.

As she had been for some time ranked amongst the number of the catechumens, she fulfilled the duties, and sometimes visited the place of meeting at Carloth, where the Christians assembled. It is known that in the first centuries, those who sought to be received into the communion of the Church, were divided into three classes: those of the first class were called "Listeners," because they had only permission to be present at the sermon. Those of the second class were called the "Kneelers," as they knelt for a time after the sermon, to receive the prayers and blessing of the Bishop. The third class were called the "Elect." The last mentioned remained in the church till after the Credo, when at the command of the Deacon, "Go, the mass commences," "Ite missa est" they are obliged to leave.

The spring approached, that time of grace in which the Church celebrates the greatest of her festivals. The resurrection of the Son of God coincides with the resuscitation of dead nature, and the conquest of the heavenly Paradise by the second Adam, is yearly announced by joyful verdant May, which animates again the mountain valley, thicket, brake and forest. This rejoicing of nature strikes in each breast the responding chord, but where is it so vividly and melodiously intoned as where it thaws the ice covering of self, and when a new life of grace begins to bloom over benumbed egotism, when the angels unite themselves as guides, and begin to announce to the awakening soul their songs of the heavenly spheres.

These days, previous to receiving the sacrament of Baptism, Metella summoned all her servants to attend.

It was an ancient custom that on the feast of Saturn in December, and on the first day of the month of August, the slaves were served at table by their masters. Since the death of Metellus, this feast had not been celebrated in Therodron. It was now going to be solemnized in a more touching manner. Our Divine Lord, King of Heaven and earth, had a short time before Easter, prepared a feast for His disciples, and showed himself as the servant of all. He washed their feet and waited on them. In commemoration of this, Metella ordered her servants to sit at table, took, according to the custom of a server, a towel, girt herself therewith and waited on them. The feast at an end, she begged pardon of all in general, and each one in particular whom she had offended through her natural hastiness of temper, and she practiced thereby one of the most beautiful virtues: these acts of humility being most painful to nature, are therefore the most meritorious. It is a noble act to acknowledge our faults, and for a noble action, no one is too noble.

We will now accompany our Neophyte to the threshold of the church at Corinth. There she stands like the lowliest among the petitioners, asking to be received into the communion of the Church. The Bishop reminded the supplicants of the persecution that awaited them on earth, and of the triumph that awaited them in Heaven. He then stepped forward, as in former times Baptisms were only administered by the Bishop, and laid his hand on the head of each, as Ananias did once on the blind Saul, and signed each one on the forehead with the sign of Redemption. As the faithful pronounced the words which a noble Neophyte once said to Philip, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." They then abjured the devil, after which they were exercised and reminded of the words: "Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the Lepers, cast out devils." While repeating the Credo, the Catechumens entered the church, where they were anointed with oil, and they then proceeded to the Baptistry, which in ancient times was very capacious and amply provided with water. Each one was taken separately by a deacon or deaconess and immersed three times: So the expression "Bath of Regeneration" signified in the actual sense of the word, a bath of water. This immersion required fresh garments, and it was then the newly baptised received the white robe, the figure of a spotless soul, and which garment they wore till the eighth day after Easter, which is called, "Dominica in Albis," or the Sunday in white.

Metella was instructed in each particular ceremony, until her regeneration was perfected in water and the Holy Spirit. But the new covenant into which she had just entered, must now be sealed by that most dignified of all mysteries, the Holy Eucharist. "The body of Christ," said Dionysius, and he placed the Blessed Eucharist in her hand. He then took the golden chalice and held it to her lips with the words: "The chalice, or cup of Life" and Metella deemed herself truly blest to drink of the blood of the Redeemer. This heavenly beverage brought her into a new affinity, the blood of the Messiah flowed in her veins. What delight sparkled in her eyes, and what joy diffused itself over her countenance! Her past sufferings and her agonizing doubts were at an end! How rich did not the Faith render her! What life with its sorrowful events had taken, grace had indemnified in rich measure and flowing over. Death deprived her of a husband, and grace bestowed upon her in the Redeemer a heavenly Bridegroom. Death tore from her a dear son, the only hope of her future life, grace opened to her the prospect of being united with him again.

The prayer of the venerable and saintly Dionysius was heard, and the precious soul was, after great wandering, brought into the one true fold. The joy that beamed on his aged countenance expressed the feelings of his heart. He raised his hands on high and invoked a blessing on Metella, and on the humble Lydia, whose virtuous example urged her to seek after, and find the Way, the Truth and the Life.

CHAPTER XVII.

MARCUS AURELIUS' CONQUEST OF THE MARCOMANNI.

WHILE Metella was enjoying this peace of soul, to which she had till then been a stranger, the troops returned from the distant campaign, and were received amidst the rejoicings of the people. In Rome a magnificent triumphal procession was prepared for the Emperor, and in all the other cities of his vast dominions, the conquest was celebrated with public feasts, processions, sacrifices of thanksgivings and bull-fights. Athens also opened its numerous temples, and offered sacrifice. Public games and festivities continued for several weeks, without intermission. The Athenians even thought of introducing the combats of Gladiators, but old Lucian said to them contemptuously, "Don't resolve on this till at least the altar of comiseration be done away with among you." *

Before we relate anything of this memorable conquest, which the Romans gained over the Germans, and which was much more a conquest of Faith than of arms, let us introduce a few remarks on the character of the Emperor. At an early age Marcus Aurelius distinguished himself by the qualities of his mind and heart. He was but a boy of eight years, when he was received into a particular confraternity of priests, in whose society he received his first religious impressions. He always declared himself to be an advocate for public worship, and on that account he is sometimes compared with the pious Numa Pompilius. Once weeping over the death of one of his teachers, to the astonishment of those present, and of which some of the youths complained, the Emperor Antoninus, his adopted father, beautifully replied, "Allow him to be human, neither philosophy nor imperial dignity ought to deprive him of feeling.

In the second year of Antoninus' reign, he married him to his daughter Faustina, and took him shortly after into the consulship. Marcus was but only 26 years old, when the Emperor bestowed upon him the honor of the Tribuneship, and even the Regency, which though not publicly proclaimed, still was actually so. His affection for the Emperor was so ardent, that he never once left him, during the twenty-five years which elapsed from his adoption to his death. He was forty years old when he began first to wield the Roman Sceptre. He was an Emperor favorable to philosophy, and thought with Plato, that those people were happy whose philosophers were kings or whose kings were philosophers. According to the wish of the new Emperor, the Roman Senate took his adopted brother Lucius Verus as colleague, but he troubled himself more about his eating and drinking, than the happiness of the people.

Aurelius was most intent on preserving the old religion and encouraging learning. If he were in anything blameworthy, it was in his great indulgence to his son Commodus, as also towards his wife Faustina, and the absolute authority which he allowed his officials in the provinces, to exercise. Neither can he be exonerated from cruelty during the war with the Marcomanni, some of his officers with their men stood once before him and informed him, that they had killed three thousand of the enemy, and had taken great booty, but as they had received no commands for this, the Emperor ordered them to be crucified for having broken through military discipline. There arose amongst the soldiers loud clamors of displeasure, but the Emperor sprang into the midst of them unarmed, and cried "Well then put me to death, and add a new crime to the one already committed." He also ordered many thousands in Seleucia to be executed during the Parthian war. His reign was a most unquiet one. The Catti, the Marcomanni, the Scythians, and other people were constant disturbers, and in addition several cities in his dominions were desolated either by earthquakes, plagues, or famine. The heathen priests sought in every possible way to appease the anger of the gods, but without effect, and at last, they threw all the blame upon the Christians, who were consequently delivered up to the public persecutions.

Amongst the wars which Marcus Aurelius had conducted, the one against the Marcomanni and Quadi was the most stubborn. No battle that was ever fought since the foundation of Rome, was so remarkable as that over the Marcomanni. The following is a short account of it, and is taken chiefly from Dio Cassius.

In the year A.D. 174, Marcus Aurelius, with his soldiers found himself in the heart of Germany. The barbarians pressed his army into a deep valley, that was surrounded on all sides by quarries and steep rocks, having completely hemmed them in, they ascended the heights and looked down upon them with savage exultation. The courage of the Romans sunk still deeper, as the dreadful effects of the climate added to their distress. They had already been for five days without water, so that they were almost consumed by a burning thirst. In this extreme distress, the commander-in-chief of the Prætorian Cohort sought the Emperor and said to him: "Cæsar, a portion of our troops the Melitani Legion, consists of Christians, to them nothing is impossible." "Let them pray," said the Emperor, and in an instant the Christian soldiers to a man fell upon their knees. They conjured the true God to let His name be known and glorified in that hour. Their prayer was scarcely ended, when dark clouds collected, the thunder rolled in the distance, and peals re-echoed against the rocky walls of their mountain valley. The lightning, in vivid flashes accompanied by a heavy hail storm struck the rocks where the barbarians were posted. The flashes were so terrific, and followed each other in such rapid succession, that in a few minutes the enemy fell into disorder. But in the valley, a soft rain fell upon the parched Romans, who held out their helmets to receive it, and drank in copious draughts of the refreshment sent them from heaven. Dio Cassius, a heathen writer, has assured us that fire and water descended from Heaven at the same time. Our army, said he, was refreshed, the other was consumed; for the water that fell upon the Romans in refreshing showers, fell upon the barbarians with the fire, like boiling oil. Although inundated, they cried loudly for water, and at every attempt made to extinguish the fire they received great injuries. In their despair they cast themselves into the midst of the Romans, where alone the water was drinkable, and the Emperor exercised the greatest clemency towards them."

In memory of this battle, Marcus was proclaimed Emperor for the seventh time. He issued commands, that the Melitani Legion should be called from that time forward the "Legio Fulminatrix" or "Thundering Legion," and not contented with this, he imparted the wonderful event to the Senate, and published an edict whereby he put a stop to the Persecution of the Christians. The edict, the force of which lasted but a short time, is still extant, and it gives us the title of the then Lord of the world.

Imperator Cæsar, Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus, Augustus Par-thicus, Germanicus, Sarmaticus, Pontifex Maximus, Tribunitie Potestatis.

As a memorial of this remarkable battle, the Roman Senate had a colossal pillar erected, on which the event was depicted in bas-relief. On the top was Jupiter with a long beard and extended arms, bearing the thunderbolt in his hands. A little lower down were the two armies, one in disorder, the other pressing forward sword in hand. The pillar is preserved to the present day, and is one of the greatest ornaments of Rome. It stands on the Piazza Colonna, in the northern part of the city, and consists of 28 blocks of marble, which extend to a height of 135 feet. It was restored in the time of Sixtus V., and a statue of St. Paul substituted for that of Jupiter. Peace being concluded with the people of the Danube, the attention of the Emperor was drawn to the province of Syria, where the General Avidius Cassius usurped the imperial purple. He set out immediately for the East, but Cassius had already been murdered by his soldiers. He pacified the provinces, and hastened back through Greece towards Rome, there to celebrate a glorious triumph. In the midst of such a variety of affairs, and during the most fatiguing journeys he wrote "Meditations on Self," in twelve books, which was a rich treasure, containing the moral maxims of life, and which won him the renown of being the most famous of the sages of antiquity. In the first book, he related how he learned to conquer his passions, and particularly anger, from his parents, friends and teachers, and how he labored to attain each virtue. He kept in view, in a most attractive manner, temperance and the reigning virtues of Antoninus Pius, whose adopted son he was. He then offers a rich collection of the most beautiful moral instruction, such as never emanated from the pen of a heathen. Virtue, said he, constitutes the fame, the perfection and the happiness of a nation. Nothing is more dignified than the divinity dwelling within us. As soon as nature has become master of the passions, and knows all that could excite them, she has, according to the words of Socrates, torn herself from that which chains her to sensuality, and charmed, she submits herself to the gods, and has for mankind a tender solicitude. He defines as the original destiny of the soul, knowledge and love of God, to have but one will with God through resignation and a constant practice of virtue. Man must do what is his to do, just as the fig-tree or the bees perform that for which they were destined. A virtuous man never troubles himself about what people say of him, think of him, or do against him, but he is contented when his actions are upright, and accomplishes with love what his vocation requires of him. Free from all excitement he has no other will than the law of God. What a falsehood it is to say, "I will act openly!" What do you mean by that my friend? One must read in your eyes what rests in your soul, just as the lover reads in the eyes of the bride what is passing in her heart. A hypocritical openness or candor is a concealed dagger. One can be a pious man and yet be unknown to all. Never lose sight of this principle, the happiness of life consists in a little. Make use of the short time you have. Yet a little while and the time that is given you to do good, will have passed away. Perform each action as if you were to die at the same moment. It sits badly on a wise man to express a talkative contempt for death.

Through the entire collection of his moral maxims, Marcus Aurelius<sup>A</sup> showed that he was far nearer to Christianity than he himself imagined.

CHAPTER XVIII.

LYDIA'S DEPARTURE.

In the first days of May, a season in which the southern climate pours forth its blessings, the Greeks begin, according to the ancient heathen custom, to prepare for their processions in honor of their gods on all the cross-ways, to petition for a plentiful harvest.

Wherever a statue was to be found, either in the cross-streets or in the fields, there the people assembled in holiday attire, to make their offerings. This feast was called the Compitalia, because it was held in the cross-ways (in Compitis). Metella and Lydia, who had just returned from Eleusis, were standing at a window, and looking down upon the altars of offerings and on the pagan processions. Before the portico of the house, a servant is seen arranging luggage for a journey; on the opposite side of the olive groves, in the distant harbor, flutter the pennant and flags of a large merchant vessel, which is preparing to set sail in the evening, and is the one destined to carry Lydia to Rome in search of her mother.

"Good child," said Metella, "I was lately at the cemetery of Kerameikos visiting my father's grave, and my thoughts turned on the change and trials of my eventful life. I reflected on the melancholy hours that the future promised me and could have wished to lame the wings of time, to postpone this our separation for a little longer. While thus thinking and wishing my eyes fell upon the trunk of a pine-tree, on the bark on which I perceived something inscribed. On a closer inspection I discovered it to be the initials of my beloved son's name, and from each letter the gum of the tree fell down in golden tears. This made me feel your departure doubly heavy. Every one whom I prize leaves me: father, husband, son and friend, and I hope also to depart soon, and then at last I shall find a resting place. But one thought comforts me, that perhaps a great joy awaits you, when you again meet your mother. O tell her that I was often very unkind to you, that I often grieved you and not seldom treated you badly. But you must not refuse me two requests, they are the most earnest I have ever made. The first is, that you accept the means for your journey. The distance is great, and the time of your sojourn in Rome very uncertain. I have placed amongst your effects a sum of money, sufficient, not only for yourself, but to purchase your mother's freedom, which when you have purchased, then my beloved child—and this is my second petition—return with her to Athens, and you shall spend happy days with me." "I know," continued Metella, "that you have a longing to return to your native land, but for a widow who has much sorrow, Christian friendship will not hesitate to deny itself a satisfaction in the cause of charity."

Lydia took the hands of her mistress reverently within her own, and lifting her eyes to Heaven, sobbed forth: "May God bless you according to the goodness of your noble heart! Nothing but the duty I owe to my beloved mother, could sanction this separation, and nothing but death, dear mistress, shall prevent our return." At this moment Duranus struck the hour, and Metella and Lydia retired to the oratory to pass the last moment together in prayer.

In the Lararium the lamp burned, as in former years, but the protecting house gods had disappeared, and their place was occupied by the true and living God, Jesus Christ, under the species of bread. An emblematic picture concealed the tabernacle, wherein reposed the treasure of the faithful, for it was allowed to the early Christians, to keep in their own homes the Heavenly Manna, particularly in troubled times, and to commune themselves. Metella advanced reverentially towards the tabernacle, opened it, and drew aside the curtain that concealed the Holy of Holies. From the tabernacle shone a silver dove, whose wings were raised as if in flight, and the breast was richly set with sparkling diamonds. Within this, was the Holy Eucharist, and near it was lying a reliquary and chain of gold, the centre of the case was set with one magnificent large pearl. "In this little reliquary," said Metella, "I have enclosed a portion of the Sacred Bread. May our God accompany you on the waves, and protect you from the scoffs of the heathens!" At these words, she placed the chain round Lydia's neck and concealed the case in the bosom of her dress.

Lydia observed the pearl, and drawing forth the reliquary again, kissed it and said to her mistress; "It is a thought full of meaning, that you to the gold which encloses the great pearl of divine love, have added on the exterior, a pearl, as a type of the interior. But dearest mistress, it is the most costly of all your jewels, and perhaps a remembrance from your ancestors, may I return it?"

"Do so," replied Metella, "in Rome, if the price of thy mother's freedom will not be so great as I expect, but thou hast merited infinitely more, as you have led me to that field in which I discovered the great pearl of our holy Faith. I was as a beaten way," continued she sighing, "till your prayers and tears loosened the soil, and placed within its bosom the seeds of faith. I was a cast-off piece of rough marble, in which a noble image slumbered, but which could only be brought to light by a good chisel. Dearest child, thou art that chisel, never to be forgotten. The artist that guided it is the Creator of the world, who formed the body of Eve, and placed it at the head of the creation. Blow after blow fell upon thee, thou patient instrument, and upon me the hard unformed stuff. Still the longer our martyrdom lasts, the nearer we are to its completion. Now the work is finished, therefore the chisel is to be put back to enjoy its well merited rest."

After a most affectionate embrace, and with heart-felt thanks, Lydia tore herself from the arms of her benefactress. She departed from Athens after having passed in it ten eventful years. Metella ascended the pergula to have a last look at the dear traveler. The sun sinking in the west, cast a rich glow on the distant Piræus; a soft evening breeze rose, and gently swelled the sails of the vessel.

Lydia was accompanied to the harbor by several of the domestics, all of whom loved her tenderly; and close to her side, was the faithful Ophne, whose loquacity never ceased, till they reached the harbor, nor would it then, had not the noise and confusion attracted her attention. The sailors were putting all in order, some were hauling in the ropes and unfurling sufficient sail, while one with more authority than the rest, calls those to order who have the care of stowing in the luggage, to keep a sharp look out for goods still left on the landing place. A tight little fellow, although one of the crew, slips from the labor and confusion to a distant part of the ship to hold converse with a friend on the opposite side of the water, which seemed no easy task, as their questions and answers were almost drowned by the noisy waves and the freshening breeze. The hour for departure at length arrives, and the sailors are busting to and fro, shouting with all their might, to tighten up and clear decks. The farewells were of a varied description. A mother could be seen parting with her only son, and in floods of tears, invoking for him the protection of the gods. Husbands taking leave of their wives and families, to seek in foreign land a support for them, which was denied at home. Men were amongst the number, who by their countenances clearly showed, that loss and gain were the sum total of their existence here. They were alone, for when the heart is absorbed in the goods of this life, it closes itself against the tender ties of family and friends. Wealth is their god, and sacrifice is made to the deity of their sordid minds.

The principal passengers consisted of rich merchants, trading between Greece, Rome and Italy. Jews also, with their merchandize and invalid Greeks, who then, as now, sought the restoration of their health in the balmy climate of Malta. Lydia joined herself to some Christian families who were bound for Rome. The decks being cleared, the trumpet blew the signal for departure, and Lydia waved a last adieu to her friends on shore.

"A happy journey," screamed out little Ophne, "and a quick return;" and she dried up her falling tears, and returned pensively to the palace, regretting the loss of her dear friend. The second signal sounded, and loosed from its moorings, the vessel floated on with swelling sail. They anchored at Delos. This island of the Grecian Archipelago, and so famous in ancient history, is said to have been at one time a floating island. Being the birthplace of Apollo and Diana, it was always held sacred on that account by the pagans; and used as an asylum for all living creatures. In the distance was lovely Syra, rising above the blue waters, like a citadel on a rock. This friendly and well-known island, famous in ancient times for its commerce, has even in our own days become a place of staple commodities. From Delos the ship sailed by the most southern point of the Morea, so called from "Morus," a mulberry tree, which abounds in that part of Greece, and is appropriated to the support of the silk-worm. They then struck out on the high seas in the direction of the distantly situated Malta.

During the last months, the crowd of circumstances in Lydia's life had so oppressed her, that she was glad to be alone and unobserved, that she might recall to her mind the events that had so quickly followed in succession. She would sit for hours on the deck, apparently watching the foaming waters, but her mind was far distant, and busily occupied taking a retrospective view of the chequered scenes of her own eventful life. How much richer was she now in experience, after having passed through such a school of affliction! At the time she was captive in Smyrna every pulse throbbed for martyrdom. Now experience taught her, that there was a still greater martyrdom than that of the sword or fire; and that to a certain extent, her life as a slave had been nothing but a continued one, which had ended in the conquest of the Faith. How unmistakable did the loving dispensations of Providence present themselves before her mind! She had been appointed as an humble instrument towards the conversion of one of the most illustrious women of Athens. God had prepared this soul to embrace Christianity by the death of her husband and son—trials over which her wealth had no control, but these drew her to the possession of that which neither temporal prosperity nor the gifts of the mind could purchase for her—the one Faith. The human heart has a necessity to communicate with those after death whom it loved in life, and this communication is only possible when the benefit is in the immortality of the soul. This was the first motive that attracted Metella towards conversion. But what Christianity was, and in what manner it was to be practised in order to prepare man for a supernatural life, she learned from her slave. At length God showed her the truth of His revealed Religion, by His holy servants, and confirmed the doctrine of the same by the wonderful interference of His own divine power.

If a voyage be long, and for the greater part monotonous, how can a meditative mind fail for a subject, when it beholds in the immeasurable waters of the deep, the beauties of nature in their wildest form. The sea itself gives ample scope for contemplation. Is it not in its calm, as well as in its loud anger, in its immeasurable extent, as well as in its unfathomable depths, a type of the Divinity? And is not the vessel that sails on the bosom of the waves, between the blue firmament and the yawning unknown abyss, a figure of man who wanders through life between the heaven of grace and the depths of depravity?

When the great luminary of the day sinks in the West and leaving to the wide expanse of Heaven his reflective rays, almost as varied in color as the rainbow, does it not give the soul a longing desire to wing its flight above, and bask in the eternal sunshine of its Creator!

What loving soul that has ever gazed on the starry Heavens, when on the sea, can say that he was ever more deeply impressed with the majesty of God and his own nothingness, that at such a moment? He is as a mite on the face of the waters, wondering at the immensity of its Creator. It seems as though the soul would burst its earthly bondage, soar on high, and mingle with the starry host. That milky way where the stars roll as in a cloud of vapor, draws our mind along, higher and higher, until it arrives at the palace of the Almighty. It is only a heart full of faith that can appreciate all this. Just as in the darkness of night, a million of worlds appear to man, which by the dazzling light of day are to Him invisible, so, dispensations of the power and wisdom of God disclose themselves to the single eye of the believer, in the hidden darkness of life, a government of which the enlightened mind of the wise ones of the world has not the slightest conception.

The passengers could as yet see nothing of lovely Malta, save the tops of the sloping hills that were just appearing above the horizon. As they approached nearer, its steep and rugged coast excited no small degree of alarm among the passengers. On those rocks, thought Lydia, the vessel that was conveying the great St. Paul as prisoner to Rome, was shattered by a storm, leaving its crew pensioners on the bounty and hospitality of its benevolent inhabitants, who first looked upon the great Apostle as a murderer, on seeing a viper cling to his arm, but on beholding him cast the reptile from him, into the fire, without his having received any injury, they looked upon him as a god. While the vessel anchored, to land the passengers destined for the island, Lydia felt a strong desire to place her foot upon a soil hallowed by the presence and miracles of such an illustrious convert; but as she could not gratify this laudable desire, she implored the protection of the Saint for the remainder of the journey to that renowned city, where he was twice imprisoned, and sealed his labors by his martyrdom. As the vessel receded from the shore, Lydia gazed on the watery element that lay before her, and never did the Providence of God appear to her greater than at that moment, when she reflected that a number of human beings were assembled together in a fragile vessel, moving upon the face of the unfathomable waters, with nothing but a few planks between them and eternity. Land had again entirely disappeared, and nothing could be seen but the blue vault of Heaven, closed in on every side of the horizon by the expansive waters. A few birds of passage were the only living creatures to be met with—untiring travelers! they cut through the air and seek but a moment's rest, on either the masts of the vessel or a water-plant. Unworn as these birds does time also fly, and when we think he lingers with us, we find ourselves carried away by him much quicker.

In Syracuse, the passengers received a more exact account of the glorious conquest by the Emperor, and the soldiers returning home to Sicily, lauded Marcus for his extraordinary generosity in bestowing presents on the troops. Between hope and fear, the vessel anchored off the eastern coast of Sicily, where not far distant, rose in gigantic heights the imposing Ætna, which sent forth in deep draughts, black clouds of smoke in graceful curls, darkening the blue ether. Pretty little barks, with their dazzling sails, were to be seen in numbers floating by, and stopping at the several places of their destination along the shore. Dolphins bounded over the surface of the waters touching the sides of the vessel in their playful gambols. Higher up, the anchor was dropped at the famous city of Catania, so beautifully situated at the foot of mount Ætna, and which to this day, ranks as one of the elegant cities of Europe, though it has frequently suffered from the volcanic eruptions of its majestic neighbor. Having landed the passengers bound for that city, they steered their course to the Straits, this passage so much dreaded by the ancients, but through which they passed in safety, and leaving a cluster of islands to the West, found themselves again on the broad water, making rapid sail for the coast of Italy. They passed by the matchless bay of Naples, with its city partly seated on the declivity of a hill, and its broad shores studded with beautiful villas and lovely gardens, presenting an unrivaled assemblage of the picturesque and beautiful, and bearing a strong contrast to the rugged Vesuvius in the background.

Few voyages could present more interesting variety, than the one our travelers had just completed, and yet it was with joy that they saw themselves nearing their destination.

Those for Rome were landed at Ostia, a distance from Rome of fourteen miles, and Lydia for the first time set foot on Italian soil. After having passed a day at Ostia, she proceeded to Rome by land. The nearer she approached its walls, the more intense became her feelings, an alternate hope and fear agitated her breast. With a holy awe she approached that city, which was even then the center of the Christian world. And who would not feel a more than ordinary interest on finding himself in the city of the Cæsars? Rome, as a late writer on this "Eternal City," expresses himself in one of his works, is the mysterious link between the two worlds, wherein is represented the history of man under the influence of paganism and of Christianity; and as on earth all rivers flow towards the ocean, so run in the divine, as in the human order, all events of the ancient, as well as of the modern history, out of one city, and this city is Rome. Rome can therefore say of itself, "I am the world!"

CHAPTER XIX.

THE TRIUMPHAL PROCESSION.

WHEN Lydia landed in Italy, she heard that the Emperor, who had already returned from the campaign, had, after a short stay, departed again, accompanied by his wife, Faustina, on a visit to the East; but was expected back to Rome in a few days. On his arrival he was to celebrate his conquest over the barbarians. The feast promised to be one of extraordinary magnificence; first, because he had been so little in Rome for the last eight years, and secondly, that on his recent journey to the East, he had suffered a misfortune in the sudden death of his wife Faustina, who met her fate at the foot of the Taurus mountains. The sympathy of Rome upon the death of this woman, renowned for wickedness, was in the exterior only, for in private they congratulated themselves upon the happy event.

Marcus Aurelius gave himself up to intense grief, and had a temple built in her honor.

The Emperor was waited for by the Consuls and Prætors in Brundisium, one of the most renowned seaports of Calabria.

Thus Rome, "City of the World," expected with impatience and anxiety, from one day to another, the arrival of its Emperor.

A violent storm was the cause of the delay, which, as the historians relate, placed the vessels in the most imminent danger. Commodus, the Emperor's son, was at that time sixteen years old, and for his age, remarkably tall and robust. He and his eldest sister Lucilla, the young widow of Verus, went to meet their father, with a numerous retinue, and congratulated him at Præmeste. In this very place he invested his son with the dignity of the Tribuneship, and commanded that he should stand beside him on the golden chariot during the triumphal procession.

Upon the Campus Vaticanus in Rome, where now stands the Pope's Palace, the procession was arranged. All the Senators had assembled there to receive the Emperor. Behind them were numerous animals for sacrifice, white bulls with gilt horns. The spoils of war were dragged along—then came the inscriptions, and figurative representations of the generals and the conquered Germans. Then followed the unhappy captives, who were brought to Rome, when the campaign had terminated. "Have you already heard," was the saying; "that it is actually true, what Tacitus relates, that Helusians and Oxioners, have heads and faces of men, but that the remainder of the body is a wild animal? Come let us see them!"

Bands of musicians were filling up the time with their drums and fifes, and changing alternately with the singers. The Lictors then arrived in their purple tunics, and their fasces were entwined with laurels; they took their places immediately behind the captives. A great company of jesters filled up the rear, and immediately before the triumphal chariot, which was unoccupied, stood rows of priests attired in all their festive solemnity, and carrying the insignia of their gods, the vessels for sacrifice and for incense. Masses of people from the city and from the country, forced themselves into all the elevated positions where could be had a clear view. The field of Mars, as well as the Vatican Hills on the other side of the Portus Triumphalis, then the hill of Marius, the bridges and all the surrounding heights were crowded with spectators. The public places where the procession touched at, and the windows of the houses in those streets through which it passed, were filled with people of all ranks.

The musicians commenced anew, when a hollow sound, that aroused attention, passed through the dense crowd, and shouts reached them from the distance announcing the arrival of the conqueror.

"Io Triumphe! triumphe!" cried out the people.

"Vita et victoria magno Imperatori." Life and victory to the great Emperor!

The triumphal car was drawn by richly caparisoned elephants. Marcus Aurelius wore a purple mantle bordered with gold, and a toga embroidered with stars. He held in the left hand an ivory sceptre headed with the Roman eagle, and in the right, a palm-branch. The crown that encircled his brow was of gold and precious stones, and made so as to represent laurel leaves. Commodus was dressed precisely similar.

A herald went on before, commanding silence, and behind him were boys who sung the song of triumph, and men repeated each time the last words of the strophe. The hymn lauded the bravery, the paternal care, and the immortality of their divine ruler.

The car had not yet reached the triumphal arch, when young Commodus was seen looking several times up at the heights of the newly built Moles Adriani, now called Angel's mount and laughingly drew his father's attention to a sight that presented itself there. It was Brutus Præsa's with his daughter Crispina, who occupied magnificent seats under the imperial tents. The daughter, who was about thirteen years old, uttered a cry of joy as the procession approached, and waved a flag unceasingly, until she drew upon her the eyes of Commodus. But when she saw his face painted with vermilion,* she burst into loud laughter, and ran to conceal herself behind her father. That very Crispina was Rome's future Empress, and was married a short time after to Commodus. How little did she suspect at the time, what her fate would be! †

The more the Emperor and his son enjoyed the scene, the more did the African, who stood behind the Cæsars, fulfil his duty. According to the ancient custom, a slave, who held in his hand a golden crown, and who stood behind the car, had to call out frequently during the procession: "Remember that thou art mortal."

As the African crown-bearer repeated these words several times in the ear of Commodus, he pushed him back in his rough manner, with the words: "I am no common mortal."

The procession had turned round the Via Triumphalis, where Adrian's Mausoleum could no longer be seen. But tears so bitter as those that fell from the captives, the soil of Rome had seldom drunk. That the pain and sacrifice of a tedious war, should end for them in such disgrace! The captives walked along carrying on their arms heavy chains, and derided and mocked by the most flighty and contemptible men in the world. Their dark blue eyes shaded with bushy eyebrows, were cast to the earth, and only raised to throw an expression of the deepest hatred on their deriders. Their auburn hair flowed proudly down their muscular backs in natural curls. Their national costume, a simple woollen mantle, or the skin of a beast fastened on the breast with a buckle or strong clasp, increased their Herculean appearance. Young Commodus almost envied them, as he liked so much to be compared with Hercules. ‡ Some of the barbarian generals and princes had on a richer costume, and by their mien, and every motion of their body, showed the proud national feeling that pervaded their whole frame. Women and children were also amongst the captives. The women wore the same costume as the men, except that some of them were clothed in white linen, which here and there was colored fancifully with red. Their garments closed tightly round their shoulders, leaving part of their arms uncovered. §

The cries of the children were most touching, and they were clinging closely to their mothers and calling for help, thereby redoubling the pain of their parents. To increase the hatred of their captives, there was a pantomimist, who in the midst of leapers and jesters, ornamented with golden chains and manacles, mimicked the gestures of the barbarians. The grinding of their teeth, the thrusting with their clenched fists, and the whining of their children. He runs first before, and then behind, depending upon the protection of the Lictors. On the bridge crossing the Tiber, one of the scoffers got a blow from an iron chain in his face with such force, that the blood streamed down, and he had to thank his red mantle for not being himself a subject of laughter. No wonder that the cithern and pipe players who surrounded the pantomimist, moderated their leaping. What was taken from the enemy in helmets, arms and vessels of the temple, in gold and bronze, was of little value. Amongst their arms, the native spear of the conquered excited some attention. It was of small, short, but very sharp iron. The shields were also considered remarkable, because of their form and rare variety of ornaments.

The distinguished Romans, who accompanied the triumphal car, were a cheerful contrast to the despairing gloom of the captives. Immediately behind the nobles, the cohorts of the victorious soldiers followed; the foot and cavalry were crowned with wreaths. They sing songs in praise of their arms, and seize the wine and delicate morsels which were now and then offered them by the nobles. Whatever houses the procession passed, were ornamented with garlands, flowers, and tapestry, on which the initials of the Emperor's name were richly embroidered. The cries "Io triumphe! Vivant Patres Patriæ! Triumph! triumph to the father of the fatherland!" echoed from all sides. *

The pavement of the different streets was thickly strewn with flowers, so that Rome resembled a flower-garden. In addition to this, the air was heavy with perfume, for from every temple the incense rose in clouds, but from the Pantheon of Agrippa, and from the Capitoline Hill it was dense.

The Emperor was so affected at his reception, that he called out to the people several times; "This is the happiest day of my life!" and he kissed the golden Bull that hung upon his neck as a preservative against envy.

At the foot of the Capitol a large statue of Faustina was erected, before which the procession halted, and the Emperor descended from the car of triumph and offered incense. Then he ascended the marble steps of Jupiter Capitolinus; when ascending the Moor presented him with the golden crown and the conqueror laid it at the feet of Jupiter with the words: "The gods have conquered; to Jupiter Pluvius belongs the crown."

The animals that followed in the procession were here offered in sacrifice. At the same moment sacrifices commenced in all the other temples. The procession at an end, the feasting commenced. On this, and on the following days, public festivities of all sorts were celebrated, whereby old and young, high and low, and particularly the common people, gave themselves up to all sorts of gaming, and the most far fetched revelling and gormandizing in the customary way, and which were indigenuous to the Roman people. The plays, says an ancient writer, which the Emperor had provided for the people, were magnificent, and at one of them appeared not less than a hundred lions for combat. Notwithstanding his great efforts to make himself pleasing to all, still he opposed them in their desire of gladiatorial combats. He took their swords, and exchanged them for the rapier, and maintained that they could prove their skill equally with them, and that the murders would be less frequent.

The feast was concluded by Marcus making presents to the people. No Emperor in fact, held them in so much consideration as he did. He mentioned in a speech to them his several years' absence from Rome, and some who were listening to him, held up eight fingers and called out, "eight years." The Emperor gave immediate orders for each one present to receive eight pieces of gold of the value of a ducat, in remembrance of those † Crispina was later banished to the island of Capri, and there murdered.

‡ When Emperor Commodus called himself the "Roman Hercules," ran about at night dressed in the skin of a Lion, and struck all those he met, with a club.

§ Tacitus Germ. a. m.

* Young Commodus, nearly a year later, as Marcus Aurelius had him titled Augustus and partner in the government, received from the senate, the honorable title of "Father of the Fatherland," a title of which he was as unworthy as the Senate who conferred it. How Commodus, who was sole Emperor at 18 years old treated the Senate, can be seen by the following example: Once he killed a bird in the Amphitheatre, cut off its head and returned to his seat with his bloody sword; then he showed the head of the bird to the Senators, who were sitting near him, and gave them by menaces to understand that he would treat their heads so. Dio Cassius who relates the circumstance, sat under them, and declares they could only suppress their laughter at the comic scene, by stuffing their mouths with the leaves of their laurel wreaths, which they pulled from their hair. The laughter would have cost them their lives.

eight years. The provincial towns, as Dio Cassius remarks, and particularly Smyrna, that had just risen from its ashes, were richly gifted by the Emperor. Through such munificence, the coffers of Marcus Aurelius were so much exhausted, that at last he had no money. He therefore put up his imperial jewels, his plate, and even Faustina's jewels and wardrobe for public sale.

Inasmuch as Marcus Aurelius gained the favor of his people, by his generosity, and as much as he labored to establish his dignity, so much the more was Commodus hated by them: so that all the intentions and labors of the noble father were wrecked on the worthlessness of the son. He was wanton, cruel, unjust, and rapacious, and in every respect bore a striking resemblance to his tyrannical and depraved predecessor, Domitian, and his greatest ambition was to be styled: "The conqueror of a thousand gladiators." Commodus' wicked career was terminated by a sudden and violent death, in the thirty-first year of his age, after a reign of thirteen years.

CHAPTER XX.

LYDIA IN SEARCH OF HER MOTHER.

LUCIAN remarked once in speaking of the Christians; "It is scarcely to be believed, how these men, so indifferent to the duties of the state, can run, the moment the neck of one of their own sect is in danger; they assemble together like ants to save him. They are persuaded that they are immortal in soul and body, and are taught to believe that they are all brothers."

How could it be difficult under such circumstance for one of their faith, entering the imperial city as a stranger, to find a hospitable reception with sympathizing brothers.

Even as it is to this day, where the members of that community settle themselves near the church, so we find that the Christians of that time placed themselves near the sanctuary, and that too on the east side of the city.

The Viminal Hill could perhaps be called the first spot where a colony of Christians settled. "Already in the time of the Apostles there were in Rome, places consecrated to God; by some called oratories, by others churches, where, on every first day of the week, a meeting took place, and the Christians who prayed there, heard the word of God, and received Communion."*

At the foot of the Viminal, stood the church, called the "Church of the Shepherd." In this church, which was afterwards called St. Pudentiana, St. Peter had officiated a hundred years previous, and there celebrated the sacred mysteries. S. S. Peter and Paul, during their sojourn in Rome, converted to Christianity the Senator Pudens and his daughters, and those two daughters, Pudentiana and Praxedes, who clung to the Faith with a holy zeal, appropriated, not only their dwelling places, but the entire of their fortunes to religious purposes.

At this day, eighteen hundred years later, strangers find in Rome, not far from the famous Basilica of S. Maria Maggiore, two churches called St. Pudentiana and St. Praxedes.

Although Lydia was a stranger in Rome, still she found in the above mentioned oratories several Christians, who with the greatest kindness assured her of their services, for they were at that time as in the Apostles; "One heart and one soul." She hastened to impart to her first acquaintance, how her mother had been torn from her several years back, at Smyrna, that she was a Christian, and her name Charitana, and that she was probably a slave in Rome. The number of the Christians was then so great, that it would have been difficult in so large a city, to find a slave, who had in all probability changed her former name. Besides the rich families were, for the most part, in the country during the summer months, seeking change of air either in the mountains or at the sea-side, where they were attended by the greater number of their domestics.

Lydia resolved to remain in Rome, and to seek her mother unceasingly until she had found her, or till she had received certain news of her fate.

She was told that in a few days the feast of St. Magdalen would be celebrated, and that for this purpose, many of the Christians would assemble in the Catacombs near the Appian Way, for divine service, and that she would probably then receive more certain news of Charitana.

At these words Lydia's countenance brightened, and she felt herself the happiest of mortals, and imagined herself already in the embraces of her dear mother, from whom she had been so long separated. This hope did not deter her from making inquiries of all the Christians she met, asking them if they had seen or heard anything of Charitana. She went first of all to a pious and wealthy matron, named Felicitas, to whom she was recommended by Bishop Dionysius, and was received by her as if she had belonged to the renowned family of this much-trying woman. The circumstance that she was the daughter of one sold on account of her Faith, was a sufficient recommendation. Felicitas promised that she would introduce her to the Roman Bishop, Soter, at the next meeting of the faithful, and added that perhaps he could give her some intelligence.

We will now accompany the Christians to the nightly meeting, which on the above named day took place in the Catacombs in the Appian Way. It is two hours past midnight, and Rome is sunk in sleep, but here and there can be seen a straggler who had been tempted to linger with his dissolute companions, far beyond the hour prescribed by usage. Approaching footsteps echoed along the deserted streets, and some females from the house of a wealthy Roman solicitor, Minutius Felix, were wending their way in profound silence along the Esquiline hill, and passed the Coliseum. This gigantic structure, erected by order of Vespasian, is said to have been built in one year, by the forced labor of 12,000 Jews and Christians. It consisted of three orders of architecture, the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian, and was sixteen hundred and twelve feet in circumference. It contained eighty arcades, and was capable of accommodating a hundred thousand spectators. Their road led to the new and extensive baths built by Antoninus, and then across to the Via Appia towards the Almo river. The females to the left, advanced towards some villas in the valley of Egeria, where were some monuments to the departed Romans, and a temple to the Deus Ridiculus.

The pious company had not yet reached the Catacombs, when Lydia interrupted the long silence of her companions by remarking: "I wonder if I shall see my mother again in this world! Now that I expect to hear something of her, I feel myself oppressed with an unusual heaviness and anxious sorrow. Our wandering here in the first dawn of morning, as well as the tombs here in the Appian Way, yes the memory of the saint herself, whose feast we are going to celebrate—all remind me of the journey of those holy women, who before it was yet day, departed from Jerusalem to visit the sepulchre of our Redeemer. Perhaps our way will also lead to a grave."

"Why such melancholy thoughts," interrupted Felicitas, "remember that Magdalen found Him living, whom she sought in the grave. We are also going to the graves of the saints, who lie in the Catacombs, and perhaps you will find her whom you seek amongst the dead, also living." The nearer she approached the entrance, the more animated became the streets which led to the subterraneous churches. Christians from all parts were assembling at that early hour to join in the solemn service. The women passed through a door to the subterraneous streets and to the last resting places of so many thousands of the faithful departed. A youth was keeping a careful watch at the door, and offered them a taper. The air was thick and oppressive, which the heat of summer did not tend to lessen, and the smell of mouldering bodies was scarcely to be borne. The grey walls of the alternately small and large passages, which crossed each other a hundred times, were full of apertures in the form of open coffins, some of these apertures which were carried up on each side in several tiers were covered with stone slabs, on each of which was an inscription in Latin or Greek. In some places a little earthen vessel was placed before the inscription, a sign that a martyr rested there. There were in several places, sacred emblems under the inscriptions, such as a deer thirsting for water, or a pair of palm branches, or a ship in full sail. On many of the slabs the initials of our Lord's name could be seen.

They had already gone through several of these subterranean passages, when at length the sound of music fell upon their ears. Further on, the space widened, and a subterranean church, lighted up with lamps and wax lights, opened to their view. The length of the church was considerable, and contained two divisions, one for the clergy and men, the other for the females.

At the conclusion of the singing, an aged priest advanced towards the altar, and turning from the people, commenced the divine sacrifice. The arrangements of the prayers were for the most part then, as they are now. After the holy sacrifice, a great number of those present retired to an adjacent hall, to hand to the Bishop charitable gifts, or to consult on the affairs of the faithful. Lydia had looked round in vain to see if her mother were among the number of those present. Felicitas turned to one of the Deacons, and begged his permission to speak to the aged priest who had just celebrated Mass. Her request was granted, and she informed him that a Christian from Smyrna had arrived in search of her mother, who was also a Christian, and named Charitana, and after whom she had up to the present, made fruitless inquiries. At this, joy and pain were alike depicted on the priest's countenance, for he doubted not being able to give the information she required. The young stranger stood motionless before him. Her eye anxiously fixed upon every movement of his lips. She expected that the thousand conjectures which had so often harassed her mind were now about to be confirmed. "O thou happy child!" said the old man, "happy in having been in the school of St. Polycarp, and threefold happy, because thou art the daughter of a Saint!"

His voice began to falter which Felicitas perceiving, understood at once what was to follow, and turned aside to conceal her emotion. Lydia did not understand the meaning of his words, her heart beat violently as the old man rose and motioned to them to follow him. They went through long passages that crossed each other at intervals, till they came to one somewhat wider; here the priest stood still. He brushed away a tear, and motioned to Lydia to approach. With deep emotion he drew her attention to a square stone, upon which the light of the torch fell, and helped her to perceive though indistinctly, the name of her beloved mother.

"Charitana the martyr lies here, as a Saint among the Saints. She died on the Ides of April. Rejoice in the Lord and pray for us!"

Lydia read the inscription and turned with a look full of vague sorrow towards Felicitas. Her eyes betrayed a doubt as to whether she was not mistaken; and looking at her friend, she suddenly uttered a loud scream that echoed through the vaults, and cast herself convulsively into the arms of Felicitas where she remained motionless for some minutes. At last she began to realize her position. She was standing at the grave of her mother, Charitana; in that very hour in which she had hoped to find her living, she had found her tomb. A phial of the martyr's blood stood near the slab. What hast thou not to suffer much tried daughter, before thy body sinks beneath the burden of thy trials! Thou camest from Athens to Rome to seek thy long lost mother, and thou hast found nothing but her tomb. O! that thou also couldst rest here in peace! Faith and affection struggled within her, affection grieved at not having her beloved mother on earth, but Faith rejoiced at her triumph. The latter conquered and the daughter sank upon her knees and pressed her hands on the stone that covered the remains of all she held most dear. Many and strong were the feelings that agitated her heart—sorrow and pity struggled for mastery, but the joy that the departed one had gained the crown of Martyrdom, silenced every emotion. At that time, as well as now, a lively faith penetrated the hearts of the believers, and the separation between the living and the dead did not appear so dreadful. Fervent Christians considered a good death as the greatest gift from God, and what can any one wish for those he loves, more than the possession of the highest of all gifts, God Himself!

Therefore, great as Lydia's joy would have been, had she found her mother amongst the living, still she was no less delighted that she had suffered death for the Faith, by which she had secured the immediate possession of God. Charitana as we have already related, was shipped for Rome on the night of the earthquake of Smyrna, and was there purchased by a former Prefect. As long as the persecution was quiet, Crescentius would not betray that she was a Christian.

The philosopher Justin wrote a letter of defence about this time, and addressed it to Marcus Aurelius and the Senate. Soon after he was cast into prison, together with several other Christians. Crescentius, in order to ingratiate himself with the Proconsul Rusticus, sent his slave Charitana to him, telling him that he might do with her what he liked. The Proconsul ordered Charitana, whose strength was already greatly impaired by anxiety, to be sent to the same prison with the other Christians. When Justin with six of his companions in the Faith was brought before the Judge, he commenced speaking, and declared openly and frankly that they would preserve their Faith to their last breath. To offer sacrifice to the gods as the Emperor had commanded, Justin held to be in opposition to the commands of the Redeemer. Rusticus questioned him as to what sort of learning occupied him. Justin gave the answer that is to be found in the acts of martyrdom, "I exerted myself to attain knowledge of all sorts but as I could not therein find the truth, I at last devoted myself to Christian philosophy, although it displeases those who allow themselves to be blinded by errors and prejudice. I glory in it, because it has afforded me the advantage of walking in the way of truth."

When asked by the Prefect about the place where the Christians usually assembled, he answered: "They assemble when and where they can. Our God is not bound to any certain place, as He is invisible, and fills Heaven and earth, He is praised and worshipped in all places."

The Judge put similar questions to the others who were imprisoned with Justin, and they all answered that they were Christians by the mercy of God. "Are you convinced," said the Proconsul, turning to Justin, "that you will ascend to Heaven if you be scourged from head to foot?" Justin answered in the affirmative. "Our sufferings will hasten our happiness, and carry us to that judgment-seat before which all will have to appear." The others added: "It is useless to keep us longer waiting. We are Christians and will never sacrifice to the gods."

As the Prefect saw that they persevered undauntedly in their refusal, he condemned them to be first scourged, and then, according to the Roman method, he commanded them once more to sacrifice to the gods: but they all refused. The martyrs were then led to the place of execution where they received their glorious crowns.

Justin had already fallen, and five of his companions had shared his fate, leaving Charitana alone standing in the blood of her companions. She bent her head to the earth, in all humility, crossed her arms upon her breast and remained in prayer. As she returned no answer to the many questions put to her by the judge, Rusticus gave a sign to the executioner, and immediately his rough hand seized her fainting form by the shoulder, cast her to the ground, and in a moment her head lay severed from her body.

The legends have preserved to us the names of these six martyrs who suffered with Justin, and they are: Charitana, Euclipistus, Hierax, Pæon, Liberianus, and Chariton. The year of this event is given as A. D. 167—13th of April. Justin is honored by the Greeks on the 1st of June.

After this short digression let us return again to the grave of Charitana. He who led her daughter to it, is already departed to join the meeting which was usual after the sacrifice. He is no other than the kind and pious Pope, Soter, who is like the Good Shepherd in the midst of his threatened sheep, and whose bare appearance is a loud exhortation to all to stand firm. Church history praised this holy Pope in a particular manner, on account of his mildness and fatherly tenderness. Not only to the members of the Church in Rome did the pope extend his care, but also to each one individually, no matter whence he came. That same Dionysius whom we before mentioned, sent his thanks to the faithful in Rome for the donations they had forwarded to him at Corinth. "From the beginning of Christianity," he wrote to them, "you were accustomed to assist the faithful in every possible way, and to supply the wants of many churches. You have also provided for the support of the poor brethren in the mines, and thereby proved yourselves true imitators of our great Master. Your Bishop, the highly venerated Soter, far from preventing this praiseworthy custom, has himself on the contrary, given it a fresh impetus, and he is not only careful to distribute alms collected for the support of the Christians, but he comforts with the tenderness of a father, all the faithful who go to Rome."

How consoling it was for Lydia to witness the truth confirmed of all she had heard in Greece of Soter's goodness. There was not one in the whole assembly for whom this holy man had not a word of encouragement and edification. None amongst them is truly in need, because all are rich in love. It was one and the same faith which called the Christians of the only true Church to such meetings, and if they were threatened with worldly power, so one and the same hope made each danger small, nay insignificant. But that the calumnies which were to be met with everywhere in the heathen writings were without foundation, we can see already from the letter which Pliny the younger, addressed to the Emperor Trajan, in which amongst other things he says: "The Christians assure us, that their entire guilt consists in this, that on certain days before the rising of the sun, they assemble to sing a hymn in honor of Christ, the Son of God. Therefore they would not have solemnly bound themselves to treason, but on the contrary refrain from theft and adultery, and the denial of that which is entrusted to them." The faithful withdrew separately to return to the city. The Pope still remained in the meeting-hall to arrange the collections. Lydia advanced to the holy father, cast herself at his feet, and thanked him for what he had done for her mother. At the same time she had learned that as Soter had been a friend of St. Polycarp and in consideration of Charitana having been his spiritual daughter, he gave orders himself for her burial and tomb. The kind Pope exhorted Lydia to imitate the virtues of her mother, and to persevere with firmness to the end, in imitating her Divine Master. She then visited the tombs of Anicetus and of several other Popes, and returned with her companions through the entrance of the Catacombs to the Via Appia.

CHAPTER XXI.

SOLITUDE AND HOLY PLACES.

LYDIA, after the events of the last few days, sought retirement in a little room appropriated for her use in the house of the pious Felicitas, there to recover her strength in silence, and to impart the results of her visit to Rome, to her much valued and now only friend on earth, Metella. She felt it her duty to give a detailed account of everything she saw and heard to her dear mistress. After God, it was the only solace left her, to communicate her inmost thoughts to one whom she so tenderly loved.

Rome was at this time peopled by nearly a million of inhabitants, and although its magnificent palaces and temples, its public baths and pleasure grounds could not be surpassed, still Lydia preferred to renounce the immediate seeing of those great sights, that she might reflect upon the wonderful ways of God, particularly as they had been revealed to her within the last few days. She was accustomed at all times, as often as a remarkable event occurred, that broke through the monotony of her hidden life, to retire into herself, and seek to discover the cause, by a close union with God. The sweet remembrances of her joyful childhood passed like phantoms before her eyes. She thought of the time, when as a cheerful happy child, she sat on her mother's knee, and listened to her pious instructions, and the raptures with which she spoke of the happiness that is prepared in Heaven, for those who serve God faithfully on earth. Then the remembrance of the sorrowful hours she spent at the bedside of a dying father, whose pious exhortations sank deeply into her youthful mind. Then how she sat at the feet of those holy men, filled with the Divine Spirit, to be instructed by them in the faith, and who afterwards shed their blood in its defence.

But she became doubly afflicted when her thoughts turned upon the last meeting she had with her mother. But this was now at an end, and her heart beat with emotion as she looked heavenward, and represented to herself the glorious triumphs of the saints; and she knew that in the number of the elect, she had an advocate that would never forget her. If a breath of temptation passed over her pure heart, the bare thought of this, her advocate, was a strong shield against all the suggestions of the evil one. So should all Christian mothers become the guardian spirit of their children here on earth, and if the heart of a well-trained child find itself inclined to commit sin, the remembrance of a mother's pious admonitions will never fail to warn it against the seductions of the common enemy.

The beloved parent of Lydia had given her, during life, a perfect model of what a Christian ought to be, and confirmed it by her holy death. God did not accept the sacrifice of Lydia's freedom, which she had come from Greece to offer, but the merit was no less, for God accepts the will, and in that the sacrifice was included. Therefore the pious daughter could from that time forward perfectly enjoy her freedom, the greatest amongst all the temporal blessings, and that which is the most difficult to resign.

No Christian would leave Rome without visiting the tombs of the saints. "In my youth," said Hieronymus, "when I studied in Rome, I used to spend my Sundays at the tombs of the Apostles and Martyrs. How often have I visited the crypts where their sacred remains lay side by side, and surrounded by a darkness that impressed the visitor with a holy awe!"

The tombs of S. S. Peter and Paul first claimed Lydia's attention. According to Pope Gregory, the two Apostles were first buried in the Catacombs, two miles distant from the city. Soon afterwards, the body of St. Peter was brought to the Vatican hill, and that of St. Paul to the Ostian way. After Lydia had visited the tombs of the Apostles, before which so many thousand Christians had their faith strengthened, she then desired to see the spot where her mother's blood had been shed. Felicitas who accompanied her on the way, showed her the temple of Jupiter on the Capitoline Hill, under which were the dark prisons, where so many Christians, Lydia's mother amongst the number, had suffered imprisonment. These vaults were hewn out of the Capitoline Hill, and to the deepest there was not even a passage, and the condemned had to be slipped into the vault on planks; this can be seen at the present day. In one of these subterranean prisons was also St. Peter, and wherein he baptized a jailer with water from a spring, which he in a wonderful manner, like a second Moses, brought forth from the rock. What a multitude of thoughts did not the sight of the Roman Capitoline occasion! Above was the temple of Jupiter, surrounded by a multiplicity of little shrines, dedicated to the numerous idols—beneath, as it was then thought, was the tomb for Christianity—above, the signs of unlimited self-love, which as St. Augustine says, reaches to self-deification; beneath, the signs of the love of God, which humbles and annihilates self. At a short distance is the Forum. Who then can describe the glorious combats that were here fought, and who could name the thousands that heard their sentence here?

On reaching the Forum, Lydia knelt down and kissed the marble flags which covered this memorable place, for from that spot her mother's soul had ascended to Heaven. Felicitas advanced a little, and showed her where the Prefect's seat was at that time, where Justin had stood, and where her mother had shed her blood. "When Rusticus saw," continued Felicitas, "that Charitana would not sacrifice to the gods, he ordered her to be scourged; a punishment, my child, that a greater than we had to bear, long before us. She then placed herself close to her companions, and prayed unceasingly with bowed head. She was so lost in prayer that she never moved her position, when the head of Justin was held up to the applauding multitude. At last when her turn came, she stepped forward, and answered the two questions: 'For whom do you die? and, does death appear so agreeable?' Her answer was: 'For my Faith in Christ, who is my Redeemer and my All. It is sweet to suffer for a friend, but to die for God is heavenly delight.'" Lydia with tears in her eyes, looked at one time on the earth, at another towards Heaven. How willingly would she not have resigned her life at that moment, to be happy with her mother. Occupied with these thoughts she left the Forum, and Felicitas led her to the great amphitheatre of Nero, which from the adjacent high Colossus was called the Coliseum. How many hundred Christians, true to the faith have stood on this Arena, how many lions and leopards have here lapped up the blood of the martyrs, and how did the applause of ninety thousand spectators thunder forth, when such amusements were granted to pagan Rome! There were still two other tombs in which Lydia felt the deepest interest, although in latter centuries the veil of oblivion has passed over them.

About twenty years before Lydia's birth, there lived in a Province of Umbria, a noble and richly endowed widow, named Sabina. This pagan matron had a Syrian slave, who with a rare zeal clung to the doctrines of the Gospel. She never ceased, so says the legend, praising the beauty of Christianity to her mistress; and as she exemplified it in her own pure and chaste life, she overcame the prejudice which her mistress had for many years entertained against the Christians. Sabina became a Christian, and by the brilliancy of her virtues, was one of the brightest ornaments of the Church in the second century.

The Emperor Adrian published an edict for a persecution of the Christians, and in consequence of this, the Governor of the province of Umbria imprisoned Sabina and her slave, Seraphica; and as the latter was the cause of Sabina's conversion, he had her beaten with rods till her tender body sunk under the cruelty, and she was finally beheaded. Seraphica's mistress, who was released from prison in consideration of her high rank, procured the body of her martyred slave, and gave it honorable interment. After this, she led a more retired life than ever, and night and day, besought her departed friend to obtain for her the grace of martyrdom. Her prayer was heard, for in the following year she was summoned by Elpidius, the new Governor of Umbria to appear before him, and he having shamefully maltreated her, ordered her to prison; when she arrived there, she found herself filled with a holy joy: "And is it then possible" she exclaimed, "that I am to be admitted to a participation of the glory enjoyed by my Seraphica? She has obtained for me this great privilege." She was again summoned the following day, but Elpidius finding all his entreaties vain, condemned her to be beheaded. She suffered on the very day upon which, in the preceding year, her companions gained the crown.* Although this Syrian slave bore a great resemblance to Lydia in her glowing love for Christ, and by the conversion of her mistress, still she had another tie upon her affection; having been baptized after that saint, whose name, it will be remembered, she bore till she became a slave in Athens.

Lydia was seldom so oppressed with sorrow as now, standing before the tomb of this much-trying virgin, who bore the miseries of slavery to her last breath. She cast a look upon her own interior, and read therein what her patron must have suffered, and also the joy she must have experienced when she saw her mistress one of the "True Fold." With what ardor did not she thank St. Seraphica, for the protection she had afforded her through her past life, and recommended not only herself, but also her newly converted mistress to the powerful protection of both martyrs.

* Not far from the Sulpice bridge, there was a beautiful church built to St. Sabina some hundred years later, and near which the Dominican monastery now stands, commanding a lovely view of the magnificent city. The erection of the church is dated as far back as A. D. 430.

Before the tombs of these holy women she took a vow of perpetual chastity, and resolved as a handmaid of the Lord, to devote herself to His service.

CHAPTER XXII.

IRENÆUS.

LYDIA was now occupied in making preparations for her return to Athens, as she was receiving letter after letter from Metella, entreating her to delay her departure no longer; and urged by this last request, she sallied forth at once, to make inquiries on what day the next ship would sail for Greece. On her way, she was surprised to meet one whose features were familiar to her, and on a moment's reflection, she recognized no other than the priest Irenæus, whom she last saw on the ruins of Smyrna.

For many years he had preached the Faith in the South of France, by the side of the aged Pothinus, bishop of Lyons, who like him, had been a disciple of St. Polycarp. Immediately after the persecution had commenced in Smyrna, a number of Christians from Asia Minor, wandered to the south of Gaul, and Irenæus was one of the number. Trade and traffic had made their way between these two distant lands, where as the seed of Christianity began to shoot, a tempest of persecution threatened to destroy it forever.

Notwithstanding the Emperor's decree, A. D. 177, in favor of the Christians, the Roman Governor and the people of Lyons and Vienne, still raged against them with dreadful cruelty. Roman justice, as Church history informs us, was, in the first three centuries very vacillating, and the immense extent of the Empire, easily explains how the Emperor's decree was carried out in distant provinces, with greater or less exactness, according to the dispositions of whatever Governor was in authority. The position of a Governor depended more or less on the favor of the people, who it is well-known, had a downright passion for sanguinary combats, and that their cry became: "Panem et Circenses." "Bread and the Circus." During war, Rome stained its sword in the blood of its enemies, during peace, in that of its own citizens. These were the gladiatorial combats and the persecutions of the Christians.

We need not doubt that some Christians were to be found earlier in Gaul, still it is worthy of credit, that no Christian blood was shed on the soil of France, before the reign of Marcus Aurelius.

The lights of the new faith were Pothinus and Irenæus. These two great missionaries of Gaul carried the Faith thither from Asia Minor, where they received it from St. Polycarp and because Polycarp had been a disciple of St. John, it might with truth be said, that they received it from the Apostles themselves. The labors of St. Pothinus were carried on, almost in silence, and he was already a venerable man of ninety years, when the persecution commenced. Except in the Church records in Smyrna, wherein there is an account of the death of St. Polycarp and his companions, we have not so remarkable a memento of Christian antiquity, as the famous account which the churches of Lyons and Vienne have left us, upon the persecution of the Church in Asia Minor. It is thought that Irenæus was the writer of those epistles, and that in the same year in which the persecution took place 177, he was sent to Rome to impart to the Pope the minutie of the sanguinary proceedings. Soter was already dead, and in his place Eleutherius had undertaken the guidance of the Church.

It was the custom of the first centuries to read the acts of the martyrs in all Christian assemblies, for the edification of the faithful, and what Irenæus had witnessed with his own eyes, he wished on his arrival in Rome to deliver verbally to the faithful.

The day on which he was to hold the funeral oration on the death of forty-eight holy martyrs, was announced in the assemblies, and the church of St. Praxedes, that asylum and oratory of the early Christians, beneath which the bodies of 300 martyrs lay buried, was chosen for this purpose. Lydia was also there, and she took with her the precious girdle of St. Polycarp, to become the possessor of which had cost her eleven years of slavery. With anxious heart, she passed the Theatre of Flora, ignorant of the shocking scenes that took place there, scenes that often brought the blush to the most shameless countenances, and she stands already at the entrance of the house of God.

How altered was Irenæus! Care and labor, not years, had furrowed his countenance, and had given him the appearance of an aged man.

"It would be in vain to describe," commenced Irenæus, "the trouble that fell upon us in those latter days: The Christians in Lyons were formally proscribed. They were hunted forth from their dwellings, and the blue heavens given to them as a shelter. They were not allowed to appear in public places without being put to shame, not even the refreshing comfort of a bath was granted to them. If any of the people ill-used one of us in blind fury, the officers of justice had no ear for his troubles, on the contrary, it was the officials themselves who led the Christians to the public places, and there asked them what their faith was, and then without anything further, had them cast into prison. On account of this treatment, one of the senators, urged by a holy zeal, petitioned one day to speak in the hall of justice, in defence of the Christians. He did it with that vivacity which his feeling of justice and his youth dictated, and stood as witness that the Christians were not guilty of the vices ascribed to them. But the people interrupted the speaker with vehement groans, and the Proconsul, who also sat in the Hall, asked the defender if he himself were a Christian. Vettius, so he was called, answered in the affirmative;—he was immediately seized, on a sign from the Proconsul, and sent to join the Christians already in prison. On this the public judicial persecution commenced. The following days the Proconsul ordered all the prisoners to be led bound before him. He addressed them in the most violent language, upon the horrible crimes they had committed, and threatened them with the most dreadful tortures if they did not abjure Christianity. When the executioner placed before their eyes the favorite instruments of torment, and explained the use of them, some of the Christians began to tremble and grow pale. The Proconsul profiting by their agitation, ordered incense to be placed in their hands, and alas! many of them sacrificed to the gods. The apostates were ten. This act filled us with unspeakable grief. We suffered a further humiliation through some slaves, who, with their Christian owners, had entered the Church, although as yet they were not thoroughly instructed in the doctrines. Frightened by the threatened punishments, they not only related what they saw in the Christian assemblies, but several of them hoped to gain their freedom by becoming false witnesses. They were therefore, not ashamed to maintain before the people, that they saw with their own eyes, how we, like Thyestes eat the flesh of children, and practised vices that my lips would refuse to utter. At this speech, some of the people applauded, others were indignant and also those turned against us, who, up to that time had some faith in our holy doctrine. The torture was next applied to many of the prisoners in the most cruel manner, and not alone the torture but also red hot irons, were pressed down upon the sufferers in great brutality, until the bodies were no longer to be recognized. Others were put into the stocks, and their feet stretched till the sinews tore asunder.

"So passed a portion of the month of May. But more sorrowfully did it terminate. I must now speak of the death of an old man, who amply fulfilled the hopes of his great master, Polycarp, and as in life, so in death he trod in his holy footsteps. Although the last events greatly affected him, still a youthful vigor seemed to take possession of his aged limbs; this was but lent to him, that he might leave behind him a remarkable example. The city authorities sent armed soldiers for this old man, and had him brought through the public streets from his dwelling. An immense concourse of people, children, and the aged, followed with ferocious cries, amidst curses and opprobrious language. When the Proconsul asked who was the God of the Christians—he answered:

'You will know God when you are worthy of it.'

"The pagans no sooner heard this reply, than they set upon the aged Bishop like wild beasts, and so inhumanly treated him that he sunk to the ground. The Governor then saw that the people were embittered, and that they were even arrogating to themselves the office of judge, he therefore ordered Pothinus to be carried back to prison. There we saw him for the last time. He signed us with the sign of martyrdom, by pressing his bleeding lips to our foreheads. Two days later the Church of Lyons had to mourn her Bishop and one of her principal pillars." At these words, the speaker thought of the loss he had himself sustained by the death of his beloved and venerated friend. All present participated in his grief, and loud sobbing was heard in the assembly.

"Amongst the prisoners," continued he, "were some Roman citizens, who claim protection from public contempt by privilege. The Proconsul sent the information to Rome and begged a command to retain as well the citizens as the other prisoners. When we were informed of this, our hopes were raised, for we trusted that it was still fresh in the Emperor's mind in what situation his whole army had lately found themselves, and how the prayers of the Christian Legion drew down the refreshing rain from Heaven which saved them from a parching death. How bitterly did the Emperor's commands deceive us! Marcus Aurelius decided on the death of each one that persevered in the confession of Christ. The Proconsul resolved that at the next public sports, at which a great multitude was expected to assemble, the prisoners should be brought forth, and that the Roman citizens were to be beheaded, but that the others should be reserved for the wild beasts.

"As we saw at this investigation those also appear who had already declared that they would offer sacrifice to the gods, our hearts beat in anxious expectation. Quite close to the judge's seat we observed a doctor of Lyons, Alexander of Phrygia, who was most beloved by the people. His presence there astonished and perplexed us, for he was known to be a man of apostolic spirit. While the apostates were questioned anew, if they abided by their former declaration, some of them unhesitatingly acknowledged, that they had been guilty of great injustice by their apostasy, and were now firmly resolved to offer up their lives for the Faith.

"Alexander, who stood opposite to them, bowed his head in a friendly manner, and showed by the motion of his whole body, how ardently he wished them to remain firm in their good resolutions. This was a great comfort to us, and but few, who were never very much in earnest, remained apostates. So this admirable Alexander saved many from destruction, not thinking of the danger in which he was placing himself. The people had observed him, and were roused almost to madness, and the Governor putting the question to him if he were a Christian, Alexander answered in the affirmative, and immediately his sentence was pronounced. He who loses his life in this manner is sure to find it.

"On the following day all met at the sports in the amphitheatre; alas! it was a sport as in Nero's time. Two from Asia Minor were to be led to death, Alexander and Attalus from Pergamus, who was formerly so vehemently persecuted. As he was placed on a red hot iron stool because he was accused of being a cannibal, he turned to the spectators and said to them in the Latin language: 'Behold this is what you may call consuming men, you are guilty of this inhumanity, but we are no cannibals.' Alexander next suffered. But now, dearest brethren, for an edifying example of two young persons, one was a very youthful and beautiful girl, named Blandina, she was a slave, and of so delicate a constitution, that she caused in us the greatest anxiety, and yet this remarkable servant of God, had from the earliest dawn till late in the evening, defied her tormentors, who relieved each other at intervals, and when the savages sent her back to her prison, she spent her whole time in attending and consoling her companions to the entire forgetfulness of herself. Her death had been previously decided on, but a remarkable circumstance prevented its taking place. She had been even tied to the stake in the middle of the Arena, to be attacked by wild beasts. She stood there with outstretched arms, a true follower of her crucified Lord. At one moment she raised her eyes to Heaven, at another she fixed them on the panther, just liberated from its cage. The beast was less of the savage than the jailer who liberated him, for the moment he beheld the maiden, his ferocious nature gave way, he turned suddenly from her, and crouchingly retreated to his cave. This failing, she was then led, together with Ponticus, a youth of fifteen years of age, to the different altars and they were desired to offer incense. But still Blandina thought not of her own sufferings, she pressed her chains piously to her bosom, and whispered to her youthful companion smilingly, words of comfort. The youth suffered with a cheerful mien all sorts of torments, and terminated his young life by a heroic death. Now Blandina stood alone, that she was stronger than all the instruments of torture, excited the people to the greatest fury, but the last hour struck for her also. She was scourged, next torn with iron hooks, till her entrails appeared, she was then tied in a net, and dragged about by a wild bull, and at last was put sitting on a red hot stool. Finding she still breathed, her sufferings were terminated by the sword; and it was acknowledged by the pagans themselves, that no woman had ever been known to endure such torments with so much constancy.

"Forty-eight martyrs thus sacrificed their lives. Their bodies were thrown to the dogs, their bones burnt, and their ashes cast into the Rhone." "Let us see," said the heathens, "whether their God will resuscitate them again." "And if we were able," concluded Irenæus, "to cast a look above the blue vault of Heaven that separates us from our happy brethren, we should behold on the head of each, a sparkling crown. For as often as a persecution breaks out, the portals of Heaven open, and the crowns of glory descend on the bleeding temples of the well-tried combatants."

When the holy man had ceased speaking, all those present cast themselves on their knees, beseeching the assistance of the martyrs, to obtain strength, if God so willed them to suffer a similar death, but they were not called upon to suffer, as the persecution ceased for a time.

This sermon made an indelible impression on all present, and one after the other left the church in deep thought. Lydia waited for the moment that Irenæus would cross the threshold of the sanctuary. Many years had passed since he saw her bound with the girdle of his martyred master at Smyrna. This precious relic she carried about her, and suspecting that Irenæus would have a death similar to that of St. Polycarp, she resolved to renounce all claim to the relic and present it to him, who by his talents and virtue filled so high a position.

Irenæus gazed at her inquiringly; for a moment he appeared as if he had to recall by-gone days, to bring back her features to his mind. Suddenly he exclaimed: "this is a child of St. Polycarp, one whom I last saw on the ruins of Smyrna," Lydia was silent. Felicitas who stood near her, spoke for her, and related in a few words, her sorrows and the cause of her journey to Rome. Lydia taking courage addressed him; "Revered disciple of our great Bishop! dare I venture to offer you a remembrance of Smyrna? Behold the girdle which St. Polycarp took off before he ascended the pile! The first amongst his followers should possess it, and when the last hour shall strike for him, may the protecting spirit of the patron saint of my native city, hover round him!"

Irenæus accepted the gift, and pressed it silently to his lips. Thanking Lydia for the precious and unexpected present, he bestowed upon her and Felicitas his blessing, with a fervent hope, that after the trials of this life, he would meet them in the world to come, where separation is no more.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE INVALID.

What sadness filled the house of Felicitas! The dearly loved emancipated one prepares to return to Athens. Her hostess had firmly attached herself to her guest, because she had shared with her in this life, the same dangers, and had for the future, the same hopes. The last good wishes were exchanged, and Lydia placed the casket before her which contained the great pearl; for, according to the pious custom of those days, she commenced her journey accompanied by her God. Hark! there is suddenly a loud knocking at the gate, and Lydia distinctly hears a man's voice. He is asking in an excited tone, if the young Athenian is to be found here, or if she is already on her way to Greece.

"Well, God be praised!" said the stranger, and entered the apartment, "God greet you," said he to Lydia, "Where is the emancipated slave who served the rich Metella? I have something to impart to her."

The rough manner in which the stranger approached her, and on the other hand, the look of astonishment that his features expressed, quite confused her. Still it appeared to Lydia, as though she had seen the wounded man lately in one of the assemblies. "Are you" continued he, "the enfranchised of an Athenian lady, who had a son named Lucius, a blooming son, who died fighting against the Marcomanni?"

Lydia cast a trembling look at Felicitas, who whispered to her in her Greek language; "Do not be alarmed, my dear child, the man is a Christian, we can give him a trifle, and he will be contented." "No, no!" replied the inquirer smilingly, "I am an overseer in the baths of Timotheus, and am an invalid, but through the benevolence of the Emperor and some good people, I manage to live. My arm was wounded by the arrow of a marksman, so that I was useless for warlike service. How gladly would I engage myself again in such a cause, face to face with those rebellious people of the Danube!"

"Perhaps you knew the son of Metella?" inquired Lydia hastily, for the thought struck her, that the man could probably tell her something of Lucius.

"Of course I did!" replied the invalid, "Of course I knew Lucius, and on that account I have come here to-day. Alas! alas! he died too soon."

Felicitas thought that the visit of the poor invalid, was only for the purpose of obtaining a small gift, on the plea of his having known Lucius, and as the moments were precious to her, she sought to put an end to the interview by saying: "Now good man, you are very poor, and perhaps you would like a small gift from Metella's enfranchised."

"By no means," answered he, "If I am poor, I am contented, and I comfort myself with the thought, that the Redeemer of the world Himself belonged to the poor, as long as He was on earth."

"You are a Christian?" said Lydia.

"O yes! and one of those who fought in the Legio Fulminatrix, and therefore I have the privilege to confess my faith everywhere without fear."

"You have perhaps spoken to Lucius?"

"No doubt of it, we belonged to the same Legion, and were under one commander. The son of Metella, equally enthusiastic in virtue as in the honor of war, will ever be remembered by us all. Oh, I see him still! How, after a battle was won, he rode his foaming charger over the ice-clad field of action, and so courageously, that his heart beat strong enough to burst the buckles of his coat of mail. Then flew an arrow from the secret ambush that struck his charger, and a second brought down the rider. We hastened to his assistance. We had a Christian commander, named Cornelius, he was alas, also left behind. This commander loved Lucius with an enthusiastic affection, and met him often during the Winter quarters, that he might explain the truths of Christianity to him.

"Oh! he was a rare youth. How often he gave us the commission, that if he were once wounded, to carry him off to the field and baptize him! For at first he was afraid to receive baptism as he did not consider himself sufficiently instructed."

Lydia's attention was riveted, and she sent a secret sigh to Heaven as if she would now, as she had often done before, pray for Lucius' baptism.

"Continue," said she, "you speak like a messenger from Heaven."

Oh! his life was too short! the arrow did its work quicker than we had expected. We drew it out, washed the wound, which began to bleed, and the youth then awoke as if from a sleep. He signed to us with half closed eyes, and exerted himself to utter a few words. I did not understand him, and had through downright anxiety, forgotten his last wish.

At length one of my comrades understood him, and said hurriedly, 'he asks you to baptize him!' Oh, had you but seen the seraphic smile that played upon his dying face, when he found his words were understood! We then struck his spear deep into the earth, and raised him against it on his shield in a reclining position. No vessel being at hand, I took off my helmet, and his eye anxiously watched my every step, as I went in search of water. I returned quickly and knelt by his side, the dying youth summoned up all his sinking strength for one great effort; he spoke distinctly: 'I believe in Jesus Christ, the Son of God—O baptize me in His name!' With heavy sobs I poured the contents of my helmet upon his head, and baptized him, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. He smiled, bent his head in thanksgiving, and placed his hand in mine, he then fell into his agony, and seemed by the movement of his lips to be in fervent prayer. He opened his dying eyes once more, and motioned that he had something still to say. One of my comrades placed his ear to Lucius' lips and heard with difficulty: "Love to my dear mother, and say I died a Christian." These were his last words; he then closed his eyes and expired.

"As I heard the other day, that an emancipated Christian slave was here from Athens, I sought you out, to beg that you would deliver the last message of a good son to his mother." The poor invalid felt deeply affected the remembrance of his fellow combatant, whom he had accompanied to the threshold of Heaven, and was then obliged to bid a long farewell, grieved him intensely.

"Merciful God!" ejaculated Lydia, "how? Metella's son one of the faithful?—Lucius died a Christian?—Baptized on the field of battle?" Her bright eyes sparkled and filled with tears.

"Yes, yes, tell his mother that she had a good and brave son, who was the darling of the whole Legion, and tell her also that this son died a disciple of Christ."

Lydia informed the invalid, that Metella had also become a Christian, and that perhaps he, who was so tenderly loved by her, had petitioned for her. "So are the ways of Him," continued she, "who carries the destiny of the world and all His creatures in His hands." The brave soldier was taking leave, and wishing the traveler a favorable journey, when Lydia considered that in the name of her good mistress she was bound to reward the bearer of such joyful tidings. She had scarcely entertained the thought a moment, when she opened the golden locket that she had suspended from her neck, and took out of it the large and valuable pearl, a present of Metella's, and offered it to the invalid in the name of her mistress. He refused to accept a reward for a service done to a dying comrade, but as Lydia had assured him that Metella would send him a reward from Athens, if he did not accept the present she offered, he then received the generous gift.

At such unexpected and joyful news, Lydia was stunned, and was obliged, as soon as the stranger had departed, to reflect a little and convince herself, if what she had just heard were a dream or a reality. Already she placed before her eyes, the happiness this news would afford her mistress, and if her departure had not been fixed for that day, she would have had to summon all the strength of her will, to conquer the desire with which she longed for Athens. She hastened with Felicitas to the harbor of Tiberius. The late intelligence made her separation an easy one. Both promised never to loosen the firm band of mutual love, and wished each other, if they were never to meet again on earth, a happy meeting in "the better Land."

And now, farewell, thou precious Rome! Ever memorable to those who have tarried within thy walls, and offered up their prayers at the tombs of thy Saints!

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE RETURN.

THERE was in the time of the ancient Greeks, a much approved and peculiar sort of ship, of remarkable height and bulk, to which they gave the name of Kerkyra; from the island of Kerkyra where they were originally built. Such a trading vessel, bearing the name of Centaurus, was just launched in the harbor of Ostia, and was the one which Lydia had decided on, for her return to Greece. Rich Romans came along side in their gilded barges to visit this triple-oared galley.

At the call of the Hortators the rowers take their seats and beat time with their oars to the flute-players on deck.

To judge by the dress and appearance, there were many Asiatics among the travelers. Some were returning from Gaul, in consequence of the persecutions there, to their homes in the East. They had not words to express the manner in which the Proconsul of that province consented to the most abominable requests of the people, and this, principally to ingratiate himself with them.

Some of them carried the traces of martyrdom on their bodies, like so many seals of their faith, and as if the days in Lyons had given them no previous warning, they continued in the practice of their religion, regardless of the judgment of the heathens.

Irenæus and Hegesippus, both of whom were journeying to Smyrna, were, so to say, the spiritual pillars around which the faithful heroes crowded.

The learned Hegesippus is not unknown in the legends of the Saints, although his works are not extant. He was a Jew by birth, and became afterwards a member of the Church in Jerusalem. He had traveled much, and had acquainted himself thoroughly with the most remarkable events of Church history: and completed, in the year 133, a history of the Church in five volumes. He resided in Rome till the year 177, therefore to that year in which the persecution took place at Lyons.

Amongst the above-named Asiatics, who were returning from Gaul, one claims our particular attention. He sits motionless the entire day, with a fixed gaze on the blue waters. Now and then he raises his head and sighs deeply. His strained arms, and the scorched flesh on one side of his face, clearly showed that he had suffered the torture. While all were cheerful, and even gay at meals, this gloomy individual, dressed in a thin over-all garment, sat eating a hard biscuit, that he dipped occasionally in a cup of wine. He touched no other food the entire day. Lydia studied this man for some time, and then took courage to address him. He looked at her frowningly, listened to her question, then turned himself towards the sea, and gave no answer. How delighted she would have been to help him, but he kept a sullen distance. Some days after, she made a second attempt, asked him where he came from, and who he was. He answered with a measured voice: "I am an unhappy Christian, leave me in peace!"

He was a Christian, and in the last persecution in Gaul, he denied his Faith, amidst the pains of the rack, and as he was threatened with still greater torments if he refused to reveal the secret crimes of the Christians, he, against his conscience, uttered scandalous lies of crimes which he said they had committed in their secret meetings. At this acknowledgment he was liberated, he took to flight, and waited for an opportunity to leave the province forever, and return to Asia. The heathens who were in the ship, said his name was Melissos; they knew his history, and some of them had seen him sacrificing to the gods. Notwithstanding, they despised his character and refused to associate with him. Of course the Christians had a still poorer opinion of him, so that the unfortunate man was proscribed on all sides. Lydia felt the deepest commiseration for the apostate. As she discovered the cause of his melancholy, she addressed herself to Hegesippus, who usually sat on the stern of the vessel, writing down the thoughts that occurred to him during the voyage. She informed him of the sad state of Melissos, and begged his sympathy. He sought to address him, spoke words of comfort to him, and reminded him, that even the prince of the Apostles three times denied his Master. But also that this denial Peter made good, by his redoubled zeal for Christ, and by his acknowledgment to his Lord, after His resurrection, in the presence of the Apostles three times, to love Him more than the rest.*

Melissos replied in a hollow voice: 'I hope to be freed from the wicked spirits, by a baptism in the sea,' and in a sullen manner turned from the historian.

There was a Christian youth on board, who unmindful of the heathens present, went through his religious duties without fear. He was liked by all, not only on account of his wit but also for his enchanting voice, with which he knew how to amuse every one during the long voyage. He seemed to make a sad impression on Melissos, and to awaken in him many remembrances of the past. One morning the youth sat in the scuttle and began to sing the following, whilst the sun was rising:

Night flees apace: lo! now the ruddy dawn,
With rising sun, breaks sparkling into morn.
O'er the blue sea shrill winds are whistling wild,
Whilst in the trim bark sails a lonely child.

Cheerful the boy plies well the ready oar;
"I'll tarn my helm for port on yonder shore,
Where golden spring glows warm, and gladsome May Blooms without cease, and decks the glittering bay."

"But see! what nymph starts up, and from the rocks,
Trips on the wave, and shakes her fragrant locks?
Enchanting songs my soul with joy so move
That my young heart well nigh will break with love."

The heedless boy, though love and music mock,
Salutes the sprite, and sending for the rock
Spreads all his sails, and steers with eager hand,—
Then joyous sets his foot on Siren-land.

Whilst hush'd he bends to hear the warbling strain,
The deadly spell steals o'er his soul amain,
Holds him with charms bound fast to magic land,
And chains with joys unblest, his nerveless band.

Rouling at last, and trembling with affright,
He sees his doom, and takes to rapid flight,
Seeks for his little bark, but seeks in vain:
The bark is gone, its planks bestrew the main!

The hapless boy sinks sobbing to a seat,
Beneath the rocks where foaming billows beat,
Casts o'er the sea his eyes, and wails uncheck'd,
And breaks his heart, as first his bark was wreck'd.

Watch then, O lonesome youth! and guard with care,
Lest to the Siren's song thou lend an ear,
And dire enchantments lure and love's pretence
Thy fragile bark to wreck—thine Innocence.†

The effect of this song on Melissos was remarkable and observed by all. Night came on, and each one had retired to rest, save the helmsman and the Hortator, who stood on his elevation. A dark figure crept along the deck till it reached the end of the vessel, and began to talk aloud: "O Thou never-sleeping Protector of the universe, lend me thine ear! Thou listenest to the chirping cricket and providest for it, and even the powerless butterfly, that flutters from flower to flower, is an object of thy tender care. Thou beholdest me also.—I am the butterfly, that should have ascended to yonder Paradise of delights, but whose wings have been burnt off under dreadful torture, now I am but a worm—a miserable worm! I have lost faith and hope, the wings of my soul! Bereft of these, I now crawl, a pitiful worm, on the earth. Man mocks me, and Thy Divinity will crush me.

Eternal God dost Thou still know me? I am an object of Thy hatred and all Heaven must detest me! For whose love did I offer incense on the altars of the gods, in whom I have no faith? On whom did I think, and who held me back in the moment that I should have gained the crown? She who is now wandering on the Asiatic shores, sleeplessly and anxiously watching for the sails that are to bring to her him she has so longed for! She is the Siren that took my heart and senses captive, and wrecked my bark when steering for the land of the Saints! She is the slender Roe that gnaws at the stem of my faith, and bites off the bark. O! that death had pursued her, before she had annihilated my virtue! And when I do arrive, she will no longer love, but curse the cripple and the Atheist!"

"O, sea! O, sea! thy cool embrace, thy melodious song! Thy liberating baptism! Dissolve this immortal being called soul, and spread it over thy immeasurable waters. In foaming billows will I then beat on the Asiatic shores, kiss her feet, and cool her longing. Dissolve this immortal being, that it may rise on high over thy surface as a mist, and as storm-whipped clouds in myriads of drops, fall upon the locks and robes of my complaining Syrinx!" And then he bent himself forward lower and lower, and vanished in an instant.

The Hortator near the ship's lamp, was looking at the apostate and said to the young Christian who had not yet retired: "Listen to the Phrygian fool! He is declaiming a monologue."

"I did not observe him," replied the youth, and both looked inquiringly towards the front rail, where he had been standing.

They lost sight of the stranger in the darkness of the night, but on the waters they heard a gentle splashing, which ceased by degrees.

"Help! help!" cried out a clear voice from the deck, "Melissos has thrown himself into the sea," and almost in the same moment, the supple youth sprang into the rowboat, loosened it from the ship, and made towards the drowning man. By ropes thrown to the youth from above, Melissos was drawn up just as he was on the point of sinking. He lay in the bottom of the boat, without showing the slightest sign of life. His pale features half shrouded in his dripping hair, clearly portrayed the agony of mind that drove him to the deed. The occurrence caused great confusion. They looked upon the drowned man as a madman, and complained of the imprudence of allowing him his liberty among the passengers. Others expressed the suspicion that the Christians, who did not seem to think much about him, had purposely sacrificed him.

In the mean time, they left him lying there, and returned again to rest. The deck cleared, and all restored to quiet, Lydia came forward from the stern of the vessel, with uplifted hands; she cast a sorrowful look around her, and wept and prayed. "O if I had but followed the dictates of my heart! Had I but sacrificed the least respect to the greater, you would not now lie a victim here to our insensibility! Alas, why did we not save thee! Almighty Father if still a spark of life be in him, fan it, and give him back to Thy flock! It becomes Thee as the all Holy One to judge the sinner, but it becomes us to look upon him as our brother, and to love him."

The moon rose clear, and the waves, as if naught had happened, danced fondly in her beams. Flying fish rose from the dark waters, saluted the splashing boat, and the sails of the vessel, then fluttered a little higher, and sank again to their watery home.

An anxious feeling agitated the heart of Lydia. Nature looked so peaceful, the body so pale, and the deed so dreadful. Overwhelmed with anguish, she sank upon her cushion, and throwing a veil over her face she began to reflect on the fate of Melissos. Suddenly a ray of hope darted through her frame, mild as the morning beam that kisses off the dew from the flower. She rose and approached the body, which appeared to her as if its posture had changed. "Good Father," she exclaims, "he raises himself, he sinks his head upon his arm! Melissos, you return again to life!" "Yes," replied he, after a pause, and looking round,—"and again to hope."—"No, all is not yet lost, I feel it here"—placing his hand upon his breast—"Regenerated," then said Lydia, "return back to expiate the injustice done."

Melissos recovered, his despair was conquered by the language of sympathy, and the care bestowed upon him daily by the passengers. His lost peace returned and he sailed towards his Asiatic home another man, and with the resolution, there to be received again into the Communion of Saints.

Two months passed, and the longed-for land was still at a distance. A cabin boy sits above on the mast, and scans the broad sea in the direction of Achaia. He looked long in vain, but at length his clear silver voice called down from his rocking ship-cradle: "The mountains of Greece are visible!" all hastened to the fore-castle, to convince themselves that the shores were near. In the greatest haste the announcer descended from the mast, to claim reward for his joyful tidings. Although land was distant, the pilot looked around him unconcerned, for he had now another sea-mark by which to guide his ship; as long as he was on the high seas, he had nothing but the stars, he now had the mountains, and he steered courageously by them towards Syros, where some of the passengers disembarked.

Melissos was of the number, who, on taking a respectful leave of Lydia, with tears, expressed his gratitude for her sympathy, and made a firm promise, with God's assistance, to be again of the "One fold." Those who were journeying to the East, went by another vessel, and those destined for Attica continued the voyage in the Centaurus. It was a soft pleasant morning, such as we never see in our foggy North when the ship arrived at Piræus. The sun was still slumbering in the East, and the Hymettus on the other side of Athens, resembled a grey veil, behind which the rising sun was still concealed. At last, Aurora waking, drew aside "the curtain of the morn." The king of day scatters his golden gifts over mountain, sea and plain, and sheds a new life upon the earth.

How majestically the Centaurus neared the shore! The morning breeze swelling every sail. The last commands given to the weary crew, were in a tone that said: "fellow laborers, our work is done!" Lydia was almost the first to touch the land, and greet the ruins of the once great arsenal, and the walls of Cyclops, destroyed by Sulla, which united Piræus with Athens; and now she pictured to herself in the liveliest colors, the meeting that was just at hand.

One of Metella's servants was to be seen for some days on the heights of the Acropolis, looking anxiously towards the harbor. At length the mast of a vessel appeared above the horizon, and by degrees, showed itself in full sail, steering towards the coast. When it approached near enough, he recognized in the flags and pennants the expected ship. Duranus hurried down breathless, to announce the tidings to his mistress. Metella answered with a cry of delight, and hastened to the threshold of the inner gate of the palace, where she waited impatiently, the arrival of her much loved child. Ophne was sent immediately to the harbor, and Lydia had scarcely landed, when she found herself in the embraces of her affectionate friend, who overwhelmed her with questions, which she herself answered, and imparted a volume of news relative to the changes that had occurred in her absence, and ended by declaring that there was one secret, she was most impatient to tell her, but she dared not, and so she went on, talking unceasingly till they reached the palace.

Feeling has a language in all places, and through all ages, and this language expresses itself in the acts of that ardent tenderness, wherewith one heart unites itself to another. When Metella and Lydia met, they lost all power of utterance, Metella stretched out her arms and her newly found child sunk nearly senseless into her embrace. After a few moments, both retired to the oratory to pour forth their gratitude to God, Having spent some time in prayer, Metella motioned Lydia to follow her into one of her private apartments. "How have I not sighed for this day that would bring thee back to Athens! The silent valleys, the solitary groves, the purling streams, yes, all the stars in the blue vault of Heaven, can witness my longing for thee! The letters, dear child, that you sent me from Rome, were a weak indemnity for your own dear self, and still they were so precious to me, that I had them ever near me. What an interest I have taken in all you have gone through since we parted! and how did I grieve at the news, that you could not find your mother!"

A look gave Metella to understand with what resignation and peace of soul the daughter had borne the loss of her parent. "My child," continued she, "as happy as is the return home so much those you have left behind, feel your loss." "I have no one now on this earth to whom I belong," said Lydia, "but I have still a mistress, who, I am certain for the future, will accept my service, and who will never abandon me."

Metella embraced Lydia tenderly: "not mistress, not lady, not friend, there is another name that stands higher than all these—that which of all the names on earth sounds sweetest, and by this sweet name you shall ever call me—The name of Mother!"

"What I offer thee now is not a thing of momentary affection; ever since I lost my son, I have thought of how I could hear again the sweet name of mother—I have chosen you that you may be to me a daughter, a tenderly beloved daughter, presented to me by God Himself. I have always called thee Lydia, but you received another name, far more beautiful in baptism. Therefore take back thy name Seraphical yes, my only daughter must be Seraphical! All that belongs to me in future belongs to thee, and as thou hast a daughter's possession of my heart so shalt thou have the possession of all the temporal trifles that I call my own. Long did the court of Athens hesitate to acknowledge you as my heiress, because you had been a slave, but I proved that you were free-born, and never purchased in public places, that you came to my house a fugitive, and found shelter there, and that without having any right, the master of the Smyrnian vessel, on which you sought your passage to Greece, took you as captive, and sent you to my house. All is now arranged, and you are acknowledged as my adopted child, and heir to all I possess. O may you be for the inhabitants of Athens, what I should like to have been for them, and you'll be a pattern of a benevolent Christian, and when death draws near, you will look upon the poor of our city as your children."

The deeply affected Lydia composed herself, and without being asked, pressed a kiss on Metella's cheek for the first time. "My faith," said she, "left me once an orphan, and the same faith has again given me a mother. I shall never forget that it was thy boundless love that liberated the slave, and from an enfranchised, raised her to be thy child. And now I can no longer suppress the joy that fills my overflowing heart. I have now to tell you the particulars of the happy death of your son. Lucius! this is not the first day, that you have been a mother to a Christian child."

Metella did not understand what the words signified, "You had a Christian child, before you yourself thought of being one. Yes, your son reposed in the bosom of his Redeemer before the dawn of faith enlightened his mother's heart.

O, remember the vision! Thy Lucius slumbered at the feet of his Redeemer."

"My son? I suspect!"—

"Your suspicions are happy truths. I myself spoke to the veteran in Rome who baptized him. His last words were: 'I believe in Jesus Christ the Son of God—O baptize me in His name; and before he expired; 'Love to my dear mother, and say that her son Lucius died a Christian.'"

Metella was astounded, and a holy awe ran through her whole frame. She rose hastily and speechless, seized Seraphica's hand, and hastened with her to the oratory. He alone who searches the depths of the heart, knows what she felt when pouring forth to Him the effusions of a grateful soul.

What a double joy for Metella! God had already commenced to bestow upon her "The hundred fold in this life." She had now one child an advocate in Heaven, and another a sweet solace to her on earth. Her life was beginning to her anew, but O, how changed! The pleasures of Chryso-phora were very different from those of the Christian Metella. In former years self was her first consideration, now it was her last—so wonderfully did Faith transform this noble soul, that she was scarcely to be recognized. The haughty and imperious bearing was changed to a mild and modest dignity. The fiery Metella of former days, is no longer heard to speak to the meanest of her household in aught but gentle and consoling words. She spends her days with her adopted child, doing good to all, dispensing the temporal blessings which God has bestowed upon her, like the faithful steward of a liberal Master.

Lydia was delighted beyond measure when Metella told her that Ophne had become a Christian, and that Duranus was then a Catechumen; she knew immediately that this was Ophne's secret. The joy of all the domestics on the return of Lydia, knew no bounds, particularly poor little Thrax, to whom she had always been most kind.

Metella and Lydia spent their days alternately between Elis, Athens and Eleusis, in each of which places they had the happiness of seeing a little colony of Christians rising up around them. Lydia took upon her the laborious portion of their charitable labors, and the sick and needy were the objects of her most anxious solicitude.

The poor potter was no longer poor he had been removed with his now dying child, to one of Metella's out-dwellings, appropriated to the male portion of her domestics. In Lydia's daily visit to his little son, who gradually declined after the operation already mentioned, poor Hyllos learned to believe, from the conversations she had with Askanus, who loved Lydia dearly, and who always entreated her to tell him something of her God, that Jupiter and Minerva were no gods, and therefore unable to help him. And when Askanus became thoroughly instructed in the duties of a Christian, and begged to be of the same religion with his benefactress, his father added an earnest petition that he might also have the same happiness. "Yes Hyllos," said Lydia, "I shall be delighted to see you one of the true fold, but you have yet to be instructed."

"Dear Lady, have I not been present each day that you talked so beautifully to my son? Old Hyllos has still a good memory—I don't forget a word of all you've said." To Lydia's astonishment, on questioning him, she found him thoroughly prepared to receive baptism, and promised that his name should be added to that of Askanus, for the Bishop's approval.

After having ministered to the temporal comforts of her poor invalid, she left their little dwelling, and in crossing the courtyard, on her way to the palace, she heard loud sobbing behind one of the pillars, and wondered to see little Thrax bathed in tears. "What has happened, Thrax?" Poor Thrax could give no other answer than "I'm only a dwarf! I'm only a dwarf!" "A caged dwarf, Thrax, not one by nature." "O but I was bought only to be laughed at!" "No; Thrax! you were sold to be laughed at, but purchased by a feeling mistress, to be treated with every kindness. Your dear young master, Lucius, was always your best friend."

"O, there it is! there it is! I want to see him again, but I can't, I can't, I'm only a dwarf! Askanus told me the other day, that if he were good, he would soon be where my young master is, and that is where I want to go, but I am only a dwarf, I'm only a dwarf!" continued he wringing his hands.

Lydia could scarcely conceal her emotion at the faithful and affectionate remembrance of the departed, and found great difficulty in persuading Thrax, that his diminutive body was no obstacle, to his being one day united to his deceased master. His countenance began to brighten up at this assurance, and he asked if he tried to be as good as Askanus, to whom he had become greatly attached, might he not soon know all about the happy place of which they were always talking?

Lydia told him that he could come with her every day to visit Askanus, and receive instructions, but that the God of the Christians was to be loved for Himself, and not for any other consideration.

We will now leave Thrax on his way to Christianity, and reflect on how faithfully Seraphica fulfilled the duties for which she had so ardently petitioned when in the dungeon at Smyrna. "Mother, I shall not die yet, I have besought our Lord not yet to call me to my eternal home; I wish to suffer, not to die:

I burn with the desire of showing to the world, in the mirror of a pure life, the devotion to our Redeemer, and to relate to unbelievers what the Son of God has done for man. Not till I have fulfilled that mission, shall I be called hence. It may be long till then! God has heard my prayer—my Guardian Angel has revealed it to me!"

CHAPTER XXV.

THE CONCLUSION.

Nosse peræta juvat, sed præstat tradita posse.

It is beautiful to know what is noble, but still more beautiful to practise it. Thus we see in a slave, weak in sex, in age, and above all, in her state of life, to what an elevation grace can raise the heart. God has chosen the weak ones of the world to confound the strong.* Suppose Lydia had not been rewarded for this triumph of virtue by any temporal gains, by honors or dignities, what consequence?

Earthly splendor, and exterior recognitions are a mere accidental gift of the interior moral greatness, which could neither be raised nor lessened by her.

Notwithstanding, it thus generally happens that honor likes to attach itself to virtue, and follows it, as though it were her shadow.

This much-tried girl could tell what wisdom lies in affliction. She would never have reached that degree of virtue, had she not passed through the fiery ordeal of suffering. If virtue is to appear in its beauty, she must for a time suffer oppression. The martyrs of our holy Church would never have died so resigned and joyful, if unutterable sorrows had not led them through the dark labyrinths of their lives to the open gates of justice—for them the gates of triumph.

Witness Polycarp, Justin, Blandina, Pothinus of Lyons and a multitude of others. It is, in fact, the truly gifted souls whom God visits, purifies and perfects. This very truth Seneca so beautifully explained by the words: "Miserable he, who was never miserable. There is not an anguish, if we begin with the blighted hopes of youthful loving heart, down to that of treachery, torture and the laceration of a despairing mind, which will not there find a complete expression. Every injustice is an admonishing voice in this valley of tears, and the oftener it returns, the more we long for our departure, which, correctly speaking, is our way home. But a friendship with death is the greatest triumph of the human mind over the terror of nature. How magnificent is the sun surrounded by stormy clouds when sinking to the West! But while one hemisphere admires his departing beauty, another, at the same moment is cheered by his rising splendor, thus sinking and rising are one of the same. With man it is even so; his departure from this world is a hymn of joy to Heaven and a kiss to death, which eternity gives to the approaching soul, as the seal of an indissoluble espousal. Through the life of our slave, a warm zeal animated her for the salvation of souls. She had the lamp of faith lighted up in the sun of revelation, and carried it as well in her humble dwelling as in the palace of the wealthy. The love by which it was animated, conquered all obstacles. "I passed by thee, and saw thee," said the prophet, "and behold thy time was the time of lovers."† She wandered on the thorny way imprinted with the footsteps of the Lord, and when she saw a loiterer, either to the right or to the left, she called to him: "Thou slow of heart, why delayest thou, come without fear, without hesitation, be not timid in treading on thorns, which fell from the crown of your King." Such are souls as God wills them, not those who loiter about inactively counting the grains of sand. O how is, also in our days, the number of the afflicted so large and our love so small! "Ye shall be fishers of men," said the Lord to His disciples, and He Himself went out before them as a divine model. For he once in the fulness of time looked down from the highest Heavens on the dark ocean of the universe, where myriads of worlds were in motion. Looking also on our planet, whose inhabitants were sighing after light and truth, He lowered His doctrine in the net of mercy, and drew us all to Him. His disciples followed His example. The Prince of the Apostles, while hauging on the cross, admonished his third successor, Cletus: "Never forget to preserve your own soul, in saving the souls of your brethren." The same duty is also laid on the conscience of each one of us. "Salvando Salvabimur."

While we describe the bitter trials of a single unbloody martyr in that century of affliction, another picture of incomparably greater martyrdom presents itself to our eyes. The bride of Jesus Christ—the holy Church. Was not the Church herself that slave, who already in her earliest youth carried the chains of slavery? Unsheltered, this orphan wandered about, after her paternal home, Jerusalem, was laid desolate, of which Smyrna's destruction was a mere painting. As a fugitive maiden this same bride journeyed across the Mediterranean Sea, and entered into the service of an imperious, sensual, and crowned mistress, rolling in superfluous prosperity: and the name of this mistress is Rome. She served there nearly three hundred years, during constant ill-treatment, mockery, and persecution and tortures even to the heart's blood. Who imagined then, that from this obscurity and after such contempt, so powerful a life, so rich in influence would unfold itself? Then came the time in which this proud mistress submitted to be taught by the low and persecuted maiden. a time in which princes abjured their tyranny and absolute will, and shared with the slave the possessions of the world, and both named themselves: Christian Empire, and Christian Church. This remarkable day, the most important since the day of our Redemption, was the 29th of October, in the year 312. "It appears to be almost a general law," said an observer of the people, "that the prosperity or success of things is connected with a certain obscurity."* What a coming forth, after three hundred years of secrecy and silence! That effect was not accomplished by physical strength, not by the sword, but by a power called Christian charity. For this charity is of all powers the greatest on earth, and what she fails to conquer, is unconquerable.

It was a conflict to be, or not to be, which was kept on from Nero's time to that of Constantine. After the conquest, the last of which was gained over Maxentius on the Tiber, he passed in triumph through the streets of Rome and, with him brought the Faith victorious to the "Eternal City."

A lance-bearer walked before the chariot of the conqueror, holding on high the bleeding head of the conquered—it was the head of fallen heathenism. "Not captive strangers," remarks a writer of that time, "swell the triumph, but armies of vices which had hitherto filled the city conquered crimes, perfidy, haughtiness, cruelty, pride, scorn, voluptuousness and unlawful desires, all these were bound in iron chains. But still more remarkable and less known than one would imagine, is the edict which Constantine and his partner in power, Licinius, appointed to be proclaimed in Nicomedia."

"As we have known long since," said the Emperors. "that freedom in religion is not to be denied, and that the practice of which, is left to the will and views of each one, so should we have sooner commanded that like all others, the Christians should be free to hold their religious views.

"But as this permission has been granted on many and various conditions, so it has perhaps happened that by a constrained practice of their religion, many have been repulsed. As we therefore, I, the Emperor Constantine, and I, the Emperor Licinius arrived happily together in Milan, and as we took into consideration all that concerned the security of the public welfare, we believed ourselves obliged before all things else, first to arrange what concerned the worship of the Divinity, so that we gave to the Christians the same freedom as to all others, to follow that religion, which they considered best suited to their views and happiness. In order that whoever is the Divinity in Heaven, that He may be gracious to us, and to all our subjects. All former proclamations contrary to this, are to be null and void.

For it is clear and compatible with the peace of our time, that each one should have the choice to worship whatever divinity he will, and that hereby no sort of religious worship is to be excluded.

"In addition to this, whatever concerns the Christians in particular, we have found it good to determine, that their former houses of assembly, and the estates they formerly possessed, which, according to certain edicts, fell into the hands of the law or otherwise, shall be returned gratuitously and if the present possessors ask for compensation, they must apply for it to the imperial governor."

Strangers admire to the present day, the ruins of the triumphal arch which the Senate erected to the "Liberator of the city:" and who can behold Constantine's arch without being moved at the remembrance of that day!

But now there shall be a new contemplation of things, a lasting reconciliation made between religion and temporal power. The arm of the Church henceforward shall be free, equal to that of the State; both arms shall have one and the same pulsation, the spirit of the Redeemer. The two highest institutions of the earth, a Christian Church, and a Christian State: these two arms belong to one and the same body, Jesus Christ. For the Messiah Himself will rule the world for the future with one hand through the Church, in distributing the gifts of the spirit, with the other through the State, caring for the temporal interests of the people. So will He, as Master of the world, guide His children to the home where He has prepared mansions for them. The period of that torturing conflict, in which Church and State seemed to bleed to death, was symbolically expressed in the figure of the Crucified One. His two hands intended to bestow blessings, were pierced, and the blood flowed down from the cross for three hours, He who wished to embrace all lovingly was crucified. The Church too, which was intended to raise man, and lead him towards his high destination, was galled by the State for a period of three hundred years.

After the Resurrection, our Lord appeared to His disciples, raised His hands, showed them His wounds and said Pax Vobis: and after the Church and State had celebrated their long-hoped-for resurrection, they had also no words more beautiful to proclaim to the world, than the same peaceful salutation: "Pax Vobis."

Peace to the people, by the right that had its origin in the Divine will, and peace to each individual through religion, which with right took root in one and the same soil—the heart of Jesus.

This new ordination of all religious and civil events was first through the merits of the Son of God; to Him therefore the first thanks are due. But after Him these intrepid combatants claim our next thanks—those who shrank not from any sacrifice to call forth the new state of things. How many tears, how many sighs, and how much blood were necessary to obtain this greatest of all good gifts. What did it not cause to save this precious inheritance from the shipwreck of the states, from the pestilential breath of heresy, and from the torrents of so many revolutions! This inheritance has passed on to the present century, and we are the possessors of it. Thoughtless is he who has never taken into consideration at what a price it has been purchased, and the deepest contempt falls to his lot, who sullies the treasure of faith with the raucor of mockery. But we have inherited this treasure unscathed, to deliver it over to our descendants. The light of our eyes will be soon extinguished, but when our graves will have disappeared, and our very names will have faded from the memory—yes, when the temples erected, and palaces of our royal cities fall to ruins, then will the later generations still reflect on the champions of the first century, and their hearts will beat stronger at the soul-stirring thought: "We are the descendants of Holy Martyrs!"
